And yet, Regulus slides open James' door very carefully just a few minutes later, slipping inside without making a sound. James isn't asleep, though, but he does look very sleepy, like he's dangerously close to drifting off. He blinks at Regulus as if he's not entirely sure that he's there. Regulus doesn't speak, or move, just standing there and feeling so very small.

"Reg?" James mumbles cautiously.

"I'm—I'm sorry to bother you," Regulus croaks, swallowing past the lump in his throat. "Could I—would it be alright if I slept with you tonight?"

James doesn't immediately respond. For a long, long moment, he's just staring at Regulus with his eyebrows furrowed, lips pressed into a thin line. It's at this precise moment that Regulus realizes that some part of him expected James to instantly agree in that earnest way of his, because James always has. But that's clearly not the case anymore, and Regulus can't even blame him.

It's indescribably selfish of Regulus to come here, demanding comfort and security from James when he offers absolutely nothing in return, not even the simple courtesy of not ignoring him. They're in this together, they've been through all of it together, and Regulus has only repaid James' reliability with indifference and distance. He doesn't mean to be cruel; he wishes he didn't need James as much as he does, especially when he can't figure out how to give him what he deserves.

He failed. James needed better from him, and just like he knew he would, Regulus failed to give it to him.

But Regulus is here, and he's internally pleading for James not to refuse him now. He wouldn't blame James if he did, if he needed his space, if he needed distance, too. This is hurting him, all of it, Regulus knows that. He asks for too much from James, when James asks for nothing from him.

I'm going to lose him, Regulus thinks, the realization hitting him at full force, and it's like having his heart broken all over again. I'm already losing him, Regulus thinks next, and it sends a fresh wave of panic through him.

The worst part is, he's never really had James at all.

James exhales a quiet sigh, reaching over to throw his cover back, shaking his head slightly as he says, "Come on, then."

"I shouldn't have asked," Regulus croaks.

"Probably not, but you did," James replies simply, patting the bed beside him. "It's fine, Regulus."

"Is it?" Regulus murmurs.

"It'll have to be," is James' response as he lays back, and the inviting curve of his body, the memory of his warmth and how it feels to be in his arms, is a temptation Regulus is far too weak to resist, especially now.

"I'm sorry," Regulus whispers as he pads over and slips right into the bed next to James, feeling safe the moment that he's there, like he always has. It's different at night, when he's trying to sleep. Touch always is. He isn't sure why it's bearable now but isn't any other time. Right now, he doesn't care.

"I've had a really bad day, so anything I say to you won't be nice, I don't think, and I'll just regret it later," James informs him, curling his arm up around Regulus' shoulders.

Regulus swallows and tucks himself closer, practically embedding himself into James' side and the curl of his arms, hiding his face as he mumbles, "Are you angry at me?"

"Regulus," James says, his voice strained.

"Please don't be angry at me," Regulus rasps, his voice going wobbly and cracking in the middle against his will. "I really fucking hate it when you're angry at me."

James takes a deep breath, holds it, then blows it out explosively and releases a groan as he turns slightly and gently bangs his head against Regulus' shoulder. "Oh, don't do that. Come on, that's not fair. You sound so sad…"

"I am sad," Regulus admits.

"Oh, fuck off," James complains. "This is—emotional manipulation. I will not fold."

"I'm not…asking you to. That's not what I'm trying to do. I just—I came here because I've also had a very bad day, and I can't sleep, but you—you make me feel…" Regulus trails off, struggling for a moment, because it's so vulnerable. But, after everything, he can admit this to James. He's going to, because James should know. He deserves to hear it. "You make me feel safe, that's all. That's why I'm here."

"Alright, I'm folding," James declares with another sigh, then he gives a weary chuckle, sounding tired, even as he wraps his arms more firmly around Regulus and pulls him closer.

Regulus probably shouldn't feel smug about that, but he does. He can't help it. A tiny smile curves his mouth, pleased, and he hides it against James' shoulder. They're all tangled up together like this, their legs entwined and their arms wrapped around each other with basically no space between them. It feels so good. So safe. Regulus' eyes flutter shut as a soft sigh escapes him, everything in him settling down all at once. Oh, he's missed this.

James is so warm. He's so, so warm. He smells good, too, and Regulus is lost to sensation and the steady pulse of I miss you, I miss you, I miss you and I'm so happy to be home, I've wanted to come home for so long, please don't make me leave.

They lay there, warm and wrapped up together, and Regulus is more settled than he's been in a long time. He breathes in and out, listening to James doing the same, feeling his steady heartbeat against him, strong and alive. So alive. Regulus is so grateful that James is alive.

It's the last thing he remembers thinking, and then he remembers nothing because he sleeps. He doesn't dream.

He won't see Evan in his dreams again for a long, long time.

Chapter End Notes

for those of you coming for the warning/explanation for james' issue with time: i don't really know the term for what it is, honestly, or if there is a term—but he essentially gets triggered by grief over vanity and hodge, and it makes him lose time and his own placement for where he is. sirius knows what it is and gets him safely alone the best he can, with regulus' help. it's from regulus' POV, so we don't see what james is thinking, only what he's doing. he bumps into things and knocks them over, turns over a table looking for his hatchet, and basically wrecks a train compartment until his leg gives out and sirius can take care of him and help him. no one gets hurt. it's just very upsetting for everyone involved. it's also mentioned that this has happened in the past once where he found a hatchet in his backyard and swung it at sirius' head. we do see james' feelings on the matter after it happens, and they're not—kind to himself, which he KNOWS, but he also does make the effort to be kinder to himself about it.

right, so this one was rough, huh? let's talk about it.

first, dorcas and marlene my beloveds <3 they're complete shit at being friends lmaoooo. this is both a Good Thing, and also a Bad Thing. we'll see more on that later! HOWEVER. me back at it again finding a way to have dorcas give marlene a ring. hey, at least im consistent 💀 LEAVE ME ALONE OKAY I LIKE WHAT I LIKE STOP BULLYING ME FOR BEING REPETITIVE!!! you can rip "dorcas gives marlene her ring" from my cold, dead hands. also, that ring features quite a lot in this fic, so really, it's important to the plot.

okay, james and marlene being Stiff and Awkward with each other—fear not, they get along later! just, marlene is a new mentor, and james DID technically kill one of her tributes, so like. it's not as if they're going to get on easily from the very beginning.

sorry, but sirius carried this chapter!!! an icon! he is the moment. giving so much good, supportive advice. remus really changed him 😭😭😭 like, he spent 2 weeks with remus and came out the other side a healthier person. noooo, im gonna sob but sirius reassuring james and regulus to do what they can and not force what they can't, and just—do what's best for themselves? i love him.

right, and then you've got james, who had a very Bad Day. not doing well, not at all, but this is to be expected after everything. and like, the impact sirius has on him is so, so important in this, because it helps him actively combat the things he struggles with. having an injury, having trauma, having grief—these are not things to be ashamed of. please never think it is.

onto regulus and his struggles with failure, as well as evan. yeah, he's...not doing well either, clearly. the fact that evan genuinely had NO ONE until regulus is fucking heartbreaking, even more so now that regulus has come to appreciate having evan in the only way he can (in his dreams), except that's been taken from him too. he really won't dream of evan after this for a VERY long time. so, ya know, to everyone sad about seeing the evan mentions, well, be careful what you wish for.

the horrible part is, regulus tried his absolute best to climb that tree for evan, and he couldn't do it. all he wanted to do was apologize, and he didn't get to. just. shit, that's so sad :(

him being absolutely TERRIFIED that he's losing james 😭😭😭 i want to drive off a fucking cliff. like, james is trying to do what's best for him (he's not very good at it lmaoooo and we see his struggles with that), but regulus is over here PANICKING bc he thinks he's going to lose james. devastating, honestly.

but they still cuddled, so. waves hand they'll be fineeeee. HELP NOT REGULUS BEING SAD AT THE THOUGHT THAT JAMES IS MAD AT HIM 😭😭😭 he really hates that shit. he's so valid, i would too. and him being smug because james "folds" for him. that little shit, i love him so much.

HONORABLE (?) MENTIONS:

-marlene nearly cutting her finger off and just stitching it herself. im in love with her
-mayor matilda minding her business, as she should
-the near-riot in district eleven (These Actions Will Have Consequences)
-sirius blocking regulus from james (this shit was so sad to me, im sorry)
-EMMELINE!!! I LOVE HER!!!
-cows being called moo-moos in district nine
-regulus cheating in tree-climbing with a ladder and STILL failing at it (im foul for saying that 💀)
-regulus telling james that he makes him feel safe
-regulus thinking of being in james' arms as coming home 😭😭😭 yeah, that's it, i suppose! i wanted to say thank you to everyone for all the comments and support <3

District eight is hard for James, because it's home to his first kill. The man's name was Cole, he was twenty-four, and he had a wife and two children. Two little girls—one still so young that she's held by her mother, and the other so small that she barely makes it to her mother's knee. Both of them are enamored by their father's picture on the screen behind them, reaching for him with small hands and tear-stained cheeks.

James throws up after they leave the stage.

District seven is an easier one, home to two tributes they never spoke to, but one of them was a child, which is always hard to handle. James and Regulus stand on stage, giving their speeches, their hands clasped between them.

They bypass district six—home—but all of them (Sirius, James, and Regulus) stare wistfully as they go by, even if it does signal that they're basically halfway through the victory tour already.

District five is where things get interesting.

Sirius is delighted to see Frank, and Frank doesn't protest when Sirius pulls him into a hug. Frank was in his games years and years ago—only two years after Sirius, and two years older than Sirius, so he was twenty when he won—but he didn't become a mentor until five years ago, when he finally talked his mother into retiring and letting him take over.

Emmeline has been around a while, too, in much the same way. She's a year younger than Sirius, and she won her games three years after Sirius won his. Since she was eighteen, she could become a mentor straight away if she was willing, and apparently she was, because she did. Sirius had only been a mentor for a year by that point, so he was still very wary of basically everyone and so new to everything. Learning to navigate the struggles of being a mentor, as well as the expectations the Hallows had for him.

When Frank came in, though, he was friendly with anyone who was friendly to him, very easy to get along with, but also not someone to underestimate. He's a good man, but he's brought home a Victor twice—his very first year as a mentor and the year before James and Regulus' games. That may not seem like much, but two Victors in five years is a big thing when you're not training up death eaters.

Sirius is admittedly closest to Marlene, purely because he couldn't help but want to ease her transition into being a mentor, something she was struggling with. Sirius had struggled with it, too. A lot. So, he tried to help, just like Alastor Moody helped him when he was just starting out, and in doing so, he and Marlene got pretty close.

Emmeline and Frank are close in the same way, if not for the same reasons. But, really, they're all a close little group between the four of them, offering comfort and solidarity every single year when the torture swings back around. Sirius is grateful for them all, and grateful to see their homes, to see them safely somewhere other than the Hallow.

So, yes, he pulls Frank into an enthusiastic hug, much like he did with Emmeline and Marlene. Just like them, Frank meets him halfway. They all have this thing they carry between them that no one else can understand.

"It's good to see you, Sirius," Frank says warmly. "You look well. Been doing alright?"

"Carrying on well enough," Sirius assures him, smacking a kiss to his cheek and grinning when Frank immediately presses the back of his hand to his forehead and pretends to swoon. They burst out laughing immediately after.

James clears his throat. Loudly.

"Oh!" Sirius says, perking up. "Frank, this is James, and that's Regulus. You know Pandora, of course, and Dorcas is the best damn stylist you'll ever see. Everyone, this is Frank."

A chorus of polite greetings go around, excluding James, who is—for some reason—glaring at Frank like he's kicked his cat. James doesn't even have a cat. His cat is dead. Has been for years, so Sirius isn't sure what that's all about.

The mayor shows up, then. A very frenzied man, short and stout and babbling before he even introduces himself. Sirius is amused by the poor man, admittedly, because he's quite possibly the most disorganized person Sirius has ever seen, and he owns a mirror. Mayor Larch has to feed them lunch before James and Regulus have to give their speeches, and then they'll be on their way to district four, which they'll reach by the evening, then they'll be heading overnight to district three where the tour will pick right back up the next morning.

For now, though, Mayor Larch goes on a long tangent full of apologies for the wait, because they're a bit behind schedule, so lunch won't start for another half hour. Sirius doesn't mind, and says as much, happy to keep chatting with Frank.

So, Mayor Larch darts off again with promises to return and escort them to lunch as soon as it's ready. Dorcas pretty much instantly goes out to have a smoke, and Pandora marches off after the mayor with the clear determination to organize that poor man's entire life, which maybe he needs, honestly.

James and Regulus stay behind, standing with Sirius as he talks to Frank. Regulus, as always, doesn't provide much input; he's never been much of a conversationalist anyway, but he seems content enough to just lean against the wall and listen. James, on the other hand, apparently has a lot to say.

He repeatedly shoves his way into the discussion—verbally, of course, not physically—even when Sirius knows for a fact that James has no idea what they're talking about. Frank likes to tinker a bit, same as Sirius, though he works more with welding and such that Sirius doesn't, most of the time. But some of the things they've done or worked with have some overlap, which makes for a very good debate on the benefits of one technique over the other. James doesn't know his way around a kiln, so Sirius is a bit confused as to why he suddenly has some very aggressive opinions, all of which contradict Frank's…even when Frank is right.

Regulus, for some reason, looks like he's having the time of his life. Genuinely, he's delighted. He keeps coughing into his fist, clearly disguising laughter, which is odd. Sirius has absolutely no idea what's so funny.

By the time Mayor Larch has returned—being led by Pandora, who is no doubt in charge now—James has practically melded himself to Sirius' side, which Sirius doesn't have an issue with, of course, but it does cause an awkward moment when Mayor Larch mistakes Sirius for Regulus because he assumes that he and James are a couple, and Regulus is known to be the boyfriend. Due to the fact that James has an arm around his shoulders and seems bound and determined to remain by his side, this is possibly not an unfair assumption to make.

"Oh, go on," Sirius tells James, nudging him away. "Just stand with Regulus, yeah? The poor mayor is confused as it is, and I'm fine with Frank."

James stares at him, mouth hanging open, but Sirius is already walking forward to catch up with Frank and head to lunch. He hears Regulus wheezing behind him and briefly glances back to make sure he's not, like, dying; he's not, he's just laughing really hard at James, for some reason. Sirius leaves them to it.

Lunch is fun for Sirius, who parks himself in a chair next to Frank and talks to him the entire meal. Frank has countless stories about his mother, who Sirius does remember as a rather frightening woman. The fact that she had to mentor her own son and help him survive the hunger games is just another fucked up thing the Hallow sees no issue with. Nonetheless, Augusta handled it and helped her son get home.

According to Frank, all his mum does these days is yell at the children who run through the Victor's Village and grumble about all the gossip she learns throughout the district. Also, she fusses at Frank for something that's not even true.

"I swear I've told her a million times that Alice and I aren't together; we're just roommates, but she doesn't believe me," Frank complains in distress. "She'll show up unannounced, all suspicious-like, as if she's trying to catch us in a compromised position, and I haven't a clue how to make her stop."

"Have you…told her to stop?" Sirius asks.

Frank looks aggrieved, the poor sod. "One doesn't just tell my mother to do anything. She means well, she does, but she's genuinely just fighting shadows, at this point. She doesn't approve of Alice for me—which is a load of rubbish, because Alice is brilliant—but that's just it! We're not even together."

"Do you want to be together?" Sirius asks, arching an eyebrow at him.

"No, honestly, it's not like that between us. Alice is brilliant, but they're just my best friend," Frank says, heaving a sigh. "Mum doesn't believe it, though."

"Ah, well…" Sirius clicks his tongue and reaches out to clap Frank on his shoulder. "Mothers, am I right?"

Frank sighs.

Across the table, James angrily stabs at his food with his fork.

Regulus is grinning. He looks so entertained, which Sirius doesn't really understand, but it's nice to see him like this, so he's not complaining.

All of Sirius' confusion gets cleared away a bit later, before James and Regulus are to go onto the stage. Sirius leaves Frank to go check on them, as he always does before they head out to give their speeches, but James is in a mood, clearly.

When Sirius asks if he's alright, James scowls off to the side and mutters, "Oh, I'm grand. Don't let me keep you. I'm sure you and Frank want to talk about stupid blowtorches or the difficulties of bad parenting."

"The—I—what?" Sirius blinks. James just scowls, then whips around and marches off to apparently go talk to Pandora. Sirius looks at Regulus, who tucks his lips in with amusement dancing in his eyes. "What am I missing?"

"James is jealous," Regulus informs him.

"Jealous?" Sirius arches an eyebrow. "Someone sniffing around you, Reggie?"

Regulus breaks out into a grin again, one so rare that Sirius feels his heart clench just looking at it. "Not jealous because of me, you idiot. He's jealous of Frank, because of you."

"What?" Sirius blurts out, bewildered. "But Frank is—I mean, we're just friends." He pauses, then frowns. "Wait, James wouldn't care if Frank was more than a friend anyway."

"Sirius," Regulus says, struggling not to laugh, "he's jealous because you and Frank are friends. James is your best friend, remember? He feels threatened."

Sirius opens his mouth, closes it, then shakes his head in disbelief. "Does he really?"

"Yes. I'm having a great time," Regulus says with a happy sigh, genuinely looking pleased. "It sort of feels like karma, you know? He's also being terribly adorable about the whole thing, but don't tell him I said that."

"But that's absurd," Sirius mutters, blinking rapidly and swiveling his head to locate James.

Regulus snorts. "I know that, but James is a possessive idiot who's having a rough week. Give him a break." Regulus smiles slightly and nods towards James. "Go on, go reassure him that he's your one and only bestest friend forever and ever."

"You're teasing, but he really is, you know," Sirius feels compelled to point out.

"Mm, yes, I know. It used to make me terribly jealous, too, in very different ways for both of you," Regulus admits.

"Well, that's absurd, too," Sirius tells him, rolling his eyes. "Now, if you'll excuse me, I have to go and reassure James that he's my one and only bestest friend forever and ever. Wish me luck."

"Luck," Regulus says, chuckling quietly, still so amused.

So, Sirius drifts over to appease James with less subtlety he should grant the situation, but James is blissfully oblivious and just happy to be reassured. Sirius is perhaps a little too doting, because James honestly is having a really bad week—they all are, frankly, but James truly does have it coming down on him from all sides, so he deserves a little extra love anyway. Sirius gives it to him in heaps, splaying out all over him dramatically and announcing to everyone within hearing range that James is the best best friend anyone could have, including Frank.

James finally relaxes, and something about the whole situation sort of breaks Sirius' heart. For one thing, it agitates him that he didn't even notice. For another, Sirius is pretty sure that James is just…trying to hold onto what he doesn't want to lose, because this week is just a brutal reminder of all the things that have slipped through his fingers, and all the things that he can't actually have or hold onto.

In any case, once he's put at ease, James falls back on his usual casual charm with basically everyone, and he ends up falling prey to Frank's friendly demeanor. It's not long before he's giving in and getting along swimmingly with Frank, and it's obvious that James is sheepish about his previous actions because he instantly attempts to make up for it by being rather aggressively nice to Frank. This sort of comes off as flirting, if Sirius is honest, but Frank—ever easy-going and happy to adjust to the flow of things—matches James stride-for-stride.

And, honestly, Sirius has never given any thought to whether or not he'd fuck Frank. To be fair, Sirius has never given any thought to whether or not he'd fuck anyone but Remus, but he tentatively approaches the idea in his mind very carefully, mostly out of curiosity. As suspected, the desire just isn't there, no matter how objectively good-looking Frank is, but he tries to figure out why. There is, of course, the rather large brick wall he runs into in the form of Remus, who he's very head over heels in love with, but past that, what is it?

Sirius tries to get the bottom of it, wondering if it's because of his internal disgust with anything sexual that's not faked, due to the Hallows; or is it just because he doesn't trust Frank? Well, that's a little unfair. Sirius does trust Frank, but with sex? No, he's not sure that he does, honestly. He had to build that trust with Remus, adjust to it, before he really felt the true desire to do it. Frank is his friend, but that's not the sort of trust they've ever built between them.

Meanwhile, James has no such requirements, so he's not immune to the effect Frank can have when he gives an easy grin and lazily tucks his thumbs through his belt loops, eyes sparkling with laughter. The flirting is almost a competition at this point, and it doesn't surprise Sirius at all when Regulus abruptly pops up like a bad habit, practically materializing out of thin air, no longer looking amused.

It seems to hit Frank and James at the same time what they were just doing, as well as why that's a supremely bad idea for everyone involved, much to their shared chagrin. Sirius knows neither of them really meant anything by it, knows it was all in good fun, but Regulus does not. He is not pleased, and poor Frank is obviously now on Regulus' shit list.

There's not much to be done about it, really. Regulus and James have to go out on the stage anyway rather soon, so they wander away, leaving Sirius with Frank while Pandora and Dorcas fuss over James and Regulus, making sure they're presentable and ready, as they always do.

"You're all a rather complicated bunch, aren't you?" Frank muses, tilting his head in vague curiosity.

Sirius snorts. "You have no idea, Frank."

"No, I get it," Frank tells him. "I come from a district of complicated, head-strong people, Sirius. I mean, my mum? You met Alice last year when they won their games. Irene and Mathias, too. Even me, a bit, I suppose. Born and raised in district five leads to some rather tenacious people."

Sirius just hums, because Frank is right. He's never met someone from five who wasn't resilient, even the tributes over the years that never got to be Victors.

It makes him wonder if the residents of district six, his home, have anything in common. As hard as he thinks about it, he can't come up with one thing they all share.

James is pretty sure Regulus is trying to break his hand. He's holding it so firmly that James is struggling not to wince. Right, so it's not a good idea to get caught up in flirting with beautiful people when Regulus is around. Noted.

It's not like it meant anything, of course. For James, it never does. Or, well, it hasn't seriously meant anything since his last relationship, when he finally came to the conclusion that Regulus was it for him. Besides, Regulus has no right to be jealous, the fussy prick. He's the one who told James to move on ages ago. Easy in theory; not so simple in practice, is it?

It's a little bit satisfying, honestly. James has seen Barty at Regulus' house a lot over the past six months, showing up and staying overnight, leaving the next morning for work. He's even seen Barty in the background through the window when going to drop off the daily flower, shuffling around while Regulus sits right there at his desk. James is not proud of the rather violent urges he's had many times to just go inside and drag Barty out by his fucking throat.

Nice to know Regulus finds it difficult to keep his head about him where James is concerned, too.

However, it does bring the subject to mind that they sort of can't be with other people, not really. Not for as long as the Hallow is infatuated with their love story. Sure, maybe they can do it in secret, maybe, but it'll always be a risk. James has no desire to be with anyone else, but that doesn't make him ignorant to how fucked up their predicament is.

What if Regulus could be happy with someone else? Barty, perhaps. Or just someone in the district he's never bothered to talk to, but possibly will some day. The mere thought makes James wilt in honest dejection and hurt, but at the same time, he'd never begrudge Regulus happiness, wherever he found it, even if it isn't with James.

Now isn't the time to stress about any of that, though, because they're out on stage, and there's the banners displaying Irene and Mathias. Irene has a family, just a mother and a father, while Mathias was apparently raised by their grandparents. Neither of them had siblings. They seemed to have found that in one another.

Like all the ones before them, district five is quiet as James starts the speech, but it's not a solemn sort of silence. No, this is tense. James can feel it, the restlessness of the crowd, the sharp gazes demanding something, furious for change. No one ever looks happy through this, but there is usually an overhanging level of defeat and resignation, just simple compliance, but district five doesn't seem to have that, at least not this year, for whatever reason. There's an energy over everyone that James can feel settling in his gut like a stone.

Despite this, James doesn't really expect anything to happen. He fully expects for them to get through the speech as they have in every district before, excluding district eleven, just as long as they don't lose it again. It's hard not to, seeing Mathias and Irene's faces, their families, forced into remembrance.

But they do it anyway, not missing a beat, because the lives of the people they care about are at stake, and James has already messed up once. It feels like a betrayal to Irene, to Mathias, but James just keeps thinking about his parents, about Sirius, about Regulus. He can't risk them. He won't.

It's going as it should for a bit, at least until someone, from somewhere in the crowd, raises their voice to shout, "This is bullshit! It's the same fucking Hallow-made speech with no heart! Hallow is hollow, Hallow is hollow, Hallow is hollow!"

James falters over his words, eyes going wide as the rest of the crowd picks up the chant, growing in volume and in rage. He stutters to a halt, clinging to Regulus' hand now, his heart racing in his chest as everything proceeds to go to shit all at once, so quickly that no one can do anything about it.

The Aurors standing at the front suffer the brunt of the crowd as they all seem to shove forward at once, and chaos unleashes practically everywhere. Someone breaks through, with others following, and the Aurors are severely outnumbered. There's a loud smattering of guns going off, bullets flying wide, people dropping to the ground but no one stopping.

Regulus moves fast, shoving James back and roughly tucking his head down as they go stumbling off the stage. Someone slams an Auror into the steps, wrestling with their gun, but it doesn't go off. James isn't even thinking as he wraps his arm around Regulus' waist, hauling him clear off his feet and swinging him around to shield him as they frantically flee.

Sirius has a hold of them in seconds, yanking them close and hastily shoving them further and further away until the screams and gunshots are muffled in the distance.

It's quiet on the train.

Regulus feels like he hasn't moved in years, like he's been sitting in the same spot that Sirius put him, and he's aging at a rapid rate, withering away too quickly to keep up with. Sirius won't let them leave the room—the train car he's been sleeping in—so they're all sort of just packed in together. James is sitting on the bed right next to Regulus, and Sirius has claimed the floor, closest to the door like a guard dog.

They're technically on lockdown, according to Pandora, who has been going in between the mayor and them to keep them updated on the entire situation. Lockdown means that they can't travel, and they're not allowed back into district five either; they're all just waiting for news from the Hallow.

Regulus can still see the line of bodies that fell to the ground, littered with bullets and blood. He can still hear the furious chant, as well as the following screams. All he keeps thinking about is Riddle and his cold, cold eyes.

"This is bad, isn't it?" James whispers, the first to break the silence after hours of it.

"It's—it's definitely not good," Sirius admits, his eyes locked on the door, likely waiting for Pandora to return, or maybe for Dorcas to join them. She'd said she was shaken by the violence and begged off to her own train car to take some time to calm down, grateful for Sirius' offer to stay with them, but needing time alone. Regulus can't blame her for that. It's probably the closest she's ever been to danger, as a Hallow.

"That was live. Everyone in the world saw that, didn't they? Or some of it," James croaks, sounding distressed.

Sirius grimaces. "I was watching the live feed and it didn't cut out until the gunshots started, so…yes."

"Oh, this is so bad," James mumbles, anxiously circling his cane between his hands, because his leg has been hurting since he essentially scooped Regulus up with one arm and ran off with him. He said he needed it, and Sirius got it for him. Occasionally, James has to stand up and pace slowly back and forth, leaning on his cane the whole way.

"I was talking to Frank," Sirius tells them, "and he says that the district has been feuding with the Aurors for years now. It's—it's a really defiant district without our involvement as it is, but seeing what happened in eleven and the fact that Irene and Mathias were adored by so many people… Well, this was just where the pot boiled over, basically. You didn't—neither of you did anything wrong, alright? This isn't on you."

"But it is," Regulus says softly, staring down at his knees, picking lazily at the seam on his outer right thigh. "It's going to come back on us, somehow."

"We don't know that," Sirius counters. "It's—yes, it's a possibility, but the victory tour isn't over. Nothing is going to happen before it is, for one thing, and there's still time. We stick to the plan, alright? The Hallow has been carrying on in blissful ignorance for years, and they'll continue to do so. Things will calm down. They will."

"Sirius," James chokes out, "Mum and Dad…"

Regulus feels a lump form in his throat, strangling him. He's not proud of it, but that same fear James has for the fate of his parents exists within Regulus for his own, because even after everything, he still… Well, honestly, he doesn't quite know what he feels for his mother and father; he just knows that the thought of them being hurt, or killed, scares him so much that he feels like he's choking on it.

Sirius doesn't have words of comfort for either of them. He just closes his eyes and sits on the floor, rocking back and forth, back and forth.

Eventually, Pandora comes back with news that the situation has calmed down and they've been cleared by the Hallow to continue on with the tour, so they disembark to head to district four. As the saying goes, the show must go on.

It's the last district for the day, and they show up late, way behind schedule. The entire square that would usually be full of people is empty, and the families of the tributes that died also aren't there on the platforms. It's Quinn and another tribute they didn't know. The cameras focus on James and Regulus only, and they're essentially just standing there, giving a speech to no one. It's disconcerting and as hollow as everything else. As they leave the stage, Regulus kisses James on the cheek, and then he pulls away as soon as they're out of sight from the cameras. He doesn't have anything to do with James after that, and he doesn't ask to sleep with him again.

The next morning, they have breakfast on the train, and then it's into district three they go. James is not at all looking forward to it, because it's Peter and Bernice.

There's something very fucking odd about having to stand up and give a speech in a district home to the deceased tributes that you, at some point, actually had issues with. With Cole and Hodge, James didn't have any prior problems with them before he killed them. Technically, James didn't kill Peter or Bernice, but he was right there for their deaths.

Things are back to normal, as far as the crowd returning and the families waiting in tribute for the fallen. Bernice, shockingly, had a fiance and a baby. She was a mother. Twenty-three years old, and her baby is still so small, can't be more than a year old, still held in the arms of their father. It strikes James that Bernice likely had between three and six months with her baby before her name was called, and she never mentioned her child, never talked about being a mother in interviews or called attention to it at all.

Peter only has his mother to stand on the platform for him. She's a short woman, and she seems even shorter from the way she hunches in on herself, never lifting her gaze to look up, not once. I'm sorry he didn't get to make it home, James thinks as he looks at her, his heart clenching violently in his chest.

On James' worst days, he is angry with Peter as much as he can be with anyone or anything he's ever felt any semblance of love for. It'll burn within him until he's seething, until he's wishing he can go back and kill Peter himself, and those nightmares are the worst. The ones where he has Peter's throat between his hands, squeezing harder and harder no matter how much he begs. It terrifies him, disturbs him, even if Sirius has told him many, many times that his dreams aren't a reflection of him and he has no control over them.

On James' best days, he can admit to himself that those dreams don't make him a bad person, because the truth is, he doesn't wish he had killed Peter at all. He wishes he could have saved Peter, but he couldn't; he was never going to be able to. On those days, the good ones, James misses Peter a lot, his laughter and his warmth and the way he cared for Vanity like James did. The reality of it is, Peter makes him sad; the entire timeline from start to finish, because maybe James deluded himself into believing that Peter could represent something good and true in that arena, when it was never fair to put that on Peter, who only wanted to survive.

James pulls away from Regulus first when they leave the stage, and he retreats into his room when they're all back on the train, refusing to come out until they reach district two.

Another difficult one, because this is Axus and Willa. Axus has a few siblings and both parents on their platform, while Willa was an only child being raised by her father, who looks completely indifferent—almost bored—by this entire process. Axus' family, at least, seems to be grieving still, and if they're even the slightest bit ashamed about all the things Axus got up to in the arena, there are no signs of it. James stands on stage, still using a cane because of Axus, and yet he honestly can't even blame Axus' family for not seeming bothered about the things Axus did. It was the hunger games. Axus wasn't a very good person there, but who knows what they were like outside of it? James doesn't, and he'll never know.

There's a different feeling in the districts closest to the Hallow, more Hallow-like, in fact. They seem actually touched by the speeches, and they're responsive, cheering for their fallen tributes and the Victors on stage before them. Somehow, this is almost worse than the hollow feeling.

District one is yet another difficult one, Mulciber and Avery, but Sirius and Regulus seem to grow more and more restless the closer they get. James can't really work out why until they arrive, and then all he can think is oh.

"I wasn't aware that this would be a family reunion," James whispers to Sirius, wide-eyed.

Sirius' smile is more of a grimace as the mayor comes along to meet them, three people drifting along with her. Only one man that James vaguely recalls Sirius pointing out to him in the Hallow as Mulciber and Avery's mentor, Lucius Malfoy. Of course, James knows that technically Lucius is Regulus and Sirius' cousin-in-law, but Sirius had made it clear that this was not something he was pleased about in the least.

Other than the mayor, there's two other women that James only slightly recognizes from memories when he was a child. Bellatrix and Narcissa (and Andromeda) lived in the Victor's Village with their father, so James actually knew them way before he knew Sirius, but only in passing. He saw them sometimes, and one time he caught Bellatrix trying to hit his cat with his broom, so he burst into tears and called for his mum, who got into a rather uproarious fight with Cygnus about actually watching his daughters.

In any case, the cat was fine, Bellatrix was just a bored teenager tired of a random stray sneaking in through her window, and life went on. James maybe had a small crush on Narcissa when he was really young, but he has never told a soul about it, not even Sirius. He grew out of it as it was, but he can appreciate the irony in his apparent affinity for having a thing for younger Black siblings.

James never saw Regulus or Sirius in the Victor's Village before he met Sirius the first time, which he thinks is due to the fact that Cygnus was a dreadful bastard who barely liked to let his own daughters in his house, let alone children that weren't his own. James recalls vividly the one time that Cygnus came home to find Alphard passed out, drunk, on his front porch; Cygnus had dumped him into the ditch and just—left him there. His own brother.

"Sirius," Regulus hisses, "why are they here? It's just supposed to be the mentor and the mayor."

"I worried they would do this," Sirius mutters. "Lucius probably had something to do with it, the prick."

"Will it really be so bad?" James mumbles. "I mean, they're your family."

"That's why it's going to be bad," Sirius says flatly.

At that precise moment, the approaching group catches sight of them, and Bellatrix tosses up her arms and calls, "Oh, there he is! My favorite little munchkin. Reggie, look how big you've gotten," before promptly moving right up to Regulus to reach out and pinch his cheeks as she coos, like he's a small child.

Kill me, kill me, kill me, Regulus thinks on repeat, his face scrunching as Bellatrix snatches him into a hug and ruffles his hair, still talking to him in that stupid baby-voice.

When they were children, Regulus was admittedly Bellatrix's favorite between him and Sirius. In Bellatrix's words, Sirius was a loud-mouthed little shit who had more hair than he had brains. Sirius once made Regulus cry, and Bellatrix pushed him down the stairs. And though Regulus would never admit it out loud, Bellatrix was always his favorite, too. He's pretty sure it's because he's a younger sibling, while she's the eldest; she always coddled him, spoiled him a bit, and Regulus was not immune to liking the fact that he could pretty much do absolutely no wrong in her eyes.

Sirius, of course, was Andromeda and Narcissa's favorite. They spoiled him, let him get away with murder, fussing at Bellatrix when she was mean to him. It's strange, because Regulus knows for a fact that Sirius always favored Narcissa over Andromeda, at least until they got older, and then his feelings changed. Maybe that's not strange at all, in retrospect. The things you feel as a child morphs when you grow, because you can suddenly understand all the things you didn't before.

For example, Regulus did not understand when he was a child that Bellatrix is fucking insane. He understands now, of course, and funny, isn't it, what difference time can make?

"It's good to see you, Sirius. You look well," Narcissa greets as she comes closer, but she doesn't go in for a hug, even if she's smiling. Regulus envies Sirius so much right now, because Bellatrix is still fawning all over him. "Bella, let him be, would you? He's massively uncomfortable, can't you tell?"

"Impossible," Bellatrix protests, though she thankfully does pull away. It's disconcerting how much she looks like Andy, or how much Andy looks like her, really. Narcissa has always been the odd duck, as far as shared traits in the family goes. There was a rumor for a long time that their mother had an affair with another man in the district, but no one ever dared to say it where Cygnus or Bella could hear. The rumors did stop when the man spontaneously went missing one day and was never seen again. No one knows what happened, but Regulus distinctly recalls a look of satisfaction on Bellatrix's face when the news broke out.

Regulus didn't understand what that meant back then, but he does now. He's quite sure his oldest cousin killed a man to make her little sister's life just a bit easier. The thing is, she hadn't even gone into her games yet.

"You look well, too, Regulus," Narcissa comments, smiling at him, small and demure, but her gaze is sharp. Clear. Pools of blue that cover more in their depths. Maybe it's a younger sibling thing, but much like Regulus, she's always been good about hiding things. The only difference is, she hides behind dainty smiles and gentle words, soft-spoken and pretty like artfully constructed glass you lock away so no one can touch it, so they can only look, because it's so fragile.

Narcissa is not, and never has been, fragile. Oh, she pretends to be, sure, but she's as dangerous as her sisters, especially because you don't expect it. Regulus remembers her games. People thought she was fragile, and she proved them wrong.

"Sirius," Bellatrix greets with much less enthusiasm than she showed to Regulus.

"Bella," Sirius replies mockingly, which makes Bellatrix's eyes narrow into slits, and Regulus releases a muted sigh.

This is going to be a long lunch.

Sirius does not want to be here. He really, desperately does not want to be doing this right now. Fuck, why did Bellatrix and Narcissa have to come? It is supposed to be the mayor and mentor only, but it doesn't surprise him that Narcissa and Bellatrix took the opportunity to come, and he doesn't doubt that Lucius had something to do with making that possible.

See, it's no secret that the Black family has…issues between the members that are estranged. There was a massive fight that took place before Narcissa and Bellatrix left the district, one that ended with Andromeda in tears, Bellatrix suffering a black eye, and Narcissa threatening to kill Cygnus.

It was all very dramatic, from what Sirius remembers, which honestly isn't much with his poor memory. He's been able to piece most of it together, though. Basically, Cygnus was an abusive piece of shit, particularly to Narcissa, who he was never sure was his daughter or not. Their mother died before Sirius was ever born, when Narcissa was still rather young, and it pretty much fell onto Bellatrix and Andromeda to take care of her. Mostly Andy, because Bella was and always has been truly unhinged.

In any case, Andy was the first to leave the house with a man the family didn't approve of, and Bella took that as a personal affront, while it hurt Narcissa deeply. However, as soon as Narcissa saw her chance to leave, to get out, she took it, too. As far as Sirius knows, she had no plans to take Bellatrix with her, not at first, but maybe Bellatrix just…invited herself along. He's not clear on the details, honestly. Andy doesn't like to talk about it very much, because it's still a sore subject.

Cygnus died not too long after all his children abandoned him, and Alphard followed behind him fairly quickly. Sirius has always wondered if part of Alphard's steady deterioration in those last months was because his older brother was dead. But, then again, Alphard had been killing himself on booze and drugs for so long by that point that it was never clear.

So, yes, the Black family is riddled with complications and generations of hurt, and as a family inclined to a flair for dramatics, this is easy to notice to those who pay attention. Lucius is unfortunately rather observant. Not only that, but he has insider knowledge as Narcissa's husband, Sirius is sure. He doesn't doubt that Lucius wants them here solely to get back at Sirius and Regulus for showing him up six months ago.

Lunch is painful.

Mayor Delores is just—well, Sirius doesn't think he's ever disliked someone so quickly in his life, which is saying a lot, considering the fact that he spends plenty of time with some very shifty Hallows. Somehow, Mayor Delores is worse, prim and proper and sickeningly sweet in that fake way that's so transparent that it may as well be air. She clears her throat in an infuriating little hem-hem every time she catches Sirius or James putting their elbows on the table.

Sirius is so fucking uncomfortable right now, even more so when making small talk with Bella and Cissa like they're not practically strangers to him. He does remember them, a bit. He remembers never liking Bellatrix very much, most of all.

All of this reminds him of stifling dinners with his parents, forced around the last people he wants to be near, stuck with the constant reminder of what his family is like. It's always either secrecy or complete madness with them. There's never been a Black that isn't, in some way, royally fucked up. He is unfortunately included in that, and doesn't at all appreciate having to confront it.

Pandora, the lovely jewel that she is, does most of the heavy lifting with keeping the conversation going. She's using what Sirius has decided to label her 'Hallow' voice. Meanwhile, Dorcas doesn't even bother pretending like she gives a shit about appeasing them, which Sirius really likes about her. She's bold, there's no denying that.

There's not much commentary about all of their respective times in the arena. He doesn't remember Cissa's at all, and he only vaguely recalls Bella's because it was the first one that the Hallows were actually excited about after the Quarterly Memorial that took place five years prior. People were still talking about the 60th hunger games by the time the 65th came around, but that faded into the background when Bellatrix got on screen, the first Black to go into the games since her father, decades before that.

Sirius wonders if, like him and Regulus and James and Effie and every other Victor he's ever known, Bellatrix and Narcissa don't like to talk about their games. They don't bring them up, and they don't bring up Sirius or Regulus' either, for which Sirius has the space in him to be grateful about.

Either way, the moment Sirius sees his chance to sneak off, he does just that. Lucius was making snide comments to Regulus and James, which had Sirius bristling, but Narcissa shockingly shut him down with one look, and he stopped and turned his attention to Mayor Delores instead. Pandora is somehow entertaining Bellatrix, while Regulus and Narcissa quietly eat and occasionally exchange the random comment or two. James is safely and wisely talking to Dorcas.

In other words, Sirius has his chance to flee, and just like his older cousins, he doesn't hesitate to take it.

He taps Dorcas on her shoulder as he goes by, and she doesn't miss a beat, passing him her pack of cigarettes and lighter that they've admittedly been sharing for days now.

Sirius stands outside and chain-smokes like his life depends on it. One right after the other, ignoring the distant sounds of conversation and clinking silverware drifting out to him.

He's not free for long, though.

"Got another one of those?" Narcissa asks as she sweeps outside to join him, leaning up against the pillar across from him with a small, tempered smile.

Sirius sighs, but he passes her a cigarette and flicks the lighter, watching her inhale and look off thoughtfully to the side as she exhales smoke. "I thought you would have quit by now."

"There are some things you don't grow out of," Narcissa replies. "I gave you your first puff of a cigarette, you know. You were ten. Do you remember?"

"Mhm," Sirius hums vaguely, even though he does not.

Narcissa seems to notice. "You caught me with one and begged me to try it, thought it was cool, but you always thought anything I did was cool. You took one puff, started coughing, looked disgusted, and swore never to do it again." She glances at him, her eyes drifting over him with something oddly sad. "Look at you now."

"Well, there are some things you do grow out of," Sirius mutters, pointedly taking a puff and blowing out rings slowly, one-by-one with expert precision, holding her gaze as he does.

"How's my sister?" Narcissa asks softly, and for the first time, Sirius wonders if this is why she's truly here.

Sirius purses his lips. "Being a raging bitch in the other room. Why do you ask?"

Narcissa's lips twitch. "Not that one. The other one."

"Andy's marvelous. Thriving, really," Sirius informs her, possibly a little too defensively. Narcissa doesn't look offended. "You have a niece."

"A niece," Narcissa whispers, her breath hitching so quietly that he almost misses it. "Do I? What's her name?"

"Nymphadora," Sirius mumbles.

"Now why would she do that to that poor child?" Narcissa asks, shaking her head as she inhales again.

Sirius can't help it. He snorts. "Honestly, I asked the same thing. No normal names in this family, you know the rules. In any case, we mostly call her Dora."

"I see." Narcissa falls silent for a bit after that, pensive, still smoking. Sirius steals a few glances at her, unable to help it. His memories are all faded and out of order, but she does star in more than a few of his older ones, some he's not even sure are actually real. "You've offended Lucius, you know."

"Ah, lovely, happy to hear it," Sirius declares, breaking out into a grin, defiant. He's expecting her to get annoyed, but she only chuckles. "If you think I'm going to apologize—"

"Don't bother. We both know it'd be a lie, and frankly, I'd expect nothing less. Lucius is a proud man about senseless things that only exist in his head."

"Not very high praise, coming from his wife."

"You know why I married him," Narcissa says bluntly.

An escape, Sirius thinks. "Yeah, I do. Regret it yet?"

"If only it were so simple," Narcissa muses. "He wants to try for a child. Preferably a son, he says."

"He—what?" Sirius balks, blinking at her in surprise. "After all this time, he still hasn't worked out that he's married to a woman with no desire for sex?"

Narcissa clicks her tongue, but she's slow to reply. She continues to smoke, and Sirius continues to stare at her in disbelief. He remembers this about her, and he's fairly sure it's not a memory he's just making up. The first time he was ever exposed to the topic of sex was because he'd caught Andy kissing a boy and went running right to Narcissa with about a million questions, which she dutifully answered. He was so young, but he remembers Narcissa telling him rather bluntly that she had no such desires, as her sisters did.

"Lucius always knew this about me. He also knew that I preferred the romantic company of women over any other gender, and no one sexually. That was never a secret."

"You're telling me that never bothered him?"

Narcissa arches an eyebrow at him. "No. Lucius never wanted me for sex, or for romance. He knows why I married him, has always known, and it was never about saving me, not to him. It's about power. He feels he has power over me, and I let him believe it. That delusion keeps me comfortable, and he has plenty of people to warm his bed to keep him comfortable."

"That's…" Sirius grimaces and shakes his head. Honestly, he hates the sound of it, but it's what Narcissa chose. It's what Narcissa made happen, on purpose. Lucius was nothing more than a puppet on her strings, and likely still isn't. "Right, if that's the case, why ask you for children?"

"Well, we're married, so he'd like his child to come from his wife over anyone else," Narcissa explains.

Sirius raises his eyebrows at her. "Are you going to do it?"

"I'd love to be a mother. I may have no desire to have sex, but I do enjoy it from time-to-time, though never with men. I could likely talk him into other options, insemination perhaps, but I won't do it," Narcissa murmurs. She takes a harsh pull on her cigarette, cheeks hollowing out, and her eyes flash as she exhales. "I want to raise a child. He wants to train a Victor."

"He's scum, you know that?" Sirius says in disgust, instantly getting what she means. Not that could he really miss it, seeing as she has put it so bluntly. He can appreciate that she has no plans to indulge Lucius' wish, though.

Narcissa just hums and looks away. "And you, Sirius? The Hallows heartthrob. You have your own scum stuck to the bottom of your shoe while daring to judge mine."

"I didn't step in mine on purpose."

"Didn't you?"

Sirius clenches his jaw. "For survival, nothing more."

"Yes, same as me, but of course you don't see it that way."

"You could have stayed, you know."

"No, I really couldn't," Narcissa replies. "There was nothing for me there."

"And what do you have here?" Sirius challenges.

"Almost everything," is Narcissa's quiet response, still blowing smoke, the cloud drifting away in the distance, an echoed distance in her eyes. Sirius thinks that, in the distance of her gaze, she's looking for Andromeda.

Regulus is going to kill Sirius. How dare he abandon him now? With her. Regulus understands that family is particularly hard for Sirius, especially now that he knows Sirius has memory issues, but Regulus would feel a lot better if he was here.

Bellatrix is a menace.

It's hard to describe, because at times, she seems so genuinely fond of him. In other moments, it appears her fondness for being a raging lunatic outweighs that.

Case in point:

"So, Regulus, what have you been up to as of late?" Bellatrix asks as she falls right into Sirius' empty chair in between him and James, leaning back and kicking her feet up on the table without a beat of hesitation.

Regulus stares at her.

Bellatrix is unperturbed by his silence. "The last time I saw you, Reggie, you were so sweet. Still as shy as ever, clearly." She waits, then chuckles when he continues to stare at her. "Oh, go on, tell me all that I missed. How were the teenage years? Dreadful time for us all, of course, but give me all the sordid details."

"There's not very many," Regulus lies flatly.

"Oh, sure there are." Bellatrix frowns slightly when he, once again, offers no response. "Cheer up, munchkin. Turn that frown upside down; I remember you smiling a lot more than this. Where'd that go?"

"Hem-hem," Mayor Delores says, clearing her throat over and over until everyone looks at her. She gives Bellatrix a simpering smile. "Feet don't go on the table, dear."

"Forks usually don't go into eyeballs either, but I can make that happen, too," Bellatrix tells her, lifting one foot and dropping it back down to send a fork sailing up from the table through the air, which she snaps her hand out to grab. She grins at Mayor Delores, staring her down, and Mayor Delores goes pale and silent as soon as she recognizes the threat. Bellatrix gets to leave her feet on the table. "Anyway, Regulus, you were saying?"

"I wasn't," Regulus murmurs.

"Oh, alright, if you don't want to talk about any of that, I suppose I'll just meet the boyfriend, shall I?" Bellatrix swivels her head. "Potter!"

At the loud, shrill call of his name, James jolts and jerks around in his chair, blinking rapidly. "Er…yes?"

"My, you did grow up handsomely, didn't you?" Bellatrix says in apparent amusement, lazily tossing the fork on the table before reaching towards James with clear intentions to touch his face, likely to swivel him by his chin to examine him.

She doesn't quite make it, because Regulus' hand snaps out to catch her wrist, his voice sharp when he declares, "Don't touch him."

"Oh?" Bellatrix's eyebrows fly up, and she looks thrilled instantly. "So, it's true, then? I didn't really believe it, honestly, that you two were actually together, but look at you being all protective and whatnot." She drops her face into a scowl and lowers her voice, mocking, "Don't touch him. Goodness, someone's possessive. Let go of me, would you? I just want to have a little talk with him. Give him a speech about being good to you like any respectable older cousin would."

"Bella," Regulus hisses, "leave him alone. I'm not joking."

"Or what?" Bellatrix teases, grinning at him.

Regulus squeezes her wrist tighter, too tight, but she doesn't even flinch. "If you touch him, the only one getting stabbed with a fork is you. Now stop being so…"

Honestly, he doesn't even know the word for it.

"You're no fun," Bellatrix complains with a pout, slumping in her chair and flapping her hand lazily until he lets go. She still looks at James, though. "Fine, I won't threaten to peel your skin off your bones if you don't treat my little munchkin right, but tell me, you do have good intentions, yes?"

"Only the best," James tells her, his gaze flicking towards Regulus briefly before looking away.

"You turned out really handsome, you know. How old are you now? Mid-twenties, yes?" Bellatrix tilts her head, considering him closely. "Grew into quite the man."

James coughs. "Ah, thanks?"

"Bella," Regulus snaps, because James is clearly uncomfortable at the moment, and it makes Regulus feel…shame? He's not used to feeling ashamed of his family when it comes to James, because his parents have very little to do with him, and Sirius has only ever been good to him.

"So jealous," Bellatrix coos, even though Regulus honestly isn't. "Look at you, munchkin, so feisty. Love makes us crazy, doesn't it? Or so I hear. How mental does it make you?"

"Trust me, you really don't want to find out," Regulus says.

Bellatrix tuts at him. "It's been ages since I've had any fun, you know. Everyone is so boring, and Cissy is always around to scold me, so actually, I'd love nothing more." She promptly stands up and turns without warning to kick James' chair back, dumping herself right into his lap and draping herself over him. James chokes, his hands flying up as he holds them palm-out, eyes bulging as his mouth drops open. Bellatrix laughs. "Look at this, you've found yourself a loyal man, Reggie. He won't even touch me, which is a sha—"

The rest of her sentence is drowned out by her sudden screech as Regulus fists her by the hair and quite literally drags her right out of James' lap, dumping her ruthlessly on the floor. James gapes up at him where he's standing, and Bellatrix lets out a long string of curses as she starts to pick herself back up. The moment her hand lands on the table to brace herself, Regulus plucks up the fork and slams it down into the back of her hand, because he told her this would happen, and she did not listen. Her fault, really.

"Fucking hell, Reg!" James blurts out, scrambling up from his chair as Bellatrix howls from the floor.

"My word!" Mayor Delores gasps.

"Sirius!" Dorcas shouts, while Pandora covers her face with both hands, muffling a loud groan.

Bellatrix snarls as she cradles her hand to her chest, the fork still buried in the back of it, blood dripping. "You ungrateful cunt of a bastard! I was testing him, you little shit! See if I ever do anything for you again! You stabbed me! You fucking stabbed me for a stupid man, you cock-slobbering slag!"

"I told you what would happen if you touched him," Regulus reminds her defensively, looking desperately at Sirius, who is rushing into the room with Narcissa right behind him.

Bellatrix rips the fork right out of her hand and lunges at Regulus with a shriek, and hell immediately breaks loose as Sirius and Narcissa frantically dive into the fray. Narcissa has to wrap her arms all the way around Bellatrix and drag her back while Regulus has to turn around and do the same thing to Sirius, who apparently needs no context to take the first opportunity to beat the shit out of her, especially if she's trying to poke Regulus' eye out with a fork.

Sirius and Bellatrix hiss and spit at each other like feral cats, growling and snarling like wild dogs, both trying to get at each other while everyone else seems to be yelling all at once.

Lucius is smirking in satisfaction.

"You're my favorite brother."

"I'm your only brother."

"I know. I'm so proud of you."

Regulus rolls his eyes and turns his head away, but James can see his lips twitch up at the corners. Pandora is stifling what seems to be a mildly hysterical laugh behind her hand, and Dorcas is shamelessly grinning at Sirius, who genuinely does look proud of Regulus for stabbing Bellatrix with a fork. The train continues on, heading for the Hallow.

"Wouldn't be a family lunch without a fight," Sirius announces cheerfully, his spirits high since leaving district one. They had been swiftly escorted to give the speeches, then asked to leave immediately after. The goodbye between Narcissa and Sirius had been fine, almost… warm, James would say, but that was about it as far as familial affection went, by the end. Well, excluding Sirius and Regulus, because Sirius spent about a solid twenty minutes roaring with laughter after the whole thing was over, and he's been praising Regulus ever since.

"Not one dull moment," Dorcas says. "There has not been one dull moment this entire tour."

"It's not over yet," Pandora reminds her, clearly having reached the point where she's given up trying to make this entire experience go smoothly for everyone. It was sweet of her to try, though. She's always putting in the effort.

"I still can't believe you literally stabbed her with a fork," Dorcas insists, shaking her head as she stares at Regulus in a clear mixture of disbelief and admiration.

Regulus sighs. "I warned—"

"Yes, you warned her you would, so you've said," Pandora cuts in, amused, "but that's still not a thing most people just do."

Regulus isn't most people, James thinks, gazing at him helplessly. He's reminded of Mulciber again, how Regulus cut his hand off when he didn't heed Regulus' warning not to make James flinch. This, at least, was a bit less violent, less bloody, less of a mess. It was also in an entirely different situation and setting. That means James can fully appreciate it, and as such, he can safely say he's never been so desperate to get on his knees for someone the way he is right now, for Regulus.

James coughs and pushes to his feet, mumbling, "Excuse me."

Sirius frowns in concern as he goes by, but James just shakes his head at him, assuring him that nothing is wrong. He knows he's been exceptionally quiet, but it's for the best, because he can't really trust himself to speak at the moment. He's afraid he'll open his mouth and say something stupid, such as repeatedly confessing his love like a broken record.

Instead, James goes into his train car, shutting the door and blowing out a deep breath. After a beat, he looks down and gives a very stern (and internal) lecture to his cock about appropriate responses to certain situations, including how there's a time and place, and surrounded by friends is not it.

James continues mentally berating his own desires—honestly, he's starting to wonder if he should be more concerned by the things that arouse him—but it does little good.

No matter what he tries, his body and heart are sure about one thing over anything else, and that's Regulus Black.

"This is the second worst week of my life," James declares miserably, then slowly and repeatedly bangs his head against the door while he begs his body and heart to realize why.

They do not.

When they reach the Hallow, there's not much time before the interview is supposed to take place. Dorcas dashes off almost immediately to go get prepared, demanding the others to follow as soon as they're settled into their suite.

Pandora is walking swiftly, leading the charge, which Sirius is more than happy to let her do. As always, being back in the Hallow is not a good time for him, nor do James and Regulus seem to be ecstatic about it.

In any case, the settings are familiar as ever. Well, mostly. They're set up in the penthouse this time, according to Pandora, who leads them into the lift. It's a long, boring ride up, and Sirius does an internal checklist for what all needs to be done next. Get settled into the suite, usher Regulus and James off to get ready for the interview, watch the interview, then they're free for the night until tomorrow.

Simple enough.

"Right, so, you two are more than prepared for the interview, and Dorcas assures me that you'll both look lovely," Pandora chatters as they get off the lift and head for the penthouse, which is right up the hall. And she's right, James and Regulus have been prepped for this interview even more than their last ones, so Sirius is actually fairly confident that they'll do just fine. "After the interview, we'll head back here, and then the most important thing tomorrow is the party, which will be a very big event, so you'll both need to listen to me."

"We're staying here after the party, too?" Regulus mutters in audible complaint. "Can't we just leave that night?"

"No, you stay one last night, then head out the next morning," Pandora says firmly. She stops in front of the door and flashes them a smile. "Alright, hurry up, we don't have a lot of time."

Sirius snorts as Pandora throws open the door and reaches out to grab his shoulder, practically shoving him in. He can't help but chuckle fondly in her direction before turning to examine the penthouse curiously, never having seen it before, and then his laughter catches in his throat and dies.

Everything else immediately slips away, the whole world shrinking down to the man across the room from him, standing like a shadow near a wall with his hands tucked behind his back and his mask firmly in place. But that's him. Sirius would know him anywhere. He didn't forget.

Remus.

He's there with his head ducked forward, his side profile on display, and Sirius' ears are ringing because he doesn't understand. They—they don't get servants for this. They get in too late on the first night, and they're at a party for most of the second day, and they won't get dressed here before the events, so they won't be needing anyone to cook for them, or do their laundry, and they won't really even have the time to make a mess unless they're trying very hard at it, which would make them look bad, so of course no one would, and—and—

"Surprise," Pandora says softly from behind him.

At the sound of her voice, Remus' head lifts and swivels, and Sirius inhales sharply at the sight of a scar across his face in a jagged diagonal line above his mask and disappearing beneath it. Their eyes meet, and Sirius feels that lurch in his center, the whole world tilting on its axis.

Slowly, Remus steps forward and lifts his hand to unclip his mask, pulling it off as he releases a deep breath. He never looks away from Sirius, and what he says—the very first thing he says—is a soft and breathless, "Hi, sweetheart."

Chapter End Notes

REMUS REMUS REMUS!!!

okay, ill get to that in a minute. sorry, just had to get that out of the way.

james' first kill. cole. a father. that's rough, buddy 😔

FRANK LONGBOTTOM HEY BESTIE!!!! i adore him. i have fallen in love with him quite a bit through this fic, if im honest, more so than any other version of frank ive ever written.

james being jealous of frank and possessive of sirius as his best friend, he's so real for that. if i had claim to sirius in ANY capacity, i would also be beating bitches off with a stick. also regulus was LIVING for it, that little shit. he was genuinely having the time of his life, like: SEE? HOW DOES IT FEEL HUH??? NOT SO NICE IS IT? also you're cute 🥰 pls regulus is so valid i love him but then james and frank flirting. first of all, frank making EVERYONE jealous, icon behavior, king shit. he's just out here Existing, and everyone is like: that man is a threat to everything i love and hold dear, look at his SMILE. i just know frank had that ooey-gooey smile that gives everyone little flutters. well except for sirius. and also regulus "if you even look at james potter i will stomp you to death with my hooves" black.

anyway, jealous regulus!!! strangling james' hand!!! get his ass, king! also jealous james wanted to drag barty! go off, babe. theyre both so stupid im obsessed starting with bellatrix. she... she??? well, she's a bit. complex lmaooo. idk how yall are gonna feel about her, but well. feel how you feel, i guess. whatever it is, it's valid. but i think a lot of us can relate from regulus' position of growing up and being Absolutely Appalled by how utterly embarrassing family can be. that poor man wanted to crawl under the table and hide 💀 but he stabbed bellatrix with a fork, because of course he did. he always warns these people, and they never listen. like??? does he look like he's joking? ever? does he look like the type of man who has ever told a joke on purpose? come on now. she deserved that, honestly.

also sirius ready to throw hands with bellatrix IMMEDIATELY with no context pls he's so 😭😭😭 i love him more than anything sirius just Suffering the entire family reunion is so real. me too, my love, ive been there. but his little moment with narcissa was like. really interesting, i think. just like a further insight to different family dynamics and sibling dynamics. narcissa looking for andromeda... ow narcissa in this is very interesting to me! like, the whole background of her possibly being born to a different father, her marriage of convenience with lucius, the way she basically manipulates him similar to how sirius does the hallow, or close to it, and her desire to be a mother but her refusal to do it due to the fucked up world and also how lucius would raise/treat the child. like, she has LAYERS.

back to james, he is Doing His Best to have boundaries, but this poor man is Struggling. regulus isn't making it easy for him either. threatening someone and following through on that threat for him, AGAIN??? james was ready to risk it all. reggie, please, he is trying so hard 😭😭😭 and finally. FINALLY!!! the real main character of this chapter!!! the man, the myth, the legend!!! REMUS FUCKING LUPIN!!!! HE'S BACK!!!! HE'S HERE!!! he had one fucking line, and he still stole the show. i love him so much. he means the world to me. i am gushing like i am sirius black, and i don't regret it.

i would just like to say, for all those people talking about remus maybe losing his memories after he was tortured, YOU'RE FOUL FOR THAT!!! you all talk about me being a menace and coming up with angst, and then there you go COMING UP WITH SOMETHING MORE SICK AND TWISTED THAN ME??? shame on you. shame on your cow. i am joking, obviously. you are all evil geniuses. go write fic, sew chaos into the world, make people cry <3

Remus barely even gets to take another breath before Sirius is throwing himself across the room at speeds that would be alarming under any other circumstances. The mask clatters to the floor just seconds before Sirius is on him, and it's like they practiced it, the way Sirius genuinely just launches himself right into Remus' arms, legs wrapped around him, and Remus catches him without even stumbling.

It's been so long. Oh, there you are, here you are, hi, Remus' heart keens, a steady throb of relief that floods his veins. As hard as he tried to cling to the memories of how it felt to have Sirius in his arms, it doesn't compare to the real thing. Nothing compares to this, to the warmth of him, the weight of him, how he smells and feels and breathes.

Sirius' hands fly up to frame his face, holding him there, and then he's quite literally just dropping kisses off all over Remus' face with undeniable enthusiasm. He kisses Remus' forehead, his cheeks, his nose, above and below each eye, even the scar. If it bothers him, he shows no signs of it, just kissing down the length of it from where it starts at the inner-corner of his left eyebrow and drags down over his nose, halting at the right corner of his top lip. When Sirius reaches the end, he kisses each corner of Remus' mouth, then full on the lips, hard and bruising and fast, pulling away to speak.

"Hi," Sirius chokes out, then immediately kisses him again, and Remus isn't making it easy for him with how he's breaking out into a grin; his first smile in six months. "Oh, hi. I've missed you, Remus. I've missed you so much."

"I—" Remus starts, but doesn't get to finish.

"Shut up, don't talk to me, I'm so happy you're here," Sirius declares breathlessly, his eyes bright. "Oh, the moon is so jealous of you. You're here. You're—hi, you're here."

Again, Remus tries to speak around his bubbling laughter, feeling ridiculously exhilarated and giddy, but Sirius cuts him off once more, with a kiss again. This time, Sirius kisses him once, twice, a third time, and then he doesn't pull away. The close-mouthed kiss fades into an open-mouthed one, and Sirius makes a truly indecent (and loud) noise while shaking in Remus' arms, rattling like he's about to fall apart.

Remus keeps a firm grip on him and turns around to promptly leave, which is probably a little rude, considering that the others are here and may wish to greet him, but he honestly can't bring himself to care about that right now.

No, instead, he stumbles along up the hall to find the first door he comes across, deciding it's just going to have to be Sirius' room, because he's not wasting time to go any further. He throws open the door and kicks it shut with his foot as he moves inside, Sirius' trembling fingers slipping into his hair.

The bed is thankfully not far, and Remus wastes no time in getting them to it. He's careful, lowering Sirius down with care, like he's precious, because he is. Oh, he is. Remus is shaking, too, barely even able to fathom that this is real, that this is actually happening, not just some dream.

For a long time, they literally just lay there and kiss like that's all they're going to do, like that's more important than oxygen. Sirius has his arms wound tight around Remus' shoulders, fingers tangled in his hair, and Remus isn't managing much more than cradling Sirius' cheek with one hand while the other grips his leg on the outside of where he lays in between Sirius' splayed thighs, his knees bumping into Remus' hips.

The moment they break apart for some air, Sirius starts frantically fighting with his coat, his chest heaving, face flushed in a way that makes Remus' blood sing with joy. Because Sirius seems to be genuinely struggling, Remus props himself up and does his best to help, perhaps a little rushed as well. He practically shoves Sirius' coat off and flings it a little bit. An envelope falls out and lands on the bed, but Remus just picks it up and tosses it across the room carelessly with one smooth flick of his wrist.

"Wait," Sirius blurts out, eyes bulging. "Wait, that's important, Remus. Where did it go? I have to—"

"Can it wait?" Remus cuts in, reaching up to push his fingers into Sirius' hair, his breath hitching. It's as soft as he remembers, so soft and so lovely.

Sirius bites his lip, and Remus' gaze zeroes in on it. "I—well, we really shouldn't wait, and I'm a terrible person for even considering it, but technically—"

"Good enough for me," Remus declares, because truly it is, and he dives back in to kiss Sirius again, knowing that nothing could be more important than this, than Sirius.

"Oh, fucking hell," Sirius mumbles against his mouth, releasing a choked noise deep in the back of his throat, and Remus knows the moment he's given in and decided everything else can wait, actually, because he legitimately shudders and arches closer eagerly.

In a move Remus doesn't see coming, Sirius abruptly rolls them, pushing himself up and over and practically slamming Remus' back to the bed. Remus blinks, admittedly a little dazed, but he's not complaining. In fact, he's rather pleased.

Sirius doesn't falter, doesn't show any signs of embarrassment about essentially taking charge, as it were. He seems singularly focused on having what he wants—which, in this scenario, turns out to be Remus—and Remus is more than happy to give it to him. He runs his hands all over Sirius, his arms and chest and thighs where he straddles Remus' hips, watching him with hooded eyes, letting him do whatever he wants.

They're a bit limited on sexual resources at the moment, but Remus knows that's hardly stopped anyone before, because there are countless other things to do. Sirius seems to be in the same mind in this regard, because what he apparently wants involves kissing his way almost frantically down Remus' throat, his chest and stomach through his shirt, heading further and further down while tugging at Remus' belt.

Remus closes his eyes and buries his hand in Sirius' hair.

"Well, that's going over well," Pandora declares brightly, beaming as the muffled moans from down the hall drifts out into the otherwise quiet room.

Surprisingly, it's Regulus who looks at her and says, very softly, "We don't deserve you, Pandora."

James is in full agreement, and to prove so, he reaches out to capture her hand, pressing a smiling kiss to the back of her knuckles. She looks so pleased, so touched, a little teary-eyed as she smiles brightly. "That was such a kind thing for you to do, truly. Regulus is right. We don't deserve you."

"Thank you," Pandora whispers.

"I thought getting a servant wasn't…allowed?" James asks as he squeezes her hand before dropping it.

Pandora chuckles. "Well, servants are only ever allowed out during assignments, and when I checked the roster, he was indeed in the lineup for servants who will be working at the party tomorrow. That worked in my favor, because I may have lied a little and said that Sirius hasn't been feeling well, so he'll need tending to, and then I very casually suggested that they send us the servant we had before to handle it. In any case, he's technically feeling under the weather—Sirius, I mean—so he won't be joining us for the interview and such. I sort of figured he'd get distracted by Remus the moment he saw him anyway."

"Ah, brilliant," James chirps. "You're brilliant."

"You two don't mind, do you?" Pandora asks cautiously. "That I sort of excluded him out of today, I mean. I know it makes you feel better to have him around, but I thought…"

"We can stand to let Sirius have some time for himself for once," Regulus murmurs, which is rather mature of him, James thinks. "We don't mind. It's fine, Pandora. Good, even."

Pandora perks up. "Lovely. Then we should be going, I suppose. Let's leave them to it."

A beat later, a broken moan and the disjointed sounds of Remus cursing up a storm drifts out to them faintly, and James can't help the way a laugh builds up from the pit of his stomach, rising up through him until his shoulders are shaking. Pandora's eyebrows fly up, and Regulus' nose wrinkles rather adorably. They all usher quickly from the room, indeed leaving Sirius and Remus to it.

On the way, James glances back with a grin, internally wishing Sirius all the good things, because no one deserves them more.

Remus is quite convinced that Sirius' mouth is capable of magic, and there's absolutely no evidence to support the contrary, because he's seen Sirius charm people with a few simple words, and this—well, he didn't even have to speak to leave Remus' brain leaking out of his ears.

It's strange, because Remus has had people do this to him that were certainly more practiced, but he's still very certain that he's never had better. A common theme with Sirius is that what he lacks in experience, he makes up for in enthusiasm, especially when he's focused on whatever he's doing.

Remus collapses back against the bed and tries to catch his breath, sort of limp as Sirius zips Remus' pants and crawls up the length of his body to stare down at him, hovering above. For some reason, Remus' brain can't quite work out why Sirius looks so bashful right now. No, this is the time that Sirius should be feeling very smug. Instead, he's blushing and eyeing Remus warily, like he's expecting a bad review or something.

The moment Remus reaches for him, as soon as he's got his wits about him enough to remember the importance of reciprocation, Sirius leans back and shakes his head.

Remus blinks. "No?"

"No, I…" Sirius clears his throat. "I mean, thank you, truly, but I don't really want...that, right now. I just—I wanted to do what I did, but I—well, I'd really just like to be held and kissed, if that's alright."

"If you're sure," Remus murmurs. "I just thought, because you're—well, I can feel that you're —"

Sirius' face glows even brighter. "Yes, ignore that, it will go away. It's—I mean, just a body thing, but I don't want…"

"Of course," Remus says simply, opening up his arms without missing a beat, biting back yet another groan of relief when Sirius sinks into his side and curls up against him. "You don't have to explain, Sirius. It's okay. And—and I hope this goes without saying, but you didn't have to—"

"No, no, I know, but I wanted to," Sirius assures him quickly, shifting to tilt his head so they're looking at each other. He's still very red, but Remus is pretty sure that it's because he's telling the truth. Oh, he really wanted to. "I definitely—um, I suppose it was…for me, too. Did you—was that okay?"

Remus can't help it. He huffs a soft laugh and reaches up to hook his hand around the back of Sirius' neck, drawing him in to press a kiss in between his eyebrows, where they're wrinkled with uncertainty. "Trust me, it was lovely."

Sirius seems to relax all at once, settling down with a hum as he falls uncharacteristically quiet, studying Remus' face with focused intensity. Remus is equally quiet, helpless to stop himself from taking Sirius in, hungry for each second where he gets to trace Sirius' features with his gaze. The fading color in his cheeks; the natural aristocratic arch to his brows; the dark eyelashes framing his bright, yet softened eyes; the lovely set of his mouth, the tilted lines perpetually at the corners like he's always seconds from breaking out into a grin, his bottom lip a bit more plump than the top one, both equally biteable.

Sirius reaches up and carefully drifts the pads of his fingers over the scar on Remus' face, whispering, "This is new."

"Yes," Remus confirms, in case Sirius is worried that he's forgotten it, even if it didn't sound like he was unsure.

"This happened in Azkaban?" Sirius murmurs.

Remus closes his eyes, humming quietly and just feeling Sirius' caress, basking in it. "Yeah. They, ah… Well, I'm pretty sure it was something to do with the next games, or maybe just a medicinal thing. Servants are often used as test subjects; I was just the unlucky sod that got picked out that day."

"They tortured you," Sirius says softly, but there's an edge to his voice, and when Remus opens his eyes, Sirius' are sharp and gleaming with anger.

"I was taken to the lower level and injected with something, made to inhale something else, and—well, I was a bit off my head from the pain, honestly, so I broke the restraints at my head and hit the tray next to the chair with my face." Remus scans Sirius' face, his mouth dry at the cold rage growing brighter in his gaze. I almost died, he doesn't say. He doesn't want Sirius to know that, to be upset about it. The next words out of his mouth are a bold-faced lie, but it's one given with Sirius' comfort in mind. "I don't really remember most of it."

Sirius' throat rises and falls on a harsh swallow. "I'm sorry."

"It is what it is. Just another crater among many," Remus murmurs, offering Sirius a tiny smile. "I do recall you saying something about the moon being jealous of me…"

"Oh, the moon is so jealous of you," Sirius declares, breaking out into that grin of his, the one that instantly steals Remus' breath because it's been so long since he's seen it. "The moon is beautiful, don't get me wrong, but it has nothing on you."

"You like my new crater, then?" Remus teases.

"I don't like how you came by it, but you're only more glorious for it." Sirius grins wider when Remus starts laughing, shaking his head incredulously. "No, I'm not joking! Really, it's sexy. Makes you look…raffish."

"Raffish?"

"It does!"

"Of all the words," Remus chokes out.

"Rakish, then," Sirius says. "Rugged. Roguish. Rapscallion."

"Rapscallion."

"Mhm. Absolutely. I stand by it."

Remus' lips curl up. "Well, if you say it, it must be true, then. That's me. Remus, your regular rapscallion."

"Remus the rugged. Remus the rakish. Remus the rapscallion."

"You're so entertained by this."

Sirius releases a shaky laugh and presses closer to him, sliding his hand up and down the side of Remus' neck. "I almost don't know how to act. I thought—I didn't expect—I wasn't prepared for you at all, but I wasn't the first time either, so now I suppose I'm too giddy to be anything other than silly. I'm just—I'm really, really happy that you're here."

"You have Pandora to thank for that," Remus says fondly.

"She's absolutely—" Sirius abruptly freezes, and then his eyes bulge before he gasps and bolts up in the bed, scrambling over himself to get up. "Shit, shit, shit—"

"Sirius?"

"Fuck!"

"Sirius," Remus calls, louder this time, but Sirius is still stuck in a tirade of curses, berating himself as he dives for the door. Remus heaves a sigh, then gets up to follow him.

"Oh, I'm late. I'm so late," Sirius is groaning in the main room, when Remus catches up to him, a frazzled mess that fills Remus with such fondness he can only smile. "I wasn't even thinking about—I actually forgot—oh, Remus, the interview, how'd I completely forget the fucking—"

Remus steps forward and reaches out to grab Sirius by the shoulders, halting him, then sliding his hands up to squish Sirius' cheeks, making his lips pucker. He blinks, eyebrows folding together, so unbearably lovely that Remus can only dip in and steal a quick kiss. Sirius leans into it, but Remus doesn't drag it out past a short peck.

"Breathe," Remus orders gently, and Sirius does. "Relax. The others can do one interview without you. They will be fine. I'm quite sure if they needed you, they would have waited, and it's clear that they didn't because they wanted to give you time to have a break. And see me."

"But James and Regulus feel better when I'm there," Sirius protests weakly.

"Yes, they do, but I bet they'll feel better knowing that you're taking some time for yourself. Pandora has them. She'll make sure they're alright," Remus assures him.

"I—" Sirius visibly hesitates, glancing at the door before looking back at Remus, chewing on his lip. "Yeah, they—they probably won't mind, right? Pandora knows what she's doing."

Remus chuckles. "Exactly."

"Sorry," Sirius mutters, fully deflating. "I'm not trying to run off and leave you. I'm supposed to be giving you a—" He suddenly stops, and in a mimicry of a few moments prior, his eyes bulge as another gasp rips from his lips. He reaches down to grab Remus' hand, and then he's on the move, dragging Remus along behind him. "I can't believe I forgot!"

Remus could not be more in love if he tried.

"What is it now?" Remus asks with rising affection as they reach the room and Sirius drops his hand to dart around with all the finesse of a tornado, frantically searching for something.

"I just—oh! Aha, there you are!" Sirius announces in delight, carelessly tossing his coat aside and scooping up the envelope Remus threw across the room earlier. Remus raises his eyebrows as Sirius whips around towards him, eyes bright, chest heaving. "Okay, sit down. Now."

"I'm sat," Remus says, once he is indeed perched on the edge of the bed, watching Sirius curiously. "What is it?"

Sirius comes over to sink down next to him, taking a deep breath. "I—I have something for you. I didn't think I would get to give it to you until—well, I thought it'd take another six months, but no need to wait now."

"Alright," Remus muses, flicking his gaze down to the envelope, then right back up. All he can think is that Sirius wrote him a letter in the last six months.

"I'm not even sure where to start to explain," Sirius mumbles.

"Uh huh." Remus snorts. "Oh, come on, out with it."

"I…" Sirius swallows, then blows out a deep breath and sits up a little straighter. "I met your dad."

Remus freezes, his smile fading as his heart seems to give a harsh kick in his chest. Sirius watches him closely, and Remus feels a cold drip of fear slide down his spine. "You what? You met him? How? You—you don't know what district I'm from."

"Twelve," Sirius says quietly. "You know how the victory tour works, Remus. I met him the very first day when we—"

"But there's no way you could have known, Sirius, not unless you—you asked around to find out, and you can't do that. You can't—that draws attention to him; it puts him in danger!" Remus bursts out, his heart hammering in his chest. "I purposefully didn't tell you which district I was from—"

"Yeah, you purposefully didn't tell me a lot of things," Sirius cuts in coldly, his gaze sharp enough that Remus instinctively snaps his mouth shut, dread sinking into his gut like a stone.

"Sirius," Remus croaks.

Jaw clenched, Sirius shakes his head sharply. "No. Don't. Not now. Just—look, I didn't go asking around about you or your dad, Remus, I promise. In the mayor's office, there was a picture of your dad, and you look a bit like him, so that's how I knew. I did ask a few people in the district for directions, but I was very discreet, so no one thought much of it."

"You didn't ask anyone in the Hallow?" Remus checks.

"No, I'm not that fucking stupid, thanks," Sirius snaps.

Remus grimaces. "I wasn't—"

"I met your dad," Sirius continues, his voice losing the edge to it with every spoken word. "He's a lovely man, by the way. We talked for a bit, and I offered to bring you a letter from him."

"No," Remus whispers, his gaze dropping to the envelope as a lump forms in his throat. "That's—that's not a letter from him. He didn't write me a letter. He wouldn't."

"Remus—"

"No, Sirius, you—you don't understand. My dad would never take that risk, especially not for __"

"But he did," Sirius tells him, his voice softening, likely due to the fact that Remus has just choked on his words. "He did write you a letter, this letter, and took the risk for you. He loves you, Remus, so very much."

Remus' shoulders wrench up as he chokes out a harsh breath, his eyes stinging as he ducks his head. It takes everything in him not to break down crying immediately, and some part of him still doesn't understand, doesn't fully believe it. Lyall has never, would never, do anything defiant to the Hallow. Not out of loyalty, but out of self-preservation, and he spent years trying to get Remus to be the same way for his own safety.

"Remus," Sirius whispers, "take it."

"I—I—" Remus swallows with difficulty, blinking the tears out of his eyes as he lifts his head. Sirius is watching him with so much compassion, holding out the letter. Remus' fingers tremble when he reaches out to grab it. "Is it really him?"

"It is. I promise," Sirius murmurs.

Remus stares down at the envelope, slowly turning it over in his hands. A beat later, he looks up. "You didn't open it."

"Of course not," Sirius replies, frowning. "It's yours."

I love you, Remus thinks, and he almost just blurts it out, only refraining because he has the feeling that there's a lot they need to talk about before love comes up in conversation.

He does love Sirius, though. Loves him dearly, with every defiant bone in his body. This man, who doesn't even realize the importance of what he's just done by giving Remus an unopened envelope. Remus, who owns nothing. Remus, who has nothing. Remus, who is not granted privacy or freedom for anything like this, for anything at all.

"Thank you," Remus chokes out.

Sirius gives him a flickering smile and leans over to kiss him on the cheek, squeezing his arm gently before standing to his feet. "You know, your dad went off to write that letter alone, so I suppose it's only fair you get to read it alone. I'll go out and make us some tea. You come out whenever you're ready, yeah? Unless you would prefer me to stay?"

Of course Sirius gives him options. Of course. "No, I—I'll be out there soon," Remus says. "Um, a bit of milk and two sugars for my tea, if you don't mind."

"I remember," Sirius tells him, flashing him a quick smile, and then he walks out and shuts the door gently behind him.

Remus stares after him for a long time once he's gone, just breathing, and then he looks down at the envelope. A part of him wants to rip it open frantically and devour the words in an instant, but a much bigger part wants to go slow, to savor every stroke of ink on the paper.

To someone who has not had anything to genuinely claim as their own, other than the very mask that symbolizes each restriction he'll never escape from, this letter means the world. Remus is so very careful when opening it, refusing to cause even the slightest rip in the envelope, let alone the letter. When he draws it out and opens it, he does so slowly, delicately, like it could turn to ash at a moment's notice.

My son, the letter starts, and that's all it takes. The first two words, and Remus already has tears spilling out of his eyes.

I hope this letter finds you as the one delivering it has assured me it will. I would like for this letter to be long and full of all the countless things I desperately wish I could tell you, but I think brevity would serve us all well. To be honest with you, I fear no words I could write would ever properly express how much I miss you every day, nor provide adequate summary for the love and concern that I feel every time you cross my mind. I'm proud to admit, as a father, that not a day goes by where I don't think about you. Days of thinking of our last fight has taught me many things about regret, and I want to tell you now that the only regret I truly have is not assuring you, even in our differences, that I would always love you and support you through anything. If you doubt anything else, do not doubt that, because I will always love you, no matter what; I will always be proud to call you my son. I, too, can only be grateful to hear that you have found happiness in possibly the last place I could have ever expected it to exist, so smile and laugh and love, and never stop, never change who you are, not for anyone.

Remus folds over the letter and cries so hard that his stomach constricts; deep, gasping sobs spill out of him as he cradles the paper to his chest and misses his father like a small child.

It's been years since he's allowed himself to think about Lyall, to miss him, and it's hitting him all at once now. He held it at bay, like that proved something, like if he didn't let himself feel this way, it meant that he wasn't looking back on the past, on who he was determined to be, with regret. Still too proud to be wrong, too proud to admit that maybe, just maybe, he does wish he could go back and do it all so differently.

Because admitting that—facing it—can't change anything now. It's too late. He's already here, and he'll never see his dad again. He'll never get to go home.

When Remus was very young, Lyall used to pack Remus his lunch for school every day, and each day, he left a little note for him to read. Just three sentences every day, only three, because they had made up a little code between them. Every second word in a sentence made up a secret message. Every day, that secret message was I love you.

Slowly, Remus unfurls and reads the letter over again, slower, noting the second word in each sentence, and by the end, he has to fold forward and weep again as the secret message echoes through his head, and through his heart.

Hope would be proud of you, too.

Sirius gets an odd sense of deja-vu when Remus comes into the kitchen, because for a moment, all he can think about is how Lyall looked after writing the letter. Remus, too, clearly cried over it, and it's obvious to Sirius that he doesn't want to acknowledge this fact, much like his father.

There's also another source of deja-vu, which comes from seeing Remus enter the kitchen, like he's seen many times before, just six months ago. Sirius is still marveling over the fact that he's here; he's really, actually here. That outweighs everything else, all the questions banging around in his head, all the countless things that Sirius wants to talk to Remus about. Genuinely, it feels like all he can truly do is just stare at Remus and be amazed that he's here.

Two days ago, Sirius learned that Remus killed people, and somehow that seems so trivial when Remus is within reach. It's not a trivial thing, or maybe it shouldn't be, but Sirius can't find it within himself to make it a priority. Basically everyone Sirius knows is a murderer, so really, that doesn't bother him very much.

Of course, Sirius does have a simmering level of upset bubbling within him, countless questions, and a growing need to make sure Remus knows that Sirius is angry with him. It's just… Well, there's a lot of layers to his anger, so he's not even sure where to start, and Remus eyes him a little warily like he's picking up on all those layers, every single one.

"I feel like I'm in trouble," Remus mumbles as he approaches the counter, stopping a few steps across from Sirius, clearly debating on whether or not it would be a good idea to come closer at this particular moment. He chooses to stay right where he is, which is a wise decision.

Sirius pushes Remus his cup of tea and says, "Oh, you are, but that can wait. First, are you alright?"

"I'm—yes, I—" Remus struggles for a moment, his throat bobbing, and then he exhales explosively and looks at him with soft eyes full of something warm and adoring that does admittedly weaken Sirius quite a bit. "I can't even begin to thank you for what you did, Sirius. You—you have no idea how much this means to me. I'm—thank you. Just. Thank you."

"You don't have to thank me," Sirius murmurs. "I wanted to do it, Remus. You deserve that, and more. That's all I could do, so that's what I did."

"You are the most considerate man I have ever known," Remus whispers, looking down at his cup of tea, but he doesn't lift it up. "I'm not going to lie, that makes me feel a lot worse about the fact that I'm currently in trouble."

"You sure you want to talk about this now?" Sirius asks, unable to keep the sharp edge out of his voice.

Remus takes a deep breath, then blows it out and looks up at Sirius. "What did I do?"

"You tell me," Sirius retorts.

"Yeah, I was worried you'd say that." Remus' eyes sink shut, and he turns to lean back against the counter, rubbing both palms over his face. When he drops his hands, he opens his eyes and glares at the wall. "I thought you said you didn't give a toss what my crime was, and I didn't have to tell you."

"You passive aggressive prick," Sirius hisses, plopping his tea down. "Don't you dare turn this around on me. I never demanded a damn thing from you."

"Really? Because you're rather pissed off about not getting something for someone who didn't expect anything," Remus snaps, crossing his arms.

Sirius can feel his blood beginning to boil. "Maybe I'm pissed off because you didn't feel it was important to mention anything before you fucked me."

"What does that have anything to do with this?" Remus asks in disbelief. "My crime—what, are you saying that I'm not allowed to have sex just because I—" He stops, blinking, and then he looks over at Sirius. "Wait, is that part of the reason you struggle to let yourself accept pleasure, even though it was literally not your fault? Sirius—"

"Don't fucking lecture me right now!" Sirius bursts out, raising both hands and flapping them around. "I don't know all the reasons, but that's probably one of them. And—and it doesn't matter, anyway, because my acceptance of pleasure is entirely separate from my sexual desire; they're two different topics, and we are not talking about either right now."

"What are we talking about?" Remus asks sarcastically. "If I'm honest, it's not very clear."

"You know what?" Sirius huffs out a weak laugh and shakes his head, running his tongue over his teeth. "Doesn't matter. Forget it; knowing me, I probably will anyway."

The moment Sirius starts to turn away (and stomp off in a fit of dramatics), Remus groans and calls, "Wait. Just—okay, wait, I'm sorry. Come here. Don't leave."

"If you're not going to have a fucking conversation—"

"No. No, I will. I promise I will. I'm just—I don't…"

"Do you want to know why it's so upsetting?" Sirius asks, turning back around, lips pressed into a thin line. "It's not because I ever secretly wanted to know. I didn't go to your dad's expecting to find out what you did; I went just so I could do something for you, and for him. That's it. He's the one who let it slip. I didn't ask, and then I didn't let him explain further, because I wanted to hear it from you. And yes, this does have to do with sex—not my acceptance of pleasure, but sex. Because I need trust to have sex, Remus. Not just me trusting you, but you trusting me, and it feels like I fooled myself into thinking it was there, but it turns out it wasn't."

"What?" Remus rasps. "No, it was. I—I didn't keep it from you out of mistrust, Sirius. It wasn't that."

"Are you sure?" Sirius challenges. "Because when I stood before you and told you about how I felt about being a murderer, you didn't say a word. And I didn't get a choice, Remus. I didn't get to decide to keep that from you, or anyone, because it was live for the whole world to see. You knew that about me from the beginning, all of it, everything. What did I know about you? Hm? Your mum and dad's name. Your best friend's name. A few little details here and there, but that was it, and you know everything about me."

"So, you did expect more from me," Remus whispers.

Sirius feels like he's about to pull his hair out. "No! That's not what I'm saying. You don't have to give me anything, not ever. I didn't ask for anything, or push you, not once. But that doesn't mean you're completely blameless in this. You know so much of my problems, especially around sex, and I'm upset because you—you let it happen knowing that the trust wasn't an equal exchange, and that's not fair. I'm upset because I trusted you, and I don't know if I can anymore."

"I told you, it wasn't mistrust, not to me. I—I didn't see it that way, so I didn't even think about it like that. If I suspected that it would hurt you, I would have never allowed it to happen, Sirius, you have to know that. I need you to know that," Remus tells him earnestly, almost desperately. "I swear to you, I trust you more than I trust myself, honestly."

"Then—then what was it?" Sirius asks, completely at a loss, confused now because he genuinely doesn't understand.

Remus swallows harshly and tips his head back, blinking hard and rolling his jaw. His voice is thick with emotion when he starts speaking. "Sirius, I told you once that you see me at my worst every day, and it's true. I'm a servant. A criminal. I have nothing to offer, nowhere to go, and literally no value as a human being in the eyes of the Hallow. You were the first person to look at me like I was worth something in five years, and I—I just wanted to be someone who deserved that. I wanted to—I wanted to exist outside of what I had done. I wanted to be free from it."

"Remus," Sirius whispers, stricken, all of his anger evaporating on the spot when it clicks, when he finally understands that Remus keeping this to himself had nothing to do with Sirius at all. It really wasn't mistrust.

"I never once thought you'd look at me differently, or treat me differently," Remus chokes out, his eyes shining with building tears that wrench at Sirius' heart. "I just liked getting to be someone who was actually worthy of you."

"Stop it," Sirius croaks, shoving forward to reach for Remus just as Remus hunches in on himself and breaks down crying in earnest. Sirius reaches up and wraps his arms all the way around Remus' shoulders and where he tucks his head down against Sirius' chest. Remus folds into him and cries, and Sirius holds him, rocking him gently and ducking his face down to press it into Remus' hair.

For a long time, that's all they do. Sirius' heart is in tatters in his chest, because Remus crying and being upset genuinely throws him into instant distress. He rubs Remus' back and kisses the side of his head over and over, trying to smother him in comfort, but Remus seems to have a lot of backed-up emotional release he needs to work out.

Sirius doesn't try to stop it, knowing it's probably about a lot of things. His dad, missing Sirius, the torture he's endured, and possibly many other things that Sirius doesn't know about. That's alright. Sirius doesn't need to know to be sure that he wants to take care of Remus through it.

So, he does, and Remus eventually calms, his tears coming to a slow halt. He stays where he is for a bit, and then he lifts his head to choke out, "I'm sorry, Sirius."

"Shh. Listen to me. Are you listening?"

"Yes."

"Your worth is not measured in your past, or even your present, but rather in you, Remus, and you are invaluable," Sirius says softly. "To me, to this world, to anyone who knows you, you are invaluable."

Remus' expression crumbles all over again, his breath punching out of him in yet another harsh sob, and he tucks himself right back into Sirius' arms like he never left.

Sirius holds him through that, too.

Remus sips his tea, failing to meet Sirius' eyes at the moment. It's very good tea. Just like he likes it.

In all honesty, Remus doesn't think he's cried that openly or that hard with another human being other than Lily. She's the only person he's ever trusted to do it with, but now there's Sirius, too. Because Remus does trust Sirius. They built trust between them, and despite this hiccup, he still believes in the foundation of it. There's nothing wrong with needing to strengthen it, though, from time-to-time.

"It wasn't just me," Remus announces abruptly, finally raising his gaze to meet Sirius'. "My crime, I mean. I didn't commit it by myself. Lily was there with me."

"Remus, stop," Sirius murmurs. "You don't have to tell me. I shouldn't have—I mean, I don't like to talk about the things I've done either. I'm not entitled to—"

"No, it's fine. I—want you to know," Remus cuts in, his voice thick. "His name was Fenrir Greyback, who I killed."

Sirius nods slowly. "And the others?"

"The others? I…didn't kill anyone else," Remus says, baffled.

"Your dad said people. He said you killed people," Sirius explains. "As in—multiple."

Remus frowns. "Well, I didn't. Honestly, I only killed one man. I was there; I would know. I'm not lying—"

"I'm not saying you are," Sirius tells him quickly, raising both hands in surrender. "He—maybe he meant Lily? Or maybe he just…didn't know?"

"There were—I mean, people were chasing Lily, even after I was captured, so…maybe?" Remus can't be sure. He'll never have the full answers. "It was—well, it was people, yes, but specifically Aurors. Greyback was an Auror."

Sirius' eyes bulge. "You killed an Auror? Remus! That's—"

"Mental? I know," Remus mutters. "Trust me, I know. They're the enforcers of the districts and quite literally Hallow weapons, so this was insane of us to do, I'm very aware. It's not like we planned it. We—we didn't know it would come to that. If we knew, maybe…"

"Remus, you really don't have to talk about it."

"Yes, I know. It's not something I enjoy talking about, but I do think you should know, Sirius. Greyback had it out for my father for practically half my life, just because my dad had a bad day and said something he shouldn't have, just once. By the time I was twenty, the feud had shifted mostly to me."

"What did your dad say?"

"Well, Greyback was a part of the new wave of Aurors that came in after my dad retired, and remember I told you my dad didn't like how they did things? Yeah, so he made that pretty clear to Greyback, who didn't appreciate the sentiment."

"And you said that anger shifted to you?" Sirius asks.

"I was…" Remus licks his lips and tips his head to the side, huffing a soft laugh. "Well, I was a bit...mouthy."

"Why do I feel like that's understating things?" Sirius mutters dryly, one eyebrow sweeping up.

Remus scrunches his face playfully. "Yeah, it is, quite a bit. Ah, my craters? The ones on my back?"

"Greyback," Sirius says, eyes narrowing.

"Mhm," Remus confirms.

"Just as an aside, I don't even blame you for killing him. Like, I've heard enough at this point to not even need further context to understand why the world's better off without him."

"Yes, well, I'm going to give you context anyway."

"Alright," Sirius says levelly, nodding.

"Greyback regularly came into my home and did his little mandatory checks, which was just him basically tearing the place apart. He knew he wouldn't find anything, of course; he just loved the excuse to be a fucking prick. Mum and Dad took it with grace, generally, but I usually caused trouble. One day, he showed up to my house with his usual team of Aurors, but my parents were out. Lily was over. It was just me and her when they busted in. She knew these things happened to my family, but she'd never seen it before. Greyback only singled us out because of his hatred for my dad, and then me, so she'd never experienced anything like it."

"She was scared."

"She was furious," Remus corrects with a snort. "Make no mistake, Lily was no flower. She was as wild and reckless as I was, at times. We were—I don't know, just always on the same wavelength all the time. When she was level-headed, so was I. When she wasn't, I wasn't either. We did everything together, sometimes even just—feeling."

Sirius' face softens. "I'm the same way with James."

"Yes, well, take it from me—be careful with that," Remus says quietly. "Perhaps if one of us had been level-headed, it wouldn't have gone as it did. We were sixteen when that happened.

My mum was still—" He stops. Starts again. "In any case, Lily and I were both upset and furious at the world, so we decided to—to find some way to get rid of him."

"Not by murderous means."

"That was not the original plan, no. Greyback was an Auror, and that comes with rules, all of which I knew intimately because my dad was one for over thirty years. I knew there was no way Greyback was following all the rules, because he was just not the sort who would. So, we intended to find solid proof and turn it in."

"I take it that didn't happen," Sirius says.

Remus sighs. "Almost. We found the proof. It took us three years. I mean, some of that time was just—everything being on pause after my mum died, but we never entirely gave up on it. I couldn't give up on it, especially because—" He swallows and squeezes his eyes shut. "On the day my mum died, I wasn't there. I wasn't with her in her last moments, because I was passed out at the whipping post. By the time someone let Lily know, and she helped get me home so she could take care of me, my mum was already gone."

"I wish," Sirius murmurs, low and dangerous, "that you hadn't killed Greyback. So that I could. Slowly."

"That might be the sexiest thing I've ever heard you say," Remus informs him, opening his eyes to stare at Sirius. He goes right to fury, not stopping to pity him, and Remus finds this unbearably attractive, honestly.

"Tell me he died slowly, at least," Sirius grumbles.

"Well, he didn't die peacefully, I can tell you that." Remus clears his throat. "After three years, Lily and I finally found the proof we were looking for. Solid, indisputable proof, I mean. We broke into his house and checked his computer, where we found that he'd been stealing money from district funds and sending it to a woman, who we assumed he was either in love with or paying for sex, and both were against the rules, as was stealing the money."

"You just…didn't get to turn it in," Sirius whispers.

"No, we didn't," Remus says softly. "That's actually what we were on our way to do. Just bad timing, because Greyback came across us, and he never really missed a chance to harass me. He wanted to search Lily and I, but we had—well, what we'd stolen, so we…resisted. Just tried to get him to let us go on our way, but of course he didn't. He started trying to pat me down, so I shoved him away, and things…escalated."

Sirius swallows, his eyes wide.

"He had his gun," Remus continues, his gaze drifting off to the side. "It—it all happened so fast. He was going to put it to my head and threaten me into complying, but we got into a scuffle, and the gun was—was waving around. We were both trying to keep it pointed away from us, and then Lily sort of just—started strangling him. I think she was trying to make him pass out so we could run, but the gun went off before that ever happened. It was me that pulled the trigger. To this day, I don't know if I meant to. I just know I didn't regret it."

Sirius blows out a deep breath. "Shit."

"Yeah," Remus agrees with a hoarse laugh. "We had to run. The others heard the gunshots, and they'd either kill us or take us, so we ran past the train tracks for the first time, and they chased us. It was—we couldn't both make it. There was no possible way with them closing in as they were, so I—I told Lily to keep running, not to stop for anything, and I gave her the gun. Then I circled back and made them chase me in the opposite direction. I got caught, and I never saw Lily again."

"Fucking hell, Remus," Sirius murmurs, reaching up to swipe his palm over his mouth.

"Do you want to know the worst part?" Remus whispers, a lump in his throat. "Every day, I'm so vividly aware that, if things had gone just a little differently, then it would be Greyback here instead of me."

"I'm sorry," Sirius breathes out, stepping forward to reach out and slide his hands up and down Remus' arms. "I'm so sorry that any of it happened to you, Remus. None of it was fair. He should be here, not you. You're not a bad person, you know. How could you think that this makes you less worthy? You didn't have any more control in it than I did."

"That's just the thing, though. I did. I could have stopped it, if I just left it alone, if I just… gave up. My dad was constantly trying to get me to stop causing trouble, and if I listened—"

"And what? Keep putting up with the harassment, the mistreatment, the abuse of power? You had every right to respond as you did. Just because it went wrong doesn't mean that you were. You weren't. You were right, and you don't need to feel like you're a bad person because of this, not at all."

"Except I don't regret it," Remus declares bluntly, his voice steady as meets Sirius' gaze, holding it. "I feel no remorse for killing Greyback. None. I'm glad he's dead, and I'm glad I'm the one who pulled the trigger."

Sirius clears his throat violently. "Yes, well, you're justified in feeling that way. Also, if you're expecting me to find that appalling—well, do I have some news for you."

"Oh, is that doing it for you?"

"It's—it's certainly doing something. We should—do you want to go back to bed? I can give you a blowie again. Can I?"

Remus stares at him. "I tell you all of that and your response is that you'd like to suck my cock?"

"Um." Sirius blushes that lovely blush of his, and Remus could never have imagined that he would be laughing after the conversation he just had, and yet, here he is.

He can't help it. He just cracks up, and Sirius groans, lifting his hands to cover his face, blatantly mortified. Remus is still laughing helplessly when he reaches out to tug Sirius' hands down and reel him in, grinning against his cheek, kissing him and kissing him in between breathless laughter full of relief.

Sirius' face is warm against his lips.

"You said something earlier."

Sirius hums idly, eyes closed as he drags his fingers repeatedly through Remus' hair, his other hand drifting gently up and down the side of Remus' arm. Remus is all curled up against him, practically on top of him, and Sirius really enjoys the weight of him. He also finds it terribly adorable that Remus is essentially letting Sirius coddle him after the emotional upheaval of the last hour.

"About a difference between your sexual desire and your acceptance of pleasure," Remus continues in a mumble, picking lazily at one of the buttons on Sirius' shirt.

"Right," Sirius mutters, cracking open one eye. "Yes, and?"

Remus lifts his head and rests his chin on Sirius' chest, eyeing him carefully. "Do you want to talk about it?"

"I mean, it's not—I never really thought about it, until you, but they're two separate things," Sirius murmurs, his eyebrows crinkling together as he tries to come up with the proper words to explain it. "I suppose I—well, for a long time, I sort of thought that my struggles to accept pleasure influenced my sexual desire, and perhaps it does make it more complicated, but I'm me because I'm me, not because of what's been done to me. Does that make sense?"

"Yes," Remus says softly, eyes clear, patiently listening.

Sirius purses his lips. "It's—I never really realized it, because I suppose I never thought about it, but it's always been this way. Not feeling sexual desire, I mean. Like, I went into my games at sixteen, but I'd never done anything by then. Not even alone, and you know, most people do at least do that, just to give it a try, or because it feels good. But, honestly, it literally never crossed my mind. I just…couldn't be bothered."

"No?" Remus asks curiously. "Because the moment I realized I had a right hand, it was over."

"Filthy," Sirius comments with a snort, and Remus grins at him, lopsided and flirty. It does make Sirius' stomach fill with butterflies, yes, but he can't be blamed for that. "But no, I just literally never cared to, or thought about it. Then, well, there was Mary. We'd been friends for years before I ever actually formed a crush on her, and it wasn't until I did that I actually had the desire to do anything at all."

Remus nods. "Tell me about her. Mary."

"Ah, she's lovely. Still a close friend to this day, someone I trust wholeheartedly. We grew up together, I guess you could say. We went to the same school, and we actually didn't live too far from each other before I moved into the Victor's Village. She was the first person who ever did my makeup when I was, like, twelve. So, by the time I was sixteen, I was pretty sure that she was…it, for me, you know?" Sirius muses.

"Not really," Remus replies thoughtfully. "I wasn't really the type to think in terms of settling down, not back then."

Sirius chuckles. "Yes, well, I'd never felt the way I did for Mary for anyone before. It was very new, and it was also really exciting, or that's how I remember it anyway. You can ask Regulus and James; I walked around for a solid month making everyone call me Mr. Sirius Macdonald."

"Stop, that's adorable," Remus chokes out, laughing quietly.

"A bit embarrassing, looking back. Mary was lovely about it, though. I never actually asked her out. I just failed to keep my crush a secret, and she eventually confronted me about it. Oh, I was so nervous, but—but in a good way, I think? I can't really remember most of it, but she was so nice about the whole thing. I think we dated for a week before I was ready to even kiss her, and she didn't mind at all."

"That's really sweet, Sirius. You two never…?"

"No." Sirius clears his throat and shakes his head. "I went into my games not too long after, and I wasn't… Well, we never actually broke up, technically, so I suppose you could argue that we're still dating, since we never had that conversation."

Remus arches an eyebrow. "Is your girlfriend aware that you have a little something on the side?"

"Believe it or not, yes," Sirius teases, grinning. "Mary knows me too well. She clocked me about two weeks after I got back. I never said a name or your position, just admitted that I met someone. She was happy for me."

"She sounds brilliant," Remus murmurs.

Sirius' face softens. "She is. In any case, we never broke up, but I was a mess after I got back from the arena. It was just one of those known things, I suppose. It wasn't until over a year later that we actually really sat down to talk, and it wasn't the same. I wasn't the same. She'd had a girlfriend at the time, too, so there were no hard feelings or anything. Most of all, we were friends, and we still are to this day."

"Does it make you feel…better? Knowing that your sexual desire and acceptance of pleasure is separate, I mean?" Remus asks, pressing his head up into Sirius's hand, silently asking him to continue running his fingers through his hair, because he'd gotten distracted enough to stop.

"Yes," Sirius admits, picking up the movement of his hand again. "I don't even know if it bothered me before, really, but I do like being sure now. I'd say that my acceptance of pleasure, or my struggles with it, have nothing to do with my sexuality. I'd also say that my sexuality is probably another reason for my struggles to accept pleasure, realistically, but there's a lot of reasons for that, so it's not necessarily the fault of sexual desire itself. More like…it wasn't something I ever had to sit down and think about, or confront, because I never really cared to have pleasure, not for a long time."

"But you do now."

"I do now, yes, because of you. I did before with Mary, too, but that was a long time ago, and it didn't get to go anywhere. It also wasn't a struggle for me back then. I mean, I was nervous, yes, and I needed time, but I was—I don't know, innocently excited about it, I guess? There was no…guilt. Or shame."

Remus' lips tip down. "And there is now, even with me."

"Not because of you, or my sexuality. Like I said, that's entirely separate." Sirius sighs. "No, this is—it's the Hallows. Because of what they believe I am, and how bad it makes me feel to think it might be even a little bit true. I'm—I've gotten better about it, I think, especially with your help. I spent so long being exposed to everyone else's sexual desires that I sort of struggled to be okay with my own, but it's—it's really nice getting to be excited about it again."

"Are you? Excited?" Remus checks. "Because, earlier, you said you didn't know if you could trust me anymore, and I—"

Sirius tsks and tugs on his hair a little. "Shh, I know what I said, but that was when I was under the impression that you didn't trust me. I—I need a level of trust between us for sex to even be an option, a desire I have, and that's all I meant. But you do trust me. I know that now."

"I am sorry, you know."

"Hush, I know. It's okay, Remus. We talked about it."

Remus searches his face and mumbles, "Is that why you wouldn't let me reciprocate before? Because, at the time, you weren't sure about the trust?"

"I…" Sirius frowns, blinking. "You know, actually, I'm not entirely sure about that one. I don't think so. I genuinely didn't want to get off. Seems a bit mental, I suppose, but all I really wanted was to cuddle and kiss after making you feel good. I don't know, maybe that's odd to you, but for me, it's fucking exciting. Like, it's just all so…new, and I liked it. That I wanted to do that for you, with you, but didn't want it in return. And you just—let me. I like that, too. That you just roll with it, and you don't get offended or anything. Because I think it's going to be different; sometimes I'll want you to reciprocate, and other times I probably won't even want to do anything at all. I like that I can trust you just to be—okay with all of it."

"So, I'm—I'm getting it right?" Remus asks, blinking at him slowly, paying attention like this is very important to him. It is, Sirius realizes, and it makes his heart clench when he works out that Remus wants to treat him well.

"You're getting it right," Sirius confirms, ducking his head forward to press a gentle kiss to Remus' mouth, unable to stop himself from grinning in delight, full of love.

"I'm sorry I didn't get it right before," Remus says, yet again.

Sirius groans in exasperation. "Oh, stop it, would you? Please don't fret about it, Remus. It's —I mean, we've talked about it, and that's… Well, honestly, I think it's good that we did, and I think it wouldn't be good to keep clinging to it. I know you're sorry, and I am, too. It's okay. I promise it is."

"I—yes, well, you're right," Remus admits sheepishly.

"First time for everything," Sirius teases with a wink, ruffling Remus' hair playfully. "You have your mother's hair, you know. Saw a picture of her and you. She was beautiful."

Remus' eyes soften. "She was, yeah. I always looked more like my dad, though."

"Oh, yes, I noticed." Sirius wiggles his eyebrows playfully, breaking out into a grin. "If your dad is any indication of what I have to look forward to seeing when you get older, then I'm a very lucky man. I mean, whew, he is just—"

"Sweetheart, I'm begging you, please stop," Remus mutters, squeezing his eyes shut.

Sirius bites his lip, fighting a laugh. "He was wearing suspenders, Remus. I could barely contain myself."

"Oh, for fuck's sake—"

"No, really, I think I actually have a chance. We're on a first name basis, your father and I."

Remus opens his eyes and flatly says, "Are you now?"

"Mhm. He likes me," Sirius declares smugly. "I made him laugh. I bet if I put in the work, I could—"

"Literally stop," Remus cuts in, reaching up to cover Sirius' mouth with his hand.

"Alright, alright," Sirius mumbles, as soon as Remus lifts his hand. Sirius smiles at him softly. "Anyway, all jokes aside, your dad really was a nice man, Remus. I was very nervous about meeting him, and wanted to make a good impression, ridiculously enough. I think I got his approval, though."

"Did you?" Remus' eyes sparkle with amusement. "That's good to know. He's always been a good judge of character, so that doesn't surprise me one bit."

"I—I did make a complete fool of myself," Sirius admits sheepishly. "So, I may have accidentally told him that we had sex, just blurted it out like an idiot, and then I immediately started panicking as soon as I had."

"I—" Remus blinks. "How would that ever even come up in conversation, Sirius? You'd just met the man."

"I was fussing a bit about—well, it was after he let it slip about your very justified crime," Sirius explains. "I proceeded to immediately let it slip that I felt you should have at least mentioned it before we had sex, and then it all went downhill from there. I'm not joking, Remus. I panicked."

Remus huffs out a soft laugh and shakes his head in what Sirius knows is pure amazement. "You absolute mess of a human being. What did he say?"

"Well, honestly, he just said he expected nothing less from you, and also that it pleased him to know you were still being a rebellious little shit." Sirius pauses. "I'm paraphrasing."

"Obviously. Continue," Remus says, amused.

"He also—well, that's when I made him laugh. When I tell you I panicked, I mean I panicked," Sirius insists. "I was scared he'd think I coerced you, and so I started rambling to explain that I hadn't, then freaked out because I kept accidentally cursing in his house. I confessed that I'm in love you before I ever got to tell you, and he just ended up laughing, but he seemed happy overall to know that you're—"

Sirius stops.

His hand freezes in Remus' hair.

Remus is staring at him, lips parted.

"—loved," Sirius finishes softly, his eyes sinking shut. "Fuck. Fuck. Oh, that's not—I didn't—I cannot believe that I just—"

"You're in love with me," Remus breathes out, and when Sirius opens his eyes, his heart flips over like it's falling over a cliff from the way Remus is looking at him. "You're in love with me, and you told my dad you're in love with me, and you're in love with me. You love me. You're in love with me."

"Wait, wait, go back," Sirius says weakly. "That wasn't even close to romantic. I—I wanted to tell you in a better way. Like, I don't know, with wine or…something. Oh, that was shit. That was absolutely the worst—"

"When did you know?" Remus cuts in, his gaze locked with Sirius', more intense and focused than Sirius has ever seen him. It makes Sirius get very warm, very quickly. "When did you realize? What was your oh moment, I mean?"

Sirius frowns slightly, then blinks. "I—I…don't remember." He shakes his head quickly when Remus briefly looks stricken, like he's horrified by the thought that Sirius lost that moment, which would be upsetting, except… "No, not in a bad way. There wasn't a moment that I just knew; it was just…there, as absurd as that may sound. I don't think it's something I lost, Remus. I think it's something I've always had."

There's only a second between the last word falling from Sirius' lips and Remus replacing it with his own, practically crawling up so he can reach, so he can fold over Sirius and kiss him like he's trying to pour himself into Sirius and disappear within him, exist with him always, stay and never leave.

Sirius tangles his fingers in Remus' hair and lets himself be kissed, lets himself be utterly obsessed and enamored with every second of it, lets himself want it and take it and moan into it. Remus kisses him like he's trying to devour him, and it's so good, it feels so good; Sirius can't get enough.

No, he literally hasn't had enough, and so maybe he whines when Remus pulls away, trying rather desperately to pull him back in, but Remus resists to whisper, "The day after the hunger games, after Regulus got released from the infirmary, when you and I were taking a moment and you started giggling because I told you that you were precious to me. That was my oh moment. That's when I knew."

"When you knew that you—you—" Sirius sucks in a stuttered breath, his heart thumping hard in his chest, feeling shaky and faint with excitement and hope and love and want and so many things all at once, as Remus is prone to making him feel.

"When I knew that I loved you. That I love you. That I'm in love with you," Remus tells him.

"Come here, come here, come here," Sirius chants breathlessly, reeling him in and quaking beneath him like a fault line splitting open into a chasm, more space for things to flood into and things to spill out of. He feels so much, all of it good, and only Remus can do this to him.

"Sirius?" Remus croaks as Sirius starts snatching at his shirt and squirming underneath him.

"Sex," Sirius blurts out. "Sex, right now."

That's honestly the best he can do with how urgent he is at the moment, but that's apparently all Remus needs, because he immediately says, "Yep," and starts getting undressed.

Sirius loves him so much.

Chapter End Notes

yeah, that was 10k of nothing but wolfstar. i better not see one person asking about jegulus, or im coming for your kneecaps.

alright, time for me to Not Know How To Shut Up.

idk if all of you have seen the vampire diaries (im exposing myself here, shhh), but to those of you who have, you know that scene where bonnie makes it back from the other side and she shows up to see damon, and then she just fucking launches herself across the room and literally hops into his arms, legs wrapped around him and everything, and he just lets out a sigh of relief and a happy little groan and clings to her? yeah, that's The Vibe for the hug that happened at the start between remus and sirius. to those of you who haven't seen that scene and have no idea what the fuck im talking about, sorry, you're missing out.

anyway, remus literally did not even say hello to anyone else, and he's so valid for that!!! THEY HAVEN'T SEEN EACH OTHER IN SIX MONTHS 😭 sirius, internally: a guillotine could not sever the head im about to give this man. good for them 😌 shoutout to my girl Pandora "cough cough he's sick" Unspecified Last Name for pulling the nursemaid card. she really said: the mentor im responsible for is SICK and i demand someone to come take care of him!!! her brain is so big. i love her.

remus and sirius just lying in bed and gazing at each other, like. they make me feel like i could fight god and WIN. i just wanna squish them and carry them around in my pockets.

the letter!!! THE LETTER!!! remus getting to know his dad loves him and is proud of him and that his mum would be proud of him too 😭😭😭 that's so special, im sorry, he needed that so much. my baby :(

not sirius being the man of everyone's dreams, like even when angry at remus, he's still like: we can fight in a minute, are you okay, do you need a hug? he's so!!! i need him.

but also, them bitching at each other 💀 HELP THEY'RE BOTH SO FUSSY, I LOVE THEM. sirius is so dramatic pls "forget it, knowing me, i will anyway" LIKE DAMN CAN HE BREATHE??? 😭😭😭 yeah, they're all sweet and cute, but i just KNOW they could go at it when pissed off. they're both Very Stubborn. however, mild argument aside, them being healthy and open and honest and just communicating is very, very important to me.

if someone ever called me invaluable to my face, i would also burst into tears, so remus is so valid for that, actually. like sirius is so lovely.

and finally, remus' backstory comes to light. remus and lily "be gay, do crime" chaos twins killing greyback because he was a piece of shit is actually so fair. as they should, honestly. like, it wasn't Planned, but they were not upset that it happened.

it's really fucking sad, though. like, remus wasn't there when his mother died, because he'd been whipped. him and his family suffered years of harassment and the backlash of blatant abuse of power. remus and lily were SO CLOSE to being okay, to never ending up where they are now. they didn't even get to properly say goodbye to their families or each other before it all went to shit, and then they never saw each other again. they didn't deserve that :(

yes im aware that i wrote it, leave me alone and then, the talk about sirius' sexuality was super important and just like. it's good for him. it's good for both of them. also, just like the fact that sirius is now at a place where he can be comfortable with exploring his sexuality vs his acceptance of pleasure is just so, so very important and a lovely development!!!

finally, the accidental love confession. oh, sirius, you lovely mess, i adore you. he really just casually was like "haha i told your dad im in love with you before i told you" pause "WAIT FUCK—" 😭😭😭 he's so special to me. he means the world to me.

remus just being fucking ELATED!!! like, oh he loves me??? STOP THAT'S SO CUTE ☹☹☹ and sirius "unintentionally the funniest and most poetically romantic fucker alive" black just being like: i didn't lose the memory of loving you, ive always had it. GOODBYE THATS SO??? ITS SO SPECIAL??? im gonna cry they mean everything to me

HONORABLE MENTIONS:

-james being a supportive best friend and wishing sirius All The Good Things
-regulus being supportive also, but still wrinkling his nose when he hears something he didn't want to
-james kissing pandora's hand (he and regulus are right, we do not deserve her)
-sirius remembering how remus takes his tea!!!
-remus the rapscallion
-sirius teasing remus about his dad
-the hidden message in the letter
-"does your girlfriend know you've got a little something on the side?" REMUS LUPIN THE MAN THAT YOU ARE
-sirius walking around demanding to be called Mr. Sirius Macdonald 😭😭😭
-remus literally not needing to be told twice to immediately have sex with sirius 💀

Chapter Notes

hello!!!

warnings for this chapter:

-references to past torture (vague and mostly implied)
-discussion surrounding a family member being ill/dying
-references to past violence
-a brief mention of someone being derogatory to sirius about his "reputation" in the hallow—alluding to people thinking he basically uses sex to get what he wants with the hallows, even though he doesn't that's... im pretty sure that's it, actually. it's a fairly lighter chapter, overall, but don't let that fool you. there is some angst mixed in!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

"—and then he said that's when he knew, and we had sex, which was so good, really good, because he's actually a fucking marvel with his mouth; no, you don't understand the things he can do, James, I mean it," Sirius is rambling in a breathless rush, propped up on the bed with a pillow in his lap, hugged to his chest, eyes so bright that the star he's named after must dripping with jealousy at the moment.

James struggles not to laugh. He's happy for Sirius, truly, but he can't help that he finds it incredibly amusing how giddy Sirius is right now. James honestly doesn't think he's ever seen Sirius get giggly and starry-eyed over…literally anyone. He's so in love that it would be painful if Remus didn't feel the same—though, thankfully, that's not the case.

"What can he do?" James asks, very much engaged in this conversation, mostly because Sirius is so happy and excited about the whole thing. Sirius immediately launches into a detailed description of all the things Remus can do with palpable delight. James can't blame him. It's just so lovely being in love, isn't it?

Most of the time.

James firmly shoves down the rising thought of Regulus that is never too far from the back of his mind. Now is not the time. This is not about him, and it's not about James. No, it's about Sirius and Remus, who are happy and in love and deserve every bit of joy that they get to share between them.

Not that James would know anything about what that's like.

Oh, for fuck's sake, James thinks in exasperation, doing the mental equivalent of swatting himself on his head. He absolutely refuses to be bitter right now. No. Just no.

It's nice, honestly, getting to see Sirius so happy, especially about this. When James got back from the interview—which went well enough—it didn't take very long for Remus and Sirius to resurface from their room; Sirius checked on them and asked how the interview went, and Remus actually fully let them all reunite with him this time. Not that James can blame him for failing to before, because he was sweeping Sirius off to be alone with him. They both look so happy together, just glowing, quite frankly. It sears James open with joy.

In any case, it took less than twenty minutes for Regulus to murmur quietly with Remus, who ended up slipping off with him, much to Sirius' dismay. He did bounce back the moment he realized he could get alone with James, giggling and gossiping with him like they're still stupid boys who haven't been exposed to the worst of the world yet.

Really, Remus being here seemed to just…make a lot of things better, for basically everyone. James himself is happy to see his friend again and know he's okay, and he's especially happy because Sirius is happy. Regulus seems to be essentially feeling the same way, from what James can tell, and it appears to have lifted his spirits quite a bit.

That made for a really good interview. James and Regulus went into it with good moods, so they actually did extremely well, if James does say so himself. James was especially bubbly, and Regulus was just very quietly pleased in that secretive way of his that James loves dearly. They put on quite the show, sitting so close together that Regulus was practically in his lap, being delightfully soppy. And Regulus kissed him.

This whole time, they've kept up appearances as a couple, but it's not as if couples walk around kissing all the time, so they were in the clear for that. Regulus wanted to keep it to a minimum, and James has respected that this entire time, keeping his mouth very firmly away from Regulus' face in literally any capacity. The one time he did anything was today, during that interview, because if there was ever a place…

Still, he only intended to kiss Regulus' cheek, that's it, but Regulus seemed to turn into it instinctively, so James caught the corner of his mouth instead, and for a moment, the entire room disappeared. Rita wasn't there. The crowd vanished. The cameras didn't exist. It was just Regulus, how close he was, the way James rested his forehead against Regulus' temple and let his eyes drift shut, just for a moment, feeling him, him, him…

And then James forced himself to pull away, but he didn't get very far at all, because Regulus genuinely just chased his mouth, fully kissing him on purpose, and James knows it was real. He knows for sure, because Regulus froze the moment he did it, and when he pulled away, James only needed one glimpse into his eyes to see that he hadn't meant to. He hadn't intended to do that, he just got so caught up, and he'd wanted it, and James felt like his heart was going to climb right out of his throat and fly around the fucking room. The Hallows, of course, had loved it, but all James could see was the rose-flush that dusted Regulus' cheeks.

In any case, Pandora was pleased, and she showered them in praise all the way back to the penthouse, so James knows they did as they needed to.

There's a knock on the door, and Sirius tapers off, his head lifting at the same time that James' does. Seconds later, the door swings open, and Remus pokes his head in.

"Room for one more?" he asks.

Sirius' face absolutely lights up so much that it's almost painful to look at. "Yeah, always. Where's Reggie?"

"He's upset that he doesn't have a balcony, I think, so Pandora is escorting him to the roof," Remus explains as he slips into the room and dumps himself unceremoniously on the bed, head and shoulders dropping right into Sirius' lap.

"Hes a fussy little shit," Sirius mumbles fondly, lips curling up as he stuffs the pillow under Remus' head and gazes down at him. For a long moment, they just grin at each other, and James forces down the wistful sigh that rises in his throat.

Remus swivels his head to look at James warmly. "How have you been, James?"

"Been better, been worse," James admits honestly, giving Remus a crooked grin. "Putting up with Sirius being sensible all of a sudden, since he met you. You're a wonderful influence on him, you know. It's terrible."

"Oh, is that so?" Remus asks, sounding amused. He raises his eyebrows up at Sirius, his eyes sparkling with blatant mischief, lips curling at the corners.

"James is just upset because I don't let him be mean to himself, that's all," Sirius mutters, rolling his eyes. "I swear, he's as bad as Regulus sometimes. Never met two people so very different, yet so willing to do the same things."

"Yes, don't be mean to yourself," Remus agrees, clicking his tongue at James in disapproval. "The world is cruel enough to us on its own; we don't need to add to that."

Sirius hums smugly. "Didn't I say he'd feel that way?"

"You did say," James admits with a sigh.

"Oh, cheer up, James," Remus says weakly, reaching out to gently pat his knee. "Look at it this way, you'll get to drink tomorrow night."

"Sirius doesn't let me drink," James replies flatly.

"Well, don't say it like that, James. You make it sound like I'm a strict parent, or a controlling spouse," Sirius grumbles. "And I do let you drink, in moderation, when you're in a safe environment and in a good mental state. Don't forget to mention that you only let me drink within those same rules."

James purses his lips. "Can I drink tomorrow night?"

"Absolutely not," Sirius announces immediately.

"So, no, actually I don't get to drink tomorrow night," James informs Remus with a sigh. "To be honest, I'm not sure I'd want to anyway. Not at some stupid Hallow party. Will you be there, Remus?"

"Yeah, I'll be working," Remus assures him with a small smile. "Just a reminder, but you can't talk to me or interact with me at all, alright? It's—if it helps, most people will leave you alone if you're dancing. That's my advice; just take Regulus to the dance floor and don't leave it the whole night, that way no one can bother either of you."

"You've worked one of these before?" Sirius asks.

Remus nods. "Mhm. I was working for the victory tour before I ever got assigned to the actual games. It's only one night, one event, less of chance I'll fuck it up, so that's why I'm picked for it. I was surprised they picked me this year, honestly."

"Really?" Sirius asks.

"This…" Remus reaches up and gently brushes his fingers over the scar on his face. "Most of the time, servants with any notable, distinguishing markings or features are kept out of the lineup for events and such. But ah…there's also—I mean, technically there's a servant shortage at the moment…"

James blinks. "A—what? Like they're…running out? They're fucking low on—on—"

"They weren't, but there's been…a lot of experimenting, as of late," Remus says carefully, dropping his gaze. "Not everyone survived it."

Sirius meets James' gaze in seconds, and for a beat, they just stare at each other in heavy silence. James can read the concern, the fear, in Sirius' eyes as if he's feeling it himself. He is feeling it himself, because Remus is his friend, and the thought of something happening to him…

It's fucking terrifying.

"But I got off light," Remus continues, breaking the silence, once again reaching up to touch his scar. "Could be worse."

Sirius makes a small, unhappy noise and grabs Remus' wrist to bring his fingers to his mouth, pressing kisses to the pads of them. It makes Remus watch him fondly, his face softening, and then he releases muffled laughter when Sirius folds over to smack a kiss gracelessly to the middle of his face, where the scar is. That lightens the mood pretty much immediately, but Sirius has always been good at that.

"What did I say, hm? Remus the rapscallion." Sirius glances up with a grin. "Go on, James, isn't Remus just so sexy with his new scar? Makes him look raffish, doesn't it?"

"Very raffish," James says supportively. He winks at Remus and waggles his eyebrows. "In fact, Remus, if you ever decide we should ditch the Black brothers, I'm actually so down to __"

"Hey, fuck off," Sirius interrupts, reaching over to smack James on the arm with the back of his hand, frowning.

Remus props up on his elbow and tucks his hand under his chin, smiling at James, slow and warm and honestly a bit suggestive, and James would like to say he's immune, but he is not. Remus is very handsome, to be fair. "Oh, I thought you'd never offer, James. Yes, absolutely, we should—"

"I will kill all of us right now, do not fuck with me," Sirius declares, hooking his hands on Remus' arm to rock him back into his lap, ruffled like an offended bird.

James and Remus share a look before busting out into loud, uproarious laughter, and Sirius grumbles under his breath before snatching the pillow out from under Remus' head and whacking them both with it in reprimand.

It doesn't take very long before they're all cracking up and fighting over the pillow, wrestling around on the bed and talking shit like the cruelest parts of the world can't touch them. And it's not very long after that silliness that they're all sprawled out again, talking and joking and laughing like the cruelest parts of the world haven't touched them at all.

They have, of course they have, and they will again; but, right now, James finds that this matters more.

Regulus can't really figure out why being up on the roof doesn't frighten him. It's high up, after all, so by all means it should fucking send him into hysterics, but it doesn't.

Maybe it's the illusion of a secure ground beneath his feet. Trees don't really have that; branches always break. He thinks about it, the way this building could tip, or the roof could crumble in, and that does admittedly make him feel uneasy, so he stops thinking about it. In any case, there's an elevated ledge that wraps around the entire roof that he can lean against and use to look out over the Hallow.

Pandora is with him. She's leaning against the ledge, too, but not against him. She's quiet, sort of pensive, Regulus thinks. They haven't spoken, instead just looking out over the ledge, comfortable and solemn.

"Do you ever think about how big the Hallow is?" Regulus murmurs, sweeping his gaze over the lights bathing across the city, lighting it up like cheap stars in the dark.

If Pandora is surprised that he's open to talking to her, or talking at all, she doesn't show it. She just muses, "No, not really. I suppose I've never really thought about it because I'm…in it, if that makes sense. But lately…"

"What?" Regulus asks, swiveling his head to look at her.

"Well, lately, I've been thinking about how small the districts seem when they're broken up, but when you think to put them all together, they're bigger than the Hallow," Pandora says softly, her eyebrows furrowed. The breeze stirs her hair.

"I suppose you're right," Regulus replies, mildly startled. He's never thought about that, but… why would he? Like she's in the Hallow, he's just another person from a broken district.

Silence settles between them, mostly comfortable, but then Pandora shatters it with the last thing he's prepared to hear.

"My dad's dying, you know," Pandora whispers.

Regulus studies the side of her face, his heart clenching when he sees the column of her throat rise and fall on a harsh swallow. He doesn't know what to say, so he says nothing.

"And I go to work. Just. Keep working." Pandora huffs out a weak laugh, shaking her head. "I mean, he's alive, just very sick, but I still—I just…keep working."

"Pandora," Regulus says carefully, very carefully, because he honestly isn't prepared for the hurt in her voice.

"You said once…" Pandora turns to look at him, and her eyes are bright with tears. "Do you remember when we first met? And you said that—that Hallows thrive on death, and I said that it's a somber subject for us, too?"

"I didn't—I was just…upset about the circumstances," Regulus mumbles, a lump forming in his throat.

Pandora chokes out a hoarse laugh. "See, it's—it's funny, because I had the audacity to be upset with you for saying that. My dad was dying then, too, and that's the first person I thought of, but look at me now. I just get up and keep working. Hallow really is hollow. I—I feel so—"

"Okay. Okay, Pandora," Regulus whispers, tugging on her a little bit as her face crumbles, and she turns into him as soon as he makes it clear that she can.

Regulus doesn't—he isn't one for touching, obviously, but he's finding it more bearable the more it happens, and Pandora... Despite everything, he does nurse a gentle sort of trust in her. He respects her immensely, more than he ever expected to, and so if this is how he can comfort her, he will. She has done so much for them, all of them, and she deserves to be taken care of, too.

Pandora tucks her face against his shoulder and releases a horrible sob, suddenly clinging to him with all her might, rougher with him than she's ever been. He lets her do it without complaint, feeling her hair tickle his nose—smelling faintly of lemons—as she trembles and sobs against him.

Regulus is sure that her ignoring her father's impending death has nothing to do with her not caring, but rather just a symptom of how much she does. There's a reason denial is the first stage of grief, and acceptance is the last. She's not letting herself feel it, or break down, like that could make it less true. It doesn't make her hollow. It makes her human.

And now it's hitting her. The moment she gets still. The moment when the work day is done. The moment that she has nothing to do in the endeavor to avoid it. The day began with her father dying, and no matter what she did throughout, he's still dying by the end. There's no changing that.

"Pandora," Regulus says as gently as possible, not sure how to comfort her, but doing his best anyway, because she always does her best for them. "Hey, look at me."

Pandora shakes her head against him and hiccups out another sob, so he gives in and gives her more time. He keeps his arms around her and rubs her back, reflexively swallowing past the lump in his throat every time another hitched sob spills out of her. Regulus wishes he could go to that day on the train and take it back, what he so cruelly said to her, so carelessly.

"Well, death is a somber subject, generally, except to the Hallows, I suppose. James and I are going to be knocking on death's door soon enough, so you'll forgive us for being a bit...maudlin."

"Death is a somber subject to us, too."

"Oh, how shocking. I thought you Hallows thrived on that sort of thing, but only when it's people like us, right?"

People like us. Because there's an us and a them. Except, right now, us and them are embracing on a rooftop, knowing layers of grief in and out, laden with the weight of losing people in their lives they never wanted to be without. Us is holding them with an aching heart, and them is falling apart. The truth is, the only thing that stands between that us and them is the arena, and when taking the time to reach across that distance from each side, it's startling how not very far it is at all.

"I'm—I'm okay. It's okay. I'm okay," Pandora rasps, pulling away all at once with a sniffle to wipe her tears away and set her shoulders. "I'm—it's—"

"No," Regulus cuts in quietly. "No, Pandora, you're not. And I know what I said before, okay? But you're not hollow. I've never met a Hallow who cares as much as you, so don't you dare blame yourself for how you're dealing with this."

Pandora exhales shakily. "I—I haven't told anyone the details yet. Sirius knows, vaguely, but…I don't know. Talking about it makes it feel more real. They think he has between six months and a year left. A year from now he could be gone—he probably will be—and I don't know what to do with that. He keeps wanting to—to talk about funeral arrangements and final wishes and his will, but I just—I refuse to hear it."

"Do you have any other family?" Regulus asks.

"Just you, Sirius, James, Remus, and all the other tributes I reaped that never made it home," Pandora replies instantly, and Regulus feels his heart shrivel up like a crumpled piece of paper when he realizes that she means it, that she considers them her family. She's lost so much family already.

"Look, I'm not—well, honestly, I don't really know the whole process," Regulus admits slowly. "I've been to two funerals. My uncle Cygnus and my uncle Alphard's, but I was so young, and my family is…very fucking dysfunctional, as I'm sure you've noticed by now."

"Yes, I've noticed," Pandora confirms bluntly.

Regulus sighs. "Right, well, my mother planned both of those funerals and handled all of that. They were her younger brothers, and neither of them had spouses alive, or children around, so it fell on her. I was too young to really understand it, honestly, and I can't promise that I'll be much help—or that Sirius and James would, because I don't know—but, when the time comes, you can come visit us if you need to."

Pandora seems to relax all at once, blinking tears out of her eyes as she gives him a wobbly smile. "Thank you." She turns to lean on the ledge again, blowing out a deep breath. "We've come a long way, haven't we? You hated me at the start."

"Yes, well, it's a common theme with me to find that my hatred isn't as strong as I always convince myself it is," Regulus mutters with a heavy sigh.

"Do you want my advice?" Pandora muses, then doesn't wait for an answer. "Doesn't matter, I'm going to give it to you anyway. Despite the fact that all of this is shit—the pretending and such—I don't think you're as trapped as you believe you are. And I mean that as, like, you and James when you're alone. Maybe that could be separate from all this, if you tried to let it be. You don't gain anything from not trying at all, Regulus."

"No, but I don't lose anything either," Regulus murmurs.

"Don't you?" Pandora asks gently, and Regulus feels those words bounce around in his head and choke him on the way down, ricocheting through his entire body, ping-ponging between the high points of his shoulders and swinging around the rungs of his spine before settling into the cavern of his center, etched into the walls of that deep place neither in the gut or the back but that fathomless unknown that lives in between, where survival and want are sourced from.

Don't you? Don't you? Don't you?

Doesn't he? Isn't he always? Hasn't he lost enough?

Yes, Regulus answers internally. Yes, and I am tired of it.

Sirius has clearly never had to kick James out of his room or his space before, so it likely doesn't even cross his mind to do so, but Remus has no such qualms.

It's not done maliciously. Remus adores James, honestly, and it's not like James won't be able to come back later. Really, Remus just wants to say goodbye to Sirius alone, not entirely sure if he'll make it through without crying again.

So, he says, "James, I need you to leave," and admittedly gets a bit of a thrill from being able to announce that without even worrying if it's going to get him killed. He trusts Sirius, yes, but he also trusts James, Regulus, and Pandora, too. It's so nice having people in his life that he can trust, that he feels safe and secure with, that he feels at home with.

James takes this in stride. Actually, he has a very dirty mind, apparently, because he breaks out into a broad grin as his eyebrows fly up, and he says, "Oh? Sure, sure! I'll just leave you two kids alone. Have fun, don't do anything I wouldn't do!"

"You heathen, just like your parents," Sirius grumbles, shaking his head as if he's not smiling a little. "It's not like that, James. He just wants to say goodbye, obviously. It's almost time for him to leave, so you should say goodbye now, too."

"Oh," James repeats, this time with more dejection. "Well, that's shit. But yes, come here, let me hug you."

Remus stifles a laugh, but he dutifully crawls off the bed to let James give him a hug, unable to swallow the laughter anymore when Sirius calls out, "Watch the hands, Potter," and James almost immediately starts grabbing suggestively at Remus' arms and commenting on how firm he is. They both get smacked in the side of their heads when Sirius throws the pillow at them, absolutely ruthless with his aim.

James keeps the goodbye lighthearted overall, like he thinks he'll get to do it more thoroughly later, and Remus doesn't shatter the illusion. The only person who knows he won't be back tomorrow and will be escorted to Azkaban after the party is Pandora—and Sirius, here in a minute, when Remus tells him, because not telling him would be too cruel.

With a final smile towards them, James nudges his glasses up his nose and shuts the door, leaving them alone.

"Oh, stop pouting," Remus murmurs as he crawls right back onto the bed with Sirius, who is indeed sulking a bit. "Don't tell me you're actually jealous right now."

"I get jealous of your clothes because they get to be wrapped around you all the time, Remus. Of course I'm jealous," Sirius mutters, waving a hand lazily. "I know you two would never and you're just fucking with me, and it's funny, but also I'm a jealous little shit. James says I'm territorial, like a dog."

Remus snorts. "Well, you did lick his face once because someone else tried to claim him as their best friend."

"And I'd do it again," Sirius says unapologetically. He pauses, then looks amused. "He's not much better, and you think I'm bad? Oh. Oh no, Regulus is the worst."

"You have stories," Remus notes, and Sirius' eyes light up before he's promptly launching into those stories.

Remus gets to hear all about the situation with Frank, who apparently has a knack for making a lot of people jealous, which Remus does admittedly find amusing. This leads into Sirius explaining about how Regulus stabbed his older cousin in the hand with a fork for touching James, and Remus finds this incredibly delightful. Sirius rambles on and on about all that happened on the tour, talking a bit about his family, and Remus listens dutifully, pleased to catch up with him. He can't be there. He can never be there, so he appreciates that he's included like this. He also just loves hearing Sirius talk, adores the sound of his voice, which is so very lovely.

"What about you?" Sirius asks, by the end. "Are you jealous?"

"I wasn't, before you," Remus admits.

Sirius bites his lip, eyes sparkling. "Are you going to be jealous tomorrow, when I'm dancing with all those Hallows?"

"Yes," Remus murmurs.

"It's okay," Sirius whispers, leaning in like he's telling a very special secret. "The whole time, I'll be thinking of you."

"Promise?" Remus asks quietly, pushing up on his elbow slightly so he can get closer to Sirius, feeling drawn in and drunk on his proximity.

"I'm always thinking of you," Sirius breathes out, and then he holds his breath the moment Remus reaches up to cup his jaw, keeping him still as he rocks in closer. He doesn't quite kiss him, just leans in enough to catch Sirius' bottom lip between his teeth and tug. Sirius chokes on his own punched-out exhale, curling forward with a soft moan. He almost sounds startled when he croaks, "Oh, that felt really good."

"Like a bit of bite, do you?" Remus says, lips twitching, and that's about as far as he gets before Sirius releases a groan and practically tackles him back to the bed, kissing him with fervor, desperate, practically trying to climb on top of him. Remus isn't against this at all, and it feels devastatingly unfair that he has to stop it. "Yes, okay, noted. I—I will keep it in mind in the future. Promise. But, unfortunately, there's not much I can do about it now. Sirius, Sirius, we have to stop."

"Let's not and say we did," Sirius mutters into the bend of his throat, trying to sneakily slip his hands up Remus' shirt. "I don't even want to do anything, really. Just—maybe what I did earlier. That's all. It'll be so quick, Remus. Can I?"

Remus fucking hates being a servant. With a groan, he reaches down to hook his hands around Sirius' elbows to tug him up and basically just squish him down to his chest, wrapping his arms all the way around him. "Don't get me wrong, I would love to give you whatever you want, but I have to go."

"Oh. Right." Sirius deflates against him and makes fussy, unhappy noise. He turns his head to rest his chin on Remus' chest, lips pursed. "Well, there's always tomorrow."

"Sweetheart," Remus says softly, a lump forming in his throat.

Sirius studies him, then weakly mumbles, "The—the morning before we leave, then?"

"I'm sorry," Remus whispers, and Sirius' eyes sink shut. "I know, Sirius. Trust me, I hate it, too. I—I don't have a choice. I'll be with the rest of the servants at Riddle's castle all day tomorrow, setting up for the party, and then I'll be escorted back to Azkaban with the rest once the party is over."

"There's never enough fucking time," Sirius chokes out, tilting his face down to bury it in Remus' chest.

"Hey, I—I wanted to ask for a favor," Remus murmurs, running his fingers through Sirius' hair and waiting for him to lift his head, heart clenching when he sees that Sirius' eyes are wet. "My letter. I can't keep it on me, or they'll find it, but I was hoping that you'd hold onto it for me. I left it in the stand by the bed. It's mine, the only thing I really have, and I can't imagine trusting it with anyone other than you."

"Yes," Sirius whispers, blinking fast and hard. He gives a stern nod, like this is a very important mission—and, to him, Remus doesn't doubt that it is. "Of course, Remus."

"Thank you," Remus whispers back.

"Can I see you at the party?" Sirius asks, his voice strained. He looks so desperately hopeful. "I don't mean just seeing each other across the room, or when I grab a drink from a tray you're carrying. I want to—I want—"

It's risky. It's always risky, between them, no matter where they are or what they're doing. They take the risks anyway, because it's always worth it. Remus says, "Every hour, the servants will rotate out on sweeping through the other rooms on the floor to clean them in case anyone left behind glasses or plates or anything else, usually those who slip away with lovers and such. If you notice when I leave, you can follow. We won't have very long, Sirius, but it's—it's something…"

Sirius quirks a sad smile. "Something is always enough for me, as long as it's with you."

The day of the party dawns bright and busy, with Pandora waking everyone and rounding them all up at what James knows Sirius and Regulus consider an obscene hour. They're both similarly displeased about being awake, wearing twin scowls that make them resemble one another more than James has honestly ever seen. It's oddly adorable.

James is an early bird, so he's doing alright. A bit tired from waking up through the night with nightmares, but that's routine at this point. He's used to that by now.

Pandora makes coffee that they can all drown themselves in to wake up, except Regulus doesn't like coffee, so James gets up to make him a cup of tea since Pandora doesn't know, Sirius is close to falling asleep again, and Regulus just—won't. He's the suffer in silence type, James knows, and he can't really stand by and do nothing about it when he's aware of it. Does that make him pathetic? Well, he's always pathetic about Regulus. He's used to that by now, too.

The thing is, he doesn't resent it. Truly, he doesn't hold any resentment for his inability to ignore Regulus in any capacity. Most of the time, it actually comforts him. And, on occasion, it gives him little moments to fold up and keep warm in his chest, something to cherish.

Like now. Regulus looks genuinely startled when James brings him a cup of tea. He doesn't even seem to realize it's for him at first, but the moment it clicks, his eyes get a little wide and his cheeks get a little red. It feels like a reward, frankly, and James hides his smile as he turns away. Regulus cups his tea between both palms like it's the most precious thing he's ever been given, sipping it slowly and coming more alive while Sirius downs coffee like it's his life source right next to him.

Pandora gives a rundown on what to expect at the party, which amounts to what James was expecting already. He and Regulus are technically the guests of honor, so a lot of attention will be on them through the night. People will want to talk to them, dance with them, just… be around them. It's probably going to be unbearable, honestly, but once they get through this, they'll be out of the spotlight for the most part.

At the party, they have to eat at some point, so they won't be seen as ungrateful. They have to meet government officials, shake their hands, and basically charm them. They have to meet sponsors, especially those that donated for them in their games, and essentially express immense gratitude. They have to be seen mingling with the other mentors that are all traveling for the party today, including the mentors of those that they personally killed, like a further sign that the horrors of the arena are something people can just—brush off. During all of this, they have to be friendly, polite, and seemingly happy, all while putting on a show for their romance.

To say that James is nervous would be an understatement.

Nonetheless, the day slips by, and it's not long before everyone is ushered off to Dorcas, who will not be going to the party but looks absolutely gorgeous as always. She isn't wearing her Hallow is Hollow necklace, and James can't remember the last time he saw it, but she is adorned with plenty of pretty accessories that he keeps getting distracted by, quite literally enamored by shiny things. It makes her smile.

"You look beautiful," James tells her honestly. "Well, you always look smashing, honestly, but you get what I mean."

Dorcas chuckles. "I do, yeah, and thank you. Here, turn for me; ah, thank you, my love. You look beautiful, too, by the way."

"All thanks to you."

"Mm, no, true beauty has nothing to do with what we can see, James. It's something else entirely. You shine with it."

James feels ridiculously bashful. "You think so?"

"I do," Dorcas confirms.

"Do you think…Regulus thinks so?" James mumbles weakly, because he's a glutton for punishment and also very pathetic.

Dorcas swivels to stand in front of him, her face softening as she meets his eyes. "I'm sure that he does, even more than anyone else in this world, and I think it blinds him. I think, for him, you shine so brightly that it's hard for him to see you."

"I want him to see me," James whispers.

"Don't worry," Dorcas assures him, "he can't really ever look away, and I think his eyes are starting to adjust."

James can't stop himself from being pleased by the thought, ducking his head as he starts fiddling with his cufflinks, too struck with the hope she's invited into his heart to do anything other than rock back and forth on his heels and beam down at the floor. Dorcas gently tugs his hands from his cufflinks and gives himself something else to fiddle with—her tiny clutch that has a clasp he can click and unclick over and over while she flutters around him and finishes getting him ready.

Seeing as they're all arriving as a unit in one group tonight, making impressions as a team effort, Dorcas is essentially getting them all ready. By the time she gets through with all of them, they each look so pretty that James could honestly cry.

She's got Regulus in a fucking turtleneck made of that soft, cashmere material that makes him look warm and domestic, which makes James wants to crawl inside the material with him and just live there. As for Pandora, she's put in a pantsuit, except the coat hooks into a belt and flows into a bit of a cape or train sort of thing that James knows he'll be reminding himself constantly not to step on; it looks brilliant, though. And Sirius has been stuffed in black pants that look painted on and one of those silk shirts that swoop down in the front, not showing too much, but showing enough that people will wistfully dream of seeing more, no doubt; oh, and she's also trusted him in a pair of high-heeled black boots that make him actually taller than James for once, though only by an inch or two.

After that, all that's left to do is get escorted to the castle, which they apparently have to do in carriages again, even though James finds it a bit ridiculous when they could literally just take cars. It's annoying getting in and out of the carriage, which is so high up off the ground—higher than a car would be—and puts some strain on his leg. It makes him wish he had brought his cane. Also, the carriages are pulled by something called a thestral, which is just a very unnerving animatronic steam-engine horse-like creature that runs on technology that allows them to be coded to be revealed only to those who have seen death in person.

Sirius says it's a symbolic thing, like tributes coming in don't often get to see the thestrals during the introduction parade, and only the Victor can see it by the time the victory tour swings around. James thinks it's morbid, and it doesn't help his feelings that the thestrals are really fucking creepy.

The whole way to the castle, Sirius and Pandora keep giving him and Regulus reminders and encouragement, which is appreciated but doesn't help James' nerves. Though, honestly, James doubts anything could help anyway. Or, he thinks that until Regulus' fingers abruptly cover the side of his hand, hesitating only a moment before sliding up to push between the crevices of James' own. Their hands link together, and James forgets to be so nervous because he's too busy looking at how well their hands fit.

James' inner delight at having Regulus' hand in his is quickly dashed away when he realizes why.

They've arrived.

Pandora piles out first, and Sirius is right behind her, hopping out in heels like it's effortless. For a second, neither James or Regulus move, and then they share a quick look before making their way out of the carriage. Regulus goes first to help him down, for which James is grateful.

James is pretty much immediately overwhelmed the moment they make it into the castle. They're led into a huge ballroom full of people. It's all glitz and glam, flashy colors and eccentric styles, tinkling laughter and prying eyes. There's a very long table displaying so much food that James is sure is wasted on these people, as well as servants bustling around with trays of food and drinks. While there isn't a bar, there is a table full of different glasses of wine and champagne.

The first hour of the party goes by in a rush. James honestly doesn't have time to be worried about much of anything, because Sirius insists on them getting certain things out of the way first, just to be sure that it's done. Meeting the sponsors is first, and James doesn't even have to pretend that much to be grateful when talking to each and every one. Yes, they may have demanded a show, but they did nonetheless provide the money that saved his life—and helped Regulus as well.

Regulus clearly struggles with it, but James suspects he's going to struggle with everything tonight. This is basically a nightmare scenario for him. He hates socializing, James knows that, so he tries to do most of the heavy-lifting for him, and Sirius picks up a lot of the slack as well. They're very good at being charming, especially together, and they leave each person smiling and satisfied.

Pandora does the heavy-lifting with the government officials, which they get out of the way next. As a Hallow, she at least knows their names, and they all basically follow her lead. It's a different feeling, because these people have power.

James feels very, very dirty after shaking all their hands and essentially acting like what they do isn't wrong, like what they do doesn't trickle down and affect the districts, like what they do hasn't created poverty and death and suffering. They may not make all the rules, but they're happy to enforce them, very willing to keep others down so they can rise higher.

He's grateful when Sirius ushers them away and promises them that they don't have to seek any of these people out anymore. Just like that, they can avoid them the rest of the night. All that's left is mingling with mentors and dealing with any other guest that demands their attention.

Sirius and Pandora are there with them for the first half of the mentors. The ones that Sirius doesn't like, or isn't close with. Lucius and Yaxley, for example. It's about as tense as expected, honestly. Lucius is the worst.

"Be careful not to stab anyone tonight, Regulus," Lucius says, lifting his wine in a toast with a faint smirk. "This is a formal event, and I don't think your little…romance will be enough to keep you out of trouble forever."

"Fuck off, Malfoy," Sirius retorts sharply, before anyone else can say a word.

"You never know when to watch your mouth, do you?" Lucius replies, his lip curling up in distaste.

Yaxley snorts. "No, but he clearly knows how to use it." He nods at Sirius, specifically the mark on his neck that James knows for a fact Remus left there. "If their romance can't keep them out of trouble, Sirius using his body out sure will."

Regulus and James step forward at the same time, their hands breaking apart because they're prepared to use them, but Pandora swings her arm out to halt Regulus and Sirius catches James by his chest quickly, keeping him still. There's a tense moment where a group of murderers all stare around at each other, not opposed to adding a few more names to their lists. Oh, and Pandora is there, too, startlingly calm despite this.

"Yes, Yaxley, make it more obvious how bitter you are that the Hallows don't find you desirable in the least." Sirius flashes him a sharp smile. "You know they don't settle for less than the best, and it's not my fault that's clearly you."

"Some of us have standards, Black," Yaxley snaps, bristling.

"Is that what you tell yourself each time they turn you away?" Sirius coos, laughing when Yaxley glares and starts to move forward as well, only to be stopped, too. Sirius hums. "Well, we're done here. This year's Victors have more important matters to attend to, you understand."

"We'd understand better than you," Lucius declares. "After all, you've never turned a tribute into a Victor before, have you? Shame you didn't care about any of them as you do your best friend and brother, or you might have gotten them home."

Sirius goes stiff next to James, his expression hardening, and James feels such a strong wave of anger rock him that he doesn't even care when he finds himself saying, "Hey, Reg, remember that time you cut off Mulciber's hand?"

"Yes," Regulus responds immediately, his voice cold.

"Felt good, didn't it?" James asks lightly, watching Lucius' lips press into a thin line.

"Felt fucking fantastic," Regulus announces, without missing a beat. "I only regret that I didn't finish what I started."

James grins at Lucius, who is clearly pissed off. "That's alright, love, I took care of that."

"Mm, that's true," Regulus muses.

"But you handled Avery anyway," James says. "It's a shame their mentor didn't prepare them for us, huh?"

Regulus hums. "A real shame."

"Next year," Lucius hisses, looking right at Sirius, "I'll ensure your tributes don't make it past the first day."

"Oh, I'd be careful with that, Lucius," Sirius snaps, glaring at him. "Didn't work out so well last time, did it?"

Lucius steps forward, eyes flashing. "You little—"

"Like Sirius said," Pandora cuts in, "we're done here."

With that, Pandora gives Lucius and Yaxley such a cold, withering look that they actually stop and shut up, though that may be just because she's a Hallow. James isn't sure. Either way, Pandora says they're done, so they're done. No one protests when she sweeps them away.

They get through a few more mentors that Sirius only knows vaguely, and most of them are polite, but distant. A few are drunk already, which is sort of sad, honestly.

Sirius is lost to them the moment they come across Marlene, Frank, and Emmeline. He instantly asks Marlene to dance, only to receive a laugh and a simple in your fucking dreams, Black that makes him clutch his chest as if he's been shot. Emmeline takes pity on him after that—or, well, she just steps forward and says she'd like to dance, so Sirius perks up and sweeps her off to the dance floor.

Marlene wanders away to go get another drink, apparently, and then there were four. Frank swings his head between James, Pandora, and Regulus.

Finally, Frank clears his throat and says, "So, James—"

"No," Regulus interrupts before he can even finish, his eyes narrowed into slits. He drops James' hand to clamp down on his arm instead, pulling him away without warning, leaving Pandora and Frank alone together.

"And where are we going?" James mumbles, helplessly amused, maybe a little entertained.

"We're dancing."

"Oh, are we? You know, typically people ask—"

"Shut up and dance with me," Regulus cuts in with a huff, clearly grumpy, unable to wipe the scowl off his face.

"Alright, alright," James says with a quiet chuckle, tugging Regulus in by his hand while slipping his arm around his waist to pull him closer.

Regulus is painfully tense in James' arms, stiff like he's struggling, like he's fighting some inner battle. What James would not give to join him on the frontlines and help him win, or die trying. He just doesn't know what to fight, so he can only watch from the sidelines and hope he can provide enough support that will help see Regulus through. In short, he keeps Regulus close, because he has to be close right now, in this setting, and he doesn't draw attention to the fact that Regulus is fighting at all.

They're surrounded by people dancing all around them, people that do double-takes when they realize it's them, and they're no doubt being watched by people on the sidelines, but thankfully, no one is close enough to hear what they're actually saying.

James still keeps his voice low when speaking anyway, just to be safe. "What are you even jealous of?"

"He likes you," Regulus grumbles.

James clicks his tongue. "Probably just as a friend, for one. For two, even if he did, it wouldn't really matter. You know that."

"Right, but he's—" Regulus abruptly cuts himself off, though it doesn't really seem to be on purpose. He's just finally turned his head to look at James, and now he seems quite stuck. All earlier annoyance is gone, like it evaporated on the spot. They sway slowly, and Regulus stares at James with his lips parted.

"What?" James asks.

Regulus swallows. "You look nice."

"You look like home," James whispers, because it's the first thing that falls out of his mouth, just the simple truth.

It's only four words, but they must be made of magic, because Regulus practically melts. James feels it. Regulus genuinely just softens all over and sinks into James, sliding his arms over James' shoulders to hook them together behind his neck, pressing them closer together. All the fight goes out of him, just like that. James adjusts, wrapping his arms around Regulus' waist. They keep on swaying, so close now that they can't even see anyone else.

"I'm sorry," Regulus rasps.

"For what? For kissing me yesterday?" James asks, watching him closely, because yes, he wants to talk about it.

"I—that was—it was necessary," Regulus starts, tension slowly seeping back into his frame.

James scoffs. "Don't lie to me. You think I don't know you well enough to know when it's just pretend, or when it's real? Give me a little more credit. I know that was real."

"Did you—did it upset you?" Regulus asks carefully.

James hesitates, and Regulus gets that panicky look in his eyes again, the same look he had the night he asked to sleep with him. It tugs at James' heartstrings every time, and every fucking time, James fails to turn him away. How can he? He loves Regulus. He doesn't want to reject him, not ever, even if it hurts to keep letting him close without having him at all.

"It's—it's complicated," James settles on.

Regulus takes a deep breath, and when it comes back out, it's a hoarse laugh. "Yes, things always are with us, aren't they?"

"Not this," James muses, pointedly pulling Regulus in even more to indicate what he means. "Do you think it's this easy in that other life of ours? I imagine this is how we dance in that life, just this close, by the firelight."

"I've been imagining it since I was ten," Regulus croaks. "In my head, we're always alone."

"We can be alone," James tells him. "We can leave right now and go somewhere no one can find us. I'm sure we have options in a castle as big as this one."

"We can't," Regulus says. "We're supposed to—

"I don't give a fuck what we're supposed to do," James cuts in brazenly. "You know what they'll assume we're doing."

"Running away," Regulus mutters.

James sighs in exasperation and fond amusement. "No, Reg. Fucking. They'll assume we've snuck off to find a corner to go fuck in."

"Oh," Regulus chokes out, a flush spreading in his cheeks, his eyes bright as he inhales sharply and holds his breath, biting down so hard on his bottom lip that James can see the white imprint his teeth leave behind. It's so tempting.

"Don't look at me like that," James whispers, every inch of him focused with full interest now, his stomach swooping as heat skitters beneath his skin and floods his veins.

"I can't help it," Regulus whispers back, shakily exhaling.

"Well, I need you to stop," James croaks. "Because I—I can't do this. I can't, Regulus, especially not now, not this week when we're pretending like this. I can't do it and know it doesn't change anything, not this time."

Regulus looks stricken. "Do you regret last time?"

Last time. Oh, last time. That last day in the Hallow, when it was just them, when it was their choice and their wants, even before they were ready. That was the last time they touched each other while not in front of a camera, or a crowd, until this tour. That deep and all-consuming kiss, and the many that followed. Looking back, James wonders if it was a parting gift, the finality in a goodbye to something they'd never get to have.

"Yes," James rasps, because he does. He said he wouldn't, and he does. It makes him ache. It makes him yearn. It makes him want it again, want it to hurt, want more.

"I knew you would," Regulus says, his eyes sinking shut.

"I can't help it," James murmurs, an echo to Regulus' earlier words. Regulus' eyes drift open. "I can't help how I love you."

Regulus makes a small sound, quiet in the back of his throat, and then he's melting forward further to try to bring their mouths together. James dodges it carefully, turning his head to press their cheeks together instead, ducking his face down as he squeezes his eyes shut. It's the first time he's ever rejected Regulus, ever turned away from anything he's offered, and it feels like it's breaking his heart, too.

"I'm sorry," Regulus chokes out. "I'm sorry. I'm sorry, James, I'm so sorry. I know I'm—I know, I'm sorry."

"Regulus, hey, it's not—it's okay. Just breathe," James says, peeling back to watch him warily. "Look, I don't blame you for what you can't do, alright? Honestly, I don't think I can do it either, especially not during this, not here."

"I've been so cruel to you, asking for too much and giving basically nothing," Regulus tells him, almost frantic, his words spilling out of him. "I've ignored you, because I—because I'm so fucking scared all the time, and having to pretend just makes it harder, but I also can't leave you alone. I can't stop wanting—I still want—and I'm losing you over and over again. I keep losing you, and I hate it. That's why I hate you, because I can't have you, because even when I could have you, I'm not ready, or I'm too scared, or people want to claim it for themselves, or all three, and I hate everything. I—"

"Regulus," James cuts in quietly.

"I hate you, and everything, and everything except you," Regulus whispers, his whole body strung tight like he's about to crack in half. "I'm losing you. I know I am. You're getting tired of me, I can feel it, and I can't even blame you because I'm tired of me, too. I—I hate me, most of all."

"Regulus, I need you to stop, and I need you to breathe," James tells him, rubbing his hands up and down Regulus' back, his heart clenching violently in his chest over and over. He swallows past the lump in his throat and leans in to press their foreheads together, breathing in and out, waiting for Regulus to copy him. "Listen to me, alright? I'm not getting tired of you. I could never get tired of you. I am tired, yes, but it's not because of you. It's because of the shitty circumstances, and me…setting boundaries and stepping back a little does not mean you're losing me."

Regulus breathes in and out, slowly, matching James' pace. Together, they inhale and exhale, repeating the cycle until it seems to feel more natural to him again. His fingers flex on James' shoulders, and he keeps pressing closer like he wants to open him up and crawl inside, maybe hide within him. He said James makes him feel safe, and James doesn't think anything has ever made him feel as simultaneously strong and weak as knowing that does.

Slowly, in increments, Regulus settles again.

"I know that our feelings towards ourselves are often more harsh than we deserve," James continues softly, "and I know that it's not as simple as deciding to love ourselves, but I do think putting in the effort to try is worth it."

"I don't even like myself," Regulus confesses quietly.

"That's a tragedy," James murmurs, "because you're one of my favorite people. I wish you knew yourself as I know you."

"What if you're wrong?" Regulus rasps.

James leans back and meets his eyes. "What if you are?"

Regulus looks at him, holding his gaze, and there's so much turmoil there in his eyes that James is sure he could get sucked into the whirlpool of complexities and never find his way out. He's really struggling with all of this, and frankly, James isn't doing much better, but in their own ways, they're trying.

Regulus swallows thickly and mumbles, with no warning or lead up, "Are you still going to bring me flowers?"

"Yes, Regulus, I'm still going to bring you flowers," James promises gently, his lips curling up.

"Okay, well, if—if you—just, if you ever knock, I'll invite you in for tea," Regulus says softly. "If that's okay. You don't—I mean, obviously you don't have to come in, but you can if you want. I'd like you to. I…hope you will."

"That'd be nice," James admits.

"Some days, I don't talk," Regulus informs him. "I just—can't. It's not as often anymore, but there might be some days where I won't be good company at all."

"You don't have to talk." James reaches up to grab Regulus' hand, loosely tangling their fingers together. "We can sit in complete silence, and I'll just be happy to be with you, so long as you want me around."

"I always want you around," Regulus murmurs.

"Well, you can have that any time," James assures him. "You don't have to give me anything to…earn me, Regulus. If you want to see me, then see me. If you want to sit with me, then show me to the proper chair."

"I want—" Regulus hesitates, then tugs on their joined hands, pulling them up to his mouth, though he doesn't touch. He peers at James through his eyelashes. "Can I?"

James swears his stomach goes tumbling down a hill, his heart shivering in excitement in his chest. "Yes."

Regulus closes his eyes and presses gentle kisses over James' fingers, the hills of his knuckles, the curl between his thumb and pointer finger. He does it with reverence, like James' hands are divine, meant to be worshiped, like they've never once been covered in blood. James has to hold his breath, every part of his body singing in pure delight.

It just keeps going, on and on, Regulus only getting more eager with each kiss, desperate almost. He nudges James' hand open to trail warm kisses down his palm, to the hill below his thumb and then over the bend of his wrist. He presses his mouth to the pulse there, right beneath the skin, lingering for a long time. James struggles to breathe.

James is scared he's going to cry. Like, actually? No, seriously, his eyes are stinging something fierce, and he's never—he hasn't ever felt anything like this. He desperately needs it to stop and simultaneously hopes that it never ends.

"Reg," James croaks, blinking hard.

"These hands—your hands should be worshiped," Regulus says, like it's just an offhand comment, and he actually looks slightly displeased that there aren't shrines built in his hands' honor. "I adore your hands."

James swallows. "They're—they destroy things now, when they never did before. They're rough sometimes. Bloody."

"Warm," Regulus counters, pressing another kiss to James' shaking fingers. "Steady. Strong. These hands hold the people you love. These hands care for them. They're gentle. Tender." He turns James' hand slightly and kisses the space in between his thumb and index finger, that line where the grip of a hatchet would rest. "I can't stand to be touched, most of the time, but it's your touch I miss most of all."

"Regulus, Regulus," James whispers urgently, fingers twitching against Regulus' mouth, and his voice cracks because he's ridiculously choked up right now.

"Your hands are so beautiful. You're so beautiful, James," Regulus tells him, lifting his gaze so their eyes will meet and lock. He looks like he means it, like he wholeheartedly believes it. There's something peaceful in his eyes as he tips his cheek into James' open palm, resting it there, and he closes his eyes in such a way that feels so vulnerable, so trusting, that James can't breathe for a moment. Regulus stays there and breathes out, "Being touched by you is being blessed by divinity. I know I'm not worthy, but I crave it ceaselessly all the same."

"I thought I was the devil," James chokes out.

"You're that, too. You're everything to me, baby." Regulus turns his head and presses another kiss to James' palm, eyes still closed. Again and again, he rains down more kisses to his fingers, looking like he's sipping salvation right out of the palm of James' hand.

"Okay. Okay, okay, okay," James chants breathlessly, rocking forward to press their foreheads together again, wrapping his free arm around his waist. He tangles their hands once more and breathes shakily as he starts tugging them in slow circles again, unsure when they stopped. "You—you can't do things like that to me. What did we just talk about?"

"Sorry," Regulus mumbles.

"Fuck, please don't apologize," James wheezes. "You're amazing. You're just so fucking lovely, Regulus. You don't even know, and it kills me. You have no idea what you do to me."

Regulus is quiet for a moment, and then, "I think, most of the time, despite my best efforts, all I do is hurt you."

"That's not all you do," James whispers, "and even when you do, it feels so fucking good. I can't get enough of you."

"Remember your boundaries, James."

"You've just blown them all up. I could not give less of a shit about them at the moment. Come here. I miss you. Oh, I—"

"No," Regulus cuts in, tilting his head down so James can't kiss him like he was desperately trying to. "You said no, you said that's better for you, and I will respect that, James. I'm not doing something you'll regret, not again."

James groans. "Fuck, I'm so stupid. Can you just—forget I said that? Please? I've forgotten it already. See how easy it is?"

"No, James," Regulus says with a quiet huff of gentle laughter, but he soothes James by wrapping his free arm around James' neck and bringing their joined hands between their chests. He ducks his head to press a gentle kiss to them, then leans in and rests his head on James' shoulder with a soft sigh. "I'll get it right. If I cannot climb, I will grow."

"What's that?" James asks.

Regulus just hums. "Nothing to worry about. Just dance with me. Let's just dance, James, just me and you. This is ours, even though we're not alone."

"It's ours," James agrees. "It's just me and you, love."

And it is. They're close together, swaying in slow circles and from side-to-side, holding onto each other, utterly alone in James' mind. Because, to him, the whole room—the whole world—has disappeared, along with everyone in it. There's no one else. Nothing else.

Just this and just them.

Sirius has danced with no less than eight people, because Emmeline abandoned him at some point to go hunt Marlene down for a dance—which, Sirius notes, did not work out for her, clearly, because she's now dancing with Pandora, who likely offered when she either couldn't find Marlene or when Marlene refused. Marlene doesn't like to dance.

So, Sirius has resorted to dancing with various Hallows, either sponsors he counts on each year, or sponsors he's hoping to count on next year, because the job never really ends for a mentor. Even now, he's putting in the work.

Meanwhile, James and Regulus are secure where they're at, so intimately wrapped up together that no one even bothers them. Well, a lot of people watch them, and there are giggles and whispers carrying around the room, but Regulus and James look so damn peaceful together that, thankfully, no one seems to have the heart to attempt to cut in. People do seem entertained by the way they're hardly even dancing at all, their arms wrapped around each other as they lazily sway, like an excuse just to hold onto one another.

Sirius won't lie, he's ever so slightly envious, because he doesn't get to slip his arms around the one he loves and feel everything else fade away. Instead, he dances with people he doesn't actually care about, taking a spare few seconds between each partner to repeatedly locate the one man he'd leave them all behind to be with.

It's easy for Sirius to find Remus. He did the moment he walked in the room, and he's found him countless times since. There he is, the most beautiful bastard in this room in nothing but grey, unflattering clothes and a black mask that covers basically half his face, and yet he puts everyone else to fucking shame. The fact that no one else notices it just further proves how stupid and lifeless they are, too blinded by flashing lights and fake smiles to see true glory right in front of them.

Remus isn't always looking at him—he does have other tasks to focus on, sadly—but this time, he is. Every time he is watching Sirius, he's doing so with a hooded gaze, something so intense in his eyes that it has the ability to send a shudder up Sirius' spine from all the way across the room. There's something more this time, a significant sort of look that makes Sirius' stomach swoop with anticipation.

"Excuse me, Boris," Sirius says politely, adopting an apologetic smile and stepping back. "I'm a tad tired. Just need a small break for now, but don't you worry, I will be back to steal another lovely dance with you."

Boris just chuckles, not seeming offended in the least by his abrupt departure, and he slips away from the dance floor quickly. Most people seem distracted by James and Regulus as it is, so Sirius gets away with relative ease. No one stops him on the way out, and he slips down the hall, further and further away from the party that grows more muffled in the distance.

On this floor, there's at least three other wings just full of different rooms for…who knows why, honestly? Sirius doesn't care. He gets far enough away that he can't hear the distant sounds of the party, picks a door, and leans against it to wait.

He doesn't have to wait too long, thankfully. Eventually, there's the sound of quiet steps, and his head swings around to see Remus moving up the hall, barely even glancing at him when he stops by the first room, knocks, waits a moment, then slips inside. Sirius goes into his own room, mildly bemused to see that it's a service closet full of cleaning products. Well, too late now. He couldn't have picked a room with a bed?

Sirius holds himself still until Remus reaches him, but the moment Remus comes in and peels his mask off, Sirius surges forward to kiss him, only to be a little disoriented by the height change. He's still not taller than Remus, even in the boots, but he's nearly his height, so the kiss lands a little off-center.

"Oops," Sirius breathes out, rocking back and blinking.

"A bit taller than usual," Remus notes with a small smile, his hands sliding down Sirius' sides. "Also, the utility closet?"

"I didn't know what it would be until I got in here," Sirius complains, slipping his arms around Remus' shoulders and leaning into him. He doesn't even have to stretch up to press their foreheads together. "How long do we have?"

"Only a few minutes, at most. I'm sorry. I know it's not enough time, but—"

"It's something."

Remus hums and tilts his face forward to brush their mouths together, soft and sweet. "It sure is. You look beautiful, by the way. I like the heels." He slips one hand up to run his finger gently down the center of Sirius' chest where his shirt swoops open. "I like this more when I'm the only one looking at it."

"Me too," Sirius admits.

"The amount of people drooling over you tonight…" Remus shakes his head, both hands settling on his hips, flexing.

"Yeah, them, whatever," Sirius says carelessly. "What about you, though?"

"I can barely do my fucking job because you're so distracting," Remus informs him, kissing a slow path along his jaw.

Sirius' breath hitches, his eyes fluttering shut as Remus nips down at the skin of his throat, the catch of teeth sending a ripple through his entire body. He feels faint and fluttery again, as Remus often makes him feel, and his desire comes trickling through for one thing and one thing only, at the moment. All he wants is Remus' mouth against his own.

He winds his fingers into Remus' hair to tug gently, making a quiet sound that's probably appropriately labeled as needy, but he doesn't care because it works. Remus responds instantly, lifting his head, and then it's so very easy for Sirius to have what he wants, because Remus' mouth is right there, and Remus just lets him have it with no issue whatsoever.

Sirius wants to do this forever, all the time, constantly. He just wants to kiss Remus every day, and hold him, and have him. He doesn't necessarily feel whole, or complete, because he doubts he'll ever feel that way, no matter what. But he doesn't have to suffer that horrible feeling of missing Remus, yearning for him, wanting him and not being able to have him. There's nothing to worry about, nothing to be scared of, when he has Remus this close, because Sirius can keep him safe and make sure nothing happens to him. He loves him. Oh, he loves him so much, with every steady beat of his heart.

"I love you, Remus, so much," Sirius whispers when Remus slowly peels away from him. "I know you have to go. I know you do, but I just—I want you to know that I miss you already. We never have enough time, but I'm so fucking glad that I've gotten to see you again. I'll—I'll keep that letter safe for you, I promise, and I'll see you in six months."

Remus takes a deep breath and slowly lets it out, then starts to lift his mask, but Sirius reaches out to catch his wrist and rocks forward to duck his head, pressing a kiss to the inside of it before swiveling his head to kiss Remus again. When he pulls away, Remus is smiling at him, soft and adoring.

"I love you, too," Remus whispers back. He leans forward to bump their foreheads gently together, sighing wistfully, then pulls back. "Wait a few minutes before slipping back out to the party, and don't forget to take care of yourself. See you in six months, sweetheart."

With that, Remus clips his mask back on and eases right back out of the room like he never entered it at all, and Sirius takes the few minutes he has to wait to press his hand over his mouth and squeeze his eyes shut as the building sob in his chest fights to get out. He traps it there, feeling it fester, but knowing he can't give into it, not this time.

When Sirius returns to the party, he does so with dry eyes and a beaming smile, no one around him realizing that he's aching except the beautiful bastard in the mask, when he finally returns, who can do nothing but watch from afar.

starting from the top!

remus, james, and sirius <3 just them hanging out and chatting made my heart so warm ☹☹☹ remus telling james to be nice to himself! sirius making james agree that his boyfriend is sexy, then Instantly Regretting It! james and remus flirting just to tease sirius! them getting into a pillowfight!!!

pandora, my love 😭 first of all, let me end the allegations right now. she is not a secret daughter of dumbledore's or something. her dad is someone unspecified in the background who will never be met and is indeed on his deathbed while his daughter is out there taking the world by storm, as she should!!! but she's sad and dealing with it, and like, having that moment between her and regulus was so, so special to me. theyre friendsssss!!! they trust each other!!! regulus willingly touched and comforted her (or did his best to)!!! just the whole rooftop scene holds a special place in my heart. also pandora giving regulus advice and a reality check in one whack! her powerrrrr remus and james saying goodbye, and then remus and sirius saying goodbye 1.0 😭😭😭 not the "there's always tomorrow" and "sweetheart..." WHY DID THAT BREAK MY HEART??? THEY DESERVE ALL THE TOMORROWS IM SO UPSET

yes, i know i wrote it, we've been here before. i Had To, for the progression of the story. no im not pleased about sirius and remus separating again either anyway, dorcas my beloved <3 don't worry, we see more of her (and marlene) in the next chapter, but it's one of those "be careful what you wish for" things. yes, there is dorlene angst on the horizon!!!

but dorcas getting james ready and the little parallel between regulus' (about james) "i don't want him to see me" and james' (about regulus) "i want him to see me" LIKE THAT'S A THESIS STATEMENT!!! IS THAT NOT THEM??? IS THAT NOT THE DYNAMIC??? sorry it gives me The Brainrot when i think about it too much also james just being adorable by liking shiny things and fiddling with dorcas' purse and being bashful when she called him beautiful and beaming at the ground because she essentially said regulus likes him a bunch!!!! AHHHHHHH I NEED TO BITE HIM!!!!

and then The Party. well, The Party Part 1, because we see some more of it in the next chapter, but still.

first, just james and regulus, like, dropping everything and being ready to throw hands the moment someone insults sirius!!! yes, go ahead kings!!! me too, honestly. lmaoooo james and regulus being little shits and pissing lucius off! as they should. it came from a place of anger, not a place of Actually Being Proud of their actions in the arena, but hey! at least they're in a place where they can actually talk about it, so...progress?

anyway, not regulus being a jealous little shit, then forgetting it the second he actually Looks At James like, starry-eyed "oh he's so pretty" GOODBYE. he was mesmerized 🥰 then james saying that regulus looks like home??? the fact that regulus thinks of james as home and as soon as james said that, he just Melted. gonna sob, never gonna stop sobbing, i love them.

james saying he can't help how he loves regulus and regulus immediately trying to kiss him... LOOK, CAN YOU BLAME HIM??? he's doing his best, leave him alone 😭😭😭 you'd do it too if james said some shit like that to you, don't lie. but also james rejecting regulus literally for the first time. kill me. BUT THEN HIM INSTANTLY lmaoooo let me stop, that was a Very Emotional Moment. regulus just genuinely standing there and showering james' hands in kisses. gonna take a swan dive off a cliff! also like, just their whole discussion about regulus' self-worth issues and then regulus inviting james in for tea when they make it back home! this is good! this is growth! let's hope it goes well!

and then the wolfstar goodbye 2.0 ☹ im SAD! i was sad about it, so much so that i literally wrote that extra scene just so they could have more time together. just made it even more sad, though, so really, i achieved Precisely Nothing.

HONORABLE MENTIONS:

-pandora being like "we're done" and then no one arguing with her! a queen!
-sirius being jealous of remus' clothes lmaooo
-marlene laughing when sirius asks her to dance
-james making regulus tea bc he knows regulus doesn't drink coffee!!!
-the little kiss during the interview that was real
-yaxley, you bitch, Just You Wait
-sirius not even wanting to have sex, just wanting to put his mouth on remus any way he can. he's so real for that -"if i cannot climb, i will grow" yeah, that's all, i think. i wanted to thank everyone again for being so kind and supportive and leaving comments.

Unconvinced

Chapter Notes

hello, everyone!

warnings for this chapter:

-references to past death (blink-and-you-miss-it)
-references to past child death (vague and brief)
-discussions/implications about sirius being a sex symbol to the hallow, and him using that to his advantage
-alcohol abuse/alcoholism (it's mostly implied to start with, then explicitly discussed later, but it leads into a talk of stopping drinking for the character's health; ill give an in-depth warning in the end notes for those of you that need it, which is valid, as always)
-death in present (very brief and blunt, and i will also give a warning in the end notes)

See the end of the chapter for more notes

James is not prepared for someone to be courageous enough to interrupt him and Regulus as they dance, so it takes him by surprise when he feels someone tap him on his shoulder. Regulus slowly raises his head with murder in his eyes.

Marlene seems unperturbed. "Simmer down, Reginald, this won't take long. I need to borrow your boyfriend for a few minutes, and it'll be quick. I fucking hate dancing anyway."

"Well, aren't you in popular demand?" Regulus mutters to James, scowling as he steps back.

"Oh, don't—" James groans as Regulus swivels and marches off in a clear tiff, heading right for Sirius, who is gawking over at Marlene and James in disbelief. James heaves a sigh and looks at Marlene. Flatly, he says, "Thanks for that."

"He's a fussy one, isn't he?" Marlene asks, amused. She steps forward and awkwardly braces her hands on his shoulders, quite literally keeping them at arm's length.

"Very volatile, like his brother," James says dryly, then clears his throat and reaches out to carefully lay his hands on her hips. She glares at him, so he panics and slips his hands up higher, but her glare only becomes more pronounced, and she's strangling his shoulders now, so he snatches his hands away entirely. "Er, sorry. I thought you wanted to dance."

"I don't want to, but…I'd like to speak to you, and I can understand why you and the pocket-sized Sirius might want to stay on the dancefloor." Marlene heaves a sigh and glances down at his hands. "Go ahead, put them back. It's fine."

James pauses. "Would you rather I hold your shoulders? We can swap, if you want."

"I—" Marlene blinks. "Actually, yes. Less…invasive that way."

"Sure," James says simply, because he gets what she means, he thinks. They swap quickly, with his hands resting on her shoulders as she settles hers on his waist. They're not close, and it's a bit amusing because she's shorter than him, but it puts her at ease. "Also, pocket-sized Sirius? He's, like, an inche shorter than him."

"Yeah, but I bet Sirius never lets him forget it, so I can't either in solidarity," Marlene muses. "Besides, I bet I could break him like a twig easily."

"No?" James replies slowly. "I mean, no offense, but it definitely wouldn't be easy."

Marlene clicks her tongue. "You poor thing. You're hopeless. I could break him if I wanted to. It's honestly sort of funny, since it doesn't look like it'd be simple to do, because he's always glaring at things."

"Yeah, he's cute," James murmurs, lips curling up fondly. Then he frowns. "He does actually have muscles, and he's stronger than he looks."

"No, I know that. I know better than most that looks can be deceiving, and I did see him pick you up once when you were passed out and carry you up an incline," Marlene admits.

James opens his mouth, closes it, then says, "He did that? Wait, when was this? In the arena, I know, but—but I have no memory of that."

"Yeah, because you were passed out." Marlene rolls her eyes at him. "It was after that whole mess with Mulciber. You weren't doing well, so Regulus scooped you up. How exactly do you think you got back to the cave?"

"I…never thought about it," James admits quietly.

Marlene nods. "Suppose that's fair. It was…a rough one. Your games, I mean. Definitely one of the most brutal, I'd say. They'll be talking about it for a long time."

"I wish they wouldn't," James confesses.

"I understand," Marlene informs him, and he knows she does. Of course she does. She's a Victor, too. "Look, I just—I wanted to tell you that it—it meant a lot, what you said about Vanity and Hodge on the tour."

"Marlene," James rasps, a lump forming in his throat instantly.

"No, listen." Marlene holds his gaze, her eyes bright and fierce. "It's—it was a bit of a mess, yeah, but it was real. It was important, because you were right, and I'm grateful you had the guts to say it. Too many people have gone too long not saying it, James, and you did the first chance you got."

"It was all I could do, and it still wasn't enough," James whispers. "They deserved better."

"It's not your fault that they didn't get it," Marlene tells him simply, and it feels like being absolved, just a little, a simple forgiveness that slices through weight he didn't even know was there, allowing it to slough off his back until he's almost unbalanced from feeling lighter.

Everything has been heavy for so long, but she was their mentor, trying to help them survive, and she doesn't blame him for the fact that they didn't.

He can breathe just a little easier.

"Thank you," James whispers, blinking fast and hard. "I really appreciate you saying that, especially because you—I mean, I know you don't like me very much—"

"It's not that I don't like you, James. I do, actually. It's just that I'm—" Marlene sighs, then gives him a tight smile. "I'm still learning how to be gentle again. For now, it's still a bit difficult, so I'm kind of shit at the worst of times, on top of being a useless mentor with a drinking problem on the horizon. And don't even get me started on my love life, or how fucking complicated and confusing it is right now, because I'm not joking, I could prattle on complaining for hours."

James blinks. "Oh… Well, you know, you can if you like. If you have some things to get off your chest, I mean."

"Right, so, your stylist?" Marlene asks, settling in as they continue to sway. "The one who looks like a fucking goddess? Yeah, so get this, she says we're friends…"

Sirius does his absolute best to shield Regulus from the worst of the attention he receives when he's away from James' side, but it's fucking difficult, honestly. The Hallows are a force to be reckoned with when they get together like this, and Regulus is sadly getting the brunt of it at the moment. They're all drawn in, curious and eager and demanding.

People ask about James, commenting on their relationship, giving unsolicited advice and praise. Most of these people just like to hear themselves talk, so Regulus can usually just nod and mhm along, and that seems to satisfy them enough. He should be smiling and laughing, but he honestly struggles with it, Sirius can tell. So, Sirius does it for him, smiling when they smile, forcing laughter when they do, mirroring them because, really, that's all they want.

He's pretty sure it works, for the most part. Some people, he thinks, can tell that Regulus hates them, but they seem to talk themselves out of that knowledge for their own comfort.

In the end, Sirius saves Regulus from most of it in the only way he knows how, by ushering him off to dance with one of the more well-meaning sponsors. A shy one, really. Sirius doesn't have many favorites, but Huey Rutledge is one of them. He's a bleeding heart, quite frankly, and coincidentally the sponsor with the least amount of money. He generally can only afford one to two donations a year, and he's never once used them on death eaters, always going for the underdogs in the arena. He's the one who donated to Frank to give Irene hot soup that everyone in the cave could split to warm up.

Regulus doesn't look too pleased to be going off dancing with a total stranger, but he does look relieved not to be overwhelmed by everyone else at once, and it's clear he trusts Sirius' judgement on this, because he goes without protest.

Sirius, on the other hand, has work to do.

Seeing that James is safely with Marlene, Regulus is safely within range of James and Marlene, and Pandora is safely with Emmeline, Sirius locates his target across the room—who Pandora pointed out to him earlier—and heads right over with a beaming smile. He catches the hand of the next head gamemaker and brings it to his lips in a quick, brushing kiss while she's in the midst of turning around.

"Ms. McGonagall," Sirius greets warmly, still cradling her hand while peering over it through his eyelashes, coquettish. "I don't believe we've had the pleasure of meeting yet."

McGonagall is an older woman, graying hair twisted artfully from her face, wearing a vintage a-line dress. Sirius can't stop himself from tracing the tattoos on her arms, visible through the sheer-style sleeves of her dress, traveling as far as he can see from her shoulders all the way down to her wrists.

Most of them are aged, like she got them when she was young, but not all—there are a few that suggest she's still getting tattoos to this day. It's more common in the Hallow, because those in the districts have to do it themselves, and they don't have access to good enough medical treatment to fix it if something goes wrong. Not that people have never done it in the districts, but it is rarer, and it's never something like this. One or two tattoos, maybe, but whole sleeves? No, that's definitely more of a Hallow thing.

McGonagall is beautiful in an intimidating way, with sharp eyes and a straight back, muscular and seemingly unimpressed with everyone around her. Even Sirius doesn't manage much with his usually-effective grin; she's still just looking at him like she wouldn't bother to spit on him if he was on fire. Sirius is delighted. It's a nice change of pace from the usual Hallow, and he does love a challenge.

"No, I don't believe we have," McGonagall replies, slipping her hand out of his as she faces him fully, one eyebrow sweeping up. "Nonetheless, your reputation precedes you, Mr. Black."

"Well, you know, you can't believe everything you hear. Some things, it's best to learn for yourself," Sirius tells her, holding her gaze. "It's always worth it to check firsthand, I say."

The very corner of McGonagall's mouth twitches ever so faintly, like she's amused, which is not the usual response he gets to his flirting. Most people—of all ages—are at least helplessly intrigued. She appears immune, which makes Sirius the one who's helplessly intrigued for once. He does love it when someone manages to surprise him.

"Unfortunately, your…reputation holds none of my interest, so I'd say it's not worth my time at all," McGonagall informs him, completely ruthless about it, and oh, Sirius does like her. He doesn't want to, because in six months, she's going to be the one behind the games, behind the death, behind the torment. Still, he can't help it, because he's never, not once, had a Hallow blatantly and bluntly not want something from him.

Never one to back down, Sirius grins wider and raises his eyebrows at her, swallowing his amusement and delight to say, instead, "So, you don't want to find out if my reputation for being the best dancer in this room is true, Ms. McGonagall?"

McGonagall blinks, slowly. Sirius has to fight rising laughter when some sort of light of understanding visibly goes off in her eyes, followed by another twitch of her mouth and the slightest tilt to her head, a tiny motion that admits defeat and prompts respect, an awareness that she's been bested.

Because, see, she was assuming he was insinuating something sexual—and, okay, that is what he was doing, to be fair, though he wouldn't have followed through, of course, because he never does, or has to—but he countered that effortlessly. Him being the Hallow heartthrob, beloved and desired by all, is something that is known, but not discussed. Or, well, he's sure people talk about it when he's not around, but to do it right to his face is something else entirely, which backs McGonagall into a corner where she either has to admit defeat, or admit that she expected him to entice her with sexual favors.

Most people wouldn't be brave or shameless enough to do that, but Sirius is learning very quickly that McGonagall is not like most people, certainly not like most Hallows.

"I've no interest in whatever sexual advances you're rumored to pass around like candy," McGonagall clarifies, even while she holds out her hand, "but I won't say no to a dance."

Sirius laughs. He can't help it. With a bright burst of laughter, he reaches out to cup her hand delicately in his own, held aloft as he leads her to the dancefloor. "Good to know. Come along, then—Minerva, wasn't it?"

"Ms. McGonagall will do," McGonagall declares.

"Of course, Ms. McGonagall. Feel free to call me Sirius, if you like," Sirius muses, cupping her waist politely and promptly tugging her into slow, sweeping circles. Distinguished and fluid, they match the music, and she never fails to keep up, just as effortless as he is. He makes a mental note to address her respectfully, as she's requested, unwilling to offend her or displease her when she will one day soon hold the lives of his future tributes in her hands. Having her call him by his name suggests familiarity, so he can only hope she will.

The thing is, Sirius knows how to do this, how to charm the Hallows. It's his thing. Most of them are lifeless, brainless puppets he can maneuver at will, but there are the occasional few that take a bit more effort. There's always an angle, though, and he intends to find hers.

"It's a good turnout," McGonagall comments as she flicks her gaze around those that are dancing near them. They sweep past James and Marlene—James lifts his hand to smile and wave at Sirius like an excited puppy as he goes by, which makes Sirius grin back against his will, while Marlene doesn't even stutter in what seems to be a long-winded rant about the implications of a ring as a gift—and McGonagall's gaze lingers on James for a moment until they twist away. "It's a shame Horace Slughorn isn't here to enjoy the fruits of his labor."

"Oh, I'm sure he would have loved nothing more," Sirius muses, flicking his gaze towards hers. She's already looking back, her expression neutral. He wonders what she knows, because he has his suspicions as to why Slughorn isn't present. He's quite sure the man is dead, and no part of Sirius regrets his part in that possibility. Riddle likely executed him for allowing James and Regulus to win, and Sirius is the one who planted that idea in his head. He feels no remorse for it.

"It was quite a valiant thing to do, allowing two Victors," McGonagall says. "I must admit, in my time of knowing Horace, he never struck me as a very valiant man."

"No, I'd say he wasn't," Sirius agrees, never breaking his gaze from hers, because he thinks—well, somehow, he's almost sure that she knows it was him. "Maybe he needed someone more valiant to guide him."

"Maybe so," McGonagall murmurs.

"And what about you, Ms. McGonagall?" Sirius asks, tilting his head curiously. "Would you consider yourself valiant?"

"I would," McGonagall says simply, then she smiles at him, small and secretive, "but I'm not so easily guided."

"Yes, well, I'm sure Horace Slughorn thought the same," Sirius says softly, letting the implications of that—the weight of an unspoken threat—wrap around his words and slip like molten silver off his tongue. If he cannot enchant her, perhaps all that is left to do is to intimidate her. "And where did that get him?"

"No one knows." McGonagall never loses that tiny smile that lives in the lovely little wrinkles at the corner of her mouth, and Sirius has no idea what to make of it. "What I do know is that Horace Slughorn was a fool, Mr. Black, and I am not."

So, as it turns out, Minerva McGonagall is not so easily intimidated, and the mystery of what angle it will take to get through to her isn't simply found. Who she is, what she wants, and how she'll be as a head gamemaker remains unknown, but Sirius isn't deterred. Though she allows no familiarity between them, he intends to keep trying.

She's the first Hallow who has ever posed a true challenge, and maybe it's foolish of him, but he's looking forward to it.

Huey Rutledge is a quiet, bashful man who blushes with his entire face every time Regulus looks at him, stuttering and tripping over his words every time he attempts to talk, going wide-eyed and focused every time Regulus speaks in response, which isn't often and usually happens monosyllabically.

He's a little taller than Regulus, broad-shouldered, and handsome enough with curly blond hair, pale green eyes, and very deep dimples in his cheeks. While he's polite and seems to have tact and simple human decency that most other Hallows lack—especially sponsors, Regulus has noticed—what Regulus likes most about him is that he seems to have no interest in talking about Regulus' games, or Regulus' relationship with James.

No, his interest seems to lie in Regulus himself, like he's trying to get to know him as a person, not as a Victor or a character in an idolized love story. Regulus usually hates talking about himself, but honestly? He appreciates it more now.

"So, it's just writing?" Huey asks slowly, cautious like he's doing his best not to offend. "Can you draw, too?"

"No," Regulus admits. "It's just writing."

Huey nods. "Any particular form? Poetry? Fiction?"

"Poetry, usually," Regulus murmurs. "Sometimes just journal entries. The occasional to-do list."

"You like organizing your thoughts," Huey says.

Regulus pauses, then nods tentatively. "It's easier to get what's in my head on paper than out of my mouth, most of the time."

"I, um—yeah, I get that," Huey tells him. "I'm a musician, but not a singer. I can compose and play what I'm feeling, but the idea of putting it into words and singing it is… unfathomable to me, honestly. People just—do that. I have no idea how."

"What do you play?"

"Piano, guitar, and violin mostly. I'm alright with a flute, or I was when I was a child, but I haven't picked one up in years. Oh, and the kazoo. I'm not half-bad on the kazoo."

"Is that an actual instrument?" Regulus asks.

Huey cracks a weak smile, flashing dimples. "Technically, yes. Mostly a comedy instrument, but you'd be surprised how well it can round out a song if you add it in. But, for my peace of mind, I take it very seriously so I don't feel like an idiot."

"My brother had a kazoo, once," Regulus says quietly, lips curling up helplessly as he remembers it. "He built it when he was nine. He mostly just—yelled into it, and didn't even have the sense to feel like an idiot for it at all."

"Yeah, older brothers are good for things like that," Huey tells him wryly, chuckling. "I have one of those, too. An older brother, I mean. Louie never takes himself seriously either."

"Louie and Sirius would get on, then."

"Probably, if they ever met. He's—he isn't into things like this. Louie, I mean. So, it falls onto me to handle it."

"Falls on you," Regulus repeats. "Being a sponsor."

"Um, yes," Huey mumbles. "Our parents were, so when they passed, the opening remained for us to step in. Louie…didn't think there was a point. Rutledges aren't exactly high-rollers, you understand, but our parents thought every little bit we could give was important. It's rarely enough to truly help anyone, to save them, but if we can at least make them a little more comfortable, we should."

"Doesn't it upset you?" Regulus asks carefully, holding his gaze, and Huey immediately turns red under his scrutiny. He's holding onto Regulus so lightly, barely touching him at all, but he looks like he wants to come closer.

"It—well, I—" Huey cuts himself off, swallowing. "I don't know. I think it used to, but then… Well, I used to feel like Louie does about it, but my first year as a sponsor, I got to help send someone water when they were in pain, and—and they were so relieved… Even though they didn't live, I was able to offer them that comfort, and it—it felt like I had to do it, you know? Because if I didn't, who would?"

"Do you want to know a secret, Huey?" Regulus murmurs. He tugs Huey a little closer, hearing his breath hitch as Regulus leans in to whisper in his ear. "If you didn't, it wouldn't matter. There is no comfort in the arena."

When Regulus pulls back, Huey is pale.

He can't seem to figure out how to respond to that, and Regulus gets a sense of vindictive amusement in watching his worldview shift all at once. It feels good, honestly, even though it's cruel. There are certainly worse sponsors, and Huey clearly has good intentions in a way so few Hallows do, but he's blinded by his own contributions to even question the system behind it all. He should question it.

Regulus hopes he does. Regulus hopes that he thinks about it, thinks about all the people he's felt the need to help, all the people he wouldn't have to help if only the arena didn't exist at all. Regulus hopes it keeps him awake at night.

It's unfair, really, because what can Huey do? Even if he's no longer blind to what's actually wrong, it's not like he can actually do anything about it. But, well, misery loves company, and Regulus never sleeps peacefully anymore.

There's a loud clearing of a throat that causes Regulus and Huey to snatch their gazes from one another and look to the side to see James, who has his lips pressed into a thin line. Huey literally jumps in place and takes a frantic step back, inviting space between him and Regulus again, no longer pale as his entire face turns red so brightly that it looks painful.

"You've accosted my dance partner long enough. I'll be taking him back now," James says, his voice clipped. He gives Huey one last hard look, then quite literally steps right in between him and Regulus to snake an arm around Regulus' waist before promptly sweeping him away.

"Poor Huey is having a really bad night," is all Regulus can think to say, his lips twitching.

"Oh, yes, poor Huey," James mutters as he swivels them further away, only slowing them to a casual swaying motion when Regulus can't crane his head and spot Huey again at all. He tries, and James audibly grinds his teeth.

"Now, who's jealous?" Regulus asks as he slides his arms around James' shoulders and helplessly melts into him. Oh, he's so warm, so very terribly warm.

He's also achingly beautiful. Dorcas is a terror, frankly. She has him in a soft, plum shirt that hugs his shoulders and practically strangles his arms high up on the muscle, except the fabric moves fluidly with his every motion. It dips down a bit at the collar, showing the obscene hollow of his throat and a peek of each collarbone. Between that, the charcoal trousers, and smart shoes, looking at him makes Regulus' mouth water. He had that the audacity to say James looked nice. Nice doesn't even begin to cover it, especially when he looks happy.

James does not look happy now, however. His gaze is sharp. "I looked over and you were talking to him, and then you were whispering in his ear like you were telling him a fucking secret or—"

"I was," Regulus admits.

"You were," James repeats, his voice flat.

Regulus arches an eyebrow. "Yes. So?"

"So, you don't like people enough to trade secrets," James grits out. "But, what, you liked him?"

"James."

"What?"

"Don't be stupid," Regulus says.

James scowls. "You make me stupid. And oh, he obviously likes you. Wouldn't even look me in the eye, the fucking—"

"James," Regulus repeats, stifling a rising laugh.

"I'll kill him. I do that now. Kill people. It's something I've done and am apparently willing to do again, as it turns out," James announces. "Did he force you to dance with him? You could have come to me. Why didn't you come to me? If he did anything you didn't like, I mean it, I'll actually kill—"

"Stop it, idiot," Regulus says, huffing out a quiet laugh as he shakes his head. James still looks quite grumpy about the whole thing, but he's mostly just pouting now. It makes Regulus want to coo at him, though he refrains, because he'd die of embarrassment if he gave into the urge. "You were busy with Marlene, remember? Sirius sent me off with Huey to, I'm assuming, get me away from the crowd of vultures that were surrounding me at all sides. Huey's not so bad, really. A bit misguided, but he has good intentions."

"He has intentions to get in your fucking pants," James declares sharply. Regulus rolls his eyes, and James releases a huff. "No, I'm not joking. It was all over him."

"Was it?"

"Yes. I recognize it, because I, too, have had intentions to get in your pants. Not just that, obviously, but that's besides the point. The point is, I could sense it."

Regulus sighs in exasperation. "And did you stop to think about the fact that I wouldn't pander to his intentions?"

"Yeah, that was before you started whispering secrets in his ear," James mumbles. "You never whisper secrets in my ear."

"Yes, I can see how this is distressing for you, as the man I have actually wanted to let into my pants before," Regulus says dryly.

"Sure, but now I'm sad about it, so it doesn't even count," James replies.

"Retroactive sadness aside, I remember it well enough to know it absolutely counts," Regulus muses, arching an eyebrow at James, who looks torn between still being agitated or giving into his focus on this topic. He's easily distracted by things that interest him—what Regulus likes to think of as shiny topics, things that James fixates on the moment they're brought up, without fail. Sex, Regulus, and sex with Regulus are very shiny topics for him, Regulus has noticed. Plus, he can't always do two things at once, especially when they're contradictory things, like being agitated or being delighted.

"I don't want to talk about Huey anymore. Let's never mention Huey again," James announces predictably. He tugs Regulus a little closer, scanning his face, lips parted. "I'm—oh, I'm forgetting my boundaries again."

"No, none of that," Regulus reprimands. "You're—it's good for you to have them, honestly. Especially if we're going to be having tea. Are we—do you still want to do that?"

James' face softens. "Yeah, of course. What, do you think I changed my mind in the last thirty minutes?"

"No, I just…" Regulus doesn't finish, clearing his throat and looking away instead. He doesn't want to be the person who needs reassurances, but there's always this horrible, creeping doubt crawling up from within the depths of him, clawing its way up no matter how many times he shoves it down. He never feels sure of anything, and he doesn't think that's a result of the arena. Maybe the arena made it worse, but it's something that has always existed within him for as long as he can recall.

"I like your tea," James offers. "Maybe I'm biased, but it tastes better than anyone else's. What do you do to it?"

Regulus hums and lightly says, "I spit in it."

Without missing a beat, James replies, "Ah, that explains it."

Helplessly, Regulus' shoulders start shaking as he folds forward into James and muffles his laughter as much as he can. He can feel the gravelly baritone of James' laughter vibrating against his chest, deep and lovely.

"Would you—" Regulus chokes on another relentless giggle, gasping a little. "Wait, would you actually drink my tea if I spit in it, James?"

"Love, I would let you spit directly into my mouth," James announces with absolutely no shame in his tone whatsoever.

"Oh, for fuck's—" Regulus doesn't even get to finish before he dissolves into laughter all over again, just letting it happen at this point, unable to stop it. James is so funny. Regulus hates it, has always hated it, and doesn't hate it at all.

James is still laughing, quiet and light, when he protests, "Is there a reason I shouldn't? We've kissed before, many times! You've literally had your tongue in my mouth. Technically, we've already swapped spit, if you think about it, so you know, if you ever get the urge to cut out the middleman—"

"Stop it. Shut up, stop," Regulus wheezes, burying his face into James' shoulder and clinging to him, stomach hurting from the laughter that won't quit. "Just shut up and dance with me."

"Yeah, alright," James says softly, sweeping his hand up and down Regulus' back, holding him close as they sway.

And that's all they do, for a while. It's so fucking good. It has no business being as good as it is, honestly. Regulus doesn't like the feeling of hands on him, but James… Well, maybe it shouldn't surprise him that James is turning out to be his exception. In the beginning, right after the arena, it was unbearable most of the time, but Regulus is starting to hope that it's getting easier, getting better, if it can.

It's different at night, when he's actively trying to rest, and he can't explain why. For some reason, when he knows he's trying to sleep, being next to someone, feeling them, is the only thing that helps. But when he's awake, it's not the same. He doesn't know what that says about him that he can only accept comfort when he knows that he'll be oblivious to it.

But this past week has shown him that maybe, just maybe, it's something that will pass. Maybe it is passing already. It feels so good just to have James close, even when he's not about to fall asleep. There's no part of Regulus that wants to step away and shrink into himself; he wants to stay just like this, forever. He thinks that's a good sign. It is, right? He wants it to be.

Still, Regulus has no earthly idea how he'd ever offer James sex. Not that he thinks that's all James wants, really. He's quite sure that James would never have sex with him if that's what Regulus wanted, and he wouldn't even be upset about it, because of course he wouldn't. That being acknowledged, it is something that Regulus wants to give him, and wants to let himself have, at least someday.

One of the main issues is that Regulus can't fathom letting James see his scars. He hasn't seen them all. No one has except for Barty, and even Barty hadn't been able to stop himself from sucking in a sharp breath of shock when he was confronted with all of them. He got over it quickly and got used to them, continuing on like they weren't even there, which is why Regulus let him see them in the first place, because he knows he can count on Barty to do what Regulus expects him to. He's consistent, always. The most consistent part of Regulus' life.

But James… Well, it's different for James, isn't it? He's closer to it, for one thing. Regulus is terrified that James will see his scars and either see him differently, or see him and blame himself, or just see him and be taken right back to the arena, or maybe a mixture of all of that.

Regulus can barely stand to see himself most days. He doesn't want to burden James with that.

James makes a quiet sound of displeasure, suddenly, and Regulus' eyes immediately snap open. He's not sure if he'll ever lose the urge to eradicate anything and everything that could ever make James unhappy. He thinks he would bleed the world dry if it meant James was never sad again.

"What's wrong?" Regulus murmurs.

"My leg," James mumbles. "It's—I've been standing and dancing too long. Didn't bring my cane…"

"Do you need to sit down?" Regulus asks, pulling back. "We can grab something to eat. Take a break. The night's almost over now, James."

James smiles at him. "Yeah, thanks."

So, they thread their hands together and go find a table to sit down at. Regulus makes James sit there and save his seat, then goes to make them small plates, dodging people as much as he's able. Marlene helps at one point, cutting someone off to get to the drink table. Sirius is still dancing, and Frank is doing the same, it seems. When Regulus heads back to the table, he locates Emmeline and Pandora, who are filling chairs around James, so that other Hallows can't.

Regulus is grateful, honestly. He sits next to James and listens to everyone chatter around him, watching James brighten around people he actually appreciates spending time with. A few Hallows do stop by to talk to him and Regulus, but James handles most of that, which is probably for the best. It's really not Regulus' strong suit. He does feel bad that he's not helping James more, but to his credit, he tries his best. It's just that his best is never really good enough. He's used to that by now.

They've just finished eating when the music cuts out, making people dancing stop and turn to the balcony on the far side of the room, above everyone else. Riddle is there, gently clinking a spoon to the side of a wine glass.

Regulus feels his heart pick up in immediate fear.

Sirius told him this would happen. That Riddle would step out at some point in the night and give a speech for the Victor, just as he does every year, except this year, it's two. It's for show, of course, so it goes exactly as Sirius said it would. Empty words and lifeless celebrations. Hollow. Riddle is the most hollow person Regulus has ever seen.

By the end, Riddle lifts his glass to James and Regulus in a toast, demanding the whole room to turn and show their signs of respect, and they all do. But Regulus is looking right at Riddle, his heart lodged in his throat, so he sees it in vivid detail when Riddle meets his gaze and slowly shakes his head. Regulus' heart sinks, because he knows exactly what that means. He reads the message loud and clear.

Riddle is unconvinced.

Dorcas keeps glancing at the door. She doesn't mean to. She's trying her best to pay attention, because what Minerva is saying is no doubt important in some way or another. It's just… Well, the mentors from the other districts that traveled in for the party are leaving now that it's over, which means Marlene will be boarding a train soon, and Dorcas didn't get to say goodbye last time, but she'd like to this time, at least.

But work and debriefing with Minerva has to be more important. Of course, she'll get her final orders from Dumbledore once Minerva debriefs him, but Dorcas knows that they'll coincide with what Minerva already thinks.

The victory tour has been...absolute madness, particularly for the Order. Dorcas was their main connection to everything in real time, all the things going on behind the scenes, all the people she met along the way. She had to shut herself away and get in touch with Dumbledore with information far more often than she expected to, honestly.

The steady rise of riots and rebellion is a good sign for the shifting tides of war, and things are starting to pick up the pace. With her connection to the Order, they're able to actually stay updated on current events, as well as get involved in a proper time frame. Dorcas doesn't know much, but she does know that change is on the horizon.

Minerva's main role tonight, other than playing her position as the next head gamemaker perfectly, was to scout out those she felt were prime candidates for recruitment. It will be Dorcas' job to recruit them in six months.

Frank Longbottom is one that Minerva is sold on, fully, so it will fall on Dorcas to get him on board. Emmeline Vance, she isn't sure about entirely, but it is a possibility. There's one sponsor as well, apparently, a man named Huey Rutledge, who Minerva believes would help provide money for war efforts, if nothing else. Even war comes with a price.

"What about Sirius?" Dorcas asks, ripping her gaze away from the door to focus on Minerva.

"Ah, Mr. Black," Minerva muses, lips twitching. "He threatened me, you know."

Dorcas can't stop herself from raising her eyebrows. "Did he? Maybe I shouldn't be surprised. He's unfairly underestimated, honestly. More than just a pretty face, I can tell you that."

"His pretty face seems to be his weapon of choice," Minerva tells her. "However, he adapts well and thinks on his feet. I can see that he's smarter than people give him credit for."

"He's a good candidate," Dorcas says softly, fighting the lump that forms in her throat. She struggles to smother the harsh impulse in her chest not to do it, not to drag Sirius into this, even if he would be the perfect candidate for recruitment. The power he has over the Hallows alone…

Minerva hums. "He is, yes. However, Albus wouldn't clear it, and they'll all provide assistance to the war without being at the forefront of it just yet. It's for the best to leave them out of it for now."

"But not forever," Dorcas asks, holding her gaze. "Dumbledore intends to bring them in at some point."

"I understand that you've come to care for them, Dorcas, I really do," Minerva says quietly, "but there's no way of keeping them out of it, at this point. Personally, I'd prefer to, because goodness knows they've been through enough already, but you know as well as I do that it's not so simple. You saw the riot in five, the close call in eleven. Regulus' message—Hallow is Hollow—will no doubt become the leading warcry when the battles truly begin."

"You know where he got that from, don't you?"

"From you. Yes, I know."

Dorcas quirks a sad smile. "Sirius, Regulus, and James have gone through too much. It's not wrong of me to say that being dragged into this is unfair to them."

"War is never fair," Minerva agrees, averting her eyes as her lips tip down. "They're in this, Dorcas. Whether they mean to be or not, it's a fight they can't avoid, and it's one we are depending on their...involvement to win. We've known it from the moment they branded their love with defiance, all of them. Sirius loving them so much that he would manipulate Horace and risk his own life to see them live. Regulus loving them so much that he would die for them, proving so by going into that river. James loving them so much that he would threaten the Hallow when no one has ever dared to before."

"They're going to hate me when they find out," Dorcas croaks, her heart clenching, and Minerva has no words of comfort for her about this. Dorcas' eyes sink shut. "They didn't sign up for a war, Minerva."

"Nevertheless, war is here," Minerva says softly, "and they are not safe from its reach."

"How long do you think…?" Dorcas trails off and swallows, opening her eyes to scan Minerva's face.

Minerva pauses, then carefully murmurs, "I believe things will be mostly quiet for the next six months, but after that…"

"The next games," Dorcas mumbles, eyebrows furrowed. Minerva says nothing more. "What is it? What do you know?"

"Nothing," Minerva replies simply.

Dorcas frowns, because she's known Minerva a long time, long enough to know when she's not telling everything. But she also knows that Minerva only doesn't tell her things for a reason. Whatever she's hiding, there's a need for it. Dorcas knows that sometimes Minerva keeps things from her just to try and keep her safe, because she doesn't want her to get hurt.

Minerva has been in the Order for a long time, the very first Hallow that ever joined, and she's been working her way up in levels of importance to the Hallow for years now. The fact that she's worked her way up to being head gamemaker is a major turning point for the war, and Dorcas knows it. She's terrified, because she doesn't want Minerva to get hurt either.

But here they are, in this by choice, wishing the other wasn't despite knowing how important it is for them to be. Caring about people in the midst of war is always a dangerous game.

Again, helplessly, Dorcas' gaze crawls to the door.

"Do you have somewhere to be?" Minerva asks, because she's known Dorcas for years, and she's a frightfully observant woman at all times.

"I just—I mean, yeah, sort of," Dorcas says weakly.

Minerva peers at her for a long moment. "Now? This late? And it can't wait?"

"I—well, if I—it's, um…" Dorcas grimaces slightly, feeling like a fucking teenager trying to hide a crush from her mother.

"The only event I can think of taking place that comes with something of a time limit tonight is the mentors leaving to travel back to their districts," Minerva says.

Dorcas coughs and taps her fingernails to the table, the pointed tips clicking away. Damn Minerva for always picking up on the details. Dorcas doesn't say anything.

Minerva sighs. "Which one?"

"Marlene," Dorcas mumbles, her shoulders slumping. When she peeks over, Minerva has her lips pressed into a thin line, which means she's displeased. "What? You don't approve?"

"Would you say she's a good candidate to join the Order?" Minerva asks simply.

Dorcas' breath catches, her whole body going still as Minerva examines her, studying her closely. Dorcas balls her hand into a fist on the table and chokes out, "Please don't, Minerva. Not her. Please, I'm—please—"

"Dorcas," Minerva says softly.

"Don't suggest her to Dumbledore. Don't—don't do this to me. Don't put this on me, to recruit her, because I—I—" Dorcas swallows, her eyes stinging. "I won't do it. Not her."

Minerva takes a deep breath, holds it for a beat, then slowly lets it out. "Okay. Okay, Dorcas, I'll leave her name out of it."

"Thank you," Dorcas breathes out, her voice hoarse as her eyes slip shut, relief slamming into her all at once.

"Involvement isn't always a choice," Minerva murmurs, her gaze sad when Dorcas' eyes flutter open. "You should know that better than anyone. You may wish to keep her safe, but if wishes were reality, we'd all be daydreaming."

"Then let me daydream," Dorcas whispers. "Please."

"Do you love her?" Minerva asks quietly.

"I don't know," Dorcas admits. "I think I could. I think I almost do."

"Go," is Minerva's only response. She nods to the door, sitting back in her chair. "Go be where you need to. I'll be waiting here when you get back. We'll continue this then. The war has waited this long; it can wait a little longer."

Dorcas is out of her chair in an instant, needing no other prompting before she's out the door.

All the way to the train, she thinks about how Minerva looks at Poppy sometimes like it'll be the very last time. How she's strong enough to handle the risk of that, Dorcas doesn't know.

Dorcas isn't that strong.

And yet, she's a glutton for punishment, because she arrives at the train station and feels her breath punch out of her the moment she lays eyes on Marlene. She's in an arctic blue suit that Dorcas recognizes, one she designed herself that Marlene must have gone through the trouble of buying from a store, or online. The top buttons on her undershirt is undone, and her tie is draped open, giving her that lazy, leisurely sexy look that genuinely makes Dorcas' head spin a little bit. Dorcas wants to peel her out of the suit. Oh, she's gorgeous.

She's also…quite blatantly drunk.

Even from here, Dorcas can see it. She's draped all over Emmeline, laughing loudly, face flushed as she struggles to stay upright. Frank hovers beside her, like he might need to catch her if she falls over, but Emmeline seems to be doing most of the work in keeping her steady. In fact, Emmeline seems quite dedicated to keeping Marlene on her feet, hands on her hips, pressed right up against her.

Mm, well, Dorcas doesn't like that. Not one bit. Oh, she definitely doesn't fucking like that at all. Belatedly, she realizes that this is rather hypocritical of her, considering she has fucked Lily, and also she and Marlene are technically just…friends. She has absolutely no right to be agitated by the sight of Marlene all over another woman, but does that stop her from grinding her teeth? No, no, it does not.

Dorcas crosses her arms, cocks her hip up against the brick wall next to her, and waits.

Marlene is drunk, that much is obvious, but perhaps the way Dorcas is drilling holes into the side of her head with her eyes breaks through anyway, because she eventually catches sight of her. As soon as she does, she gives a rather comical blink.

"Dorcas?" Marlene calls, peeling away from Emmeline, who grimaces slightly when she stumbles. Emmeline and Frank instantly reach out like they're going to have to catch her, but she bats away their hands and makes her way unsteadily right over to Dorcas, her eyes glazed and wide.

"Tipsy, are we?" Dorcas asks softly.

Marlene clears her throat and reaches out to brace her hand on the brick wall beside her, getting her balance. She looks a little sheepish as she says, "Oh, just a bit."

"I can see that," Dorcas tells her.

"I just…had a few drinks," Marlene mumbles. "Just to make the night a bit more bearable, you know how it is. I'm, ah, liked more by the Hallows when I'm drunk. I laugh easier."

Dorcas is pretty sure her heart breaks. "Not all Hallows. I like you when you're sober quite fine, actually."

"Yeah, well, you can't offer me money to save the lives of my future tributes, so no offense, but it's not exactly your opinion of me I'm relying on," Marlene announces bluntly.

"There's a fine line between a fun drunk and a messy drunk, at least to them, so keep that in mind," Dorcas says. She holds her hands up in surrender when Marlene squints at her. "I'm just saying. It's a fine line to walk, and I don't know anyone who has ever managed to."

Marlene's lips press into a thin line. "Well, I can't fucking do it sober, Dorcas, alright? I hate them. I—when I'm sober, I'm—I can't—I don't know how to—"

"Marlene," Dorcas cuts in gently, "I'm not judging you. I'm just… I don't want you to harm yourself for their sake, especially when it likely won't get you anywhere anyway."

"I don't know what to do," Marlene confesses, blinking hard and fast. "I don't know how I'm supposed to keep doing this. I'm going to end up like so many of the other mentors. Drunk. Withering away. Escaping this in the only way we can."

Dorcas swallows thickly and reaches out carefully to grab Marlene's hand, squeezing it gently. "I—I think you should stop drinking, Marlene, or try to. Maybe that's unfair of me to say, but I just—I want you to be okay. I want you to be safe, and healthy. Maybe you—you could talk to your mum? The way you talked about her, I don't doubt she would help you."

"She—she would," Marlene croaks. "I just—I don't—"

"It's okay to need help," Dorcas whispers.

Marlene sniffs quietly and looks away, her eyes sinking shut. She breathes for a moment, then gives a jerky nod before looking at Dorcas again. "I didn't expect you to come, to be here. I didn't want you to see me like this. Not you."

"Hey, it's alright," Dorcas assures her, squeezing her hand again. "Really, it is. I came to tell you goodbye, because I—I didn't get to last time."

"Will I see you again next year?" Marlene asks. "Are you going to be designing for Sirius again?"

Dorcas nods. "Yes, I will. I'll be here, Marlene."

"Could I convince you to ditch Sirius and design for me?" Marlene murmurs, swaying a little closer. "I'm positive he doesn't appreciate you the way I would."

"Ah," Dorcas says, huffing out a weak laugh, "Sirius would kill me, I think."

"I wouldn't let him. I promise," Marlene tells her, curling forward until she's settling her free hand on Dorcas' waist and leaning in to brush her lips along Dorcas' jaw.

"Marlene," Dorcas whispers, her eyes fluttering shut as a sharp hook of yearning yanks at her until she's scared she's going to tilt right into Marlene and never resurface again.

"You smell like rosewater, diluted sweetness," Marlene breathes out, inhaling sharply as she flexes her hand on Dorcas' hip and dips her head to kiss the side of her throat. "That's you. Diluted sweetness. Every time, you muffle the full force of it, hold it all back, and I don't know why."

"You're drunk," Dorcas rasps, her mouth dry as she gently untangles their fingers to ease Marlene back.

Marlene huffs. "Yeah, but it's not like I want you any less when I'm sober."

"Well, you seem to want a lot of things when you're drunk," Dorcas mutters, her gaze flicking over Marlene's shoulder to land on Emmeline, who's chatting easily with Frank.

"What?" Marlene follows her gaze, then turns back around and stares at her. "Are you—jealous?"

"No," Dorcas mumbles.

"I thought we were friends," Marlene reminds her, sing-song, that last word wrapped in a derisive scoff.

Dorcas purses her lips. "We are. Of course we are."

"Emmeline is my friend," Marlene muses.

"Lucky Emmeline," Dorcas snaps reflexively, then immediately squeezes her eyes shut with a grimace. Oh, for fuck's sake.

Marlene has a smile tucked at the corner of her lips when Dorcas opens her eyes again. "Yeah, but there's no need to be jealous. I don't have a friend like you, other than you, and that works for me. I'm alright with being friends like this for now, in the way no one else gets to be."

Dorcas can't stop herself from tucking her lips in and dropping her gaze, pained. Ah, dammit. Fuck, fuck, fuck.

"Oh," Marlene whispers.

"Marlene," Dorcas says weakly, lifting her gaze and instantly regretting it when she sees how hurt Marlene looks.

"Shit," Marlene chokes out on a harsh laugh, blinking rapidly. She takes a solid step back and nods. "Right. Well, you know, I don't even know why I—I just assumed—"

Dorcas shakes her head. "No. No, wait, it's not—"

"And you were jealous?" Marlene asks incredulously. "For fuck's sake, Dorcas, that's—you do realize how ridiculous that is, yeah? I mean, I knew Hallows felt a strong sense of entitlement, but fuck, the double standard is a bit much."

"Just—wait, no, it's not like that," Dorcas insists. "I swear it's not, Marlene, okay?"

"No, this is on me. This was my mistake. Of course you have other friends," Marlene grits out.

"She's—it's—" Dorcas legitimately feels like she's about to let out a low whine. "Yes, she's my friend, but we're not friends like…you and I are."

Marlene arches an eyebrow. "So, you two didn't fuck? I just misunderstood, then?" She waits, and Dorcas opens and closes her mouth. Marlene nods. "Right, so actually, it sounds like you two are friends the exact same way that we are, unless you want to elaborate on how it's different."

Dorcas would love nothing more, except she can't, because then she would have to admit that what she feels for Marlene is a lot more than friendship, and she knows it, but to do that would be to put Marlene in danger. Dorcas has responsibilities and other things she has to let be a priority, none of which she's willing to drag Marlene into. She would be lying to Marlene in a worse way than she already is.

"Please elaborate on how it's different," Marlene croaks, holding her gaze, her voice small. "I'm—I'm literally begging you to, because you didn't do anything wrong, and if you'd just—if you'd just give me something, anything, please…"

Dorcas wants to give her the world.

Dorcas can only give her nothing.

Marlene swallows harshly and blinks away visible tears, her jaw rolling as she turns her head and breathes, in and out. She nods again, then reaches down to brush her fingers over the ring on her thumb, swiveling it once before pulling it off all the way, revealing the scar she doesn't like to look at.

Meeting Dorcas' eyes, Marlene reaches out to cup her hand and drop the ring into her palm, curling her fingers over it before drawing her hands away. "There's nothing wrong with you having friends, Dorcas. I just don't think I can be one of them. Not like this. Not when I—"

"Marlene," Dorcas whispers, stricken, feeling like her chest is shrinking as Marlene cuts herself off and looks away. "At least keep the ring. You don't like seeing that scar."

"It'll be easier to see than the reminder of you," Marlene says softly.

The train blows the horn, calling for them to board, and Marlene meets Dorcas' eyes again. It's not the goodbye she was expecting, but it's the goodbye she gets.

Without another word, Marlene turns and stumbles back to her friends, boarding the train with their help without once looking back. Dorcas stands there, clutching the ring so tight that it hurts, daydreaming that she hadn't come at all.

The last night in the Hallow is a bad one for Regulus, personally. After a day of being forced to socialize, he genuinely feels so drained that the thought of being around anyone else sounds like torture. So, he sneaks away to the rooftop and stays there until the sun rises. As exhausted as he is, sleep remains out of reach. It's frustrating. Regulus always misses oblivion when he's away from it.

The next morning, bright and early, they all gather themselves up and board the train to go home. Pandora sees them off, but Dorcas doesn't show. They didn't get to say goodbye to her, and Regulus wonders if he'll ever see her again.

The train ride home is quicker without any of the stops. Sirius is in a sullen state, moody and quiet, clearly upset about being away from Remus again. He's in his James only setting, the one where the only person who seems to make him feel the least bit better is James. Regulus doesn't look too much into that, not anymore. It's not an unfair feeling to have, after all.

Regulus can't blame Sirius for it, especially not when he understands it intimately himself, in a very different way.

There's just something about James. Something so inherently comforting. Something so unshakably safe. When everyone else fails to be enough, James always is.

Sometimes, it breaks Regulus' heart that James can't see that.

Regulus leaves Sirius and James alone, sitting off to the side and watching the world go by, quiet and alone in the way that doesn't make him feel so small.

They're passing through a tunnel in district five when Regulus does a sharp double-take, head whipping to the side. He would swear he just caught a glimpse of words spray-painted on the inside of the tunnel. Maybe his mind is playing tricks on him, but it looked like it said Hallow is Hollow.

The train is going too fast for him to really be sure, so he settles back into his seat slowly, eyebrows furrowed. Against his will, he thinks about the way Riddle had made it very clear that Regulus failed to change his mind, or do a proper job of convincing him, as he was demanded to.

Regulus doesn't believe there's actually anything he could have done to achieve that goal anyway, if he's honest. Riddle doesn't strike him as the type of man who's swayed once he has his mind set on something. But, well, maybe Regulus did a good enough job of convincing everyone else. James, too. They really did try, no matter how difficult it was.

That has to count for something, right?

Either way, Regulus is relieved when they make it back home. He doesn't know the future, doesn't know if the Hallows will demand more out of him and James at some point, but he is sure that the chances of them fading into obscurity are higher now. There will be new tributes soon enough, and Sirius is the only one who will for sure have to return to the Hallow. James and Regulus might not have to, possibly for a long time.

So…tea. Regulus thinks tea is a good place to start. He isn't sure what that means for them, honestly, but he is sure that he's not opposed to finding out. It's easier like this, without the weight of the Hallows expectations bearing down on them. Whatever they do, however it goes, it'll be their choice. It won't be for show. It'll be theirs, and only theirs.

When the train slows to a stop, Regulus gets off first. James has been getting up at random intervals to walk when his leg demanded it, so he doesn't seem as uncomfortable as he did the last time he returned home from the Hallow. Regulus lingers out front, waiting in silence as Sirius gets off behind him, then helps James off right after. James is fine enough that he's not using his cane, just lazily swinging it as they walk.

He seems pleased that Regulus waited on them. A smile curves his mouth, and it's beautiful, so very beautiful. Regulus wants to feel that smile against his own lips, and with no one around eager to see just that, the desire feels more real somehow. It leaves him a little flustered, honestly.

Regulus could have left and just—went home, but instead, he walks along with Sirius and James to the gate. They're all quiet, but it's not a heavy silence. It's light, actually, just an unspoken relief to be home with the past week behind them.

When the gate opens, Effie and Monty are there. Regulus is secretly relieved, because some part of him was afraid that they wouldn't be, that Riddle would have…

And then, Effie steps forward and softly says, "Sirius, Regulus, I need a word with you both," and Regulus knows instantly that Riddle did. Just not to them.

Regulus' heart sinks, his stomach tangling into knots as he slowly looks over at Sirius, who is already staring right at him. They don't say anything; they don't have to. James is frozen in place, staring at Monty with wide eyes, and Monty has sorrow etched into the lines of his face. Without a word, Sirius and Regulus follow Effie off to the side, listening in silence as she explains that their parents had a tragic accident and are dead.

Riddle didn't even grant the liberty of leaving bodies behind for them to bury.

Chapter End Notes

the alcohol abuse warning: marlene has turned to drinking to cope with being a mentor, and she is drunk in one scene that she's with dorcas, but nothing really happens, and she does agree to ask for help back home on getting sober (we will see her recover) the death warning: walburga and orion are killed. it's not explicitly stated how (not yet) and is shown in, like, two paragraphs. all that's said is that there was a tragic accident and "riddle didn't leave bodies behind to bury" which will get explained in the next chapter alright! into me jabbering away, ig.

so, starting strong with marlene being hilarious, and also her and james bonding! i told you they'd have progress! also regulus getting bitchy because their dance got interrupted 😭😭😭 regulus' little moment with huey was so satisfying to me, im so sorry. like "there is no comfort in the arena" YOU TELL HIM BABE!!! sucks for huey tho bc he really does mean well.

jealous james my beloved <3 sorry but he has me giggling and kicking my feet, he's so 🥰 lmaooo not him being like: he wants to get in your pants and i know this because i ALSO want to get in your pants, i will fight him to the death! okay babe, calm down 😭😭😭 literally who are you fighting??? regulus doesn't even know other people EXIST.

but regulus bringing up sex and james immediately shifting gears, he is HILARIOUS, i love him. the fact that regulus calls them "shiny topics" is adorable to me bc he knows james likes shiny things PLS 😭 also just like, the growth that regulus has had!!! he has come so far!!! he is trying so hard and making progress!!! im so proud of him ☹☹☹ now, minvera fucking mcgonagall!!! an icon!!! a queen!!! not sirius trying to THREATEN HER 😭😭😭 GOODBYE. also yes, finding out that she is the next head gamemaker but also in the order... hm, What Could This Possibly Mean 🤔 that whole interaction between minerva and dorcas is so.... god, it's such a set up for future pain, yall don't even KNOW. but also the fact that dorcas BEGS minerva not to make her recruit marlene, and then admits she could love her, and she thinks she almost does... KILL ME 😭 just minerva being like "go. go be where you need to be" ohhhh it's hitting so hard but its a sad day for the dorlene lovers (i am one of them, yes, and i am Sad). just, like, the fact that dorcas did absolutely nothing wrong by having sex with lily, just like marlene wouldn't be doing anything wrong by having sex with someone else, but it Still Hurts bc they have feelings for each other, EXCEPT dorcas feels she can't do anything about it bc like, she Needs To Keep Marlene Safe. and it's one of those things where, like, marlene can't just be dorcas' "friend" she feels much more than that, so she needed to take a step back and do what's best for herself, and there was NOTHING dorcas could do about it, because she would be putting marlene in danger.

the ring... we will see the ring again. it's Important. don't worry, dorcas and marlene WILL see each other again. there's a lot more to their story, i promise.

but god, that juxtaposition where minnie is like "if wishes were reality, we'd all be daydreaming" and dorcas then being like "then let me daydream please" only to then later daydream/wish she hadn't gone to say goodbye to marlene at all bc of how it ended. it felt like someone just stepped on my heart 😭 and then, the going home portion!!! effie and monty are alive and well, walburga and orion...are not. ding dong the bitches are dead. all of you: i wish they'd just die. me: your wish is my command lmaoooo no but, as shit as they were, it's not something that regulus (and sirius) are just happy about, obviously. it's a complex thing, and it's expanded on more in the next chapter.

HONORABLE MENTIONS:

The first time Regulus invites James in for tea is months after learning his parents are dead. James can't really blame him for that, honestly, because—well, his parents are dead.

It was a house fire, apparently, but James—along with Sirius and Regulus—knew that Riddle was behind it somehow. The mayor did have it assessed, but all that was said about it was a faulty wire that led to a tragic accident. No one wondered why they didn't try to escape, and didn't think to ask themselves if maybe Walburga and Orion couldn't. Effie said it happened in the middle of the night, while her and Monty were asleep, so by the time they got up to the harsh smell of smoke from down the street, it was already too late.

Regulus was, predictably and understandably, not okay after the fact. Sirius wasn't either, though his complex emotions seem steeped in his own understanding of morality, because he confessed to James once, late at night, that the fact that his parents were dead comforted him, and he thought it made him a bad person. He got randomly upset as well, though. About two weeks after learning his parents died, Sirius had a major breakdown thinking that maybe, just maybe, there were happy memories of his childhood with his parents, but he just forgot them. On that day, the only person who could help Sirius was Regulus—who also wasn't doing so well at the time—and so it was Regulus who had to explain that no, they didn't have many happy memories with their parents as children, and yes, their parents were shitty people, but they were still dead, and it still hurt anyway.

There was no funeral equivalent or anything of the like. James is pretty sure that Sirius and Regulus took a night to get absolutely fucking plastered, because Sirius didn't come home one night, and he could hear yelling from across the street. The next day—not morning, but afternoon—Sirius came stumbling in, hungover and sporting busted knuckles, grumbling about lunatics for little brothers.

Nonetheless, whatever issues they had seemed to pass, because Sirius continued to go visit Regulus as often as he had been. The only other common visitor was still, infuriatingly enough, Barty Crouch Jr, who went in and out of Regulus' house like he fucking lived there. James, of course, was still just bringing the daily flower, and he wasn't even heartbroken the first time he stepped up and saw the flower from the previous day right where he'd left it. Well, he had been heartbroken, but not out of a sense of rejection. He remembered how Regulus said that the flower got him out of bed when doing so was too hard, and he was pretty sure that meant that Regulus just—hadn't gotten out of bed the previous day. At all. Not even for the flower.

So, James put out a little flower pot for him on his stoop, just so the flower wouldn't die, letting it wait there for whenever Regulus was ready to get it. Regulus eventually did. James showed up one day to see that the flower was gone, and so he replaced it again, and the cycle continued. There were some days that Regulus didn't take the flower, and there were some days where James barely got to make it across the damn street before Regulus' hand was darting out his door to grab the flower like it was all he wanted out of life.

It took two months, nearly three, for that door to open when James stepped up onto the stoop. He didn't expect it, not that day, and probably not ever. Some part of James felt—guilt, felt like it was at least partially his fault, because maybe he could have done more, tried harder, put on a better performance, and maybe Walburga and Orion would have lived. He knew, rationally, that he wasn't to blame—Riddle was—but that didn't stop the feelings from being there.

His shame for it led him to be fully convinced that Regulus would never, ever speak to him again. The curtains on his window were always shut.

But then, one day with no warning, the door to Regulus' house opened just as James was about to lay a flower out on his stoop, and as beautiful as Regulus always is, he had looked quite rough at the time. For James, who hadn't properly laid eyes on him in months, it felt like a drastic change. He was thinner, and he had deep and dark circles under his eyes that looked like they'd been there for quite some time. James immediately wanted to feed him and tuck him into bed.

But he was there, and his voice cracked a little bit when he looked at the flower in James' hand and whispered, "Would you want to come in for tea?"

James did want, in fact, and so he went in for tea.

Which brings him to now, two months later, nearly five months after returning home and finding out that Walburga and Orion had died. Not just died, though. They'd been killed. James never lets himself forget it, never lets himself forget how easy it was for Riddle to have them killed, done in secret, late in the night; not as a warning, but as a punishment.

Since Regulus let him in on that very first day, James has had at least one cup of tea with Regulus every day since. He doesn't lay flowers on the stoop anymore, instead knocking on the door—if Regulus isn't opening it before he can even lift his hand in the first place—and handing it directly to Regulus, who takes each one like they're precious. He always replaces the old flowers in the vase in his kitchen with the new one, taking one of the old ones up to his room before returning to the kitchen to start tea for them both.

Some days, Regulus doesn't acknowledge him at all, doing everything with a distant look in his eyes, quiet and never looking at him. On those days, James sits with him in silence and listens to the sounds of life they create even when living is so hard; the clinking of ceramic, the scuff of shoes across the floor, and the soft, steady way they breathe. On those days, James knows not to touch him, and he knows that, in some way, just being there with Regulus is enough.

Other days, Regulus seems better. He's willing to talk; he'll look James in the eye; he goes just a little slower when making their tea. On those days, James talks to him, and usually that's all it is. Lazy, inane chatter about whatever thoughts pass through his head. Sometimes the goal is just to get him to laugh, and James is always pleased when it works. On those days, James is fairly sure that he can come closer, that he can reach out and touch, that Regulus will let him. Most of the time, James doesn't. But, occasionally, he can't stop himself from at least trying—just a hand on Regulus' arm on the table, or coming so close that only one step would be all it would take for him to have Regulus in his arms—and on the good days, Regulus allows it, every single time.

Some days, James is the one who's struggling. He drags himself into Regulus' kitchen and can't quite remember how to smile. On the days that his leg hurts more than usual, he's grumpier from the pain. On the day he accidentally kills a bee while tending to his flowers, he goes through the five stages of grief in less than an hour, which has nothing to do with the bee and everything to do with Vanity. He has bad days, too, days where he walks into Regulus' house and wants to curl up in a ball and fucking cry, or get up and toss shit around the room, or scream at the top of his lungs until he's breathless.

Those days, Regulus always tries to be there for him. James knows he does. He can tell. Regulus isn't very good with vulnerability, James knows that, but he makes it a point to ask if James needs or wants to talk, or just rant, if he's clearly having a bad day. He listens when James takes him up on the offer, which isn't always, but James has learned by now that he feels a little better every time he lets himself unload a bit. And, when James doesn't want to talk, Regulus makes his tea just a little bit sweeter, and somehow that makes him feel better, too.

Today is a good day for them both, which isn't as rare as it was when they started doing this in the very beginning. It's more frequent now, in fact, especially since Regulus seems to have fully come to terms with his parents being killed, as much as he ever will. He doesn't talk about them, ever, at least not to James—maybe Sirius, but Sirius hasn't said either way, so James doesn't know—but Regulus does look better these days. Still tired, most of the time, and still beautiful.

On this day, Regulus is in a good enough mood to add bagels to their tea time, as James has fondly dubbed it in his head. When Regulus wants more time with him, he adds bagels, which James has now unconsciously been Pavloved into thinking of as his favorite food for that very reason. For one thing, he gets to watch Regulus spread cream cheese on the warm bagels; a treat for his eyes, because Regulus uses a dull kitchen knife with the same ease that he used his daggers in the arena.

"You're a bit of a show-off, you know that?" James asks in amusement after Regulus effortlessly swivels the knife between his fingers. "Sort of like Sirius, but more secretive about it. Don't think I haven't noticed."

"I'm not showing off," Regulus mutters, sticking his pinky in his mouth and sucking off a smear of cream cheese with a small frown of concentration that makes James feel like he's about to melt down against the counter.

"So, what, you just can't hold a knife normally?" James teases.

Regulus hums and swivels the knife once more before sitting it down and sliding James' bagel over to him. "Maybe. I don't know. It really is just an unconscious motion. A habit."

"Can you teach me?" James asks.

"Do you want me to?" Regulus replies.

James thinks about that for a long moment, then lifts one half of his bagel and admits, "No, not really. I just like looking at it, if I'm honest. It looks…nice."

"Nice wasn't the word you were going to use, was it?"

"No, it was not."

Regulus shakes his head, his lips twitching as he starts tearing his own bagel into portions, rather than just biting into it like James is. He's always like this, eating politely, something he no doubt learned from how he was raised; it took Sirius ages to get out of the habit himself.

"Maybe you should think about your fascination with knives a little more, James," Regulus muses, popping a piece of bagel in his mouth and chewing slowly, eyebrows raised.

"I don't really have to. They're sexy." James shrugs, shameless, because that's enough for him. "That's all I need to know."

"Is that so?"

"I'm a simple man, Reg."

Regulus rolls his eyes. "You're something, alright."

James grins at him and bites into his bagel, chewing obnoxiously like he can invite a little life into this house with just a smile and a willingness to be silly. He's always doing that, when he's capable of it, on his better days. He laughs loudly and hears it echo throughout the house, hoping it will seep into the walls and warm the space when he's gone. Every day, when James leaves behind remnants of conversation and commotion, it feels a little less hollow.

Sirius is contributing in his own way, too. He builds furniture and just—leaves it all over Regulus' house. He puts together picture frames and fills them with photos of himself and James, himself and Regulus and James when they were kids, himself and Regulus before James ever came into a picture. He even put out a photo of their parents, likely for Regulus' sake more than his own, but it's still the thought that counts.

Effie sends over food and various other things so she's sure that Regulus' pantry will never get empty. Monty has sent over books for Regulus to read, which James knows for a fact that he actually does, because he's seen the books lying around with flowers that James gave him used as bookmarks. Mary somehow worked out through James' rambling that they're trying to make Regulus' house a bit more of a home, so she sent a beautiful painting full of bright, happy colors that genuinely does make the house seem warmer. And, of course there's always a vase of flowers in Regulus' kitchen.

It's still… Well, there's still a hollowness that lingers, and James knows why. It's hard to make a home out of a house where a ghost lives, and there are days where the only thing that seems real in this house is the way Regulus haunts it.

What puts a bright burst of hope in James' chest is that Regulus is starting to try, too. He sees it, the signs of effort, everything from the clear signs of Regulus actually cleaning up, to him moving furniture around on his own because he wants it in a different spot than where Sirius left it. He sees it in the shoes by the door, and the little notes of recipes taped to the fridge, and the lack of a visible flinch or tension in Regulus' shoulders whenever he turns on the tap and hears running water.

His curtains are open again, too.

It's the small things, really. They matter.

"So," James says later, once they've both finished their bagels and the visit is coming to an end. There's just something that James wants to talk about first, and he dares to hope that he'll actually get a positive response. "I've been thinking…"

"Mm, dangerous," Regulus comments idly, carrying his small plate and empty cup over to the sink. "Wasn't aware you could do that, James. What a terrifying discovery."

James snort-laughs, unable to help it, and that's another thing. Regulus is mean to him again, sometimes, but like, in the good way. James can't explain it, what's so good about it, why it makes him feel happy every time Regulus does it, but he is nonetheless pleased by it. He didn't even realize how Regulus had stopped doing it until he started back.

"Yes, well, it's difficult business, this thinking thing I've taken to doing as of late," James announces with a delighted little chortle as he brings his plate and cup over, too. "You're, ah, watching the announcement for the Quarterly Memorial tonight, right?"

Regulus side-eyes him, even as he grabs James' dishes to wash along with his own. "Yes…"

"Well, we're all going to be watching it right across the street. Mum, Dad, Sirius and me, I mean," James says slowly, bracing his hand on the counter and gazing at Regulus hopefully. "If you wanted—I mean, if you didn't want to watch alone, you could always come over and watch with us."

"Ah, I—I don't know if that would be the best idea, James," Regulus replies carefully.

"You wouldn't be intruding," James tells him, leaning closer to try and catch his gaze. "Really, Mum and Dad think you should be there anyway. No point in watching it alone. Sirius would probably feel better with you there, too. We can—I mean, you can have dinner with us, then stick around…"

"I'm not—I don't—" Regulus pauses, then blows out a deep breath and sits the dishes out to dry, turning off the tap and pivoting to face James, eyebrows furrowed. "I'll see how I feel later, how about that? I'll think about it."

James nods, unwilling to push. His gaze snags on a wavy strand of hair stubbornly lying over Regulus' forehead, and he studies it for a long moment before his hand raises slowly. He hesitates for a beat before he comes in contact, flicking his gaze down to look into Regulus' eyes and see if this is upsetting him in any way, or if it's going to. Regulus just watches him, his eyes clear and sharp, a little intense.

Gently, James brushes the hair back, letting his fingertips graze slightly over the arc of Regulus' eyebrow. James is pretty sure his heart attempts to kick right through his chest, muscle and bone and all, because Regulus leans into it. He sways closer, a soft sigh spilling out of mouth the moment James dares to brush the curl of his fingers down his cheek.

"Oi, what's going on in here?"

James jumps in place, snatching his hand back reflexively as he bursts out, "Fucking shit, Sirius! For fuck's sake, don't do that. You nearly scared the piss out of me!"

"Can't you fucking knock?" Regulus snaps, pinning a glare on Sirius, who seems unperturbed by this.

"Well, I usually don't, do I? And now I'm glad I didn't. What's all this then?" Sirius flaps his hand between them, his nose wrinkling. "Stop that. I'm miserable and loveless, so this means everyone else must also be miserable and loveless in solidarity with me, because I said so."

"Oh, stop being dramatic," Regulus mutters. "You are not miserable and loveless."

"This is true," James agrees solemnly. "I always endeavor to make you happy, and I love you very much."

"Don't make me feel guilty, you utter tossers." Sirius groans and shuffles into the kitchen to flop against the counter, pouting at them. "I miss him. I miss him so much. I'm pretty sure I'm dying, that's how much I miss him."

"Not too long now," James tells him weakly, walking over to pat his shoulder. There's not really much James can say to make Sirius feel better about missing Remus; he's said every single comforting thing he can think of by now so many times that he's pretty sure Sirius is tired of hearing it.

Sirius heaves a sigh and props himself up. "I am going to attack him mouth-first when I see him again. I'm going to just fucking absorb him, that way I can keep him when I leave next time. Is that insane? I think I'm insane."

"Your last name is Black," Regulus says wryly. "Of course you are."

"Bad news for you, Reggie," Sirius replies, bearing his teeth in a playful grimace. Regulus snorts quietly and turns away, so Sirius focuses on James. "Are you two done with your little tea date now? Mary is expecting us, James."

"It's not a date," James and Regulus announce at the same time.

"Sure it's not," Sirius declares flatly, clearly unimpressed with them both. "Whatever helps you two sleep at night. Anyway, can we go now?"

"Yes, you can," Regulus mumbles, pointing towards the door, his cheeks red. "Get out of my house."

"Don't you want to walk James to the door, Regulus? It's only polite, you know, after a date."

"Out!"

Sirius cackles his whole way to the door, and James has to stifle laughter of his own as he follows behind. He glances back on the way, just in time to see Regulus shaking his head with a small smile as he turns around, reaching out to gently brush his fingers over the flowers in the windowsill.

"Fucking hell, Potter, you're heavy," Sirius complains, pausing in place to do a little jump to haul James further up on his back, having to pitch himself forward to keep his balance.

"Hey, this was your idea. Steady on, my noble steed," James declares in delight, clicking his teeth and raising his cane up in the air, laughing brightly when Sirius huffs.

Nonetheless, Sirius continues on, because it was indeed his idea, so now he has to see it through. It's colder now, these days, since winter is coming in; that makes James' leg a little more difficult for him to deal with at times, especially if he's been really active. The idiot was chasing children around outside today, while Sirius—who is lazy—much preferred to stand off to the side with Mary and gossip about the other teachers. By the end, James was limping a little on the way home, even with his cane, so Sirius—who is not lazy, when it comes to the people he loves—decided a piggyback was a clear solution. His back is not happy with him about it, because James is a solid mass of muscle draped all over it right now.

"I can feel you turning to look at his house," Sirius says dryly as he carries James towards their own. He can literally feel James twisting around to look at Regulus' behind them.

"He's at his desk," James replies lightly. "Writing more sad boy poetry, no doubt, but I think we've just ruined the mood for him. He's laughing at you so hard right now."

"Little shit," Sirius mutters, but there's not much heat to his words, honestly. Regulus has been doing better lately, which is a huge improvement to how fucked up he was after their parents died. Frankly, Sirius wasn't really handling it well himself, so he has no room to judge.

It's just that it was so unexpected. Like, yes, they all knew it was a possibility; that's part of the fear they've had from the moment Riddle paid them all a visit. But it's one thing to think about it, and it's something else entirely to have it actually happen. Sirius doesn't know why, but some part of him didn't expect it to. Maybe because he has spent years of his life just wishing his parents would fucking die, like that could erase everything they put him and Regulus through, only for it to actually happen and find out that it doesn't.

Sirius had a war going on in him for months after they were killed. One half of him tangled up with shame and this horrible yearning for the Walburga and Orion that never even existed in the first place; the other half just fucking relieved, as horrible as that may be, because them being dead can't change what they did in the past, but it does ensure they can't do anything else in the future. The war has settled now, over time, but neither side really won. He just… let it go. Or, he tried to. He's still trying to, and he does a little more each day.

Regulus, though… Well, he loved their parents. He still loves their parents. He never wanted them to die at all, despite every reason it would be perfectly valid for him to wish for that. It hit him very, very hard and wasn't a complex, complicated thing at all. His grief is clear and defined; Walburga and Orion are dead, and he does not want them to be.

So, it's—well, it's relieving for Sirius, to see him doing better. He's pretty sure a weight lifted off his chest the first time James didn't come home immediately after leaving one of his flowers, and he discovered the two of them having tea in complete silence. He left them to it, hoping it was a good sign.

It was. Regulus has been doing better, slowly but surely. Not just with the loss of their parents, but with a lot of things, honestly. Two days ago, Sirius showed up at Regulus' house unannounced and they got into a bickering war that ended with them both racing each other up the stairs, shoving at each other and insulting the other back and forth the entire way, and at the top, Sirius mindlessly threw his arm around Regulus' shoulders to roughly drag his knuckles over his head, forgetting for a moment that Regulus fucking hates being touched. Except Regulus fussed and craned his head away, but he didn't push Sirius off, even leaning into him a little as they stumbled along, like he didn't hate the contact at all.

It's a big improvement from the horrible, ugly fight they had the night they decided mixing alcohol with their grief would be a proper way to send their parents off. It felt fitting at the time, but in retrospect, it was a very stupid idea. Regulus ended up tossing shit at Sirius' head, yelling at him about a lot of things, like being a bad son and a bad brother and a bad person, all because Sirius made the less-than-innocent comment that some part of him was glad that their parents were dead, so they couldn't do any more damage.

In response, a very drunk Sirius retaliated by yelling right back and ranting about how fucking emotionally-stunted Regulus is and how he's a bad brother as well. In his drunken stupor, he may have punched a wall a few times, which was better than punching Regulus, because he really wanted to punch Regulus. He's pretty sure if they fought that night, they would have ended up killing each other, or coming close to it.

By the end of it, though, they were both a weepy mess of apologies and stupid, dysfunctional confessions that will likely never see the light of day again. Things like how much they missed each other in the ten years they spent apart. Regulus admitting that he missed Walburga and Orion and wasn't even sure what he was missing. Sirius whispering that he wished he remembered them more, even if the memories he would have would be as shitty as all the rest, but a part of him wanted to cling to them anyway. They'd both passed out on the floor in the main room of Regulus' house and regretted all their decisions the following day, plus they struggled to meet each other's eyes after the emotional upheaval of the night prior.

And yet, Sirius went right back when he promised to, and Regulus welcomed him in without missing a beat.

"You know, he said he'd think about coming over for dinner and watch the Quarterly Memorial announcement with us," James says as slides slowly off Sirius' back at the doorway, bracing himself with his cane and following Sirius in when he opens the door and holds it for him.

"Did he now?"

"He—well, he didn't promise anything, but he didn't say no either, so…"

The absence of a no is not a yes, and James knows this as much as Sirius does, especially with Regulus, but Sirius can tell that James is getting his hopes up anyway. Sirius won't make a fuss out of it either way, but he really hopes Regulus comes.

But Regulus doesn't show up for dinner, and Sirius grimaces each time he sees James wistfully look in the direction of the door. It's probably some of the most heartbreaking shit he's ever seen. James is so ridiculously smitten that Sirius doesn't even mock him about it, even though it's with Sirius' little brother. Sirius also has no room to judge for being ridiculously smitten, because a night does not go by where he hasn't dragged himself up on the roof to talk to the moon.

You'd think that getting the surprise of seeing Remus in the middle of the year unexpectedly would have made him miss Remus less, but he's pretty sure it just made him miss Remus more. He thinks about it a lot, how different things would have been without getting to see him. He wouldn't know the story behind Remus killing someone—justifiably. He wouldn't know that Remus has a new scar. Has he gotten any more in the time since? Is he okay? Is he safe? Is he…alive?

The last thought scares the hell out of him, honestly. It really, truly does, because there's no way for him to know, or find out, until he returns to the Hallow as a mentor. And that's what the rest of his life is going to be like. It's the life he chose, and it's one he would choose every time for Remus, but that doesn't make it any easier. It's still so fucking hard.

The only thing he can do is take it one day at a time, as Remus would say, and so he does. Some days are better than others, but every day, he misses Remus just the same.

Before dinner, James was in a good mood, but throughout dinner, he becomes more visibly dejected and subdued. Sirius doesn't often get angry with Regulus or James on the behalf of the other—he meant it when he promised to stay out of it—but there are some moments where he can't help it. This is one of them. He wants to go across the street and grab his stubborn, emotionally-stunted brother by the ear and drag him over here, just to put a smile back on James' face.

Sirius knows, in only the way a brother does, that Regulus loves James with everything he has in him. He has no doubts that one day, someday, Regulus will be ready to allow James to love him just the same. Very soon, likely, from what he's seen. Regulus is getting there. Slowly but surely, he and James are getting there.

It's just taking time, and sometimes, Sirius gets a little impatient when either of them get sad about the other, which is unfortunately a frequent occurrence.

Effie notices, too, because she discreetly ushers Sirius into helping her wash dishes while Monty goes to set up the screen and James begs off to have a shower. As soon as they're alone, she murmurs, "Did James have a bad day?"

"Not really," Sirius replies quietly. "A good one, mostly. It's just that Regulus said he'd think about coming over, but he must have decided not to, and James… Well."

"Ah," Effie says softly, getting it instantly. "Mm, well, maybe he just needs a bit more time. Regulus, I mean. He was always more cautious than you and James were, even as kids."

"Sometimes, I can barely even remember what we were all like as kids," Sirius confesses, swallowing. "Reggie, most of all. I do remember some things, but not…"

"Well, Regulus was…a quiet, shy child who turned bashful the moment I smiled at him. Such a gentle, gentle boy," Effie muses with a fond smile. "He grew into a gentle man."

Sirius stops and stares at her. "He—what? Regulus?"

"Yes," Effie confirms with a laugh. "Most wouldn't think so, but I know better. I watched him stand to his feet and tip himself into a river of blood in an act so tender that I'll never again be able to look at him with anything less than pure love. Every other member of the Black family, including you, fought and clawed their way home to their family, oftentimes to a family that never truly made them feel loved at all. Regulus? He fought and clawed through that arena, the entire time, for James. He's far more gentle than anyone gives him credit for."

"Oh," Sirius whispers, a lump forming in his throat. He swallows past it harshly and blinks rapidly, clearing his throat loudly. "I—I suppose I never really…thought about it like that."

"Gentle things are easily crushed. That's why they're packaged more carefully. Takes a bit longer to unwrap," Effie tells him with her special brand of wisdom that he's been fortunate enough to have in his life for a long time now. She smiles at him and reaches out to sweep her hand down his hair, leaning over to kiss his temple, then she goes back to washing dishes.

They're silent for a while, and he can hear the faint sounds of a shower going, along with the quiet sound of Rita Skeeter jabbering away from the screen. The past week, for the lead up into the Quarterly Memorial announcement, the previous hunger games were held in review for a refresher. Highlight reels from the arena, from the interview before and after, as well as Rita's constant commentary.

They haven't been watching them for obvious reasons, but they don't have much of a choice tonight.

Because of the Quarterly Memorial.

Sirius wasn't even born when the first Master of the Hallow was assassinated. Gellert Grindelwald, killed in his own castle only months after the 34th hunger games. He doesn't know much about it, only that the people in the districts had been hopeful that a change in leadership would bring good fortune to the districts.

It had not.

Tom Riddle was the next to become Master, and Sirius doesn't know much about that either, since it was before his time, but he does know that people were originally appalled by how young Riddle was when he came into power. Not even eighteen at the time, if Sirius has his facts correct, but while those in the district were upset, the Hallows loved him.

One of the first things he implemented was special games in memory of the previous Master of the Hallow. So, the 35th games were altered with a rule to allow the tributes reaped to pick volunteers to go in their stead, with the catch being that they could only pick from their own family.

The Hallows had loved the special games so much that Riddle announced it would be a quarterly event. Every twenty-five years, in memory of Gellert Grindelwald's lovely leadership, there would be a Quarterly Memorial. It was apparently a Victor from long ago who killed him, though no one knows who anymore, or what happened to them. Probably dead, Sirius would guess.

It's the Quarterly Memorial. They're notoriously worse than the usual games. Bloodier. Harder. More intense. Whatever rule Riddle comes up with—because it is his decision in the end, even if government officials and gamemakers get to vote or offer ideas—it will be brutal. It will be hard on the tributes, yes, but it will be hard on the mentors, too.

It's going to be hard on Sirius.

"What do you think the rule will be?" Sirius can't help but ask, his voice small, his heart picking up the pace in fear.

"I don't know," Effie says quietly. She washes a plate and stares straight ahead, her gaze distant like she's looking into the past and existing there, too.

Regulus has come to the conclusion that staring at a door and thinking about knocking on it isn't the same thing as actually knocking. He's not sure why it's so hard to do, but he's really struggling to even just lift his hand. The first step, and he's somehow managing to fuck that up.

Well, no, the first step was actually showing up on time, but he fucked that up, too. It was his fault. He's not sure why it mattered to him so much what he wore, and he didn't expect it to, or maybe he would have gotten dressed earlier than he did. But he wasn't aware that it would send him into a mild crisis in which he dumped basically his entire closet out, changed at least six times, then somehow ended up on the floor with his head between his knees, trying not to cry because he realized he was already late and still hadn't found clothes that made him feel presentable enough to show up in the first place.

He has no idea why, other than the fact that he cares what James thinks of him, which is so stupid, because James has quite literally seen him look his worst and that didn't stop him from feeling for Regulus as he does.

So, Regulus was late to dinner and decided just to not go, since he was already late, but then he kept thinking about how James really did seem to want him to come, and honestly, Regulus really wanted to go. The more he thought about it, the more the desire settled within him, because he really doesn't want to watch the Quarterly Memorial announcement alone.

He'd also like to choose to be there for Sirius at least once in his life, and it's Sirius who's really going to be needing the support tonight, seeing as the announcement will affect him the most. So, Regulus talked himself back into going.

And now he can't figure out how to knock, and the door won't just magically open for him, so he's in a bit of a—

The door proceeds to magically open without any prompting whatsoever, and Monty blinks at him while holding a bag of rubbish in his hand, clearly about to walk out and toss it in the large bin at the corner of his property.

Regulus blinks back.

"Oh," Monty says. "Hey, Regulus."

"Hello, Monty," Regulus replies weakly, his entire face immediately getting hot. Oh, for fuck's sake, this is mortifying.

"Coming in?" Monty asks. "You just missed dinner, but I could make up a plate for you if you want."

"Oh, ah, thank you, but I ate," Regulus admits sheepishly, because he did indeed smash down two sandwiches before leaving his house so he wouldn't put them out by being late for dinner, and yes, he did almost cry about the crumbs that got on his shirt, and he was also sure that his parents were rolling over in their—well, they didn't get graves, so their metaphorical graves, then, for how he slammed those sandwiches back with no manners whatsoever.

"Alright, come on in," Monty says agreeably, stepping back to let him slip inside. As soon as he does, his lips twitch as he tilts his head and calls up the stairs, "James, hurry up in the shower, Regulus is here!"

"WHAT? HE IS?!" is the shout that drifts back down, followed by a series of loud thumps and muffled cursing.

Monty chuckles quietly, then looks at Regulus fondly. "My poor child. Alright, I'll be back. Sirius is in the kitchen with Euphemia if you want to go see him."

"Thank you," Regulus mumbles, and Monty winks at him before carrying on what he was doing.

Before Regulus can even take one step, Sirius' head pokes out the kitchen doorway. He blinks. "Reggie?"

"No, a figment of your imagination. An illusion, if you will."

"High chances of that, actually, with the horrors my brain likes to cook up."

"I'm not sure why your brain would have to cook anything up when all you'd have to do is look in the mirror."

Sirius opens his mouth like he's about to respond, but he snaps it shut again as Effie appears in the doorway, smiling as she says, "Hungry, dear? I can make a plate for you."

"I ate, but thank you," Regulus replies quickly, still embarrassed about missing dinner as it is. He's pretty sure he'd die from the humiliation if she fed him now.

"Would you like some tea?" Effie offers. "It's a bit nippy out, isn't it? Or, oh, we could do hot cocoa."

"Yes!" Sirius blurts out. "Yes, Regulus, would love hot cocoa, because Sirius would also love hot cocoa."

Regulus' lips twitch. "Tea is fine."

Sirius scowls, and Effie chuckles as she waves them both into the kitchen. Regulus relents and agrees to hot cocoa when Effie offers again, which makes Sirius stop grumbling under his breath. Regulus stands off to the side and watches in silence as Effie and Sirius work together to make the drinks, moving fluidly around each other with a familiarity that Regulus himself has never had with—anyone, honestly.

Effie chats with him a bit, asks him to pass her a mug or two, scolds Sirius when he squirts cream directly into his mouth, and it's—nice. He feels on the outside of it, but he feels on the outside of a lot of things, and he thinks he always will. Most of the time, he doesn't even mind. This is one of those instances where he's okay with it, where it's almost comforting just to flutter on the sidelines and watch, where he's not envious or yearning at all, just happy to bear witness.

James appears in the doorway with a mess of damp hair and bright eyes, only getting brighter the moment they land on Regulus. He inhales sharply, audibly, then holds it for a long moment before he exhales all at once and eases his way into the kitchen. His cane thunks lightly with his every step, a rhythm that somehow, inexplicably, feels like music in Regulus' chest, a beat that leaves him breathless.

"Reg," James greets happily, his gaze warm, pleased. Regulus likes it, that look in his eyes, that simple joy in seeing him.

"James," Regulus murmurs, his heart giving a quiet, yet no less happy little hello in return.

"You're late," James says, but it's teasing, no true displeasure in his tone at all. He props up against the counter next to Regulus, leaning over on it, turning to give Regulus his full attention. His glasses are a little fogged up from the swift temperature change from, Regulus presumes, the steamy shower and the slightest chill in the kitchen.

"Ah, yes, I was—" Regulus opens and closes his mouth, his mind completely blank, but he refuses to tell James that he's so late because he literally couldn't decide what to wear. "Yes, well, I'm here now. Sorry I missed dinner."

James hums. "That's alright. You are here now. Hungry, though? I can make a plate for you."

"No, I ate, but thank you," Regulus says, fighting a smile. Potters. They're all the same.

"Effie can't leave him empty-handed, though, so we get hot cocoa!" Sirius announces brightly, looking utterly delighted as he cups his mug between his palms.

"Regulus, I'm going to have to ask you to come over more often," James says, eagerly holding his hands out with a grin, and Sirius laughs as he sits his own mug down to pass over one to James, then one more for Regulus.

Effie isn't very discreet about ushering herself and Sirius from the kitchen shortly after that, though that's partially just because Sirius doesn't realize that's what she's doing, so he keeps failing to miss her cues, and she finally just swats him gently on the shoulder and practically drags him out of the room. Regulus blushes behind his mug of hot cocoa, trying to hide, and for once, James looks just as flustered as him.

"Sorry about—" James coughs and waves a hand sheepishly, sitting his mug down and reaching up to scratch at the side of his head in a nervous gesture. "I don't want you to feel ambushed. I wasn't—I mean, this really was about having you over for the Quarterly Memorial announcement, not to get stuck with me or anything."

"I don't feel ambushed," Regulus assures him. "Or stuck."

"Oh. Good," James breathes out, visibly relieved. He relaxes a bit, reaching out to grab his drink and sip on it, all of his nerves seeming to fall away from him at once. That means it's with complete sincerity that he says, "I'm happy you're here."

"Me too," Regulus whispers.

And he is, that's the thing. He's so fucking happy that he's here right now; next to James, close to James, looking at James, being fortunate enough to exist at the same time as James. It feels so unbearably, inexplicably good just to be near him, to be with him. It makes Regulus happy. So happy.

It also makes him feel like he's going to fall to pieces, but not in the way it used to. He wasn't able to stand being touched before, and now that's all he wants James to do. Touch him. Just touch him. Please, please touch him. However he wants to, however he will, Regulus doesn't care. He craves James' hands on him with a desperation he never thought he'd reach again, after the arena, but here he is, and he hasn't forgotten.

He hasn't forgotten what it is to long for James. He still knows what it is to want him so badly that he'd be willing to kneel at the altar of James Potter and beg; he'd drop down on his hands and knees and crawl if that's what it took, if that would prove his devotion. He is the manifestation of longing built up with nowhere to go, and he craves, he yearns, he covets.

It has been building into this, slowly, especially since he started letting James into his house every day, but he's sure of it now. Every time he gets in the same room with James, all he wants is for James to touch him, and maybe never stop.

The scars—well, it has reached a point where Regulus is almost sure he's going to have to let James see them, and the plan is to beg him to just get used to them really fast and keep his comments to himself and pretend he doesn't see Regulus any differently than he always has. Because, honestly? Regulus' libido has caught up to him, along with his willingness to do something about it, and James can barely breathe in his direction without it invoking this carnal, desperate need to fuck until they can't move.

The insane thing about all of this is that Regulus could literally just…have it. All of it. Anything. If he asked, James would touch him. He knows that.

It's the asking part that's difficult.

He thinks it a lot, as loud as possible. Please touch me, he'll think on repeat, staring at James and almost wishing that James could just read his mind. Oh, if James could read his mind, even he would probably be stunned—possibly even a little horrified—by the absolute tirade of pure filth that has barged in and out of Regulus' head in this last week alone.

James quite literally can't do anything without Regulus wanting to rip his clothes off and jump his bones. But, most of all, he just wants James' hands on him, the weight and warmth of them pressed into him all over, anywhere, please.

Sadly, James seems utterly oblivious to this fact, which is honestly a bit of a letdown, because if he knew, then he'd make it happen for them. Regulus knows he would.

Regulus is honestly doing his best to find some way to convey this to James, but he can't think of how. He knows that just saying it is an option, except literally every time he tries, the words legitimately won't form. He's considered writing a letter or poem, but the idea of actually letting James see into his head like that is—oh, no, he's ready for some things, but not that, not yet. Maybe someday, but he's aware of himself enough to know that it would take time for him to build up to that.

So, really, he knows no other form of communicating his desires without just waiting for James to either notice, or just get brazen enough to act on his own, while Regulus gets to happily participate.

It never even crosses his mind that he can just—do it himself, until after they've finished their cocoa in comfortable silence, and James turns to take his mug to the sink. Regulus trails behind him automatically, only for James to turn right back around very abruptly and say, "Ah, shit, let me take yours, too, if you're—" and get no further, because Regulus literally just bumps directly into him. Like, right into his chest. He even bounces off a little with a blink, because James is…firm.

"Oh, sorry," James starts, and again, he doesn't finish, because Regulus is still so close to him, with his free hand on James' arm, and he's staring at it with fixed intensity as he realizes all at once that he can touch. He flexes his fingers on James' arm, like testing the theory, and James sits his mug down next to Regulus' with a dull thunk, not saying a word. Regulus is very aware of the fact that James is holding his breath right now.

Oh, hello, I'm home again, Regulus thinks, or maybe he just feels it, always feeling whenever James is close to him, under his fingertips. So close, and still, not close enough. Regulus wants him closer. He wants to be closer.

It's simultaneously so easy and not easy at all to slide his hand up James' arm and step forward to press up against him once more, and he doesn't realize he's holding his breath as well until it escapes him on a sharp, shaky sigh the moment he sags into the warmth James carries around with him wherever he goes. It's been months since the last time Regulus was in his arms, all the way back in the Hallow, and it's been too long. Regulus slips his arm up to link around the back of James' neck, then does the same with his other one, his eyes fluttering shut as he melts into him all at once.

"Reg?" James mumbles, not moving, not returning the embrace at all. His hands hang by his sides, waiting.

"You can, James. You can touch me. Please," Regulus replies, not meaning for the last word to tumble out of his mouth, but it does, and he can't take it back now. He's not so sure that he would anyway, because as soon as it falls from his lips, James' arms fly up to wrap around him, instantly, earnestly.

It's different here, like this, in James' kitchen with no one else around, just them, no prying eyes and no expectations. It's different after time, after they've had time to adjust, after they've reached a point where trying isn't a daunting task they could drown in, but a glowing possibility that they're eager to jump into the deep-end of. James would have never let him drown, he knows that; he didn't, after all, but it was never about that; it was always about Regulus needing to learn to swim on his own. Regulus can swim now. He's ready to.

"You're shaking," James whispers, his hand gently sweeping up and down Regulus' back.

"I'm—I'm really happy at the moment," Regulus chokes out, then tucks his face down into James' shoulder when he realizes that, rather pathetically, he's crying.

James, the pure soul that he is, doesn't call attention to it, or ask any questions. He just holds Regulus in a sure grip and continues to stroke his back, letting Regulus sob, letting Regulus shake, and letting Regulus settle.

"Remember that time I told you I was going to keep hoping for us?" James asks quietly.

"I remember," Regulus croaks.

"I still am," James says. Regulus releases a hoarse, choked laugh and clings to him even harder. James presses a fleeting kiss to the side of his head, to his hair, and Regulus practically goes limp against him. He nearly whines. "I think, now more than ever, I have reason to hope. Don't I? Do I?"

"Yes," Regulus breathes. "Yes, you do. You always have."

James exhales explosively and tightens his arms around him, and they stand there like that for a while. It's an embrace, but it's also so much more than that, too. It's the beginning of something that they're sure they'll actually get to have.

James settles in next to Sirius while Regulus does the same on the other side of him. In the middle, Sirius swings his head between them, finally settling on looking at James, because Regulus is pretending he doesn't even exist. Sirius arches an eyebrow at James, and James bites down on the inside of his cheek as hard as he can, but it still doesn't stop the grin that breaks out across his face. Sirius snorts and looks away.

Alright, so maybe James is walking on clouds at the moment, but he's chill. Really, he's being so normal about this, if you ignore the fact that literally every part of him is tingling and his arms feel permanently warped to the shape of Regulus' body. He's pretty sure he's about to start floating.

That feeling fades when Monty unmutes the screen when Rita shows up on it, the previous clip of Regulus and James curled up together in a cave thankfully fading away. Rita is smiling as she says, "And now, a special message from the Master of the Hallow himself."

"Thank you, Rita," Riddle murmurs as soon as he's on the screen, staring right into the camera. He seems to be at a desk, his hands threaded casually together on top. There's a cordial smile on his face, and his eyes—usually so empty—gleam with an unspoken pleasure that makes James' heart sink in his chest. "As with each Quarterly Memorial, I'd like to take a brief moment of silence to remember the fallen Master I take great pride in having as a predecessor."

Sirius scoffs and mutters, "Well, fuck that," then proceeds to chatter throughout the entire moment of silence, in an overly cheerful tone that has them all cracking up helplessly. He does fall silent again when Riddle raises his head to speak.

"Fifty years ago, we had the very first hunger games with an altered rule, and the Quarterly Memorial was born," Riddle explains. "Every twenty-five years following the first altered games, we have the Quarterly Memorial to remember the previous Master that was taken from us too soon, a special event in his honor that, were he alive today, I believe he would be truly honored by."

"He sounds charming," James says flatly, and Sirius snorts derisively, crossing his arms. He's tense, his jaw set.

"He wasn't," Monty murmurs. "Grindelwald, I mean. I was still very young when he was assassinated, but I remember my parents being relieved by the news. Grindelwald was young, twenty-six years old, I believe. He'd been a Master for eight years before he died. Very young when he took up the role, and yet, Riddle was even younger."

"Wait, so who was the Master before Grindelwald?" James asks, blinking over at his dad. He's never thought to ask about this, or even care, because he was still a baby when the previous Quarterly Memorial happened. His mum was a mentor, though. Maybe he should know this.

"There wasn't one," Monty says. "The first twenty-six hunger games weren't…what they are now. The Hallow used to be a democracy, long ago, run by a council of people instead of just one, but Grindelwald somehow managed to change that, and with it, the hunger games themselves. It used to be…"

"My parents said they weren't celebrations," Effie announces quietly. "There was no reaping from the districts. People couldn't volunteer. It was—at first, it was just people thrown out on a field with weapons and told to kill each other, or they'd be killed. It wasn't…adored, if that makes sense. There was no way they could spin it to make it desirable to watch, but apparently Grindelwald turned it into what it is now."

"Hat's off to whoever took him out, then," Sirius declares firmly. "I hope that fucker isn't resting in peace, actually. I'd love to take Riddle out, too."

Like he's heard the threat, Riddle looks straight into the camera and shuts it down with one simple announcement.

"This year," Riddle continues calmly, "in memory of Gellert Grindelwald—who was unjustly murdered by a Victor—to remind all Victors that their crimes against the Hallow will not go unpunished, it has been decided that this year's tributes will be reaped from the existing Victors in each district."

It takes James a second to get what that means, honestly. He's not sure why, but it's so unfathomable to him that he literally can't make sense of what Riddle has just said. Existing Victors in each district. Reaped from the existing—

James' ears ring.

Riddle is still speaking on the screen, though what he's saying, James couldn't say. He can't hear past the loud pitch in his head that's slowly, steadily getting louder. He's just staring at the screen, watching Riddle's mouth move, and then Rita comes on the screen next, staring wide-eyed at the camera.

The screen abruptly goes black.

"Fleamont," Effie croaks, but Monty is already out of his chair, flinging the remote at the wall so hard that it flies apart and crumbles to the floor in pieces. It leaves a dent in the wall.

"No. No, not—not again. Not—" Monty chokes off and ducks his head forward before leaving the room altogether, marching up the steps. A door slams in the distance, and then another one slams much closer.

James looks over, and Regulus is gone.

The moment Sirius processed what that rule meant, he was gone. It was instant. A switch flipped, and he slipped away.

He doesn't know how long he's been gone for when he makes it back, but he's not in the same place he was. He's in the kitchen, sitting next to James, while Effie paces back and forth in complete silence. Sirius blinks and looks over to James, who is visibly shaken, the whites of his eyes shown in blatant fear as he watches his mother's every move. Sirius glances around, but Monty isn't here, and neither is Regulus.

"Where's Regulus?" Sirius demands instantly, starting to push to his feet.

"I'm quite sure that he went home," Effie murmurs, coming to a sudden stop and facing them both. "Sit down, Sirius. There's something I need to say before you go to him."

Sirius sits down, despite every instinct screaming at him to go to his little brother right now. James—he has Effie and Monty, and of course he has Sirius as well, but Regulus? He has no one right now, and he needs Sirius. He has to. Sirius needs Regulus to need him, because he needs Regulus, too.

"No volunteering," Effie declares sharply. James and Sirius both go still at the same time, and she clenches her jaw. "No volunteering, not for me, am I understood?"

"Mum," James whispers.

"Neither of you will volunteer in my place if my name is called," Effie tells them, each word precise and blunt, allowing no room for argument. Sirius stares at her in horror, because it's just now fully hitting him that Effie could be—she could—

Sirius has spent so long thinking of her as a mentor that he hasn't thought about how she's a Victor, too, in the lineup just like the rest of them. Sirius has spent so long thinking of her as a mother that he hasn't prepared himself to ever lose her, because a true mother isn't someone you can bear to lose.

"If your names are called, I will be volunteering to go in your place," Effie continues shamelessly, "and—no, do not interrupt me, James Potter—"

"That's not fair, Mum!" James bursts out anyway, nearly coming out of his chair. "You can't just—just tell us we're not allowed to volunteer for you, but turn around and say you're going to volunteer for us!"

"I can, and I am. Sit down," Effie snaps, and James slumps back into his chair. She stares him down. "You are my son, and I am your mother. I'm your mother, so I will—"

"You're not mine," Sirius says softly, then almost immediately shrinks back when Effie's eyes cut to him, cut into him, bright and blazing in a way he's never seen before. Fierce.

"I am," Effie informs him, her tone clipped, and though they've never actually said it out loud before, he knows this already. "You're my child, and I will volunteer in your place, if that's what it comes to."

Sirius swallows. "I can't let you do that, Effie."

"You can't stop me, and won't," Effie says simply, her gaze darting between Sirius and James. "I will volunteer for any of you, and I will see to it that whoever I go into that arena with makes it home, do you understand? And I will not hear a word of protest from either of you. And neither of you will volunteer if it's my name that gets called. Promise me. Now. Both of you." They don't speak, and she slams her hand down on the counter, making them jolt. "Promise me."

"Mum—"

"Now, James."

James' eyes sink shut, and his breath shudders out of him all at once. "I promise."

"Sirius?" Effie demands.

"I promise," Sirius whispers.

Effie sweeps her gaze between them, then exhales heavily and leans back. "Good. Now, if you'll excuse me, I have to go console my husband."

With that and nothing else, Effie sweeps out of the room, straight-backed and stiff, her lips pressed into a thin line as she goes. Sirius and James are silent for a long moment, and then they look at each other, and that's all it takes.

"No," Sirius says instantly. "Let me do it, James."

"She's my mum," James retorts.

"You heard her; she's mine, too. She's—James, she was my mentor. I—I wouldn't even be here if it wasn't for her," Sirius chokes out. "Please just—please don't—"

"I'm not letting her go back," James grits out, "and I'm not letting you take her place, Sirius. I'm just not."

Sirius sets his shoulders and narrows his eyes. "Well, you better hope you're faster than me, because the moment her name is called, if it is, I'm volunteering."

"And abandon your brother?" James asks coldly, holding his gaze.

"Ah," Sirius breathes out, feeling like he's just been punched directly in the gut. His brain slams into a brick wall, suddenly, because oh, right, Regulus is a Victor, too.

Regulus.

His little brother.

Always his little brother.

James swallows harshly. "I'm sorry. That was—I shouldn't have said that. I—"

"Fuck you, James, truly," Sirius croaks, fumbling to push his chair back and get to his feet, his eyes stinging as the tears build and a lump forms in his throat. He's struggling to breathe. His heart is crumbling. Both sensations are at war with each other, and he's shaking all over, and he wants Remus. He misses Remus. "Why would you—how could you say that? Fuck you. Fuck you. Why—"

"Sirius, wait, wait," James whispers frantically, surging forward to catch his arm, wide-eyed. "I—I didn't—I didn't mean that. I'm just—I'm scared, alright? I'm scared, and I'm sorry. I don't want her to go back, I don't want him to go back, and I don't want you to go back. I'm sorry. I'm so sorry."

And, finally, it hits Sirius that James, too, is a Victor. He's known, of course, but each option settles in fully at some point, and somehow, James sinks in last.

Not James, he thinks desperately. Not James, not James, not—

"Sirius?" James mumbles, his voice trembling like a small child, so much remorse in his eyes that it hurts. Sirius knows James didn't mean to hurt him; he was just trying to be the one to take his mother's place, another way to keep Sirius out of it.

Except there is no keeping Sirius out of it, or Regulus, or Effie, or James. There are four options, two names called, and six different ways this could go, not including all the ways in which they could reach those ways if volunteering comes into play. Two people won't be going back into the arena, which means that Sirius can take Effie's place, or James', or Regulus', but one of the others will still be with him anyway.

"No volunteering," Sirius whispers, and James' eyes go wide. Sirius forces himself to exhale. "Promise me you won't volunteer for me, James. If it's my name—"

"You can't ask that of me," James croaks, his eyes visibly filming with tears. "You can't—"

"I can and I am," Sirius counters, and James pulls his hand away, his throat bobbing harshly, up and down. "I will never, ever be able to live with myself if you did, do you understand? The guilt—James, if the arena didn't kill me, that would."

James opens and closes his mouth, then rasps, "Sirius—"

"It'll kill me. You'll kill me. I'm—I need you not to. I need you to promise me you won't," Sirius insists.

"What about—" James' voice catches, cracking in his throat loudly. "What about Regulus?"

"I don't know," Sirius murmurs. "I have to go talk to him. I'm going to make him promise, too. But I'm here with you right now, and I'm not leaving until you promise."

"You have to promise, too, " James tells him, holding his gaze steadily. "If I'm promising, then you have to promise not to volunteer for me. And mean it. You have to mean it."

That sits between them for a long moment, a heavy one where something unfathomable passes between them, a simple joint understanding of how much it hurts to be in this position. How impossible it is to be stuck here, incapable of splitting themselves apart to protect and save everyone around them, both wishing to do the same exact thing. It's agonizing, looking at one another with the impulse to shield each other; it's just as awful to look at each other and see the echoed desperation to shield the same people that aren't them. Effie and Regulus, they share that between them, here and now, like one of the worst secrets they've ever heard.

To not volunteer goes against their nature in every capacity. Sirius has already done it once, and he would do it again three more times for each of them. James has also done it once, in his own way, planning to die to get Regulus home from the arena, though that thankfully went in a better direction. Sirius has the feeling that there's no escaping this, not this time.

They are helpless creatures trapped in the jaws of life, no way out, no way to get free. They can't do this, and yet, they have no choice. This is what it is, and Sirius can only think about how it would affect him, how it would genuinely kill him, if James went into that arena in his place. He wouldn't survive it, and he knows it would change him irrevocably. He knows it would be the worst thing James could ever do to him.

And he knows that, to do it in reverse, would be the exact same for James. It would ruin him. So, Sirius swallows as he blinks harshly and says, "I promise, James."

"Okay," James breathes out, blinking hard and fast, not even seeming to notice the tears that spill from his eyes. "Okay, then I—I promise, too. No volunteering for each other."

"I have to go," Sirius whispers, his vision blurring, and James nods before dropping his head into hands. Sirius wants to comfort him, but he has to get to Regulus and get this handled; he has to drag a promise out of him, too.

He leaves James there, just like that, weeping quietly.

Sirius is sitting at Regulus' kitchen table with two full glasses of whiskey—the fine sort of stuff Orion always liked to keep on hand—when Regulus makes it home.

In the aftermath of the announcement, Regulus just—ran. He didn't know where he was going until he ended up at the tree out on the edge of the mayor's property. He thinks he was crying when he got there. He thinks he screamed. He knows he threw himself at that tree over and over, desperately trying to climb it, scrambling for purchase at the bark and repeatedly slipping down until he ended up in a heap on the ground, biting his own arm so hard that he drew blood.

He swallowed it—as if, after all this time, he's still trying to survive. It's not a taste he's forgotten. He vomited right after and wished, pathetically, that he just died in that river.

But he didn't. He's still here and there's still more to endure. He couldn't do anything about it, so he picked himself up and came home, where Sirius has clearly been waiting for him.

Regulus looks at him and remembers being a baby-faced, freshly fifteen year old boy stepping out to the center of the courtyard the first time he was reaped, only for his older brother to come stumbling out, his voice a desperate plea when he volunteered in his place.

It's been nearly eleven years, and what was the point? What was the point of any of it? Look at them. Here they are. Every choice they made, even that young, led them right to here.

Regulus moves forward and sits down in the chair across from Sirius, who picks up the full glass closest to him. He holds it the same lazy way their father always did, but Regulus would never tell him that. He'd hold it differently if he knew, and something about the sight comforts Regulus, even now.

Together, they drink in silence, just looking at each other. Regulus wonders which of them will break first. He isn't expecting it to be him, but it is.

"You can't do it again," Regulus rasps, his throat raw and sore, his whole body aching. "I nearly didn't forgive you last time, and I won't this time."

"Regulus," Sirius says softly.

"You can't do it again, Sirius," Regulus whispers, his voice small, a desperate, pleading note to it. He is exposing himself, cracking himself open in front of his brother, bared to him and vulnerable. "Please don't volunteer for me again. Please."

Sirius' eyes flutter shut, and he presses the glass against his forehead, his face twisted up. The moment stretches between them, and Regulus' heart thumps harder with each passing second that Sirius doesn't respond. Regulus hasn't felt terror like this since he was fifteen, particularly this type of terror, the gripping fear of knowing that he will be to blame for everything Sirius suffers, just as he always has been.

Every ounce of Sirius' pain can be sourced back to one place. One person. Regulus. Even as a child, all the hits he took for him, all the punishments he volunteered to have so Regulus wouldn't, all the abuse he carried so Regulus didn't have to. And the arena, where Sirius spilled blood and took lives in his name, where his life was wrecked and altered, where he bore wounds and scars and tragedy just so Regulus could live.

"Sirius. Sirius," Regulus chokes out, borderline frantic now, and he doesn't mean to come out of his chair, but that's what happens. There he goes, swinging around the table to crouch down beside Sirius' chair and press shaking hands to his arm lying on the table, tugging on his sleeve like he's nothing more than a child again. "Look at me. Look at me, Sirius, please."

Sirius squeezes his eyes shut tighter, his throat convulsing on a harsh swallow. When he exhales, it comes out stuttered and heavy, like it's being slammed out of his lungs. He opens his eyes, swivels his head, and looks at Regulus.

"What if—"

"No. No, we're not talking about anything else, any other possibilities. We're talking about this. About what happens if my name gets called. Promise me, Sirius."

Again, Sirius doesn't respond. He remains unmoved, no crack in his expression at all. He was like this when he was in the arena, when he was in pain, when he was fighting for his life.

"You can't do it again. Please don't do it again, don't take my place again, because I—I—" I love you, I love you, I love you, too, Regulus thinks, trying to force the words out, but they don't come. He can barely breathe. "I won't be able to forgive you this time, Sirius, if you do. Everything that we just got back, everything we work together to have every single day, all of that will be gone. We'll lose each other again. You'll lose me. So, please, just—just choose to keep me this time. Please."

And there. A tiny splinter in his expression. Sorrow blooming in his eyes. Sirius chokes out a harsh breath, sits his glass down with a thunk, and releases a strangled, "Okay."

"Okay?" Regulus repeats, shaking so hard that he can barely balance in place, so much residual fear in him that he doesn't feel capable of experiencing what it is to be safe ever again.

"Okay," Sirius confirms, shakily, nodding jerkily. "I promise, Reggie."

Regulus wheezes out a deep breath of relief, and he ducks his head forward to press his face against Sirius' arm, whispering over and over, "Thank you, thank you, thank you."

Sirius cups the back of his head for a moment, his palm a warm weight of comfort that makes Regulus' eyes sting. For a beat, they both stay there, just like that, and then Sirius tugs on his hair to get him to lift his head. He holds Regulus' gaze and demands, "Now, you. Your turn. Promise me the same."

This time, it's Regulus who remains silent. The thing is, he never even thought about it, the mere chance that Sirius' name would be called. Sirius' name has never been called. The idea that it could be this time, for the first time, is absolutely unfathomable to Regulus. His mind can't even conceptualize it, what that would sound like, what that would be like.

"Regulus," Sirius says sharply, so sharp that Regulus can hear their mother in his voice.

The worst part is, Regulus didn't think about it. His mind was too full of other things, other fears, other concerns. But it could happen. That's a reality he doesn't know how to face, that Sirius' name could be called, and Regulus is supposed to just—what, remain silent? Do nothing? Not even return the favor? Sirius did it for him. Regulus should—he should—

"If you can't promise, then I don't either," Sirius declares, dropping his hand down from Regulus' hair to grip his shoulder and shake him a bit. "Do you understand what I'm saying, Regulus? This has to be an equal exchange. I need you to promise me, and you better not fucking lie when you do."

Right. Because of course this is how it has to work, for any of this to work. Regulus recognizes this, what it is to put in effort and demand the same from one another, because they've spent a year doing just that. They've spent a year trying so hard, working together to reach this point, and now they have to fight every instinct to let it come crumbling down again.

So, he breathes in, and out, and he fights. He looks up at Sirius, looks at him and sinks into that juvenile little brother's belief that Sirius' name won't be called, and he nods. He swallows and says, "Okay."

"Promise?" Sirius asks.

"I promise," Regulus whispers. It feels like his greatest sin.

"You know I love you, right?" Sirius asks, his voice cracking, the words soft as a feather, yet weighing so heavy with endless sincerity packed into it, coming straight from the heart.

Regulus turns his head away, feeling the tears fall, and all he can bring himself to say is, "I know," because after all this time, after everything they've been through, he does.

I love you, too, Regulus thinks.

Even now, the words never leave his head.

Chapter End Notes

...sigh 😔 ah, shit, Here We Go Again...

and it started off so well, too 😭😭😭 well, sort of. i mean there was the (complicated) grief that regulus and sirius were dealing with for their parents, and the differences in that for them always interests me. also the (brief) wedge it drove between them.

but with time (a five month time jump, sorry about the time jumps btw, but it was Necessary For the Plot), they both got better, and god, regulus made SO MUCH progress in that time period, despite the minor setback. like the fact that his house was becoming a home, and he was having tea (cough tea dates cough) with james every day... LIKE HE WAS READY!!! HE MADE THE FIRST MOVE!!! HE!!! 😭 just the fact that, like, they were so fucking close, but never close enough. i hate myself. like that moment in the kitchen was literally them being like: okay we're gonna do this. and like, THEY WOULD HAVE. if the announcement had been anything else, they would have been trading love confessions and fucking THAT NIGHT!!! james would have probably done something ridiculous like proposed on the spot, and regulus would have matched his energy and immediately said yes. LIKE THEY WERE READY FOR THE LONG-HAUL!!! I AM PUNCHING THE AIR SO HARD RIGHT NOW anyway, let's talk about the whole Quarterly Memorial thing. it was only mentioned once a few chapters ago and a few people clocked it and were like 😳🤔😒 about it, so those of you who saw it, cookies for you!

but yeah, the backstory with like grindelwald and dumbledore killing him is like. it's LITERALLY the catalyst to them all ending up Right Here. the Quarterly Memorial would not exist if not for dumbledore, in more ways than one...

anyway, monty immediately losing his shit when he heard the announcement hit so hard... and then effie stating outright that she's going to volunteer... just. FUCK. it's so upsetting :(

the way regulus ran away. like the first thing he did was run to that tree 😭😭😭 STOP MY LOVE COME HERE LET ME HUG YOU. and like the way this whole announcement just brought out these intense, harsh, sometimes ugly feelings—and how that was translated through james especially, who is never harsh and has a heart of gold and would never purposefully hurt sirius, and then he says exactly what he knows will cut the deepest bc he's scared and trying to protect EVERYONE. just. that shit hurt so bad.

how sirius and james made their promises and it was almost... i mean, they're best friends, they Get Each Other, and it was literally like, they're so similar in their desire to do the same thing, and they're aware to do that to each other would be absolutely destructive to their entire relationship in any capacity. so it was literally like, relieving each other of that pressure but also just grieving in Having To Let Go Of That, bc they both want to do the same thing for too many people. it's so hard, and like, there IS no solution other than agreeing not to volunteer for each other.

regulus and sirius are—different, in that it's not an isolated event. sirius has already done it once, so regulus NEEDS him not to do it again. that scene where he's like, begging and promising never to forgive him. fucking devastating. everyone turn your heads to moonymoment (blurryayse on tumblr aka jude, my judebug, light of my life, the person this fic belongs to above all—jude, you bitch, you better be reading this while im over here waxing poetic about you). they are partially responsible for that scene between sirius and regulus at the end, and also for some future stuff, ill explain in the next chapter notes more, but they deserve a lot of credit for A LOT of angst in the next chapter especially, so if you're throwing tomatoes at me, aim at her as well! (not really tho i will defend jude with my life)

HONORABLE MENTIONS:

-james being Pavloved into loving bagels (this will turn into angst later)
-james thinking knives are sexy
-sirius giving james a piggyback!!!

-effie calling regulus a gentle man 😭
-sirius still talking to the moon every night :(
-regulus having "what do i wear" anxiety (he's so real)
-monty yelling that regulus is there and james immediately Freaking Out (yes, he slipped in the shower from excitement)
-regulus healing, but the fact that he's horny for james being his Biggest Breakthrough 😭
-the drowning metaphor and also "regulus can swim now" 😭
-james still hoping for him and regulus all that time
-effie telling sirius he's her son
-regulus tugging on sirius' sleeve like a little kid :(

yeah, that should be it. feel free to scream in the comments, and like. strap in. things are back to being fucking insane from here on out for a whileee

EDIT: i still to this day get comments asking about narcissa and bellatrix being included in the reaping. just read the next chapter. it's answered there.

On Regulus' twenty-sixth birthday, James shows up at his door not with a flower, but with a hat.

A very, very old hat with a fluffy ball on top that used to have a working bell in it, but no longer does. Regulus hasn't seen it in literally eleven years, down to the exact day.

It's cold outside, there's a blanket of snow on the ground, and James stands there with a hat he kept for eleven years like all the years in between haven't changed a thing.

But they have.

Everything is different now.

It's been hard for them since the announcement. For a solid week, James didn't leave his house—didn't leave his parents' sides, and Monty has been a mess, according to Sirius—and Regulus was in basically the same predicament. Even if James had bothered to come, Regulus wouldn't have gotten out of the bed to let him inside. The only reason he got out of bed when he finally did was because Barty coaxed him out.

Eventually, James did show back up with a flower, and Regulus didn't answer the door, or let him in. He let the flower die on his stoop, but James just replaced that one, too.

Regulus was angry that he was still fucking trying. No matter how this goes, their chance—it's gone. Regulus made the mistake of thinking that they'd actually get to have it, what they wanted, only to have it ripped from him immediately after. He couldn't understand how James could bear it, could bear to still bring him flowers, to still hope when there's no fucking hope left for them. He was so, so angry.

That passed, too. Slipped away into simple resignation and overwhelming regret. Shifted and morphed into a sharp pulse of purpose in his chest, because before everything falls apart, he wants every flower he can get.

Once he started taking them again, he opened his door to let James in, and they had a very, very difficult conversation.

"You can't volunteer for me," Regulus had said. It was the first thing he said. It was what needed to be said, the very thing sitting between them, a topic they hadn't yet broached.

It was a fight. Sort of. James was mostly just begging, so close to some inner collapse, wanting to shut the conversation down and turn away from it. Angry that Regulus would demand it from him. A promise, one he would honor, one he would look Regulus in the eye and mean.

Regulus, stubborn as he is, wouldn't let it go. Even when James cried. Even when he reached for him and begged. He stood right there and broke James open to reach into the depths of him and carve out the promise he needed. He got it.

And, when James demanded the same from him, Regulus eased himself into James' arms, hid his face against James' shoulder, and returned it. He promised, too, his eyes shut and his heart breaking. It was the last time they spoke, the last time they touched, because Regulus didn't open the door again to let him in until today.

And now, here they are. James standing on his doorstep with a hat, and Regulus standing across from him, wanting to let him in, wanting him so badly he can't breathe around it.

"I—I just thought you'd like this back now," James croaks, anxiously flexing his fingers around the hat in his hands. "I know you don't want to see me—"

"I do," Regulus cuts in. "I do want to see you, James."

James looks like he might cry. "You do?"

"I miss you," Regulus whispers.

James starts crying immediately. Instantly. His expression crumbles, and he ducks his head with a heaving sob. He stands there and breaks down all at once, and Regulus feels the splinters in his heart get wider.

"James," Regulus says softly. "James, come inside."

"Okay, y-yeah, okay," James chokes out, stumbling forward with the hat pressed to his chest, clinging to it.

Regulus leads James inside and up the stairs, reaching back to take one of James' hands on the way up, offering balance because he doesn't have his cane today. Must mean his leg isn't giving him trouble, but stairs are always annoying for him, Regulus has noticed. He'd planned to ask Sirius to build one of those seats to carry James up in his house, too, but he supposes there's no point now.

James has never been in his room, even if he's seen glimpses of it through his window. He's not really in much of a state to take it all in, crying as he is, and there's not much to see anyway. Regulus peels the hat out of James' hands and gently sits it on the desk before easing onto his bed and tugging James in right after him. James comes willingly.

"I'm sorry," James gasps out through his tears, even as he slides closer. "It's your birthday, and I—"

"Shh, don't worry about it, James. Come here," Regulus murmurs, getting settled and tugging James close. James curls up against his side and buries his face into Regulus' chest, crying and shaking. Regulus strokes his back and repeatedly passes his hand through James' hair.

It takes a while for James to calm. He does, at some point, and then he's just quietly breathing. He turns his head to get more comfortable. Regulus straightens his glasses for him.

"I don't know how I'm going to do this," James croaks. "How am I meant to do nothing if your name is called? And Sirius—"

"You promised, James," Regulus cuts in sternly, reaching down to cup James' jaw and tilt his face up. "We all promised."

James swallows thickly. "I know, and I—I won't volunteer, but no matter what happens, it's going to break my heart. I hope my name is called. I hope it's me."

"I don't," Regulus murmurs.

"I love you," James whispers. "Maybe you hate to hear it, but I love you so much, Regulus. So fucking much."

"James—"

"I just love you. I love you. All I can do is love you. I—"

Regulus surges forward to cut him off with his mouth, because he can't help it, because he wants to. Because why shouldn't he? Because what's the point of not doing it, when there's no point in doing it in the first place? It's all so pointless.

Except.

Except, oh, the heat of James' mouth, and that gentle whimper, and how good it feels. It feels so good. Maybe that's the point. Maybe nothing else matters other than this, this, this. Regulus was ready before, and he's still ready now. If this is all he gets to have… This is all he gets to have.

He wasted so much time.

"Oh," Regulus chokes out with a harsh, pained laugh, breathless as he rocks back to stare at James, who is looking right at him, beseeching. "This is going to hurt."

And it is. Of course it is, because they're a great, big tragedy. That's what they are; that's what they've always been; that's all they'll ever get to be. There's no changing that now, no matter what they do, no matter how hard they try.

They were going to try.

"I'm sorry. I'm so sorry. I shouldn't have done that," James rasps, squeezing his eyes shut.

"It was me. James, it was me," Regulus tells him, because it was. Trust James to blame himself. He genuinely doesn't seem to realize it, like the concept of Regulus choosing to kiss him is impossible. His eyes flutter open, full of confusion, and Regulus feels a surge of inner rage at himself for ever, ever making James doubt how much Regulus wants him.

"You…?" James searches his eyes. "Why?"

"Because I wanted to. Because I want you," Regulus admits, too tired to even bother dealing with all the complications that exist with that, especially now. He just brushes it all aside and, for once, lets here and now be all he knows. Here and now, he wants what they'll never get to have—just a piece of it, something that's theirs and theirs alone.

"Even now?" James whispers.

"At all times, baby, at all times," Regulus whispers back, cupping James' jaw once more. "I'm going to kiss you again, if that's alright with you."

"Please," James breathes out, begging, every inch of him craning forward for more, desperate. "Please, please, pl—"

Regulus refuses to let him beg any further, drawing him in again until James can't say another word, his mouth busy against Regulus' own. It's a slow kiss, gentle, but it's deep from the very beginning, like the depths of them are blown wide open, and they're tipping themselves over into it.

It builds, as these things tend to do when allowed to, and Regulus allows it. He melts back into bed and accepts every single thing James gives him, begging for more without having to say a word, and James gives it to him. James will give him anything, and Regulus wants it all, wants to take it and return the favor, give all that he has, all that he is, right back.

Regulus can't kiss James without losing sense of everything else, anything else. It's just James. Only James.

James.

James.

James.

"No, no, it's okay. It's—" Regulus' breath catches in his throat, because James' just mindlessly slipped his hand up Regulus' shirt and froze the moment he realized what he did. He isn't touching any scars, but Regulus suspects that he's worried he is. Regulus rears back a little to meet his wide eyes. "You can see. I'll let you see. You just—you have to promise me that you won't—that you'll pretend I'm—"

"What?" James asks, confused again. Regulus shakes his head, and James frowns. "You don't have to, love. We don't—listen to me, we don't have to do anything, alright?"

"I want to," Regulus says, then adds, "and it's my birthday."

James blinks, then huffs a weak laugh. "Right, well, that's a solid argument, I'll admit."

"Did you know, on my fifteenth birthday, I wished on the sunrise that you would kiss me?" Regulus murmurs.

James kisses him immediately, dipping down to do it, and Regulus hums in smug approval. Wish granted.

For a bit, it's just that, only that, and then Regulus breaks the kiss and pushes James back, persistently nudging him until he falls to the side, propped on his elbow and staring at him with his glasses askew. Regulus feels his heart clench violently before he sits up, and for a moment, he just breathes.

Slowly, he reaches down to grip the hem of his shirt, his hands shaking, and it still takes him a solid minute to move. He closes his eyes, squeezing them shut tight, and then he eases his shirt off. There's silence. Neither of them are breathing, and Regulus doesn't open his eyes to see James' reaction.

A few beats pass, and then he hears James exhale, inhale, and exhale again. "Regulus? Will you look at me?"

Regulus does, slowly. James meets his gaze, steady.

"Do you think this makes you less beautiful?" James asks softly. "Because it doesn't. It doesn't, Regulus."

And that's it. James Potter dismantles all of his fear in just three sentences, and the truth in his eyes. Regulus doesn't mean to, but his shoulders heave, and he isn't crying, but he's dangerously close to doing just that.

All the fight goes out of him all at once, and he slumps, choking on a harsh breath that could either be a laugh or a sob, or both. James scoots closer, carefully reaching out to grab Regulus' hand, and then he leans in and kisses the scars on the inside of his forearm. They're pale and faded now, but forever gouged, dented in from the claws that dug into his skin. James' lips are warm against them.

Regulus does cry, then. He can't help it, because the scars have always felt like death to him, like death permanently etched into his skin, and James is breathing life back into him.

James kisses more, up the length of his arm, every set of clawed scars on the way up. He pushes Regulus gently back to the bed and crawls on him to reach more, whispering, "You're beautiful, Regulus. So beautiful," over and over between each scar and every kiss, and all Regulus can do is cry.

Regulus' arms and legs are covered in the faded scars, as is his chest and back, his sides and hips, too. Inner thighs. Outer thighs. The outside of his ribs. The side of his neck. Most of them are all faint now, after nearly a year, but there's one…

The worst one is on his chest, right over his heart where the cold, piercing hand tried to rip it right out. A part of Regulus believed for a long time that it actually managed to. Every time he looks at James, he's reminded that it didn't.

It left behind a mangled, raised scar, the skin knotted and patchy. James kisses it as if it's no different than the rest.

"You still—you aren't—" Regulus can't really finish either sentence, but he doesn't have to.

James raises his head and meets his eyes. "Do you look at me any differently for my leg?" Regulus shakes his head. "Then why would this be any different, love?"

"Because you begged me not to do it," Regulus rasps. "You said—you told me you'd never forgive me, and now you have to look at me and see—always see—"

"I look at you and see you," James cuts in. He lifts his hand and covers the worst scar, not even looking at it. "I never wanted—" He swallows, then sighs. "I could look at your scars and blame myself for them, or even blame you, but the truth is, neither of us were to blame for the things we went through in that arena. At the end of the day, you're Regulus."

"Not the same Regulus I was before," Regulus croaks.

"You'll always be my Reg," James says softly.

Regulus has to kiss him for that, truly. He threads his fingers in James' hair and frantically tugs him into another kiss, his chest heaving as his emotions bubble up and threaten to spill out of him. He thinks about it, the way James once said the arena—the Hallows—could change them, but couldn't take who they are away from them, and the idea that Regulus is included in that, for James, sends him spiraling.

Scars and all, he'll always be James' Reg. It has a nice ring of finality to it, something resolute, something secure and safe.

The next few minutes pass in a frantic haze of:

"Touch me, please. Anywhere. Everywhere. Just—just—"

"Okay, just—I only have two hands, love."

"James—"

"Give me a second. This is—it's a bit difficult when you won't be still. You have to—"

"James—"

"Just—again, only two hands, and my leg is—"

In the end, Regulus just has to come to terms with the fact that James can't spontaneously grow more hands, which is cruel and unfair, if you ask him. He wants James to touch him all over, touch his scars and wipe away the death echoing from the wrong hands that touched him before. James does. It takes time, but he does, leaving behind scalding handprints with the life etched into his palms that only Regulus can feel.

Regulus doesn't know how he's going to be able to look in the mirror after this and hate what he sees, knowing he's going to see the lingering caresses of life that James blesses him with.

Like this, with James' hands on him, he feels more beautiful than he ever has. He never truly has, until now.

It's difficult between them, at first. Sex, that is. They struggle to find the right position that doesn't bother James' leg. They fight with clothes, fight with sheets, fight not to fall right off the bed when Regulus scrambles to snatch his bottom desk drawer open to find what he needs, mentally thanking Barty for always keeping him well-stocked. Safe sex is important to Barty, which is paying off in Regulus' favor now.

It gets easier once they get where they're trying to go, once everything slots into place, and the whole world falls away. That's when they stop, when they pause, neither of them moving or speaking or doing anything at all.

James presses their foreheads together, and they breathe, the intimacy of the moment swaddling around them, heat in their mouths, tenderness in their skin.

"Okay?" James whispers.

Regulus glares at him, and his voice comes out on a wheeze when he says, "No, and you won't be either when I fucking claw your eyes out here in a second. If you don't move—"

"Yeah, yeah, yeah," James teases with an exhilarated huff of laughter, grinning as he reaches down to hook his hand under Regulus' knee and hitch his leg up higher, which has Regulus shutting up immediately. "So impatient."

"We don't have a lot of time," Regulus mumbles, hissing in a breath between his teeth and clamping down on a helpless whine when James does, in fact, move.

"We have all the time in the world," James lies, then proceeds to fuck him as if it's the truth, slow and intimate and coated in love, like nothing else exists but this.

For now, Regulus lets himself believe it.

When Pandora arrives, she takes one look at Sirius and promptly bursts into tears.

Sirius sighs.

"I'm so—I'm so sorry," Pandora chokes out, her eyes streaming, chest stuttering on harsh, hitched sobs. "Sirius—"

"Stop, Pandora. Stop it," Sirius says softly, moving forward to pull her into a hug. "It's not your fault. Don't do that."

"I'm the reaper," Pandora croaks, pulling back to stare at him with puffy eyes. "It's me. I call the names. I—I pick. I—"

Sirius braces his hands on her shoulders and ducks his head to stare into her eyes. "None of us blame you, Pandora. You're not at fault for this. I'm sorry, I know it's upsetting, but I need you to hold it together right now, because you have news we need to hear, don't you?"

"Yes," Pandora says, sniffling.

"Come on, then," Sirius replies, slipping his arms around her shoulders and guiding her along.

They go to the mayor's office, where Effie was already waiting, but Sirius is surprised to find that James and Regulus have turned up early as well. He thought they'd be…doing things Sirius prefers not to think about, but unfortunately is aware of nonetheless, because James felt the need to tell him.

Literally, on Regulus' birthday two days ago, Sirius showed up at his house, calling out to let Regulus know he was there, which resulted in distant, muffled cursing and a series of loud thumps, then unexpectedly, the sound of Regulus laughing.

James had appeared at the top of the stairs, his hair a fucking mess and his shirt on inside-out, so Sirius had an idea of what he'd just walked in on even before James beamed at him and announced, "I just had sex with your brother. Four times."

He'd sounded so proud, too.

Regardless of circumstances, James and Regulus have capitalized on their…new development with vigor, and James repeatedly updates him on this, for some reason. He's pretty sure James just likes to make his face scrunch up the way it does automatically, against his will. Sirius has retaliated by calling James 'brother-fucker', except this never works because James just grins and says, "Yeah, yours," and dodges quickly when Sirius makes a lazy, half-hearted swipe for him.

This morning, James had looked him dead in the eyes and said with no shame whatsoever, "I'm going to go spend all day having sex with your brother and pretending that everything isn't shit. We'll see you later, yeah?"

To that, Sirius could only sigh and reply, "Yeah."

So, yes, Sirius fully expected James and Regulus to show up a bit later, and admittedly, the thought of them arriving late to the reaping because they were too busy fucking is sort of hilarious. Sirius' low-level distaste is overshadowed by his pride in them for being whores. He wishes they weren't being whores for each other, but alas, at least they're happy.

It's not a happiness that can last, not after today.

Regulus and James aren't happy now, and with good reason. Sirius isn't, Effie isn't, Pandora isn't. None of them are happy, and the atmosphere is heavy and solemn as they all come together to hear the process for what's about to happen.

Pandora hugs James and Regulus first, then Effie, who never turns away a hug from anyone, and then she clears her throat and sets her shoulders, breathing in and out. Her hands are visibly shaking. "So, first thing's first. Mentors. The—the mentor options that the Hallow will accept are Regulus, Sirius, and James. Euphemia, they—they want it to be one of them, regardless of which of you are tributes."

"I'll be a tribute anyway," is all Effie says.

"Wait, so—so what does that mean?" James asks quietly.

"It means…" Pandora swallows. "That means if, say, your mum and—and Sirius were tributes, for example, then it would fall on you and Regulus to decide who's the mentor between you."

"Me," James says instantly, looking over at Regulus.

Regulus doesn't protest. Doesn't say a word.

"And if—if it was your mum and Regulus, then it would be between Sirius and you to decide," Pandora continues.

"Me," Sirius declares immediately, and he holds his ground when James meets his gaze. "If I'm not a tribute, then I'm a mentor, James. I'm good with the Hallows."

James relents, because he knows it's true. "Okay."

"So, as I understand it," Pandora says carefully, "Regulus won't be a mentor in…any possibility? Unless Euphemia doesn't—"

"I will," Effie cuts in. "No, Regulus won't have to be a mentor, and only one of them will have to be a tribute. I intend to volunteer for whoever gets called—or, if my name is called, they won't be volunteering for me."

Pandora nods slowly. "I see. Then let's discuss volunteering."

"There are rules for that?" James blurts out, startled.

"Well, there's the usual rule," Pandora replies slowly. "The person reaped can't refuse a volunteer once it's stated, a second volunteer can't be stated after the first, and the person volunteering can't take it back once they've said it."

"Are there…new rules?" James mumbles, face scrunching up.

"This time, yes. Some usual rules don't necessarily apply, since there's no age restriction, or a Victor restriction," Pandora explains. "The way this goes is, if someone volunteers, their name gets taken out of the reaping, so if I pull it, then I have to choose again. So, say I pull James and then Euphemia volunteers, if I pull her name next, I have to discard it and pull again. Also, the person who was originally reaped before someone volunteered for them is taken out of the reaping. This means that person can't be called a second time, but they can volunteer for anyone else. So, for example, if Euphemia volunteers for you, James, your name wouldn't be put back in to be called again, but you could still volunteer for Sirius or Regulus after that."

"That doesn't matter," Effie murmurs. "The only person who will be volunteering is me."

Pandora looks skeptical.

"It's true," James confirms wearily. "Sirius, Regulus, and I won't be volunteering for each other. We agreed not to."

"Okay," Pandora whispers, blinking fast and hard. Her mouth twists. "I just—I wanted to say that I—that if there was any way out of this, any way I could not choose, I—I—"

"Oh, sweet girl, this isn't on you," Effie says softly, reaching out to take her hand. Pandora clings to it, her face twitching until it finally crumbles, and then she's crying again.

"We—we don't have much time," Pandora cries. "I'm sorry. I'm so sorry, all of you. None of you deserve this."

No one argues with her, because they don't.

It's strange, going up to the stage from the beginning, Regulus thinks. The walk to the stage in the courtyard is like being marched to the gallows, willingly stepping up to the chopping block. Pandora, safe from this fate, is the only one shaking.

Regulus isn't afraid, not this time. It's ironic, he thinks. At every other reaping, he always nursed a heavy dose of terror right in the pit of his stomach, and now that his odds are even worse than they've ever been, he feels nothing.

At the annual reaping, there's usually a palpable fear that pulses through the district gathering, but this year, there's nothing but anger. Regulus can taste the tang of it on his tongue, the restless rage rippling over everyone, because while they're safe, it's still not fair. It's fucked up. It's wrong. Victors are supposed to be exempt from this; that's the one promise the Hallow has managed to keep, until now, and it's a further sign of the inequality and overarching power held over them at all times. It doesn't help that a lot of people know Sirius and James, and love Effie, and have respect for Regulus from his games, if nothing else, because he stays to himself.

District six has a good relationship with their mayor, possibly the oldest living mayor to this day, who has been mayor for decades now. He keeps a firm grip on the Aurors in his district and actually works to actively fight poverty with what little power he truly has. Mayor Aberforth might be the one thing standing between a riot breaking out today.

"Welcome, district six, to the 85th annual reaping for this year's Quarterly Memorial," Pandora says, speaking into the microphone, her voice weak and shaky.

Regulus swivels his head to look at those on the stage with him. Effie is standing tall, her shoulders back and her chin tilted up, eyes steely with determination. A part of Regulus looks at her and feels—grief. Just this quiet, unspoken grief for the bond he never fully let flourish between them. She would have been gentle with him, the same as she is with Sirius, if only he would have let her. He wishes he had.

Beside her is James, who does look afraid. He looks completely and utterly fucking terrified, more so than he ever has, more than he did when his name was called the first time. But that makes sense, because this time, he isn't just afraid for himself; he's afraid for the people he loves, too. Regulus is included in that. It's something he doubts he will ever take for granted ever again.

In between James and Regulus is Sirius. He's staring straight ahead, lips pressed into a thin line, eyes blazing. He's angry. He looks like he wants to break his way into the Hallow and set it ablaze, like he'd rejoice in slaughtering each and every person who had a hand in making this happen. It's a feeling that Regulus relates to. He feels the same.

The rest of Pandora's speech and the annual message from the Hallow—the same one every year—passes too quickly, and Regulus feels his heart start to race as it comes to an end. All that's left is the names to be called. There are four folded pieces of paper in the bowl, and Regulus stares at them, unable to look away. Four names. Four people who are all, in some way, incredibly important to each other. Four people who will, inevitably, be knocked down to at least three very soon.

Pandora approaches the bowl like it's going to bite her. Regulus can see the tears in her eyes, and he watches her hesitate with her hand hovering over it, fingers trembling. A quiet whimper escapes her as she dips her hand in, echoing across the silent courtyard. Regulus holds his breath.

Slowly, like she's dreading every step, Pandora moves back to the microphone. She unfolds the slip of paper with shaking hands, a muffled sound escaping her as her shoulders wrench up on a building sob. There's a beat, and then—the irony. Because of course. Not just once, not twice, but three fucking times, like he's fucking destined for it. He'd laugh, if he could breathe.

"Regulus Black."

Sirius hears his little brother's name, and he's sixteen again.

He remembers that day, clearly, vividly. The day Regulus' name was called for the very first time. He hadn't believed it at first, because he hadn't learned yet that the odds are never in your favor—no matter how they might seem to be. Regulus' name, at that time, had been on three slips of paper. Three, out of hundreds. It shouldn't have been him. Sirius couldn't even fathom how it was him, because you never believe it'll be you or someone you love, until it is.

That day, the very first time, Sirius had reeled for a moment. He had been frozen in place, ears ringing, unable to make sense of anything. A cold, desperate fear had surged through him, and it hadn't even been a choice, really, to rush out and take Regulus' place, to volunteer for him.

It had been an instinct.

That instinct still, despite everything, exists within him today. It's an instinct that strikes like a snake, quick and ruthless, fast-acting and poisonous. An invasion of the senses, everything in the world draining right out, and he doesn't lose himself. He doesn't go away. He is here, planted firmly in this moment, anchored to one thing, one necessity.

Sirius is entirely himself, entirely aware, when—before anyone else can even catch their breath—he jerks in place, snaps into motion, just as desperate and frantic as the first time, this time, when he blurts out, "I volunteer!"

His voice rings out, wrenched from him, loud and pleading. He can't help it.

It's Regulus.

His little brother.

Always his little brother.

There it is, a clear statement to volunteer, declared before anyone could do anything at all, before Regulus could even take one step forward. The horrible part is, he didn't know he was going to do it until he was doing it. Worse than that, deep down, he always knew he would, no matter what promises he made. He knew, no matter the name called, he wouldn't be able to stop it, but it's Regulus. It's Regulus, and it's instinct. He didn't mean to, and he was never going to do anything else. It's a statement he can't take back, and not one that he ever would; he never wanted to from the very first time, not once. He doesn't now, and it's not a statement Regulus can refuse.

Regulus tries to anyway, his face draining of all color as he goes rapidly pale and chokes out, "No. No. I—no, I don't—I won't accept that. Sirius—"

Sirius averts his eyes and takes a step forward, hearing Effie release a strangled sound, hearing a breath punch out of James like he was just struck. A hand catches Sirius' arm, swinging him around, and Sirius feels a lump form in his throat the moment he sees the look on Regulus' face.

"You—you were supposed to choose—you were—" Regulus' words crumble in his mouth, and he looks absolutely, unequivocally betrayed.

The worst part is, Sirius wishes he could be the brother who always does right by Regulus, but he has gotten it wrong many times, and he's quite sure this is one of them. Regulus' eyes are swirling with emotion, full of turmoil, and Sirius knows what comes next. He knows, because Regulus told him.

Sirius is going to lose him.

He just did.

There it is. As expected, Regulus' expression shutters, and all the emotion in his eyes drains right out. It's so painfully reminiscent of all the years they spent with a gaping distance between them, a chasm they've spent time and effort closing into nothing more than a crack in the sidewalk, one they could skip over like they used to when they were just kids playing a game. They're not kids anymore, and with one misstep, that crack breaks open once again, crumbling outwards until it's wider and deeper than it has ever been.

Regulus is unreachable. Sirius could try, and try, and try, but he will never again get to mend what's broken between them once more. Regulus won't dare to reach back.

And that's okay. Sirius makes his peace with that, swiftly and all at once, because it doesn't matter. Sirius doesn't get to keep Regulus, but if it means keeping him alive, the loss is worth it.

It always was.

"I love you, Reggie," Sirius murmurs with a sad smile and a gentle shrug, because really, that's what it comes down to. He does. He loves his brother so very much. Just once, selfishly, he wishes Regulus would say it back.

Regulus doesn't.

"You are dead to me," Regulus whispers instead.

Sirius fights against the wave of pain that crashes over him from those words, telling himself it's for the best. After all, he'll actually be dead very soon, because whoever he's going in with, he'll be sure to get them out.

Without a word, Regulus drops his arm and lets him go so he can walk to the front and take his place. Again.

Sirius does.

James feels the realization sink in belatedly, like he never fully accepted it until this exact moment, and now that it's here, it slams into him all at once.

Sirius.

He's standing there, a tribute all over again, and James feels it hit him fully. Sirius is going back into the arena. There's no stopping it now. He's going back, headfirst into danger, where he could die, and James can't—he can't—

"Wait," James says, the word spilling out of his mouth as he surges forward. "Wait, no, Sirius. No."

"James," Sirius whispers, turning his head to stare at him, his jaw clenched as he shakes his head.

"Let me go. Can I go?" James chokes out, steadily moving forward even as he addresses Pandora, who stares at him, pained. "Please. Please just—not him, please—"

Sirius swivels and catches him by the chest, pushing him back a little. "James. James, stop. You can't do this. You—"

"Sirius," James croaks, his eyes stinging. "Sirius, don't—please don't—I can't—"

"Listen to me, you need to go back and wait, okay? You can't do this here," Sirius insists, darting his gaze to the side. When James follows it, he finds Aurors slowly approaching the steps with their hands on their guns. Sirius reaches out and grips James' shoulder, shaking him a little. "It's okay, James. Just go wait with Regulus. Go."

"Sirius," James says again, helpless.

"I know," Sirius replies, exhaling shakily. He swallows and drags James into a tight hug for a moment, then pushes him back just as quickly, giving him a little shove.

James falls back, his chest heaving and his vision blurring. He keeps backing up like he can get away from this, like getting further away will make it less real, but it doesn't help. He feels like he's being torn directly in half.

Not Sirius, he thinks desperately. Not Sirius, not Sirius, not—

James bumps into someone, and his head whips around to see Regulus, who is visibly and palpably shut-down. His face is blank, eyes devoid of emotion. Everything about him is empty, and he's just standing there, just waiting. James waits with him.

Pandora is standing at the bowl again, staring down into it, at the three closed pieces of paper. It could be Effie or James—or Sirius, but she'd just have to choose again if it is. No, it comes down to mother and son now. There are tears streaming down Pandora's face, and she isn't moving. She doesn't move.

"Pandora," Regulus says sharply, and she jolts, choking on a harsh exhale as she turns her head to stare at them.

"I'm so sorry," Pandora announces and never looks away from them as she plunges her hand into the bowl and plucks out a piece of paper with the next tribute on it.

The thing is, James knows it doesn't matter whose name is on that paper, because his mother is going back in anyway. She made it very clear that she would be volunteering, so if it's his name, she'll do just that. And, despite his knee-jerk reaction to break his promise and make sure she doesn't go back in, he knows he can't do that to her. He knows he can't hurt her, or disappoint her like that. They've talked about it a lot, and she said something to him, something that broke his heart, but something he needed to hear nonetheless.

A mother should never have to outlive her children, James. Do not put me in a position where I'll have to, she had said, because Sirius is included in that, just as much as James is. If James volunteered for her anyway, if he broke that promise to her, he would be sentencing her to living on without one of her children, possibly both, and when she broke down crying, once more making him promise, he could only do it again and mean it the second time. He hasn't been able to think about what that entails, what that means for him, what that will do to him and his family when she—when she—

He can't think about it, and so he doesn't, too petrified by terror to even dare to try. But he knows. He looks at those slips of paper and knows that it doesn't matter, because his mother is going in with Sirius regardless, and she won't be coming back out. He glances over at her, his eyes stinging, only to look away when Pandora reaches the microphone again.

"For district six's second tribute…" Pandora exhales shakily through her tears and fumbles with the paper to open it. She releases a low whine, her head ducking forward, and James' eyes sink shut as his preemptive devastation wreaks havoc on him. After a heavy pause, Pandora whispers, "J—"

"I volunteer."

James feels his entire body go cold. Like the sun dying. Flames extinguished. The whole world going dark.

No.

No, not this.

Please not this.

James turns slowly and looks at Regulus, who meets his gaze steadily, unwavering. The last two words he spoke ring in James' ears, loud and blunt and sure. Regulus' voice hadn't even trembled. He'd said it so simply. Without hesitation.

James' full name didn't even fucking leave Pandora's mouth. Effie looks stricken, her eyes wide, and her hand darts out to catch Regulus' arm as he starts to move forward.

"I can't let you do that," Effie chokes out.

"You can't stop me," Regulus replies softly, and Effie's hand falls to her side, limp, as she realizes it's true. There's nothing she can do. Regulus was faster.

"No," James protests, his breathing thin. He shakes his head and steps back as Regulus continues to move forward. "No, Regulus. No. I don't—" James stares over at Pandora and Sirius, wild-eyed and frantic. Sirius' face has gone slack with horror, and he looks like he's about to be sick. "I—I refuse."

Pandora swallows down a sob and chokes, "You can't, James."

"No, no, no," James chants desperately, surging forward to grab Regulus by his arms and halt him, shaking him a little, his grip too rough. "Don't do this to me. Please don't—"

"It's already done, baby," Regulus whispers.

"You promised," James whimpers.

Regulus gives him a sad smile. "I lied."

James proceeds to lose his fucking mind. He can't really say what happens, exactly, but the Aurors end up involved, along with his mum. She's there, whispering harshly in his ear and trying to tug him away from Regulus, but James isn't budging. The Aurors have to flood the stage and quite literally drag him away, and a fight breaks out right there between basically everyone. The moment James lashes out, the Aurors retaliate, and then Sirius, Regulus, and Effie are all right there, too.

James watches his mother sweep a fully grown man off his feet and put him flat on his back. Sirius punches an Auror so hard that they fall off the stage. Regulus snatches one of the Aurors away from James and bends her arm back so far that there's a loud, grotesque pop and a horrible shriek of pain from where Regulus just broke her arm with no remorse.

The thing is, James is sure that, between the four of them, they could honestly fight off every single Auror in the district.

If it wasn't for the guns.

The moment one is pointed to his head, everything stops. Sirius, Regulus, and Effie instantly go still, then let go of whoever they're beating the shit out of, surrendering with their hands up. James is so pissed that he's still willing to fight, but their palpable fear stops him.

He closes his eyes and lets himself be dragged away.

Euphemia watches Mayor Aberforth scratch his beard with a weary sigh, peering at her with very tired, very blue eyes. She's known him a long, long time. He's thirteen years older than her and knows more about the history of district six than anyone alive today. He was seventeen when Grindelwald was assassinated and twenty-six when Euphemia was reaped at thirteen. He didn't become Mayor until he was thirty, and he's been the mayor for thirty-three years now.

Euphemia was a mentor for over twenty years, so she has spent a lot of time with Aberforth, and she knows for a fact that he cares about the people in his district. She knows that she's included in that. She also knows that there are a lot of things—most things, really—that are out of his power.

"You assaulted three Aurors, Euphemia," Aberforth says, his voice gruff, just as it always has been.

"They assaulted my son," Euphemia replies, her tone clipped.

Aberforth sighs. "Your son was assaulting them."

"Okay, and?" Euphemia arches an eyebrow at him. He's sorely mistaken if he thinks, even for a moment, that she cares what James, Sirius, or even Regulus do, as far as fighting for them goes. She'll always fight for them, regardless.

"Do you know how fortunate you are that they decided not to broadcast this year's reaping live?" Aberforth asks, reaching up to scrub his fingers over his eyebrow. "They delayed the broadcast so it's behind, so it could be reviewed, which was in preparation for—unforeseen circumstances."

Euphemia huffs a sharp laugh. "Unforeseen circumstances. Right. And this doesn't have anything to do with Riddle wanting to make sure no possible riots or outcry of rebellion would reach any further than it already has?"

"They were able to cut out everything they needed to, so what happened is contained to here, meaning that James, Sirius, and Regulus will go unpunished due to their positions in this year's Quarterly Memorial as mentor and tributes," Aberforth continues, as if she hasn't spoken at all. "I've managed to vouch on your behalf and talk them out of the public execution they were originally demanding."

"Thank you," Euphemia says quietly, after a long beat of silence, because she isn't too proud to be grateful for that. Not out of a fear of death, but purely because Fleamont—oh, he would have never recovered. And James…

"However," Aberforth continues with a grimace, "they won't allow your crime to go unpunished."

"No, of course not," Euphemia murmurs, holding his gaze without flinching. "Wouldn't want anyone to get the idea that they can fight back, right?"

Aberforth sighs again. "You know as well as I do how this works, Euphemia."

"When do we stop accepting it, Aberforth?" Euphemia hisses, leaning forward to stare him down. "When do we stand the hell up and stop taking this? The children I love are wrecked. Do you understand? They have been through too much, and I won't stand for it. I won't sit down and remain silent any longer, not this time. My boys—"

"You're going to get yourself killed, woman," Aberforth growls, low and exasperated. "Is that what you're trying to do? Because I'm trying to keep that from happening."

"So be it," Euphemia declares dismissively. "If I die fighting for them, then I'll die with no regrets."

"And Fleamont?" Aberforth asks. "Will you risk him?"

Euphemia promptly shuts her mouth. She falls silent and stares at him, unable to say another word. Fleamont… The mere idea of Fleamont being in danger, being hurt, makes her heart clench violently in pure terror. Just the same, Fleamont is an adult who can make his own choices, and she has no right to make them for him, even out of love.

That's something Sirius, James, and Regulus have yet to learn, and she wishes she could go back to tell them, to teach them, but it's too late now. Look where it has gotten them.

"What's my punishment?" Euphemia says stiffly.

"They'll see you whipped in front of the entire district. Mandatory attendance to all," Aberforth mutters. He drops his gaze, his voice dropping along with it. "Seven lashes for each Auror assaulted. Twenty-one altogether."

Euphemia just hums and turns to leave. "Very well. I'm assuming this will be taking place later, so if you'll excuse me, Mayor Aberforth, I'm going to say goodbye to my children."

"You're not allowed, Euphemia," Aberforth calls. "They said—"

"Just try and stop me," Euphemia calls back, snatching the door open. "Add it to my sentence."

With that, she slams the door and continues on without looking back. No one comes after her, and no one stops her on the way, which is for the best.

The first person she comes across is James, who surges towards her the moment he sees her. He nearly knocks her right off her feet with the force of his collision, clinging to her as he sucks in deep, gasping breaths. Her poor baby. He's been through too much. He's lost so very much.

If she could keep him from all that he's endured, and all that he will endure, she would. She planned to, and Regulus—oh, that stupid, lovesick boy. He'd planned that. There's no way he didn't with how quick he was. A silent, secretive plan that no one saw coming. It's going to ruin James, and Sirius will—she already knows. He's going to fight for his brother; of course he is. Euphemia wanted it to be her, so she could go in and make sure Sirius came home. Damn that boy. Damn them both and their selfish, reckless ways to love. It's going to tear them all apart, and there's nothing she can do about it.

"Mum," James chokes out, reeling back to stare at her with wide eyes and lopsided glasses. He looks innocent and so very young, even now. She nearly died giving birth to him, and she raised him into the lovely man he is today, so endlessly proud of the color and vibrancy he invites into the lives around him just by being himself—and she cannot protect him.

"James," Euphemia whispers, reaching up to cradle his cheeks and study his features. He's always resembled her more than Fleamont, excusing his build. Fleamont is something of a gentle giant. He's tall and broad, but has never once hurt a fly. He's a bit sensitive, honestly. James gets that from him, too.

"What do I do, Mum? I don't know what to do," James says frantically, looking terrified.

Euphemia swallows. "What you do is go to the Hallow and listen to the advice Sirius gives you on being a mentor. You do your best, darling, for both of them."

"But—but only one—"

"I know, James. I know that. It's not—you can't do anything about that. Sirius and Regulus will do whatever they decide to do, and all you can do is help them along the way. I know you're scared, but we don't have much time, and I—I need to speak with Sirius."

James slowly pulls away, blinking hard. "You just came from a meeting with the mayor, right? Is everything okay? Will you be okay, Mum?"

"Of course I will, honey. Everything is just fine," Euphemia lies, because there's no need for James to worry about what punishment awaits her. He'll only blame himself.

She tugs on him and holds on just a little longer.

Sirius stares at his busted knuckles and waits. He feels numb. He feels… He doesn't know. All that he can make sense of is that, even now, he misses Remus.

His head snaps up when the door opens, a surge of fear hitting him all at once, and it only mildly settles when Monty steps into the room. He looks at Sirius and swallows harshly.

"Where's Effie?" Sirius whispers.

"Being vouched for by Mayor Aberforth, I believe," Monty croaks. "She—she committed a crime, as did all of you, but James—he'll be a mentor, and you and Regulus are tributes, so you'll see no punishment. She might not get off lightly."

Sirius' heart drops. "What's going to happen to her?"

"I don't know," Monty says, his voice hoarse. "Mayor Aberforth is a good man, and we've known him a long time. If there's anything he can do, he'll do it."

"So, I—I won't get to see her again?" Sirius asks, his voice small. The skin around Monty's eyes tighten, because he knows what that means, and then he closes his eyes and ducks his head forward. Sirius' shoulders slump. "He's my brother, Monty. My little brother. You know I'm getting him home."

"I know you will do your very best to," Monty murmurs, his eyes fluttering open. "I so wish…"

Monty trails off, then heaves a very exhausted sigh. He steps forward and reaches out to brace his hands on Sirius' shoulders, just drinking him in for a long moment. Sirius feels a lump form in his throat when Monty lifts his palm and oh so gently cups his cheek with a tenderness that makes him ache.

"Are you angry at me?" Sirius croaks.

"I've known you since you were a child, Sirius. As devastating this is, a part of me isn't surprised."

"I'm not a child anymore."

Monty's face softens. "No, you're not, but you will always be our child, just the same as James, no matter your age."

"Regulus hates me now. I'm going to die with him hating me, and I didn't—I didn't even mean to. I wanted to keep my promise, I swear I did, but I couldn't help it," Sirius chokes out, his eyes welling up against his will.

"You're just doing your best, of course you are," Monty assures him, and Sirius can't stop himself from pretty much just bursting into tears. "Oh, Sirius, come here, dear boy."

Monty tugs on him, and Sirius falls in against his chest, feeling ridiculously small, which may have something to do with the fact that Monty is taller and broader than him. Sirius hides his face into Monty's chest and cries, and he's still doing just that when the door opens again.

Sirius and Monty break apart, whipping around at the same time. Monty releases a loud exhale of pure relief when Effie steps inside, but Sirius holds his breath. Effie looks right at him, coming to a halt and just staring at him, her expression tight and tense. It makes Sirius want to curl up and weep.

He doesn't mean to say it, but what falls out of Sirius' mouth is a small and heartfelt, "I'm sorry, Mum."

"Okay, honey, shh," Effie soothes him, inching forward to carefully cup his face in gentle palms, her eyes bright with tears. "I love you. We love you so much, Sirius."

"Please, I need you to do something for me. There's a letter in my room to Remus, from his father. I need you to keep it safe, and if you ever see him, give it to him for me, because I won't be able to. Because I'm not coming back," Sirius croaks, tipping his face into her hands with no fear, with nothing but the desperate need for comfort.

A horrible sound rips from Effie's mouth, and she draws him into her arms, holding him tight, and Monty is right there to hold them both. Effie clings to him and chokes out, "Of course, Sirius. Of course we will."

Sirius stands there in the arms of the parents he's only ever truly known, and he weeps. They weep right along with him. Because this is it. This is the last time.

Regulus' head snaps up when the door opens, and for a second, he's expecting it to be his parents, just like last time. He has to remember they were murdered all over again. It hurts just the same as it did the very first time.

Andromeda stands in the doorway, her lips pressed into a thin line. Next to her, holding her hand with wide eyes, a five year old Nymphadora blinks at him. She's almost six. Her birthday will be coming in a week, and Regulus won't be there.

"Andromeda," Regulus murmurs, swallowing.

"Regulus," Andromeda replies, her jaw clenched as she releases Nymphadora's hand and nods down at her. Dora immediately skips right over to Regulus and beams up at him, holding her arms out.

She's far too young to understand the gravity of this moment, but Regulus is grateful nonetheless that Andy brought her to see him. Regulus never expected to get attached to Dora, honestly. For the longest time, he hadn't been, and she'd been afraid of him, because Andromeda had made sure she knew she wasn't allowed to touch Regulus, especially back in the early days after the arena when he couldn't stand to be touched by anyone, let alone a child.

Over time, as Regulus got better, and Dora got older, things shifted. She would come sit next to him and draw, or read books, or ask him to hold one of her stuffed animals—and he would compliment her artistic abilities, listen to the stories, and keep every stuffed animal safe until she asked for it back. Being so young, she fell asleep and leaned over against him one day by complete accident, and as much as it terrified him, he literally didn't move an inch, refusing to, because she was sleeping so peacefully and he couldn't bear to wake her.

It was at that moment he realized she wasn't afraid of him anymore, and something about that felt—good. Over time, she got farther and farther away from the memory of being told not to touch him, and she just—seemed to forget. She had before many times, but Andy and Ted always reminded her, insisting it was important to teach children to respect boundaries, but Regulus eventually plucked up the courage to confess that he didn't mind so much anymore.

It was like Nymphadora had been given a new, shiny toy. With the permission finally granted, she always wanted to climb on him, or be picked up by him, or run and hug him the moment he stepped through the door. He got used to it. Actually, he thinks the touch of an innocent child was the first touch he ever truly got comfortable with after the arena. He's not so sure he would have gotten better without Dora.

"Hello, Dora," Regulus says softly, reaching down to scoop her up and swing her into his arms carefully.

"Hi, Reggie," Nymphadora chirps, grinning at him. She picked that up from Sirius. The grin and the nickname. "Mummy says you have to go away for a bit, so you won't be able to visit next week like you were s'posed to."

Regulus swallows harshly and nods. "Yes, that's true. I'm very sorry about that."

"I'll miss you lots and lots," Nymphadora says, her grin falling.

"I'll miss you lots and lots, too," Regulus whispers, blinking fast to dispel the heat gathering in his eyes.

Nymphadora's frowning now. "When will you and Sirius be getting back, Reggie?"

"I—" Regulus' voice catches, and he looks over at Andromeda, who is looking away, swiping at her face roughly. It startles him to see her cry. Andromeda is a very stoic woman, and always has been, never one to show too much emotion. Regulus didn't appreciate that enough as a child, didn't really understand it, but he does now. Regulus clears his throat and looks at Dora. "I don't know."

"But you are, right?" Nymphadora whispers, her voice small. "You're coming back, aren't you?"

"Don't worry about that now," Regulus says softly, reaching up to carefully brush his hand over her hair, offering her a tiny smile. "You just—you live your life, alright? Laugh every day, as loud as you want, and whenever you miss me, imagine that I'm laughing along with you."

And there are the tears, because she may be too young to fully grasp what's happening, but children have a knack for picking up when something is wrong. When something is sad. Regulus was that way as a child, crying without always understanding why, just knowing that he felt it necessary to.

"I don't want you to go," Nymphadora tells him, sniffling as the tears spill out of her eyes, big tears from big eyes that only a child can produce. She wraps her small arms around his neck and hugs him tight, crying quietly but wholeheartedly.

"Andy, please," Regulus croaks, staring at her desperately through the blur of his own tears.

Andromeda takes a steadying breath and moves forward to coax Nymphadora away from Regulus with gentle, soothing murmurs. Nymphadora pitches one holy hell of a fit, shrieking at the top of her lungs and reaching for Regulus like she knows, somehow, that she may never get to see him again.

Ted is waiting outside of the door, and he takes Dora away, doing his best to calm her down. Her cries eventually muffle, then drift off. Regulus tries to gather the shattered remains of his heart and comforts himself with the knowledge that she's so young now, she probably won't even remember this one day.

"You're angry with Sirius," Andromeda says in the ringing silence. Regulus just nods his head. "You're aware, I'm sure, that this makes you a hypocrite, yes?"

"I don't care," Regulus replies. "He promised."

"From what I hear, so did you."

"Well, he's supposed to be better than me. More honorable."

"I understand why you think so," Andromeda murmurs, and when he glances at her, there's an old, echoed sort of pain in her eyes. "Bella, Cissa, and I were not so young when their names were called. Do you think that there was no part of me that wished to volunteer for both of them?"

Regulus studies her eyes. "Why didn't you?"

"Father thought it was a form of weakness. He made it very clear that volunteering would be pointless, because he would kill whoever we volunteered for," Andromeda murmurs.

"Oh," Regulus says quietly, heart clenching when he realizes Cygnus made his daughters feel like they had better chances of surviving the arena than him. He thinks about how Sirius was shunned after his games, by Walburga especially, and wonders if the fact that Sirius volunteered for Regulus had anything to do with it. "The games have been tearing our family apart long before us, hasn't it?"

"Yes, it has," Andromeda confirms, and then she heaves a sigh and steps forward to reach out and pass her hand over his hair, the side of his head, like she did when he was a child and still sometimes does to Sirius. She hasn't done it to Regulus since he was a child, and he doesn't know why, but it puts a lump in his throat. "I have to go, not much time, but I—I—"

"Andy," Regulus whispers, shaking his head. He knows she's closer to Sirius, has always been closer to Sirius, but that doesn't mean this hurts any less.

Andromeda firms her jaw, holding his gaze. "You and Sirius are the first instance of an arena bringing any of this family back together, and I can't say how that will translate when you go in together, but I will tell you and him the same thing." She leans in and lowers her voice to a whisper. "A family like ours, if only we'd work together, we can do anything, Regulus. After everything, I believe that. I believe in you and Sirius."

It's a nice sentiment, but not one Regulus can cater to. He told Sirius what would happen, and he meant it. Sirius was supposed to choose to keep him this time, not just toss it all away, like it was meaningless. That stupid fucking fool. He is once again going into the arena because of Regulus; his name wasn't even called and wouldn't have been, and what was the point? Regulus was always going in again anyway, so it was pointless for Sirius to do that, just like the very first time. History has repeated itself, a cycle that gets worse each time it comes back around. Sirius should have learned. Why didn't he learn? It's all ruined now. They're ruined.

Two words, and it was ruined.

"Only one of us can come home," Regulus croaks.

"I know," Andromeda agrees, pulling back to lock eyes with him, her gaze fierce. "Make them pay for it."

Regulus swallows, but, slowly, he nods.

Andromeda doesn't linger after that, needing to go see Sirius off next, and it's not like there's much time for these things. In the ringing silence, Regulus moves over to the chair and sits down, closing his eyes and leaning his head against the wall.

He's not expecting any other visitors.

He gets one anyway.

"Don't," James says coldly, the moment he opens the door and Regulus automatically starts to stand up. "Don't get up. This isn't going to take long."

"James," Regulus rasps, feeling like his hammering heart is being pinned to a board like a butterfly that doesn't know its fucking dead yet. Oh, James looks… He looks so…

And the thing is, Regulus knew James would be upset if Regulus volunteered for him. A horrible, selfish part of Regulus had hoped that it would have gone differently, so James would have never found out that his promise was a lie. If not for Sirius, this would have never happened. If Sirius hadn't fucking volunteered, then James wouldn't be looking at him the way he is now. They're ruined, too.

He knew that James wouldn't like it, once he found out, but this is something else. He doesn't think he's ever seen James look so angry, so detached with blank fury, the way he does right now. Regulus has spent the last two days touching James as much as he could, knowing in one way or another he would be losing James after the reaping, but he still can't stop himself from standing up anyway, prepared to come closer, wanting to apologize even if he's not sorry.

"Sit down," James orders, and Regulus feels a bolt of heat ricochet between the rungs of his ribs, and he finds his legs giving out and himself parked in the chair immediately, buzzing all over like he just stuck a fork into a light socket.

Regulus wisely sits there and doesn't try to interrupt, not that James really gives him much of a choice. He starts speaking, his voice firm and sharp, and his tone is doing wonderful things to Regulus' head while his words do not-wonderful things to Regulus' heart.

"You lied to me. You broke your promise, and you intended to do it the entire time, didn't you?" James demands.

"James—"

"How long?"

Regulus swallows thickly.

"How long?" James snaps, when he doesn't answer. "How fucking long did you plan to volunteer for me, if it was my name that got called? How long, Regulus?"

"As soon as I heard the Quarterly Memorial announcement," Regulus whispers, and it's true, because the moment he heard it, the first thought he had, selfishly, was not James.

This was always the plan. He knew—the entire time, he knew he would take James' place if his name was called. It was just a matter of what order the names were called in first. Whatever it took to keep James out, that's what Regulus was always going to do. And he was aware, of course, that Effie would take his place in a heartbeat, but Regulus wasn't going to let her go back in. Not James' mum. Not the only mother who has ever done right by Sirius, after their mother never did, after all the pain Sirius took from their mother so Regulus wouldn't have to. If it had gone as it was supposed to, in the order of the names called, Regulus would have been reaped, then James, and Effie would have volunteered. Regulus could have made sure she made it back home to her son—to both of them.

Sirius fucked all of that up. He should have never been involved. He volunteered, only for Regulus to step right up beside him only seconds later. It was almost—poetic justice, in a way. For a moment, Regulus could only think, vindictively, look at this, you idiot, you took my place and here I am anyway; you should have learned the first time, why didn't you learn?

James' face wipes clean of any emotion as soon as he fully processes what Regulus just told him. He's silent for a long moment, and then he says, "My personal feelings won't get in the way of me doing anything I can to help you as well as Sirius, but I do want you to be aware of my personal feelings. I want you to be aware that I don't forgive you for this. I want you to be aware that whatever we had, whatever we were doing these last two days, that's done. Don't touch me. Don't sneak into my room and expect me to hold you, because I won't. Don't apologize, because I don't want to hear it."

"Okay," Regulus says softly, even as his heart goes splat right at his feet. Some part of him was preparing for this. It still hurts. It still makes him want to curl into a ball and cry.

James' jaw clenches. "Are you even sorry at all?"

Regulus hesitates, considering lying, but he's already done enough of that, hasn't he? So, he looks James right in the eyes and says the truth. "No."

James doesn't respond to that, doesn't react at all, and Regulus wonders now, after all this time, if James is willing to let him go yet. Regulus thinks he's willing to at least try.

Without a word, James pivots on the spot and walks out, slamming the door shut behind him as he goes.

As soon as Regulus is alone, behind closed doors, all bets are off. He curls up in the chair and grips the arms of it so tight that his fingers ache, face buried into the crook of his elbow as he sobs hard enough that he doesn't even make a sound at all.

Chapter End Notes

well. sirius 🤝 regulus: being fUCKING LIARS.

ahem, anyway. first, a huge HUGE shoutout to jude (moonymoment on ao3, author of the immaculate fic disintegration, and joy in my heart; please go give them some love). they are directly responsible for the line "sirius hears his little brother's name, and he's sixteen again"—as in, she literally wrote it while we were brainrotting (i was drunk at the time lmaooo) and i immediately went: hey im using that, is that okay? and they said yes, and i was like mwah mwah thanks im kissing your brain, so long story short—jude is entirely responsible for that one, PUT SOME RESPECT ON THEIR NAME!!!

also, the plan was ALWAYS to have regulus and sirius go back in, but it was with jude's help that i found the best possible route to make that happen. so, again, huge shout out to her for all her help/contributions to this fic, as well as their love and support! everyone say thank you, jude. That Is A Threat 🔪 right, onto the chapter itself. hm. well, we got a lot of information in this one!

—aberforth dumbledore is the mayor of district six!!! very interesting!!! he does indeed Make Moves in this fic and Impact The Plot, so. there's that! can't wait to see all the theories for what that means for everyone.

—effie is NOT going into the arena, and she has a POV!!! she's going to live!!! SHE'S SAFE!!! i did not see one person who believed she actually would be, which was mildly entertaining to me, honestly.

—we got andromeda and nymphadora (and ted)!!! first appearance outside of just being mentioned! andy is of course an icon! "make them pay for it" YOU TELL HIM, QUEEN!!! that about covers the new stuff, so let's get into this bitch of a chapter.

james bring regulus his hat!!! seeing regulus' scars!!! kissing them!!! calling him beautiful!!! the scar over regulus' heart (fun fact, i did have this chapter written before i wrote a great, big tragedy!). "you'll always be my reg" 😭😭😭 regulus acknowledging that he (or anyone) doesn't see/treat james differently because of his leg!!! regulus calling james baby again!!! being the one to kiss him!!! demanding to be touched!!! the both of them quite literally spending two days just constantly enjoying each other carnally!!! it's what they deserve!!!

and then it all went to shit. again.

first of all, pandora being a MESS!!! no, no, that hurt my heart so much ☹☹☹ she was DISTRAUGHT. like, that tore her to pieces, she was so upset, that shit was so sad. who let me write that? :/

ahhh, the cruel irony of regulus' name being called THREE TIMES!!! that's for the history books right there. that poor baby 😭 and then sirius instantly volunteering for him. oh, oh, oh fucking devastating. absolutely CRUSHING. like, he PROMISED, but thats his little brother, and he was sixteen again, and it was just. it was instinct. he couldn't NOT. like, he didn't even mean to, really, but he always knew deep down that he was going to. just. ohhhh, the angst, the strife, the "i love you" and "you're dead to me" THIS IS GONNA HURT 😭 and then. and THEN, regulus "i lied" black 😐 now why would you do that? who let you do that? PANDORA DIDN'T EVEN GET PAST THE FIRST SYLLABLE OF JAMES' NAME, LIKE??? damn reggie can you let them breathe??? he MEANT he was volunteering. god herself could not have stopped him. don't blame me, love made me crazy starts playing in the background

james, naturally, did not take this well. which, ya know, Valid. james—the only one who actually would have kept his promise, or was at least planning to. ALL of his promises. and then no one else did, but ESPECIALLY regulus, who flatout lied to him. this does not bode well for james at all, or regulus for that matter. the girls are fightinggg. they're in their breakup era part 2, except this time it's not due to outside sources keeping them apart, but rather internal conflict. so, fun!

i told everyone the angst was coming. it is here. we have Arrived At The Angst. that's not to say there won't be happy/funny moments, as well the fun dynamics of "i am so angry at you but i also need to rip your clothes off" that we will indeed be getting, but like. yeah, angst. don't boo me, you can leave at any time! but if you're sticking it out, things are about to get Wild.

HONORABLE MENTIONS:

-regulus wishing on the sunrise on his fifteen birthday that james would kiss him, and that was the same day that james started falling for him
-effie, james, sirius, and regulus kicking ass together
-effie "add it to my sentence" being an icon!!! (for those who need the reassurance, she does not get whipped)

-sirius' "im sorry, mum" and asking the potters to look after remus' letter 😭
-james "sit down" potter and regulus "im sat" black yeah, that's about it!

Fury

It doesn't fully hit Dorcas until she's sitting in front of a screen, late in the evening, watching with her breath held as the reaping for district ten ends and the one for eleven begins.

Even when the Quarterly Memorial rule was announced a month ago, it never crossed Dorcas' mind to think—even for a second—that Minerva was involved, or Dumbledore for that matter. It was too cruel, too horrific, for her to even imagine that the supposed good guys would have a hand in this.

There are no good people in war. Dorcas has known that this entire time, so maybe some part of her should have seen this coming, but she didn't. She didn't.

There are only two Victors in district eleven.

Only two, and one of them is Marlene.

Dorcas didn't know that, because she doesn't know all the Victors in each district. She doesn't find out until she's staring at the screen where Marlene and what must be her previous mentor are waiting on the stage. Alone.

The reaping is a formality. A joke, really. To rub salt into the wound, it's Marlene's name that gets called first. She steps forward, stone-faced. Her mentor, when he is called, stumbles up, visibly drunk, and vomits all over the stage.

Dorcas is just sitting there, ears ringing, and she remembers suddenly how Minerva looked at her with such sadness when she said that involvement in war isn't always a choice. She remembers suddenly the way Minerva said things would be quiet until now. She remembers suddenly that Minerva said she can wish to protect Marlene, but if wishes were reality, everyone would be daydreaming—and oh, isn't that the truth? Reality is a bitch, and Dorcas has been daydreaming for too long. She can't anymore.

Dorcas is up out of her seat in seconds.

It's raining outside. She doesn't care. She just runs.

Minerva lives halfway across the city from Dorcas, nearly half an hour away in a car, so she isn't making it there as fast as she needs to on foot. The quickest route will be to take the tram, which she does, practically rattling in place the entire ride. People look at her oddly, but she ignores them.

The moment she's off, she's running again. Careless and frantic, she sprints without stopping, the pouring rain drenching her until her clothes are sticking to her skin and her braids are slapping heavily against her back, dripping over her neck and shoulders. She's sopping wet, not dry anywhere, and that's how she turns up at Minerva's door.

As soon as she arrives, she bangs her fist against the door on repeat without stopping, her chest heaving as she fails to catch her breath. She'd yell if she could, if she wasn't panting, if she was able to find her voice.

The door wrenches open to reveal Minerva with her lips pressed into a thin line, but she doesn't look particularly surprised to see Dorcas at her door. She doesn't say a word. She just stands there and holds Dorcas' gaze.

"You knew," Dorcas chokes out, desperately wanting to be wrong, but Minerva's mouth flattens out even more, pinched and wrinkled at the corners. Dorcas heaves out a harsh breath and rears back, whispering in utter betrayal, "You knew?"

"Get inside," is Minerva's quiet response. "You'll catch your death standing outside in the cold, soaked head to toe."

With that, Minerva swivels on the spot and sweeps off, leaving her door standing open. Dorcas doesn't move for a long moment, her chest still aching, her lungs burning. It takes her a few seconds, and then she tilts her chin up and marches into Minerva's house, which she has never been inside before.

Minerva brings her a towel, but Dorcas doesn't take it. She stands there and continues to drip all over Minerva's floor.

"Did you know?" Dorcas demands, wanting to hear it.

"I knew," Minerva confirms.

Dorcas has always looked up to Minerva. Has always respected her. Has always admired her. When Dorcas joined the Order, it was like Minerva was her mentor. Her role model.

One thing about Minerva is, she isn't someone you fuck with. Dorcas has seen Minerva drop grown men twice her size effortlessly. She knows for a fact that Minerva has killed people. If you know her, then you don't take the idea of attacking her lightly, and Dorcas knows her better than most.

So, it says a lot that the very first thing Dorcas wants to do is throw herself at Minerva and get violent.

She doesn't, because she knows there would be no point. Either Minerva would flatten her in five seconds, or Minerva would let her do it without defending herself, which would only leave Dorcas with regrets in the end, and she doesn't know which possibility is worse. What she does know is that she has too many regrets already. She doesn't add another.

"Tell me," Dorcas croaks, "that you weren't involved in making it happen. At least tell me that you—you didn't—"

"I gave Riddle the idea," Minerva murmurs, "on Albus' orders."

Dorcas inhales sharply. "Riddle didn't—he didn't come up with this? Dumbledore did, and you—you—"

"I need you to listen to me, Dorcas," Minerva says sharply, stepping forward abruptly to grab Dorcas' arm and start drying her off with the towel. Dorcas just stands there, limp like a ragdoll, staring at Minerva in horror. "Riddle wanted them dead, do you understand? James and Regulus, and Sirius for collateral, too. He fully intended to have them killed when they got home after the victory tour."

"And you thought this was the solution?!"

"There was no proper solution, but this—we can do something with this. There have been four riots across the districts since the victory tour. The Order has taken in over thirty-five deserters. More than fifteen Aurors have been killed, and you don't even want to know the death toll sweeping through the districts right now."

Dorcas swallows. "I still don't understand how forcing the fucking Victors to go back in is beneficial, Minerva. For fuck's sake, haven't they been through enough?"

"Losing Regulus, James, and Sirius would be a major hit for our side of the war, particularly in the aftermath of their seemingly accidental abilities to invigorate rebels. The loss of them all—it would make those resisting lose steam at best and extinguish every bit of hope at worst."

"Then—then we should have saved them! I should have been notified, and I would have gotten them to the Phoenix. How the fuck was this the solution?!"

Minerva's lips press into a thin line as she shifts to grab Dorcas' other arm and pat that dry, too. "What we lack in this war right now is unity, as well as visibility. There needs to be something that angers the people and brings them together, even the Hallows. We need the Hallows angry, too. We need an outcry from everyone to push this war in the right direction, and Albus—well, he knows how to make that happen."

"Martyrs," Dorcas chokes out. "They're nothing but martyrs to him. To you."

"Dorcas," Minerva says quietly, reaching up to gently dry each side of her throat, "I was just following orders."

Dorcas shoves Minerva's hand away and takes a step back, glaring at her. "Without question, Minerva? Do their lives mean nothing to you? You'll drag these people back in to die, just to start a fucking war?"

"To win a war," Minerva corrects sharply. "I followed orders I know will help us win this war. A war we have been fighting for a very long time. Do you think these are the first lives that will be lost? You know how this works, Dorcas, and if you weren't leading with your heart, you would see how important it is to save who we can."

"To save—" Dorcas freezes, her heart dropping. "You're going to make sure one of them makes it out. Sirius or Regulus?"

Minerva doesn't reply.

"Which one?" Dorcas hisses, her nostrils flaring.

"Surely you already know," Minerva says softly.

The thing is, Dorcas does know. Of course she does, because she's been fighting in this war long enough to know what will help it in the long-run, and she's been a Hallow long enough to know what will infuriate them the most.

"Sirius," Dorcas whispers. "He's the one you'll make sure wins, because everyone will be furious that Regulus didn't get to make it back to James."

Minerva nods. "That, and Sirius' influence on the Hallows—"

"He won't," Dorcas cuts in harshly. "Are you fucking stupid? Is Dumbledore? You—you don't understand how much he loves his little brother. Losing him will—it'll fucking ruin him. He'll be useless, Minerva. He won't be fighting in a war! You'll be lucky if he doesn't lay down and grieve himself to death!"

"Albus thinks differently," Minerva counters. There's something in her eyes, something knowing and hidden, like shadows draping over a room when lights go out. "He thinks Sirius will end this war after losing his younger sibling."

Dorcas scowls and snarls, "Oh, yeah? Does he now? And what led him to be so fucking sure of that?"

Minerva holds her gaze. "Because he started it when he lost his."

For a second, just one, Dorcas feels her breath hitch with a rush of empathy, thinking about that portrait of the young girl in Dumbledore's office, the young girl who has his eyes. The young girl Dorcas has never met.

It warps things in Dorcas' mind for a moment, thinking about Dumbledore's motivations behind everything, because she's never truly known. All she knows is he's the one who killed Grindelwald after winning the 34th hunger games, and then he started the Order of the Phoenix. No one knows much else, honestly, but apparently Minerva does.

The moment passes quickly, and Dorcas feels all of that empathy drain right out of her, because there is no excuse for this, for what he's doing now. No excuse. Not one.

"And what if he's wrong?" Dorcas asks as she takes a solid step back, her jaw clenched.

"Despite the issues we have with him and the way he does things," Minerva murmurs, "he's never been wrong before."

Dorcas just scoffs and shakes her head, pivoting on her heel and leaving without another word, slamming the door as she goes, furious because Dumbledore is wrong. And, this time, Dorcas isn't going to stand back and do nothing.

No, not this time.

This time, she's going to fix it.

She's been thinking of it as an option between Riddle and Dumbledore, siding with the lesser of two evils, but there's not very much difference in the evil between them now—and Dorcas refuses to side with either. If they're the only options she's got, then she'll just have to make another one.

Herself.

This time, she's doing it her way.

Sirius feels nauseous.

"There's no way that wasn't fucking rigged," Sirius rasps, staring at Pandora incredulously. "Both of them?"

"Bellatrix first, Narcissa right after," Pandora replies softly, her lips tipped down. "I'm so sorry."

"It's a fucking family reunion," Regulus mutters, his head tipped back against the side of the train car, eyes shut. He's been quiet, mostly, and Sirius wants to tell him that he doesn't have to be here for this, that he can go be with James right now, while they both still have time.

Not that they won't have more time in the future, because Sirius is obviously going to slaughter everyone to make sure Regulus makes it home, but regardless. Regulus won't even acknowledge him. Won't look at him. The one time Sirius dared to speak to him, Regulus pretended he didn't even exist.

James has been locked in his own compartment since they boarded the train, but Sirius is sure that if Regulus knocked, James would open that door and let him in. Sirius himself wants to go, but someone needs to be here to find out the important information, and he knows it has to be him. It's better if it's him. He needs to be prepared.

The 'important information', as it were, is the other tributes that Sirius is meant to be slaughtering in the name of keeping his brother alive. And, right out of the gate, it's a fucking mess. Bellatrix and Narcissa.

Fucking hell, it is a family reunion.

Despite being Victors from district six, they are nonetheless residents of district one now, so they were integrated into the reaping there. As luck would have it, their names got called, and no part of Sirius believes that's a fucking coincidence. He just doesn't. There's no way.

He can't do anything about it, and it's not something he's sure how to feel about. The idea of killing Bellatrix or Narcissa, or both, doesn't exactly…put him off. They may be family, but he doesn't know them, not really. They're strangers to him, and for Regulus, he'd kill them without blinking.

But he doesn't particularly…want to. Maybe it's some stupid flickering family loyalty in the back of his head, but he doubts that. He doesn't want to kill anyone. Bellatrix and Narcissa aren't special, but there is one thing that sets them apart from everyone else. Regardless, they are family, and he can't help but think about Andromeda… He knows he's not coming home to see whatever response anyone will have to what he does in the arena—yet another one—but that doesn't mean he's just alright with the idea of Andy seeing him kill her sisters.

"Alright, what about two?" Sirius says with a sigh.

Pandora grimaces. "Corban Yaxley and Rabastan Lestrange."

"Fucking Yaxley," Sirius grumbles. "Three?"

"Alecto Carrow and Thorfinn Rowle."

"Four?"

"Majesty Mildred and Asher Rockwood," Pandora says.

Sirius takes in a deep breath, then slowly lets it out, setting his shoulders. "Five?"

"There was a volunteer," Pandora murmurs, and Sirius holds his breath. "Augusta Longbottom volunteered for Frank."

"Fuck," Sirius whispers, feeling a mixture of relief and distress fight their way through him all at once. Because, yes, he's grateful that Frank isn't a tribute again, but the fact that his mother is in there… Sirius would—he'd—if it came to it, for Regulus, he'd do what he had to. Fuck. Fuck.

"Alice Fortescue was the other one from five," Pandora continues, and Sirius feels his heart sink.

Oh, that's rough. That's—that's fucked up. Frank's mother and best friend. Neither of which can come home, because Sirius has to make sure the only person who makes it out is Regulus.

"Seven?" Sirius croaks, and so it goes. Seven and eight are just four more Victors he's never met, which makes it a little easier, honestly. Best if he doesn't know them.

And then, at nine, Pandora swallows and mumbles, "Dixon Darcy and—and Emmeline Vance."

"Emmeline," Sirius says weakly, his eyes sinking shut. No. No, not her. Why did it have to be her? She's his friend. He—he—

"District ten is Mavis and Velvet Oswald," Pandora continues, strained. "They're, ah, married."

Sirius winces, reaching up to scrub both hands over his face, and then he lowers them and looks at Pandora with a lump in his throat. His stomach is in knots, because some part of him already knows what's coming next. As far as he knows, there are only two Victors in district eleven, but—but maybe his memory is just—maybe he's wrong, and—and maybe—

Pandora doesn't meet his eyes.

"Marlene?" Sirius chokes out, knowing deep down already and still feeling a horrible crushing sensation press in all around him when Pandora looks at him with tears in her eyes.

"Marlene McKinnon and Eli Zatish," Pandora rasps.

"What about—they don't—isn't it just them?" Sirius stutters out, his throat feeling tight, like he's being strangled. "Who will be their mentor?"

"They'll have an elected spokesperson on their behalf with the sponsors and such, but—but that's it. No mentor," Pandora says, swallowing harshly.

Sirius' lips twist grimly. "Some spokesperson working with the sponsors isn't going to be enough. They'll be a Hallow, and they won't care, not really, so Marlene will be—" fucked, he doesn't finish. He snaps his mouth shut, because he realizes all at once that this is, technically, an advantage.

As soon as he's had the thought, he physically recoils like he can flinch back from himself, his stomach turning over with internal disgust. He knows, objectively, that it just comes from what he's always labeled as mentor brain, where he thinks in terms of advantages and disadvantages towards survival, but he's never thought in terms like that about friends.

Marlene is his friend. His closest friend, after James, basically on the same level as Mary, just in a very different way. Because she knows about being a mentor, understanding what it is to be a Victor. Sirius has looked out for her for years now, as much as he could, and she has looked out for him, too.

The mere idea of—of hurting her… Killing her…

Sirius has to take a shaky breath, in and out, just so he won't vomit. Slowly, his gaze crawls to Regulus, who still hasn't opened his eyes, like maybe he wants to block the rest of the world out, escape from reality. Sirius stares at him, just stares, and he knows—he knows it in his heart that he'll do whatever it takes to get Regulus home. He knows that, and for that, to do that, he thinks he's going to die as a very bad person with a lot of blood on his hands. It should make him reconsider.

It doesn't.

It takes James longer than it should to work up to leaving the train car he's essentially been hiding in. He'd only wanted one moment, really, just one to catch his breath and smother the harsh ache in his chest every time he saw Regulus out of the corner of his eye—but then he got alone and started fucking shaking, again, and he just couldn't. He couldn't stop, and he couldn't get himself together, and he couldn't figure out a way to shove everything down so he could handle going back out.

He does figure it out, eventually, because he needs to go back out there and deal with everything. The anger helps with that. It comes in waves, and it doesn't go away; it just keeps getting worse, growing within him until he can feel it festering away under his skin, bubbling in his veins. This anger…

Oh, this anger is unlike anything he's ever felt before in his entire life. He's never been as furious as he is now. It's a harsh, unforgiving, all-consuming rage that has ahold of him, and he doesn't think it's going to let go.

He doesn't think he wants it to.

"Ah, James, there you are," Sirius greets when he makes his way into the train car they're all gathered in together. He's busy writing something down, but Pandora looks up from the notepad and smiles at him. James doesn't smile back.

Regulus is sitting in the corner, his eyes shut and his head tipped back. James could easily mistake him for sleeping, except he can't, because he knows what Regulus looks like when he's sleeping. He knows what Regulus looks like right after a kiss he deems too short, his parted lips and pleading eyes, that sharp tongue of his, words harsh and demanding like that can hide the fact that he's begging for another kiss to make up for the brevity of the one before it. He knows what Regulus looks like right in the middle of his peak of pleasure, when he's feeling really good, his slack-jawed, starry-eyed look and flushed skin. He knows what Regulus looks like right before he breaks a promise he was always lying about in the first place, that lack of remorse and veneer of innocence.

James missed it. He missed it. All the times he's looked into Regulus' eyes, all the different states he's seen Regulus in, and he missed this. He never saw it coming.

A new wave of rage floods him, and he rips his gaze away from Regulus to snatch out a chair and sit down across from Sirius and Pandora. "What are you writing?"

"Listing out all the tributes," Sirius mutters with a frown, his eyebrows furrowed. "Just, ah, getting out there what their strengths and weaknesses were in their games. I don't really remember everyone's, so we'll probably need to rewatch and play all the highlight reels." He pauses and looks up, clearing his throat. "We got the list for who's all been reaped. Bella and Cissa are in the arena with us, James."

"Well, would you look at that? Looks like the whole damn family can't manage to stay out of it," James says shortly, and Sirius blinks. James grinds his molars together. "And who is their mentor? Malfoy, I'm guessing?"

Sirius stares at him and quietly says, "Yes."

"He didn't volunteer for his wife?" James asks. "Wonder why. Hm, maybe because he actually has an ounce of respect for her and what she wants. Maybe he even cares about her. Maybe—"

"Okay, one, that could not be farther from the truth if you fucking tried," Sirius cuts in. "And two, I'm—I'm sensing that you have some things you're clearly upset about—"

"No, really? You sensed that?" James says flatly.

Regulus heaves a sigh and mumbles, "Here we go."

"No, don't make your sarcastic fucking comments under your breath in your little corner," James snaps. "Either open your eyes and look at what the fuck you did, or keep your opinions to yourself. No, wait, I take it back. When it comes to me, you don't get an opinion, actually, so don't even bother looking."

"James," Pandora reprimands him, nearly gasping it like she's never been more shocked in her life.

"Oh. You're—angry at each other? You're fighting?" Sirius blurts out, face scrunching like the idea of that is genuinely the most confusing thing he's ever heard.

"But—but why?" Pandora whines, like she's already fed up, like she just wants all of this to stop being so hard. Well, tough. It's not that fucking simple.

"We broke up. Again," Regulus says dryly, lifting his hand lazily and giving a careless flick of his fingers, and James has to clench the edge of the table to stop himself from instantly losing his shit. Regulus still hasn't opened his eyes.

Sirius looks at James in disbelief. "Now is a hell of a time to go about breaking up! James, what the f—"

"We didn't break up," James interrupts harshly, "because we weren't together. We were never together. He just likes to say things and expects people to go along with it, as if whatever he says is right, like he can make decisions for people, even when he promised not to. But hey, he's a fucking liar, so—"

"Okay, hold on," Sirius says quickly, eyes a little wide as he leans forward on his elbows. He looks a bit pale, suddenly. Worried. "I—yes, right, I see the…issue now. Um, James, if you're —I mean, if you're upset with him about volunteering for you, then you have to be upset with me, too."

And, the thing is, James could be upset with Sirius as well; maybe a part of him is. But Sirius didn't break his promise to James. No, just Regulus. Maybe it makes him a horrible person, but James just—can't. He can't do it. Not both. He can't carry all of this, and Sirius—he needs Sirius, especially through what's coming. And it is different.

It is.

It's different because it wasn't Sirius who actually broke the promise to James. He didn't lie. It's different because there are different things to forgive. Because Sirius didn't fuck him. Sirius didn't hold him. Sirius didn't give him little slices of happiness and rip it away with no remorse.

Sirius is sorry. James can look at him and see that he is.

Regulus wasn't. He isn't. James only had to look into his eyes to see that truth. He remembers, suddenly, that he hadn't been looking into Regulus' eyes when he made the promise, when he lied. Why hadn't James looked? He should have looked.

"No," James says, his voice coming out steady. "No, I don't have to be upset with you, actually. Just him. I'm just upset with him. I hate what he did. I hate—" He stops, the words catching like they're banging on the inside of his throat, awash with the burning acidity of his ever-mounting rage. He flicks his gaze to Regulus, who has finally opened his eyes, looking right at him. James holds his gaze and hopes with everything in him that Regulus sees the truth in James' eyes when he coldly announces, "I hate him."

"You don't hate anything," Sirius argues, sounding strained and a little desperate. "Stop it, James. Come on, please don't do that, yeah? Regulus, he didn't mean that. He's just—he's upset, is all, and he's—"

"I hate you," James states, talking over Sirius as he looks at Regulus. "I didn't get it before, how anyone could ever hate someone they once claimed to love, but now I do. Isn't that ironic, Regulus? I understand now."

There's a heavy, ringing silence on the train, and James can hear the rush of his own blood in his ears, the awful thud of his heart against his ribs. He's so angry. He doesn't even properly know what hatred is, but it has to be this. It has to be whatever the fuck happens to him every time he looks at Regulus and feels like ripping the world apart, like he's being ripped apart with it, like everything is just—it's just—

Regulus abruptly pushes to his feet, slow about it. He stands to full height, never breaking James' gaze, and there's something about his eyes that only makes James angrier. They're hollow. So fucking hollow. He doesn't even speak. He just turns to walk away without saying anything else, and James lets him go.

Fighting every urge to call him back, to follow right after him, James stays there, raging, and lets him go.

"You've been crying," Dorcas says.

Regulus presses his lips into a thin line. "No."

"My love, you don't have to talk about it, of course not, but you also don't need to lie," Dorcas tells him, cupping his chin very gently between her fingers as she does his makeup. He has no idea what she's going with this year, honestly, but he leaves her to her whims at this point, knowing better than to doubt her. He's not going to question Dorcas' stylist skills.

As soon as they got into the Hallow, he and Sirius had been ushered off as per usual, to get presented for the introduction parade. The reintroduction parade, more accurately. Regulus had to wait for a bit, seeing as he was alone with a fucking bathtub, and then Dorcas showed up and started chatting with him while standing in the corner, her back to him, working on some sort of designs at her desk while he bathed.

After that, she left again, then came back. Left again, then came back. It took Regulus some time to realize that she was running between him and Sirius, which baffled him. She's their stylist, yes, but there should be a design team to help assist her in any way she needs.

Regulus doesn't doubt that there are countless people who would sell at least one internal organ just to work alongside her, especially this year.

Maybe it has to do with Gideon and Fabian?

Maybe she misses them.

Either way, Dorcas has always been frighteningly good at just—seeing through everyone. Regulus, who has indeed been crying a lot today, really doesn't have a leg to stand on when she's staring directly into his eyes and likely seeing the evidence. His shoulders slump and he sighs.

"James hates me," Regulus whispers, and it takes everything within him, all of his effort, not to immediately burst into fucking tears as soon as he says it. Oh, he's pathetic.

Dorcas laughs.

She just—laughs, and Regulus can't stop himself from rearing back to stare at her incredulously, because that's just fucking rude. Like, yes, he's aware he's a no-good, terrible hypocrite who really should have seen this coming, because of course the universe would take the chance to turn these tables on him as a form of adequate karma, but she could at least pretend to be a little sympathetic to his plight.

"Oh, don't look at me like that." Dorcas snorts and gently reaches out to cup his chin a second time. "James doesn't hate you. I don't know who told you that—"

"James did," Regulus says flatly, and Dorcas blinks. "He told me that, Dorcas. Right to my face. Like, purposefully."

Dorcas doesn't laugh this time. She looks so confused, her eyebrows pinching together. "That's just—not possible. That man is so in love with you that it's mental, Regulus. He's gone on you. I mean, so far gone that there's no getting him back."

"Yes, well, it seems like he went so far that he came back out on the other side," Regulus mumbles, and the worst part is, he knows all about that.

He knows what it is to love someone so much that you hate them. Want someone so much that you despise them. Need someone so much that you hurt them. He knows exactly what it is to look at someone you love in the aftermath of a horrible loss and feel so much, too much, all that pain and grief and pure fury, and it leaves you unsure how to make out the love through it all. He knows all too well.

It's fucking devastating. It's nothing less than Regulus deserves, yes, but it is nonetheless devastating. It devastates him. He hates it when James is angry with him. He doesn't want James to be angry with him; he doesn't want James to hate him. He wants James to smile at him, and hold him, and have him right up until he can't anymore.

That makes him a huge hypocrite, he knows, and this really is karma. He spent years making James feel like this, feel the way Regulus is feeling right now.

"I know that this is hard on—all of you," Dorcas murmurs, her throat rising and falling on a harsh swallow. She gently sweeps her thumb over his jaw. "It's—it's going to be okay, Regulus. It will be. I promise it will."

"A bold promise," Regulus whispers, lips tilting up sadly.

Dorcas looks him right in the eye and says, fiercely, "Yes, and it's one that won't be broken."

Regulus doesn't respond, because he knows all about promises made that only end up broken in the end. He understands that she's upset, too. One look at her makes that obvious. Still, this isn't okay, but if it's easier for her to believe it will be, he'll let her. Reality will catch up to her soon enough. It always does.

After Dorcas finishes with his face, she leaves him to get dressed alone with the promise that he would wait after so she could come back and make sure everything was right. He can tell there's a difference in her style choices this time, rather than last time. He doesn't look innocent, like the angel he was presented as before, instead looking—well, quite dangerous.

Regulus didn't know he could look dangerous. He stares at himself in the mirror, baffled, but his blank look of disbelief only makes him look meaner. He's all sharp edges and leather, dark colors and eye-catching material, a walking weapon meant to draw attention and invoke…something.

Fear, he thinks. He's supposed to invoke fear.

Regulus looks in the mirror and realizes that he looks like the epitome of do not fuck with me. The more he stares, the more he likes it. He looks untouchable. He looks like a threat. Again, he hears Andromeda's words in his head…

Make them pay for it, she said.

Oh, he will.

That's a promise he intends to keep.

Sirius squints at himself in the mirror, lips pursed. Dorcas stands behind him, awaiting judgement, and Sirius is likely more opinionated about fashion and such than—well, James and Regulus were, so he's a bit of a harsh critic.

He's trying to find some way to put this politely, but he's not entirely sure if there's any possible way he could.

"I just—don't see the vision," Sirius admits weakly, swiveling to face her. "Like, no offense, but this is… I mean, it's a sure sign of talent, I suppose, managing to make me look…"

"Unflattering?" Dorcas suggests, lips twitching.

"Dorcas, I look like shit, babe," Sirius says bluntly. "Fucking hell, what did you do to me? How did you even—manage this? Do you know how sexy I am?"

Dorcas coughs around a laugh, eyes bright. "Yes, Sirius, I'm quite sure how sexy you are hasn't been missed by anyone, but I present you with this…" She crosses her arms and raises her eyebrows at him. "Why the fuck should they get to drool over you, hm? That's what they want, you know. They want to see you come out there looking like pure sex, something to ogle, someone to steal their breath—and no. No, fuck that. They don't get that. Let them be disappointed. That's the goal."

Sirius stares at her, startled.

He hasn't thought about the implications of his position as a tribute this year, if he's honest. The performance he has to put on, so to speak. It strikes him suddenly that he's not really required to lean into his usual role for anyone's life but his own, and if he so desires, he doesn't have to lean into it at all.

It's a strange positive to find in all this mess, but leaving the Hallows disappointed—yes, he likes that idea. He likes that he has a chance to subvert expectations and take something away from them, something they never truly had, though they have always believed that they did. And he let them. But no more.

Not this time.

Sirius turns back to examine himself in the mirror again. He genuinely looks…plain. Or as plain as he can get. As plain as he's ever been in the Hallow.

His hair is in a low ponytail that mostly hides the length and waves in his collar, taking the volume of it from his face. There's no makeup except for what Dorcas added to make him look—well, more tired, honestly. He's in bland colors, and there's not an inch of tantalizing skin on display for anyone to see. He's in layers to take away from his usual shape, like a silhouette, hazy around the edges and indistinguishable so no one could properly apply him to a fantasy.

It's just—he looks muted. Like someone not trying to leave an impression. Like someone who can't leave an impression. And that, he thinks, will leave an impression all on its own.

"No, okay, you've got a point," Sirius murmurs, blinking at his reflection. "I'm seeing the vision."

"Brilliant," Dorcas declares, delighted. "Then, when you go out there, don't smile. You do truly have a lovely smile, and it will light up your face and ruin the vision we're going for."

Sirius reflexively smiles, unable to help it, and he sees the difference immediately in the mirror. The way his grin does have an effect, how it transforms him, the power it holds. He's never really thought about it—well, he says it often enough, but really, he is truly an attractive bastard. If he wasn't him, he'd be so into him. The thought makes him chuckle. For someone uninterested in being ogled, he's quite vain.

"Yeah, no, don't do that," Dorcas says with a snort.

"I won't," Sirius assures her, still grinning as he faces her again. "Just—thank you. For this. It's—it means a lot. More than you could ever know."

Dorcas' face softens. "I'm glad. Now, come on. I need to go collect your brother, and then I'll see you off to the carriages."

Sirius follows her out, then stands in place and twiddles his thumbs lazily while waiting, his mind turning to James again. He's off with Pandora at the moment, who is giving him a crash-course in all things mentor. She'll be holding his hand through a lot of this, honestly, but Sirius has tried to give him as much advice as he could on the train.

But, well, that was hard to do when James is fucking furious, just the same as Regulus. They're not okay. None of them. It's a shit situation, and Sirius knows how fucking hard it is to watch two of the people you love most in this world be in this. He did it only last year and very nearly didn't make it through. James is stronger than him, so he will. He has to, because the idea of anything else is something Sirius simply won't accept.

The thing is, James is very, very scared right now. He's freaking the fuck out, and Sirius can't even blame him. It's not as if he handled it well, when it was him, and circumstances were a lot different then. Circumstances are a lot different for James now, especially in regards to Regulus.

But—and maybe this is cruel, even if it's reality—he's just going to have to push past it and get the fuck over it. Because if he doesn't, Sirius knows that James will regret it. He'll regret every moment he spent angry, and hurt, instead of cherishing the time he could have had. He'll regret all the harsh words he said, and he'll regret all the unspoken truths that he held back, as if that could protect him from the pain of it all. He'll regret all the time wasted and all the opportunities missed.

The sound of footsteps draws him out of his own head and makes him look up, and the moment he sees Regulus, he's fucking offended. He gapes at Dorcas in disbelief.

"Wait, why the fuck does he get to look cool? Why couldn't we be boring together?" Sirius blurts out.

Regulus does look cool. There's a whole I will murder you look that Dorcas has going for him right now. That's not fair. Sirius wants to look like he'd murder someone. This is bullshit.

"Sirius," Dorcas says, amused, "remember what we talked about? If anything, the blatant difference between you two will only leave the Hallows more disappointed."

Sirius pauses, thinking about that, then he nods. "Right, no, that makes sense. If I actually looked cool, then they'd all be looking at me and wouldn't even notice him anyway."

Trying to goad Regulus into an argument, light bickering or even a full shouting match, does not work. Regulus doesn't look at him. Doesn't speak. Doesn't react at all. It's like Sirius isn't even here, like he really is dead already.

For a moment, Sirius look at Regulus with a lump in his throat and remembers one of the few memories between them he actually still has. When he was young, when they both were, he tried to bury Regulus in the backyard once. He'd found out that dogs tend to hide or bury things of value to them to protect it from harm, and being so young, he'd thought it was a brilliant idea to do the same. So, he took what he valued most and intended to protect it.

All these years later, and what has changed?

Everything, and not very much at all.

Remus is doing a terrible job of keeping his excitement down to a calmer level. He's so fucking ecstatic that he's shaking, even just standing in the corner of the room with his head ducked and his hands behind his back.

Some part of Remus really didn't think he'd get assigned to this suite again. It's a bit of a risk, but also not really. Someone would have to care enough to look into it, and as a servant, no one cares unless he's failing to be a proper one. And yeah, he is failing at it—shamelessly and with glee—but no one knows that. Still, it's very rare that servants get assigned to the same things twice, so whatever Sirius did to make this happen…

Well, it worked.

Remus is practically vibrating while waiting for Sirius to get in. Maybe that's unfair and even a bit cruel, because Sirius will be as busy this year as he was the last. He'll have two new tributes to look after as well, though Remus is quite sure that it won't be as emotionally taxing as last year, when it was his brother and best friend he had to take care of, living with that fear that he'd lose either of them, or both.

Regardless, Remus cherishes every moment he gets with Sirius. He'll be happy just to be in the same room with him, honestly. There's no expectation that Sirius will come running and fling himself into Remus' arms immediately, because he'll likely want to explain to his tributes about how servants are treated within the safety of the suite.

It's also the Quarterly Memorial, which Remus doesn't know very much about. He heard the guards in Azkaban talking about how fucked up the rule was, and it had admittedly made his heart pang just thinking about whatever torment Sirius will have to endure this year. And Pandora. And whatever tributes arrive. It's all shit for everyone.

The sound of the door opening makes his heart jump, and he can't stop himself from looking up, waiting with a bated breath for that moment where he'll get to see Sirius again.

Except the first person that steps inside is James.

Remus' mind goes blank.

They come in one right after the other. James first, leaning on his cane and moving swiftly despite that, wearing a scowl that Remus honestly didn't know the muscles in his face knew how to make. Pandora next, and Regulus right behind her, his shoulders tense. The last to come in is Sirius, and he instantly looks right at Remus, but the look on his face—

It's all wrong.

Something is wrong.

James and Regulus weren't supposed to be here.

Remus can only stand there, frozen, not grasping what's going on or what any of it means. James doesn't even greet him; he just marches through the room and down the hall, a door slamming in the distance hard. It makes Regulus flinch.

Oh.

Oh, this is bad.

Whatever it is, it's bad.

Slowly, almost dreading it, Remus reaches up to peel his mask off as soon as the door closes. For a moment, no one even moves, or says anything. Pandora is looking at him with her eyebrows pinched together, so much pity and sympathy and pure, unadulterated sorrow in her eyes that it's sincerely scaring the fuck out of him. Regulus fails to meet his eyes.

Sirius, though… He takes a deep breath, then slowly lets it out. Despite who he's arrived with, he doesn't run and throw himself at Remus. He just approaches him slowly, and with every step, his eyes seem to get brighter. Tears. There are tears in his eyes, building up as he comes closer.

"Hi," Sirius chokes out when he comes to a stop in front of him, and that's when the tears start to fall.

"What's—Sirius, what—" Remus halts, a lump in his throat making it impossible to speak, and there's some part of him that's more afraid than he's been in a long time that doesn't want the answers anyway.

"I thought maybe you would have heard," Sirius croaks, "but from the look of you, I can—I'm assuming you haven't."

"Heard what?" Remus whispers, fucking terrified, so much so that his voice is shaking, and Sirius doesn't answer. Remus' heart is racing, and he doesn't know why.

"Come on," Sirius murmurs, clearing his throat and holding out his hand. "Let's—we should go talk. Alone."

Remus shakes his head reflexively, flexing his fingers around his mask. "Just—just tell me, Sirius. What is it? What's—"

"Can you give us a moment? Please?" Sirius asks softly, swiveling his head to look at Regulus and Pandora, both of which dutifully make graceful exits without complaint, leaving Remus and Sirius alone. Sirius focuses on him again, inhaling deep and exhaling slow. "The Quarterly Memorial—this year, the rule was… It was that the—the tributes would be reaped from the existing Victors in each district. So, a Victor could become a tribute again."

Remus stares at him, needing a second to wrap his mind around that, to really understand what it means. It takes him a moment, then it hits him, and his heart drops, his mask along with it as it clatters to the floor when his fingers go slack.

"Oh. Oh, Sirius, I'm so sorry," Remus breathes out, reaching for him immediately, and Sirius releases a harsh, choked noise the moment he folds himself into Remus' arms. Remus holds him, cupping the back of his head and squeezing his eyes shut as grief takes root in him.

"It's not fair," Sirius whimpers.

"I know," Remus croaks, feeling strangled, barely able to talk. Later, he's sure, his anger will hit him, because Sirius is right, it's not fair. But, for now, he's just—really fucking sad. It's horrible. It's absolutely awful that, after everything Sirius went through last year, he has to do it all over again. He has to watch his brother and best friend go back into the arena. Remus pulls back to cup Sirius' face, meeting his eyes. "I'm aware that it doesn't fix anything, but I'll be here with you the entire way. I'll take care of you, okay? It's—it's wrong that they're going back in, and I'm sorry. I'm so sorry."

Sirius' expression freezes for a second, then shifts swiftly and all at once. It sort of collapses into heartbreak, a certain brand of heartbreak that Remus has never seen before.

"Remus," Sirius says gently, and it's that. It's the look on his face, and in his eyes, and how gentle he's being with Remus right now; even before he opens his mouth to elaborate, that's what does it. "It's me. I'm going back."

Remus' hands fall away from Sirius' face as he steps back, everything around him and in him seeming to go crashing down. Crumbling. The creation of all things being crushed. It feels like something inside of Remus curls up into a tight ball and whines. It feels like a howling wind sweeps through him and throws all that he is against the walls of himself, leaving behind a mangled, broken mess.

I won't break, you know, Remus had told Sirius once. It was a lie. He didn't know, but it was a lie. Just wait, I've barely gotten my hands on you yet, Sirius had replied, and he was right. Because here Remus is, now, left in shambles.

It doesn't hit Remus until this exact moment, but there was safety in Sirius, a sense of security that he foolishly believed in, wholeheartedly. No matter what they did, Sirius was never in danger. The risk never truly applied to him, not really. If anything ever went wrong, Sirius would most likely scrape by, evade death and torture and worse; the threat of losing him was never a genuine threat past not getting to see him again, but he'd always know, at the very least, that Sirius would be safe.

Remus was never supposed to live in a world where he would be at risk of losing Sirius to death. Remus was never supposed to live in a world where he could outlive Sirius at all.

"Remus, please say something," Sirius rasps, staring at him with wide, glittering eyes. "Give me something."

They could never have everything, and now, they're losing the only something they ever got to have, because Remus has no doubts, not even one, that Sirius is going into that arena with his brother or best friend—either one—with absolutely no intentions of making it back out.

They were never supposed to be nothing.

Helplessly, Remus lifts his hand to cover his mouth and smother the sob that tries to climb the walls of his throat, and his eyes ache. Everything aches. He keeps moving back until he bumps right into the wall, and he can only stand there, eyes squeezing shut as the tears spill over, a horrible, secretive part of him wishing Sirius never touched him at all.

Tragically inevitable and woefully pointless. He said that about them once, too. He knew. He really did.

He just wishes he had been wrong.

Chapter End Notes

let's start from the top.

so, dumbledore being the one behind the quarterly memorial announcement... hm. inch resting. That Bitch. the fact that it wasn't riddle!!! oh, had riddle been left to his plans, walburga and orion wouldn't have been killed. sirius, james, and regulus would have. do we say thank you??? no, no, we do not. dumbledore was still fucked up for that one.

and then there's minnie... LISTEN!!! LISTEN, GIVE HER A CHANCE, OKAY??? you gotta see it from her perspective. she has been working with dumbledore for years, war is coming, and this is—objectively—a rather strategic plan to win the war. there is more on this later. is it immoral? absolutely. don't worry, minerva mcgonagall only needs to see another option to take it. just like dorcas, her options have been rather limited to between riddle and dumbledore.

however, OUR GIRL DORCAS!!! OUR QUEEN!!! AN ICON!!! she makes me scream into my pillow. i NEED her. no, you don't understand, i would do ANYTHING for this woman. 😭 she really saw marlene going back into the games and literally just went: hm, yeah, Don't Like That, time to fuck shit up! whatever ive done, i did it for love playing in the background it's interesting, i think, because iirc, in the books/movies, the rebels always fully intended to break people out of the arena, right? i can't fully remember, but i THINK that was the plan. in this, however, that is not the plan. the order's plan is to let them all go back in, make sure sirius' wins (minnie is head gamemaker, she can make this happen), and THEN win the war/take down the government.

dorcas of course is Not Okay with this, and now she's about to cause nothing short of fucking chaos. as she should!!! things are happening people!!! the first domino has

meanwhile, james and regulus and sirius are Falling Apart. great. love that (i want to go play in traffic)..

so, james. 😬 a bit harsh saying you hate the man, innit? HELP AS IF REGULUS DIDNT DO THAT SO MANY TIMES IVE LOST COUNT GOODBYEEEE 😭 sorry, it just makes me sad seeing regulus sad (says the writer who has purposefully made him sad). but also, james is EXTREMELY valid in his anger, and like, some of you may not like it, you may even be mad at him, but just. just—i am BEGGING you to trust the process, please.

oh, regulus just crying, noooo. like the fact that he's self-aware enough to realize that he's a bit (more than a bit) of a hypocrite in this situation... well, they're all hypocrites, which will be discussed later. also, his sadness is valid as well—it's a shit situation all the way around, really. just the same, his anger with sirius is valid, and sirius' sadness is valid.

THEY'RE ALL VALID, THIS JUST HURTS 😭

sirius my beloved. him just. being so firm on doing whatever it takes to get regulus out of that arena alive, and like, the horrible complications of that when basically all his friends are going back in... OH HE IS NOT HAVING A GOOD TIME!!!

the fact that it's a family reunion with narcissa and bellatrix going back in. like, THAT'S a whole mess. this is all so messy. and then augusta and alice going in while frank has to be their mentor. PAIN!!! the fact that marlene was always going back in regardless, bc in her district there were only two victors to start with. oh, im FOUL for that one 😭 and finally. remus. my lovely, darling remus lupin. the utter whiplash of sirius' sad pov switching to remus' pov where he's excited. awful, oh im awful, im not a good person :(

THE WAY REMUS DIDNT EVEN THINK AT FIRST THAT IT WAS SIRIUS GOING BACK IN IM GONNA YANK MY TEETH OUT BY THE ROOT!!! he was so. like, he just. he literally didn't even let the thought form in his brain, because he just Couldn't. and then sirius had to tell him, and like... the fact that remus immediately broke down. some secret part of him wishing sirius never touched him at all??? 😭😭😭 IM UPSET for those of you who need the reassurances: james and regulus will resolve things (...eventually). sirius and remus will have some somethings again soon enough, i promise!!! (maybe, one day, they'll even get to have everything)

(i know i wrote it, shhh)

HONORABLE MENTIONS:

-pandora just wanting everything to stop being so sad (she is us, we are her)
-regulus "i can dish it out, but can't take it" black being a little shit and saying they broke up and then instantly regretting it when james shut him the fuck DOWN (lowkey sexy of him imo)

-regulus looking like he'll murder someone!!!
-sirius getting the freedom to NOT act as he always does with the hallows
-sirius checking himself out in the mirror and knowing he's sexy
-again, dorcas being amazing!!!
-at least remus and sirius got to hug for a minute? :(

The Mission

Chapter Notes

hello, everyone.

warnings for this chapter:

-sexual content (a bit more heavy than usual, though there's no descriptions of what's happening in an exact play-by-play, so i still wouldn't label it as explicit, but you definitely know what's going on)
-references to past death
-references to past torture/beatings
-implied past child death
-guns/gun violence
-gunshot wounds
-mentions of blood
-depictions of violence
-murder/death (yes, in the present)
-depictions of a warzone
-child endangerment (due to the warzone)
-biological warfare used to kill masses of people in a very painful way
-most likely some medical inaccuracies

this is a war chapter. it's very, VERY heavy. people die, mostly not in detail, but some do. there are descriptions of people being hurt/shot at/in agony due to biological warfare etc. i will be putting in-depth warnings in the end notes, as well as places for people to skip/skim-read if they need/want to. please, please, please be mindful of the warnings, and take care of yourselves FIRST, always.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Aberforth is a very practical man, but he's also a proud one, and he knows that. It's part of the reason he's right where he is today. District six, born and raised—and alone.

Being Mayor of a district isn't quite what he expected it to be when he fought and clawed his way into the position, fully determined to get high enough within the system that he could actually make a difference, only to get where he was going and learn that there wasn't much difference he could make.

It scalds his insides at times, knowing that Albus was right.

Aberforth can't deny that he has taken care of his district, his home, to the best of his abilities. There's always a fine line to walk when planted firmly between the Hallow's demands and the district's needs. It's a constant balancing act, navigating which rules to bend and where to keep a firm hand.

He knows the people of district six respect him, the Aurors and every day people alike; he also knows how easily that respect can shatter when the Hallow puts them all under pressure he has no way to alleviate. For decades—for most of his life—he's been in the middle, treading carefully not to tip too far to either side, and now he has no choice.

Albus' doing, no doubt. Aberforth is no fool; he's aware his brother is behind it all, pulling the strings, pushing for war. Trying to make up for old mistakes. Making new ones.

Sighing heavily, Aberforth swallows down a deep swallow of whiskey, letting it burn as he stares at the phone on his desk. The phone Alastor Moody left with him years and years ago when he swept through district six on a victory tour for his tribute at the time. The phone that came in an envelope with a short, simple letter along with it.

The phone Aberforth has never bothered to use.

Many times—over the last six months especially—Aberforth has considered using it just to call Albus and ask him to stop. Whatever he's doing, whatever he's pushing for behind the scenes, just stop it. Just, after all this time, bring it to an end.

The death toll across the districts have been rising with the mounting rebellion and riots. People dying over petty crimes. People attacking Aurors over petty arguments. People, people, people. Does Albus not think of the people? Does Albus not realize the carnage he's helping spread?

District six has remained in a precarious position, the tension rising with each passing day, especially since the Quarterly Memorial announcement. It's at an all-time high since the reaping, since the district as a whole witnessed rebellion firsthand, and Aberforth knows there's no chance of stopping it from going further. The district is one push away from a riot they can never come back from, and he knows exactly what push will get them there. And he can't stop it.

For years, he has kept this district safe. Tomorrow, he knows, he will fail to. Because, tomorrow, the day after the televised introduction parade, Euphemia Potter will be marched out into the middle of the district and beaten in front of everyone, and no one will spared from the violence of such a thing, because it's mandatory attendance for all. Even him. Even he will have to be there to bear witness.

Aberforth doesn't want to see it. He doesn't want to watch. He doesn't want to remember. District six hasn't used a whipping post since he became mayor, and the last person he remembers being whipped at all was Albus himself. Aberforth doesn't want it to happen, not again, and there's nothing he can do.

Well.

Well, there's something he could do. Something he has to do, because he knows the people of his district, and he knows that there will be a riot the moment Euphemia is marched out in front of the crowd and left to her fate.

What all residents of district six have in common—have always had in common, for as long as he can remember—is a fierce, unwavering sense of loyalty.

Putting his glass down, Aberforth swallows the bitter taste of his pride and picks up the phone.

It rings only twice before it's answered, as if it hasn't been nearly fifty years, and Albus' voice is soft, so very soft, when the line clicks and he murmurs, "Aberforth."

Aberforth's eyes sink shut, helplessly, because it has been nearly fifty years since he and Albus spoke. Even all these years later, one of their many arguments still ring in his ears.

I'm doing this for Ariana! Albus had shouted.

It's your fault she's dead! Aberforth had screamed back.

After all this time, Aberforth finds that the strength in Albus' voice has gone quiet. He sounds…old. Of course he does, because he's no longer a young man in his twenties. He's no longer the bright, glowing big brother Aberforth looked up to. Now he is a stranger, a withered voice through the phone, aged and still speaking with so much love. And loyalty.

So much loyalty, even now. That was always Albus' problem, his clinging sense of loyalty, and how that manifested when faced with loss, when tarnished with his own mistakes. What people fail to realize in district six is that a loyalty like this can lead to a dark path one can't come back from. Justice into vengeance into a point of no return.

Albus surpassed it long ago, that point of no return. He solidified it the moment he murdered Grindelwald. Aberforth had begged him not to. But, really, he was just begging Albus not to leave him. He didn't know it at the time, but he was.

Albus left him anyway, and inexplicably, he is still here. In an instant. No questions asked. He picks up the phone, and it's ridiculous, but Aberforth knows—even after all this time, after everything—Albus will do what he always did.

"Albus," Aberforth says gruffly, bracing his forehead with a shaking hand, "I…need your help."

Though his voice is different and time has surely changed more than Aberforth could ever know, Albus does, in fact, do what he always did as the big brother. Without missing a beat, without even a stutter, he says, "You have it."

Dorcas has been fighting with herself all morning, not knowing how she's going to convince Marlene to do this, but needing to find a way regardless. Every thought and plan she had seems so stupid, so now she has no plan at all.

And yet, here she is.

Sighing, Dorcas shakes her head ruefully before raising her hand to knock, ignoring the heavy thump of her heart as soon as she does it. There's about a minute, and then she hears faint steps approaching, which makes her tense up in anticipation.

When the door swings open, Dorcas blinks at the sight of Emmeline Vance standing in front of her in nothing but a silk robe that's tied around her. Okay, so did Dorcas go to the wrong floor? Press the wrong button on the lift? She could have sworn she was at the right room.

"Oh. Sorry," Dorcas blurts out reflexively. "I thought—well, I think I have the wrong room. Ah, I'll just—"

"Dorcas, hello," Emmeline cuts in, lips twitching. "Looking for Marlene? Because if you are, you've got the right room."

Dorcas stares at her, mind briefly screeching to a halt. There's no mistaking the sight of Emmeline and what it means. Dorcas can't help but notice that Emmeline is rather, ah, naked beneath her robe, which is quite obvious from how she has it tied. It doesn't seem to bother her one bit.

"Em, who's at the—" Marlene cuts herself off the moment she sees Dorcas over Emmeline's shoulder. For a split second, her lips part as her eyes light up, and just as quickly, all of that wipes away before Dorcas even gets to enjoy it. Marlene, like Emmeline, is in a silk robe that she's quite blatantly nude under, as if she just threw it on to come to the door.

"Right, well, I'm going to get dressed and head out," Emmeline announces, glancing over at Marlene with visible amusement, a smile twitching at her mouth.

Marlene cuts her a sharp look. "You don't have to—"

"I wanted to go see who turned up to train anyway, and since you're being lazy and don't want to come with me, I'll just go myself," Emmeline interrupts simply. With that, she turns around and sweeps away.

"Right. Thanks, Em," Marlene grumbles under her breath, then heaves a sigh and swivels to look at Dorcas, who is currently doing her level best to keep her expression as neutral as possible. "What do you want, Dorcas?"

"I wanted to speak to you," Dorcas replies stiffly.

"The feeling isn't mutual," Marlene tells her, voice sharp.

Dorcas shifts her shoulders a bit, trying her best to work the tension out of them. "Okay, let me rephrase. There's something I need to say to you. It's important."

"Yeah, I uh—" Marlene scoffs a little and reaches up to scratch at her eyebrow, making a face. "I really think it's a little late for that, Dorcas."

"Can you get over yourself for five fucking minutes?" Dorcas snaps. "I'm not here to fall at your feet and—and—"

Marlene arches an eyebrow when Dorcas falters, because she would, in fact, fall at Marlene's feet right here and now if that's what she wanted. The progression of their relationship hasn't changed much. To go from two people who fucked, to friends, to nothing—and through it all, Dorcas always wanted more. She still wants more, but that's not why she's here, and yet she would sink to her knees right now with one spoken word from Marlene. That's all it would take.

"Just five minutes," Dorcas murmurs. "Please."

Marlene studies her for a long moment in tense silence, and then her lips press into a thin line before she looks away with a sigh and steps to the side. "Fine. Come in."

Dorcas sweeps forward, though she hesitates in the doorway, stopping the second she comes closer to Marlene, so close she could reach out and touch. She can't stop herself from pausing in place and meeting Marlene's eyes, their gazes locked as they stare at each other, a charged moment steadily growing thicker with mounting tension. After each beat of Dorcas' heart, she finds it more and more difficult to breathe, like all the air in the room is being sucked right out through a damn straw.

Marlene is strangling the doorknob with her hand, and is it taking everything within her to keep her distance, too? Does she want to dissolve the space between them, too? Come together in a collision of heat and sparks they can set themselves ablaze with, too? Fuck, Dorcas hopes so.

"Right, I'll just be going now," Emmeline announces, clearing her throat and making them whip their heads towards her.

Marlene's face turns red, and she looks pissed off about it. Dorcas wants to trace the scar on her neck with her tongue and feel the heat of her skin between her teeth. Emmeline seems thoroughly entertained as she slips past them, pausing long enough to flash them both a grin before tugging the door from Marlene and shutting it behind her, laughing as she goes.

"Tea?" Marlene offers, so tense that she almost looks like she's braced for battle, or dealing with an ongoing one from within already. Her jaw is clenched as she turns and heads for the kitchen without waiting for an answer.

Dorcas follows, and she just—she literally can't resist. It's like an exposed nerve in a cracked tooth; until it's fixed, it's so hard to stop returning to the pain over and over. "So, some friend, huh?"

"Oh, for fuck's sake," Marlene mutters, swinging her head around to stare at her incredulously. "Really, Dorcas?"

"What? I'm just saying. You're the one who said it wasn't like that between you, so I was—"

"Yes, well, that was then and this is now. Your point? And, frankly, how is that any of your fucking business?"

"It's—not," Dorcas admits with a grimace, crossing her arms and leaning against the counter, lips pursed. "Should you be doing that, though? I mean, she's…a tribute, too, Marlene. What if—are you two going to—"

Marlene heaves a sigh and slams the kettle down on the stove hard enough to make Dorcas shut up. "Since you're so fucking curious, it's not like that between us. We're friends, who just so happened to want to fuck today. She's just the one who showed up at my door first."

"What if I came a little earlier?" Dorcas asks, glancing over at her, unable to stop herself from seeking the answer, wanting to know so badly she can barely think of anything else.

"Well, you didn't, so," Marlene mutters, averting her eyes.

"But if I had?"

"You didn't."

Dorcas swallows. "I wanted to. I just waited too long. I was—"

"Late," Marlene cuts in, looking at her again. "Too late. Yeah, you always are, aren't you?"

"Marlene," Dorcas says softly.

Clearing her throat, Marlene reaches for teacups. "In any case, I needed a friend, and you're certainly not that anymore, so I don't think it matters when you do or don't show up."

"Look, I get that you're upset—"

"I'm not upset."

Dorcas scoffs. "You're clearly—"

"Actually, no, I am upset." Marlene plants her hand on the counter and swivels to face her, eyes blazing. "Fuck it. I'll probably be dead by the end of the week anyway, so yes, I'm upset. I'm upset because I can't—no matter what I fucking do, I can't get you out of my head, alright? I can't—I don't know what you did to me, but I want you so much I can barely stand to be around you. I'm upset because you're here, so what the fuck do you want? Say what you've come to say, and then go."

"I never gave Lily a ring," Dorcas blurts out, freezing the moment the sentence tumbles from her mouth. That was not what she came here to say, but—well, it's out there now. Marlene stares at her. "You asked before what was different about how we're—how we were friends and how I was with anyone else. Lily—she is my friend, alright? She is, but it's different. It was always different."

"Lily," Marlene says quietly, rolling the name around in her mouth like she's tasting it. She looks like she wants to chew it up and spit it out. It's unbearably attractive. "Pretty name."

"She knows about you," Dorcas whispers.

Marlene straightens a little, fully just abandoning the tea entirely at this point. She hadn't even cut the stove on. "Does she? And what does she know, exactly?"

"If I'm lucky, the same sort of things Emmeline knows about me," Dorcas replies, because if Emmeline is Marlene's friend the way Lily is Dorcas', then Emmeline's looks of amusement and delight would make total sense. Lily would be no different if she was caught in that situation.

"You're so—you just keep confusing me," Marlene croaks, squeezing her eyes shut. "That's not fair, Dorcas, especially not now. I'm in the arena in three days, so whatever you're trying to do, you better do it quickly."

"Listen to me," Dorcas whispers fervently, moving forward to reach out and grab Marlene by both arms. Marlene instantly goes still, inhaling sharply as Dorcas slides her fingers down to Marlene's wrists, circling them lightly. "I need you to do something for me, okay?"

Marlene searches her gaze and rasps, "What?"

"I need you to wear this, even in the arena, and don't take it off or lose it, not for anything," Dorcas tells her, pushing her hands down further to cradle Marlene's fingers, pressing the ring down on her thumb. It makes Marlene jolt, her throat bobbing on a harsh swallow as she glances down at it.

"Are you fucking joking?" Marlene hisses, and when she lifts her head, her eyes are blazing.

"Please. I need you to do it, okay? Trust me." Dorcas squeezes her hands, holding her gaze. "I need you to trust me."

"You haven't given me one reason to trust you, Dorcas," Marlene says stiffly, nostrils flaring.

Dorcas nods carefully. "I know. Do you trust me anyway?"

"Somehow, for some fucking reason, I really do," Marlene snaps, glaring at her. "And it pisses me off. You piss me off."

"As long as you'll wear it, you can be as pissed off as you need to be," Dorcas tells her bluntly.

Marlene scoffs. "Your five minutes are up."

"Are they?" Dorcas asks, holding her gaze.

"Get out," Marlene tells her sharply.

"Get fucked," Dorcas replies, just as heated, just as pissed off and desperate and—and wanting. Oh, she wants so much, she wants more, she wants—

Marlene makes a furious sound in the back of her throat, then darts her hand out to snag the back of Dorcas' neck and reel her into a rough, open-mouthed kiss, and it's everything. Immediately, it's the most important thing. A war could break out right on the other side of the door, and Dorcas would let it wage on to stay right here, just like this, with Marlene.

As soon as their mouths meet, all bets are off. Dorcas is shoving Marlene back against the counter and helping lift her up on it at the same time that Marlene frantically scrambles up the length of it and spreads her legs to drag Dorcas in between them. Dorcas is more than willing to be there, but she clamps down on Marlene's thighs and stops, which does not go over well with Marlene, who tugs at her restlessly.

"Just—no, relax, I'm not—I mean, this isn't just your suite, Marlene. Where's your handler? The other tribute? The servant? We can't do this here," Dorcas gasps out.

"Out, out, away. No one's here. It's just me and you," Marlene says rapidly, her chest heaving, eyes feverish. "We can do this here. We're absolutely doing this here. Come here."

Dorcas goes. Of course she does. How can she not? Without any fuss, she starts frantically plucking the rings off of one hand, each clink of them hitting the counter making Marlene groan. Marlene folds in to kiss her again, and as soon as Dorcas' hand is free, she tugs on the tied part of Marlene's robe, letting it fall open and immediately slipping her hand up her inner thigh to make use of the access.

Marlene's mouth falls open on a soundless moan, a breathless gasp, her fingers digging into Dorcas' hip and shoulder, where she's holding onto one of each with her hands. Dorcas can feel the shudder that ripples through her body, and she curls out her tongue in Marlene's mouth, humming in satisfaction when Marlene responds by kissing her hard, a little messy, with teeth and tongue and unabashed desperation.

It's a fucking wreck from start to finish, a build-up of heat and anger and desire that goes spilling out all around them. They're not paying attention, so countless things go clattering to the floor in their reckless movements, not that either of them really care. It's a difficult angle, honestly, but they're too far in to stop now, so Dorcas makes it work.

Marlene's head falls back, and Dorcas uses the opportunity to immediately work her mouth down the side of her throat, worrying skin between her teeth and feeling the scar there under her tongue. Marlene clutches at her, legs opening wider, which is actually very helpful, seeing as it gives Dorcas' wrist more room for a better, steadier motion.

"Oh my fucking—" Marlene chokes off, her hand on Dorcas' shoulder flying up to clamp down on the back of her neck under her braids, nails pressing in so hard that it burns, but Dorcas doesn't mind. She's pretty sure Marlene doesn't even realize she's doing it, a little too caught up to even be aware. It feels good. All of this feels so fucking good. "Yes, yes, yes, yesyesyes—"

Marlene's chant of approval gets higher in pitch, and it's not very long before she's tensing all over, a mixture of Dorcas' name and truly impressive curses tumbling from her mouth. Her back arches, which is also an impressive feat, considering their position. She nearly falls right off the edge of the counter, and probably would if Dorcas didn't pin her in place, holding her there, not stopping or slowing down until Marlene is genuinely just panting and twitching against her.

Dorcas waits for her to slump backwards, breathing hard, admittedly pleased that Marlene's legs are shaking as they drop a bit, all the energy seeming to go out of her for a moment. Marlene just breathes, eyes closed, face flushed. She looks debauched and delectable spread out on the counter, her robe open by her sides. Dorcas stands there and observes.

When Marlene's eyes flutter open, Dorcas leans in to kiss her quickly, knowing she prefers to see it coming, especially when she feels particularly relaxed or vulnerable, or otherwise it will just make her tense up again—and not in the good way.

"Okay?" Dorcas checks as she draws back.

"Yeah, I'm—yeah," Marlene mumbles.

Dorcas studies her face and murmurs, "Have you been okay?"

"You mean about the drinking?"

"Well, just in general, really, but that too, I suppose."

Marlene clears her throat and sits up a little, moving slowly and getting situated, drawing her robe around her loosely, though she doesn't tie it. "Yeah, I—well, my mum helped me dry out. Dad tossed all the liquor in my house and threatened everyone who would sell me booze, so they—stopped. I still had a stash. Just one. I—I couldn't—I don't know why, but I couldn't bring myself to toss it out. I would just…go look at it and let it, like, mock me or something. Fight the temptation daily, because it's like I need something to fight."

"It's good that you asked for help, though," Dorcas says.

"Maybe, but I—I relapsed," Marlene replies, grimacing and averting her eyes. "I still had my stash, and the night of the Quarterly Memorial announcement, I went right to it. That's when I realized I was just saving it in case I ever needed it. I was fighting, alright, just for the wrong thing."

Dorcas sighs. "Marlene, you were doing your best, and that's all you can do, okay? A relapse doesn't—it doesn't make you a bad person. It doesn't mean you failed. You're human, and these things happen."

"I suppose it was to be expected. I mean, I just learned I was going back in. I wish I hadn't done it, though, and drying out a second time was a bitch," Marlene mutters. "But I'm lucky. I had my parents, my aunt and uncle, and my cousin. Well, I had a lot of support, honestly. I'm grateful, because I want to go back to the arena with a clear head. I want to go as me, not as the person I tried to be for the Hallows."

"I'm proud of you," Dorcas whispers.

Marlene swallows harshly. "I'm proud of me, too."

"Good. You should be," Dorcas tells her firmly, leaning in to slip her arms around her back and drag her closer, eyes falling shut as Marlene melts into her with a quiet sigh. For a long moment, they stay just like that, and then Marlene pushes her back and reaches up to run her fingers through her hair.

"Shouldn't have done that. Fuck," Marlene croaks. "Oh, fuck you. Really, just—just fuck you, honestly. Dammit."

"Marlene—"

"Just go. Just fucking go, Dorcas."

Stepping back, Dorcas wavers in place, swallowing. "Promise me you'll wear the ring."

"I promise I'll wear your stupid ring," Marlene grumbles, scowling off to the side.

"Thank you." Dorcas hesitates, then steps forward and reaches out to cup Marlene's jaw, leaning in to brush a kiss to her cheek. Marlene's eyes flutter shut, and she releases a shaky breath before leaning into it, resting her temple against Dorcas' forehead. Dorcas closes her eyes, too.

"You'll be the last thought I have, you know," Marlene whispers. "Before I die, it'll be you. I just know it."

Dorcas breathes in and out and fights the gripping urge to wrap Marlene up in her arms and take her away. Sneak her out. Sneak everyone out and get them to the Phoenix. She wants to, but she doesn't have the time or resources or support to manage it. They'd all be killed before they took one step out of the building.

She needs to go. She has to go, because she has one shot to do the only thing she can, at this point. There's too much to do and so little time to do it, but for Marlene, she'll make it happen. Whatever it takes, she'll get it done.

It's a strange time to realize she's fallen off into the deep end of love with no way to resurface, but after all that resistance and determination to keep her priorities straight, here she is anyway. All of it, everything, is for Marlene now.

"Don't die," Dorcas says shakily, pulling back to look at her, holding her gaze. "Whatever you do, don't take that ring off, and don't fucking die."

Marlene gives her a sad smile and murmurs, "I'll do my best."

"Evans, get ready, we have a mission," Kingsley calls, banging on Lily's door repeatedly.

Lily's head pops up from between Ember's thighs, and she ignores her groan as she swings herself to her feet quickly, yelling, "A mission? We do?!"

"You have two minutes!" Kingsley informs her.

Ember whines. "Seriously? Now?"

"Sorry," Lily says distractedly as she rushes to her closet to find the clothes assigned to her specifically for missions, though she's never had a chance to wear them until now. Ember buries her face into Lily's pillow and releases a muffled scream, which makes Lily wince. "Okay, hey, I know it's shit, but I really do have to go. I'll, ah, make it up to you later."

Ember just releases more sounds of frustration, and Lily can only finish getting dressed and stop by to kiss her quickly on the way to the door, having to peel herself away when Ember does her absolute best to get her back in bed. Lily slips out of the door quickly, blocking the opening to protect Ember's modesty, not that Kingsley is looking.

"Follow me," Kinglsey says, then leads her away.

Lily can feel her nerves tangling up, a mixture of excitement and fear. She's been training for this for…basically a year, at this point, and apparently she's now cleared for missions. Is she ready? She feels ready.

The Phoenix's highest level is the most secure, seeing as it's the only way in and out, if you exclude the vents. There's a whole hanger bay dedicated to heli-carriers, either stolen or built, or both. They're rarely used, seeing as the Order is a silent organization, and that would draw too much attention. Very few people even bother to become pilots, seeing as it's basically viewed as the 'lazy job'. Of course, Sybill always says that's exactly why she chose it, usually with a grin on her face when she does say it. Despite being trained, she's never even flown anything before. Lily finds it hilarious.

Most of the activity around the higher level seems to be at the train, which is—as far as Lily knows—the usual mode of transportation for missions, seeing as it's underground and off-grid. They can get to each district and the Hallow from a network of stations below the dirt. Practically everyone is trained to be a conductor. Even Lily can drive the train.

"Alright, mission debrief. Gather up," Kinglsey calls out, clapping his hands together. Lily joins the forming crowd, her heart racing, paying attention. "Mission location—district six. We got a tip about a possible riot, so we're going to be a little early this time. We have targets for retrieval; Euphemia and Fleamont Potter. We will not leave that district until we have them both enroute to the Phoenix, am I clear?"

"What if they're dead?" someone asks.

"Then we retrieve their bodies, if it's at all possible," Kinglsey says bluntly. "As usual, there will be two teams. Team A will be moving into the district, while team B will remain at the rendezvous point. Each team has their point-lead giving the orders; that's me for team A and Bones for team B. Each team has their field medic, in case they need to carry out triage to the best of their abilities—our targets are priority, before anyone else. Each team has their gunners, the people whose main jobs are to provide defense, cover fire, and assistance in sticky situations. Everyone will have a gun, but not everyone will be free to use them at every second, and we will be up against more guns than we've got."

"Team B, we do not move out until we have Euphemia and Fleamont Potter with us, no matter who else arrives, or what state they're in," Edgar declares. "We hold position and do regular sweeps for any incoming stragglers."

"Speaking of stragglers," Kingsley adds, "the targets are our priority first. Team A, you can direct people to the rendezvous point, but do not waste time doing so unless you have no other choice, and do not stop to escort them. People will be hurt, in danger, and in need of help—and you cannot stop for them, not before the targets are acquired."

Lily feels her mouth go dry. She's a medic. How the fuck is she supposed to fight every instinct to help people? What if…? What about children? What if she could save—

"We will likely split up in the field, which is a common occurrence on a mission," Kingsley continues, reaching into a box to start passing out small hand-held devices with a keypad on it. "That's why you were all taught codes. You know them. Use them to communicate. As soon as the targets are acquired, send out the correct code, and everyone else will hear the ping from their Notif, which will give us the clearance to start helping others."

Lily grabs her Notif when it's held out to her. She sort of hates it, just because there's a ridiculous amount of codes to have memorized, but she finds a helpful little tab when she boots it up that lists out codes for her. TA for target acquired, and the code to go with it being 0310. She starts internally chanting it in her brain, but stops when Kingsley begins talking again.

"We need two pings for targets acquired, one for each. There's no way to communicate which you've gotten, unfortunately, so we'll just be on the lookout for either in the case of one ping being sent out, meaning there's still one more target to find. Only once we've gotten two pings can we turn our attention to any others," Kingsley announces. "The most important thing; if your point-lead calls for the team to fall back, or sends out a fall back code, then you fall back immediately. Understood?"

A low murmur of agreement sweeps through the crowd.

"Good," Kingsley declares. "As soon as I call your name and assign you to your team, collect your gun and packs, then board the train—medics, you have the packs with the orange stripes. Clark, team B. Delworth, team B. Diggory, team A. Evans, team A. Fargo, team B…"

Lily breaks from the crowd to bypass the table on the way to the train, grabbing her medic pack and gun on the way. She doesn't put on her pack as she gets on the train, finding a seat so she can go through it. Technically, she already knows what she'll be equipped with, ammo and various things for triage medical purposes, but she still feels better exploring it and getting comfortable with where everything is.

So, that's what Lily does until the train starts moving, just familiarizing herself with her supplies, unloading and reloading her gun, trying to remain calm. Kingsley and Edgar go up and down the aisle, answering questions that Lily listens to, filing away the answers. When things get quiet, Kingsley dumps himself in the seat next to her.

"Team A, huh?" Lily asks lightly.

Kingsley shoots her a dry look. "You're too good of a shot to waste at the rendezvous point." When Lily grins, Kingsley chuckles and shakes his head, then his face softens as he catches her gaze. "Nervous?"

"Excited," Lily says, because she read somewhere once that the feeling of nervousness and the sensation of excitement come from the same place in your brain, and if you can convince your mind to believe it's one instead of the other, your brain doesn't know the difference. Honestly, it's not working.

"It's not going to be clean. Missions are never clean. They get messy and go wrong all the time," Kingsley warns her. "Just remember your priorities, and you'll be fine."

"Right. Euphemia and Fleamont Potter." Lily raises her eyebrows at him. "What's that all about, King?"

"None of our business, Red. We're just the feet on the ground going in and bringing them out," Kingsley murmurs.

Lily leans in, voice lowered, and mutters, "But if you had to take a guess?"

Kingsley glances around, then quietly says, "If I was guessing, I'd say it's a major turning point for the war. They're highly known figures—or Euphemia is, at the very least—and having a connection to James, Sirius, and Regulus is no coincidence."

Lily hums and leans back, turning her gaze down to her gun, staring at where the safety is on. It's a good metaphor for what's coming, she thinks, because the safety will eventually have to come off. Just the same, the war will eventually have to be fought. She thinks this just might be the first shot fired.

Of course, there have been a lot of recent missions bringing in people rescued from all over the districts. A lot have come from five, which must have been interesting for Kingsley, who is from there originally. Still, there haven't been any specific targets for a rescue mission before, and as far as Lily knows, they've never gotten a tip ahead of a riot either. War is coming, and it's coming fast. Very fast.

Mercy on them all when it gets here.

Aberforth answers the phone as soon as it rings. There's complete silence on the other end of the line, which makes him roll his eyes like he's young enough to do something like that again. Siblings will bring it out in you every time.

"Patronus?" Albus asks, and if Aberforth isn't mistaken, there's a hint of faint amusement in his voice.

"Goat," Aberforth says with a sigh, and if they were the young men they used to be, he's fairly certain that Albus would be snickering under his breath right now. "Are the ridiculous code words absolutely necessary, Albus?"

"Of course, or I would not insist on them," Albus says.

Aberforth doesn't believe that for a second. Albus used to love messing with people, and he doubts age has changed that very much. Perhaps made it more vindictive, if anything. "This is a secure line. You know it's me."

"I can never be sure that someone else hasn't found it, and if you don't respond with your proper answer, then it's a clear sign you're not alone or able to speak freely. It's a matter of safety and secrecy, Aberforth."

"Yeah, yeah, yeah. What do you want?"

Albus pauses, then murmurs, "These teams are on the way."

"Will they arrive in time?"

"I believe so, or very close to it."

Aberforth exhales. "They sent in a new head Auror. He arrived this morning and rounded up the rest with clearance from the Hallow to, ah, handle everything from here. He… I don't know what he did, Albus, but he had cases full of what looked like medicine of some sort. All the Aurors were gathered up for it."

"Not a good sign," Albus comments.

"Don't you think I know that?" Aberforth snaps.

Albus is silent for a long moment. When he does speak again, his voice is very quiet. "Flee, Aberforth. I'm asking you to—"

"No," Aberforth cuts in harshly. "I'm not leaving. It's my home, and these are my people. You may be fine with abandoning—"

"Aberforth," Albus interrupts, his voice sharper than it has been thus far, since Aberforth heard it decades ago, "your home is likely at great risk of being wiped right off the map, you and your people with it. If you stay, you will die."

"Then so be it," Aberforth says simply.

"You will be safe here, with me," Albus rasps.

Aberforth scoffs. "Do you think I am afraid, Albus? I'm not. If I die here, then I shall die with no regrets. Can you say the same?" Silence is his only answer. To drive the knife in deeper, Aberforth continues, "Our sister is buried here, Albus."

Again, more silence.

Helplessly, Aberforth turns his gaze to glance out his window, looking over the tree at the edge of his property. The one they planted for Ariana, along with her ashes beneath the base. He's seen the boy—the youngest Black—out there often, throwing his daggers at the bark, or simply sitting on the fruitful roots weaved through the earth below.

Sometimes, Aberforth would have to fight the physical urge to run the boy off, but the memory of Ariana always stopped him. She liked having friends, visitors, especially when it was those in need of comfort. Ariana was comforting, very kind, and she didn't like to be lonely. Every time he considered getting up to make the boy leave, it was like the echo of Ariana's small hand would come down on his shoulder and stop him. It was nice to feel her near again, and he has the boy to thank for that.

Aberforth knows he and Albus don't see eye-to-eye on this. Loyalty can manifest differently for everyone. Aberforth's loyalty keeps him here; Albus' loyalty took him away. He doubts they'll ever forgive each other for that.

"Aberforth," Albus says softly. "Please."

"Goodbye, Albus," Aberforth replies, and then he hangs up.

"Alright, everyone, get ready," Kingsley calls, pushing to his feet. "Remember, the Aurors will be armed and dangerous, so shoot to kill. Priority targets are Euphemia and Fleamont Potter. Let's move."

Lily swings her pack on her shoulders and grips her gun, flicking the safety off and following Kingsley off the train and up the hatch to the surface. They come out in the middle of the woods, moving in silence outside of the sound of their gear shifting and hitting their bodies.

Team B stops at the rendezvous point, which is the midway point between the district and the underground station. Team A carries on, cutting the group traveling together in half.

Lily would be lying if she said her heart wasn't racing right now, her palms a little sweaty from where she holds onto her gun. They went over everything on the train thoroughly, passing around photos of Euphemia and Fleamont, asking questions and coming up with scenarios to watch out for. Even still, Lily is on edge. She hasn't been this far out of the Phoenix in six years now. It's different than just sneaking to the surface through the vents.

District six is built like a square, and they're going right to the center courtyard, apparently. They start out at one corner, and Lily can't help but feel uneasy by the eerie silence and stillness that exists out here on the sidelines. Kingsley did warn them, making it clear that everyone would be gathered in one place.

It's not until they get closer that they hear the screaming.

"Spread out," Kingsley orders, glancing back at them. "Flank the courtyard and push in. Go now."

And so they do.

Lily slips off to the right and follows an alley in between two homes, jogging carefully with her gun down by her side. The shouting increases in volume as she gets closer. It feels like her blood turns to ice when she hears the spray of gunfire, the harsh crack and pop of bullets flying, accompanied with more screams and the sounds of pounding feet scattering all over.

There's a break at the end of the alley, and as soon as Lily swings around the corner, she has to fling herself back. She sucks in a sharp breath and cranes her head past the brick wall, her body tensing as she watches an Auror drag a man right through the street. He's not Fleamont, but…

Lily pushes herself forward at the same time that the Auror dumps the man on the ground, pinning him with their boot. They point their gun at his head, and before the trigger can be pulled, the Auror's head snaps to the side as their body falls. Lily lowers her gun, releasing a deep breath. Her fingers are steady, despite just pulling the trigger. The man on the ground doesn't even hesitate, scrambling for the gun off the body and darting off without even stopping to look to see who saved him. Lily stands there for a long moment.

She stands there.

Just stands there.

Lily has only ever shot one person, one Auror that had been chasing her while she was running, and she hadn't shot to kill. She'd only managed to shoot them in the knee, then kept running, and then she was shot in the shoulder for it. If Kingsley and his team hadn't arrived when they did, she suspects the next shot would have been to the head.

The Auror she shot died anyway, but she didn't kill them. She's never killed anyone, until now. A person. Someone who had a life to live until she took it away.

Someone who was about to take another's life, Lily reminds herself, firming her jaw and forcing herself to keep going. She jogs past the body and doesn't look back.

The closer to the courtyard she gets, the more chaos there is to find. People running. People screaming. People fighting, and people dying. There are dead bodies on the ground, some that are Aurors, some that are not.

Lily keeps going.

On the outskirts of the courtyard, Lily can see people from her team in the midst of fighting, Kingsley among them. Aurors are rounding people up and dragging them in the center building, shoving them in and keeping them in. Blowing out a deep breath, Lily starts running, then runs right into a fight, because an Auror quite literally slams directly into her.

It's immediately a mess. There's a lot of shouting, and she falls back into someone else, trying to get her bearings as the Auror swings their gun up. Lily blocks it and shoves it down, jerking her knee up into their abdomen and slamming her palm upwards against their nose with force. The Auror immediately grunts and stumbles back, clutching their face, and by the time they straighten up, Lily is pointing the gun between their eyes and pulling the trigger. The Auror falls.

Lily turns in just enough time to watch a woman tackle the other Auror to the ground, and the Auror doesn't seem to have a gun, which is probably for the best, or the woman would be dead. As it is, she puts up a valiant fight, scratching and clawing and snarling, quite the powerhouse, honestly.

Without waiting, Lily marches over and tugs the woman back, putting a bullet in the Auror's skull.

What Lily isn't expecting to happen is for the woman to launch herself off the ground and go right for Lily next. It catches her off-guard, and she grunts as she goes sailing backwards, hitting the ground so hard that her breath punches out of her. She only gets a flash of brown skin, curly hair, and frenzied black eyes before the gun in her hands is ripped away.

"Hey!" Lily shouts, scrambling to her feet at the same time the woman does, only to come to an immediate halt when she finds herself staring down the barrel of her own gun. Oh, what the fuck? Lily grinds her teeth. "Are you mental? Give that back. I'm here to help. Do I look like an Auror to you?"

"Don't care," the woman says shortly. "I need this."

Lily narrows her eyes. "Do you even know how to shoot a gun?"

"Pull the little trigger-thingy, right?" is the cold response.

"Oh, for fuck's sake. I don't have time for this," Lily hisses, taking a step forward. "Don't point a gun at someone if you're not going to pull the fucking trigger, and you're clearly—"

The woman lowers the gun and proceeds to fire it right at Lily's leg, which—okay, maybe that's a little on her, actually. Taunting someone with a gun—bad idea. Noted.

"You fucking shot me!" Lily bursts out as she crumbles to the ground, a line of fire licking along the outside of her thigh. It's just a graze, really, no entry or exit points, but it still fucking hurts. She gapes at the woman. "You… You shot me."

"Like I said, pull the little trigger-thingy," the woman repeats, taking a step back. "The name's Mary, by the way."

Lily releases a stunned huff of laughter, gaping up at her, at Mary, even as she says, "Lily. I'm Lily."

"Thanks for the gun, Lily," Mary tells her, then turns and takes off running without looking back. She's sprinting in fucking heels, too. Oh, she's insane, clearly.

Lily can only gape after her in pure astonishment for a moment, absolutely riveted by watching her go, and then the burning ache in her thigh reminds her of the severity of her situation. She's quite literally in an active war zone, in need of patching up, and in constant danger. There's no time to waste, and so she doesn't waste it.

The adrenaline helps her rush through slapping a bandage over the graze, because now isn't the time to worry about properly cleaning it and tending to it. She just has to get to a point that she can stand up and keep going, and as soon as she has, that's exactly what she does.

Thankfully, there's no shortage of guns in the courtyard between all the Aurors, though it's different ammo, so she won't be able to reload if she needs to. Doesn't matter. She throws herself at the first Auror she comes across, one that's dragging a teenage girl by her arm, the girl screaming and calling for her mother. The moment the Auror is distracted, the girl runs away, and Lily gets a new gun.

"No! No, Fleamont! Fleamont!"

The shout snatches Lily's attention, and she whips around in just enough time to catch Euphemia Potter running full tilt across the courtyard towards a group of Aurors that are dragging a man—Fleamont Potter—to the blocked off part of the courtyard, a whole line of Aurors keeping people in one spot. Lily shoves forward through the crowd, not close enough, but if she can get the right vantage point…

In the middle of everything, there's a fucking whipping post that halts Lily right in her tracks, memories flashing through her mind that make her stomach churn. Remus…

For a second, that's all she can see. Remus locked to the post, his back bleeding and torn to shreds, head slumped. Every time she found him like that, his breathing was so shallow. Past all the screaming and gunfire that rings in her ears, Lily swears that she can hear it again. How he breathed.

Just for a second.

And then Lily is rushing forward to grip the post and fling herself up on the structure that supports it, climbing higher until she can see right over the crowd. She raises her gun, breathes in and out, the whole world narrowing down to the four Aurors pulling Fleamont along.

One.

Two.

Three.

Four.

Quickly, one right after the other, the Aurors drop. She got two in the head, one in the thigh, and the last in the shoulder. It's the best she could do from this angle, but it's enough. It allows Euphemia to reach her husband, and she scrambles forward to drag one Auror back, slamming them ruthlessly down on the ground. She yanks so hard at their head that, even from here, Lily can see the awkward angle of their neck, indicating that Euphemia just broke it.

Kingsley is there, suddenly, shooting the last Auror in the head, no different than he did when it was Lily's life on the line, finishing what she started. He's there with the targets, and Lily starts climbing down, because she has no doubts that Kingsley will get them to safety.

Either way, they may need assistance, so Lily drops down and ignores the throbbing in her leg as she starts sprinting yet again. Her lungs are burning. Her heart is racing. Everything is so loud and bloody and quick. It's all happening so fast.

Kingsley and Amos are with Euphemia and Fleamont when she reaches them, and it's immediately clear that they're not quite managing to acquire the targets. Kingsley is doing his absolute best to coax Euphemia and Fleamont out of the district and to safety, but it's not working out so well for him.

"We can't just leave them!" Euphemia bursts out, shoving Kingsley's hand off her arm. "My back would be torn to shreds if these people didn't fight for me before the whip could ever be raised. They didn't even get to strap me to the post, and if you think I'm abandoning my neighbors, my people—"

"Listen to me, Mrs. Potter," Kingsley says soothingly.

"Yeah, really noble, but you're just keeping these people from better help than you and Mr. Potter alone could give them," Lily cuts in as she quite literally comes skittering up the steps, gun held secure by her hip. "As soon as you and your husband are at a secure location, the rest of the team are cleared to provide aid to everyone else. Sticking around for these people is actually worse for them, so fucking move already."

Kingsley sighs and gives her a look which quite clearly states really, there was no way you could have put that more delicately? This is ironic, seeing as they're surrounded by people dying at all sides. There's no fucking time to be delicate.

"Euphemia," Fleamont croaks, "you're bleeding."

In seconds, Lily has her pack off and she's kneeling on the step beside Euphemia, studying the gunshot wound on her abdomen. She grips Euphemia's hip and twists her, lips pressing into a thin line as she looks and feels for an exit wound, but doesn't find one. Lily rifles through her pack and does what she can for now, barely even listening as Euphemia stutters out reassurances to Fleamont, while Kingsley and Amos steadily try to coax them into agreeing to leave.

Lily focuses on her task and doesn't tune back in until she stands up and declares, "There's no exit wound, which could mean there's internal bleeding. Either way, wherever that bullet went, it's going to need to come out, so we need to get you medical attention sooner rather than later, Mrs. Potter. Now, Mr. Potter, if you don't want to see your wife die, you'll pick her up and drag her out of here if you have to."

That seems to be the right button to push, because Fleamont manages to do what no one else could—convince Euphemia to leave. Kingsley, Amos, and Lily travel swiftly together through the courtyard, ushering Euphemia and Fleamont along. It's hard to keep Euphemia from getting involved in fights; she keeps trying to stop and help people, and even Fleamont falls prey to the urge from time-to-time.

Lily can see a lot of people running ahead, and she knows there have to be some that have managed to escape already, but she's practically itching to get back here and help round up more people to save them. Focusing only on two targets is restricting, and Lily would much prefer—

"Stop it! Stop resisting! You're only causing trouble!"

"Let me go! Mum's over there. They took Mum!"

There's a lot of strange things that have taken place already, but Lily is admittedly baffled by the sight of two men—who are not Aurors, one older than the other—grappling with each other. The oldest is trying to snatch a gun from the youngest, and that's when Lily realizes that the young man is the one who was nearly shot earlier. He'd come back for his mother.

"You can never do as you're told!" the older man bellows, pitching himself forward with a scowl. "If you don't cause any trouble, if you just listen and follow the law, your mother will be fine. You're just making it worse. You make everything—"

The gun goes off, and the man releases a choked noise, stumbling back a step. The younger of the two holds the gun steady, jaw clenched as he continues to point it at the other man, not looking regretful in the slightest. The oldest man raises his fingers to his chest, where he's bleeding profusely.

"I told you to let me go, Dad," and oh, oh, that's his son. That man just shot his own father. "Mum is over there, and I'm getting her to safety. Not even you are going to stand in my way."

Lily exhales in surprise, but she turns to keep going just as the man crumbles to the ground, definitely mortally wounded. He was just shot in the chest point-blank. Unfortunately, the commotion managed to catch Euphemia's attention, and despite possibly being mortally wounded as well, she whips around to stare at Fleamont with wide eyes.

"Flea, it's Crouch," Euphemia hisses. "Our boy's boy's boy. Regulus' boy. We can't just—"

Fleamont's face twists, and then he groans, "Oh, alright."

"Wait, wait, don't—" Amos curses as they pivot in perfect sync and start right after the man —Crouch. Not the father bleeding out, but rather the son currently being body-blocked by three Aurors. Amos reloads his gun with a huff. "I have never met people so resistant to being saved in my life."

"Stay on the targets," Kingsley orders, and so they do.

Crouch visibly doesn't know his way around a gun, not with efficiency, but he's not scared to throw a punch, that much is obvious. He is, however, quite outnumbered at the moment, meaning Fleamont and Euphemia reach him just as he's being shoved to his knees, a gun pressed to his head. Fleamont slams into the Auror before they can pull the trigger, and Euphemia throws herself forward as well to shove another back, one arm wrapped around her middle and still fighting despite that.

Crouch goes for the third, gripping them by their sleeve and tossing them harshly to the ground. One doesn't need to know their way around a gun in close proximity; all you have to do, really, is point and shoot. Crouch does.

Euphemia wrestles the gun away from the Auror she attacked, also pointing and shooting without a second of hesitation. Lily and Amos barrel in to help Fleamont, who—despite being a very large man—is struggling to get the gun. Amos handles it for him, ruthlessly kicking the Auror in the face while Lily fists Fleamont by the back of his shirt and bodily drags him out of the line of fire, while Kinglsey takes aim and shoots.

Fleamont and Lily stumble all over each other, and then they collide to the ground in a messy tangle of limbs when a wash of screams split the air so loudly that it's like an explosion. It's a cacophony of pure, unadulterated agony, enough to make Lily's ears ring and her heart pound with fear. For a second, she's just clinging to Fleamont, her breath punching out of her as the screams get louder, and then—all at once—they both rush to push themselves up again.

The center of the courtyard is the source, and Lily can hear people trying to run away, still blocked by Aurors, begging and pleading to be set free. Then, one right after the other, those pleas give way to screams, too, adding to the rest.

The line of Aurors break, and someone comes stumbling out, but they're shrieking when they collapse to the ground, writhing in place and clawing at their own skin. From between the Aurors, a bright green fog begins to pour out.

"No! No, Mum! Mum!" Crouch bellows, throwing himself forward against Euphemia and Amos, who are desperately pushing him back. He fights against them, and Fleamont rips away from Lily to go help drag him back.

"Fall back! Everyone fall back now!" Kingsley shouts, his voice raised until it's almost booming, and he already has his Notif in hand, sending out the codes.

"Kingsley," Lily chokes out, "what the fuck is that? What's—"

"Fall back!" Kingsley roars. "Don't wait, just go!"

So, Lily does.

The screams get louder, closer, and Lily doesn't think. She just runs. She's not alone. Kingsley is shoving Euphemia in front of him to get her moving, while Amos and Fleamont bodily lift Crouch and take off running with him.

All around her, there's chaos. Shouts to run. Everyone trying to get away, knowing a threat when they see one. Lily sees Auror after Auror come pouring out of the fog, not screaming, completely unharmed. Those that aren't Aurors hit the ground in clear agony. The shrieks are spreading all over the courtyard now, more people falling to the ground and screaming like they're enduring the worst pain they've ever felt in their lives.

Lily keeps running.

There's a spray of gunfire towards the west side of the district, in the direction of the rendezvous point, and they all burst out to see a line of Aurors blocking the woods, guns held aloft. They start shooting the moment people arrive.

Lily scrambles to duck down behind a bin, her chest heaving as she squeezes her eyes shut and takes a second to make sense of what's happening. It comes to her slowly, too slowly, that the green fog is being used to kill people quickly, and those that try to run are met with bullets, leaving everyone trapped. They need a breach, or everyone is going to die.

Everyone is now running in the opposite direction, away from the gunfire, leaving the line of Aurors still in place, blocking the escape route. There are Aurors coming up behind as well. Lily has no fucking idea how they're going to—

"Get down!"

The warning comes from up ahead, and Lily's mouth drops open at the sight of a fucking grenade sailing right through the air, thrown by a man at the front bearing a startling resemblesance to Dumbledore.

Lily ducks down and feels the harsh impact of the explosion when the grenade goes off, the ground shaking and her ears ringing in the aftermath. It kicks up dirt and sends bodies flying, but—well, that's the breach they need.

"Go, go, go!" The older man who really could be mistaken for Dumbledore starts ushering people into the woods, and everyone makes use of the breach immediately.

Most of the Aurors in the line were blown up, but a few scattered, and fewer still remain. But they do, and they start shooting as people rush by, sending people to the ground.

Kingsley doesn't even have to give the order. Amos and Lily immediately start raising their guns to provide cover fire, trying to keep the opening. Some people are making it through and disappearing into the trees.

Lily presses forward, gaining more ground, and one Auror drops. Then another. A third. It takes Lily a second to realize that it's not all her and Amos. It takes her even longer to locate the rest. Mary, Crouch, and Euphemia have guns as well, and though they don't have the best aim, that isn't stopping them.

They're going to make it.

Lily can see that they are. Mary has a boy tucked up against her side, blocking him as she shoots. Crouch is a fucking mess, clearly, barely able to stand up straight, bloody and bruised and still bellowing about his mother. Euphemia is covering the rush of the crowd while Fleamont is directing them with the other man that looks like Dumbledore.

Then Kingsley is there, shouting for everyone to run, and Lily has never heard him sound so frantic. One daring glance over her shoulder tells her why. The green fog is catching up to them, spilling from the alleys behind them. It's a thick cloud that hangs low to the ground, not spreading higher, but traveling in one clump. Aurors dart out of it, unharmed.

From behind, a small family of three—one being a frightfully young child—comes rushing towards them, and Euphemia gasps out, "Andromeda!"

"Go, go, Ted, go," Andromeda is chanting, trying to push him away. She's hobbling, covered in blood, and he's helping her along with his arm around her waist, while his other arm is carrying the child, who is hiding their face in his neck.

"Help us, please," Ted chokes out, and it's like Fleamont fucking teleports, rushing to their sides. Ted immediately hands off the child, eyes wild and desperate. "Take her and go, make sure she gets out, I can't go fast enough and help Andy."

"I said for you to leave me," Andromeda hisses.

"Never, darling," Ted replies, nodding gratefully as Fleamont holds the sobbing child and immediately darts off.

"Pull back, we have to go now!" Kingsley orders, and that's the final call, but Lily still rushes over to help support Andromeda from the other side, helping her as much as she can.

Fleamont has already gone. Mary quite literally just snatches the boy up off his feet and fucking sprints, Crouch right behind her with Amos dragging him along. Kingsley and Lily bring up the rear with Euphemia, along with Ted and a very injured Andromeda.

The man who looks like Dumbledore doesn't move.

"Aberforth, are you mad?!" Euphemia shouts, pausing long enough to face him. "Come on!"

The man—Aberforth—just says, "No."

"Aberforth, we don't have time for this!" Ted snaps, actually trusting Andromeda with Lily and Kingsley as he breaks off to rush over to Aberforth.

"No! No, I'm not leaving!" Aberforth snarls, lashing out and shoving Ted away, his blue eyes flashing. "It's better to die here than—"

Aberforth doesn't finish, the rest of his words drowned out by the sharp crack of a gunshot, and Ted's head jerks to the side before his body falls to the ground.

Andromeda screams.

She screams in such a way that Lily thinks, for just a moment, that the green fog got her, too. A chill goes up Lily's spine, her breath punching out of her as she stares at Ted, wide-eyed, not moving. She doesn't rush forward to provide medical assistance. There's nothing to assist.

He was shot in the head. His death was instant.

Aberforth has gone pale, and for just a second, Lily wonders if he still thinks it's better to die here.

Andromeda flings herself on the ground beside Ted, sobbing and lashing out when Kingsley tries to pull her back. She clutches at him, chanting his name over and over, and Lily swallows past the lump in her throat to rush forward to help Kingsley, though it does little good. Andromeda isn't budging.

"Mary, keep going!" The shout from Euphemia is followed quickly by her arrival, accompanied by Crouch and Amos, the three of them surging forward to help as well. Euphemia crashes to her knees beside Andromeda and starts speaking rapidly. "I know, okay? I'm sorry, I know, but we have to move."

"Ted," Andromeda chokes out, curling down over his body, her shoulders heaving as she clings to him.

"Think about little Dora. She's your daughter, and she needs you, she still needs you, so you have to get up. I'm so sorry, but you have to get up now," Euphemia continues in a frantic rush, grabbing Andromeda by her shoulders and tugging. "Come on, we have to go. Don't do this. Andromeda—" Between Euphemia and the rest, they manage to drag Andromeda off and away, having to keep a firm hold of her while she screams and sobs and fights each of them. They have no choice, no other options, and they have to go. So, they do. They all do, except for Ted, whose body remains vacant and still on the ground until it's swallowed by a green fog, disappearing from sight and left behind.

They run. They make it to the rendezvous point. Everyone who got out in time reaches the safety of the train. By the time they make it there, Lily has run out of bullets, and she doesn't know how many people she's killed. But she's alive, and so are the targets, and so is everyone else who made it.

Most didn't.

Chapter End Notes

for those of you here for the warnings and such:

people you know that die in this chapter:
barty's parents
ted (andromeda's husband)

if you want to skip the war portion, don't read the second lily pov. ill put a summary of what happens below for those who want to know, but don't want all the heavy, descriptive details:

lily is selected for a mission to rescue effie and monty from district six. the team going in gets there before effie can be punished for assaulting aurors at the reaping. the district is in a state of chaos, and lily kills the auror who was about to kill barty. it was her first kill. she bumps into mary, who is fighting an auror. after lily helps her, mary proceeds to attack her and take her gun. they get into a mild argument, in which lily informs mary to not point a gun at someone if she isn't going to shoot. mary proceeds to shoot her in the leg. it's a graze on her thigh, so lily is fine. mary runs away, and lily returns to the mission at hand.

she hears effie screaming for monty and assists in saving monty from aurors by climbing on the whipping post and shooting them. when she reaches them, along with kingsley and amos diggory, effie has been shot (she has a POV, she'll be fine), but this is what helps coax her into actually leaving the district. on the way, they come across barty, who is arguing with his father and fighting over a gun. barty's mother has been taken to a part of the courtyard where large groups of people are being held by aurors. barty shoots his father and intends to go save his mother. effie and monty run to go help him.

the horcrux hornet venom has been made into a "green fog" that does no differently than it would from the horcrux hornet itself. when inhaled, people die swiftly and in a lot of pain. the aurors release it on the district, which is when barty's mother dies and everyone has to run. the exit out of the district is blocked by aurors, but aberforth throws a grenade to make a breach. andromeda, ted, and nymphadora arrive—andy very injured. fleamont takes dora and flees. everyone else tries to run as well, except for aberforth. ted goes back for him and is shot in the head.

everyone else makes it out—effie, monty (with nymphadora) barty, mary (and her little brother), andromeda, kingsley, amos, lily, and aberforth. it's noted that most of the district didn't make it out at the end.

for everyone else...

there's something i wanted to address here that has less to do with the chapter and more to do with the fic overall:

❗ PSA PLEASE READ THIS, IF NOTHING ELSE ❗

ive been seeing a lot of people being upset by the fic for being angsty/heavy, or not liking certain things about how the story is going, or how they ASSUME the story is going to go. and like, i get it, things aren't great at the moment in the fic, but i am imploring you to not be rude/angry at me about something that you haven't even read yet. you don't know what's coming in the future or how it will be resolved, and to automatically assume that i won't do it justice by your standards in my story is unfair and actually pretty disappointing. like, to be completely honest with you, id really just rather you not read the fic at all if you're not happy with what you're reading, or just wait until you know the resolution is here before you pick it back up again.

i warned all the way back in chapter one that this fic would be very heavy and very angsty, and you chose to read it. you can choose to stop as well, if you don't like it, and that's OKAY. that's valid. the warnings are there for a reason, please don't hesitate to use them and just nope out of the fic. genuinely, just don't read if you're not enjoying it, because seeing people be rude/harsh about it is just...exhausting, honestly.

im just asking for everyone to be patient and trust the process, or quit reading altogether, and not be rude no matter your decision. the warnings are there. i do everything i can to make this fic as safe as possible for everyone who wants to read it, and i support anyone who can't/doesn't want to. the same respect i try to give to all of you is all im asking for in return. you're here because you choose to be here. if you're not happy here, choose to leave.

Regulus stares over the edge of the balcony from his chair, feeling the gentle breeze run fluttering fingers through his hair. The Hallow is busy today. There's a crowd of people standing down below with posters, protesting.

It's strange. Regulus has never given much thought to how the Hallows views the Victors. Tributes? Yes, he knows they just view them as new characters to meet, to fall in love with, to inevitably watch die. But the Victors? Well, Regulus is only just realizing it, but the Hallows do not fuck around when it comes to their beloved Victors. Their favorites. Their celebrities.

Riddle has possibly made a mistake, and maybe Regulus is relishing in that a bit too much. The reintroduction parade yesterday went just as the first one he participated in did, except this time he was standing next to his brother when he was shown off to the Hallows.

But the Hallows know him already, or they believe they do, and they definitely believe they know Sirius. There wasn't an outcry of excitement and delight for what's to come. Instead, the crowd was fucking furious . People were sobbing; people were yelling in protest; people were looking at Victors that were supposed to be safe and raging that they no longer were.

It struck Regulus then that there were people out there in that crowd that love him. Not traditionally, not truly, because they don't actually know him, not really. But, in some unfathomable way, they have love for him. He means something to some of them. Some idolize him. Some care about his well-being.

It's completely detached from reality, yes, but they do. James would find beauty in that. Regulus, of course, struggles to. It annoys him, honestly. Nonetheless, he finds it fucking hilarious that Riddle isn't getting the reception he was likely hoping he would. There are some people excited, sure, but a lot of them are not happy about their favorites being tossed back into the arena. Yeah, Regulus isn't too happy about it either.

So, the protesters down below are a genuine source of entertainment for him at the moment. These people dragged themselves out of their homes to stand on the street and shout about how unfair this is. They literally organized a protest to address what's wrong. They're a bit late to that realization—it would have been nice if they had seen it years ago—but he supposes they've got the spirit.

"That's not going to end well, you do realize?" Remus mutters, but he doesn't sound like he actually cares.

Regulus hums. "Yes, I know."

"You seem pleased."

"It'll piss Riddle off, probably, so I am."

Remus snorts. "Alright, that's fair."

They lapse into silence, just listening to the indistinguishable shouts from down below. They're too high up to be seen, so they're the hidden spectators enjoying the show for once. Sometimes, turning tables can be fun.

Remus has been out here on the balcony with him ever since they bumped into each other in the kitchen in the early corners of this morning. Sirius, Pandora, and James hadn't woken up yet, but Regulus hadn't even slept the night before. Remus turned up, just like he's supposed to, but it didn't take very much to get him to abandon making breakfast and come outside with him instead.

They haven't talked about it.

Any of it.

Regulus knows that Remus is aware Sirius is going back into the arena with him. He knows this because he heard Remus crying all the way from his room. Just another person who is hurt because of Regulus. Sirius would be safe right now, if he hadn't—but he did. He did, and now Regulus knows what Remus sounds like when he weeps. It's heart-rending.

"You seem better, you know," Remus announces abruptly. Regulus swivels his head to arch an eyebrow at him, but Remus doesn't look ashamed. "I mean it. Despite…all of this, you've come a long way. I thought—well, I got to see so little of you over this past year, so I figured you'd like to know that there's visible improvement."

"I, um. I mean, I've gotten better in some ways. In other ways, it's still much of the same," Regulus murmurs. He clears his throat and looks away. "Less nightmares, even if they haven't fully gone away. Less paranoia. Less aversion to contact. Still can't fucking shower, but…it's gotten a easier to navigate."

Remus' lips curl up. "That's good, Regulus."

"It's redundant," Regulus corrects bluntly. "I got better—I was still getting better, and just in time for—"

Regulus cuts himself off, and they fall silent, because there it is. Neither of them speak for a long moment, the weight of reality bearing down on them. When Regulus turns his head, Remus is staring listlessly down at his fingers, his mouth twisted like he's trying so hard to fight some great emotion.

"He volunteered for me again," Regulus says, and Remus' head snaps up. Something passes between them, that knowledge sitting between them. Regulus can see it there, in Remus' eyes, the realization that, if not for Regulus, Sirius would be safe. It's painful to see. "We promised each other we wouldn't, and he still did. Isn't that the worst thing you've ever heard?"

Remus' face scrunches a little, making the scar there crinkle up in certain places. "You're angry with him."

"Angry doesn't even begin to cover it," Regulus admits.

"Regulus," Remus chokes out, shaking his head.

"You can hate me for it. Do what you need to do, and I've—got your back on that," Regulus continues, fighting the swell of emotion making his chest feel tight. "But don't forget to hate him for it, too. I begged him not to, Remus. He did this."

Remus squeezes his eyes shut. "I don't hate you, Regulus. I don't hate him either."

I wonder what that's like, Regulus thinks.

They fall silent again, the ease between them gone; he misses it already, but there's nothing he can do to get it back, because they're all trapped in this, stuck with this fucked up reality they can't break free from. This is all there is, for all of them.

Down below, Aurors arrive to break up the protest, and the show comes to an end.

Sirius knows Remus is avoiding him. Bit of a prick move to go hide with Sirius' brother to do it, but Sirius isn't stupid. He knows Remus wants space right now. He can't blame him.

The thing is, Sirius doesn't know what to do about this. Of course he wants to respect Remus' need for space, but he also wants to spend as much time with him that he can while he still has the chance. At this point, they're all just wasting time.

And 'all' does include James, yes, who is throwing his version of a tantrum at the moment. Sirius isn't agitated by it; he's the last person who gets to judge someone for throwing tantrums, with Regulus being a close second. Maybe that's why they're allowing James to do it without interference, without speaking up, without stepping in to try and make it better. The truth is, Sirius thinks they both—he and Regulus—have this inner fear that they're only capable of making it worse.

Honestly, Sirius is just scared overall. He can't remember a time that James was this angry. Like, about anything. It doesn't help that Regulus is just as furious—or no, he's something else, something worse, somehow. Not angry. Just done. When it comes to Sirius, he's just done.

So, in reality, Sirius wants to go find Remus and hold onto him, bury his face in Remus' shoulder and waste the whole day away just hiding there. They've already wasted half the day already. Technically, Sirius and Regulus could be making use of the training room today, but neither of them have bothered. Sirius doubts most of the tributes will bother, honestly, at least on the first day. Tomorrow, before the evaluations? Yeah, probably. Sirius will pop in long enough to secure allies for him and Regulus, then come right back to Remus, because he's more than confident in his abilities to fight, thank you.

However, Remus needs…space right now, so Sirius is left with what he's really dreading, possibly for the first time in his life. Well, the first time that he can recall, at least.

"James?" Sirius calls weakly, knocking on his door. "Can I come in?"

"Yes, fine," is James' quiet response.

Sirius shuffles in warily, his lips tipping down when he finds James sitting on his bed against the wall, head resting back against it, eyes shut. James doesn't open his eyes, not even when Sirius sinks down on the edge of the bed.

"Can we talk?" Sirius asks.

"Go for it," James mumbles, his voice bland and lifeless.

"Are you, ah, alright?"

"Does it look like I'm alright, Sirius?"

Grimacing, Sirius reaches up to rub his palm over his mouth, then heaves a sigh and lets his shoulders slump. "Okay, just get it over with. Go on, let it out. Yell your head off."

"I don't want to yell," James says.

"Think you might need to, though," Sirius tells him, trying to prepare himself for it. His stomach is in knots, and James doesn't bother responding at all. "If—if you just get it out, and you can get past this, then—"

"There is no getting past this," James interrupts, and he doesn't sound angry. He sounds exhausted.

"Please don't say that, James," Sirius croaks.

James' eyes flutter open, and he just looks at Sirius, just studies him slowly, diligently. Softly, he says, "You're planning to get him out."

Sirius takes a deep breath, then nods. "Of course I am."

James makes a harsh, choking noise. "What do I do with that? What am I supposed to do with that, with any of this? It's all fucked. How could he do this to me?"

"There was no right answer to this," Sirius rasps. "There was no way any of us could—could get through this without it all going to shit. The truth is, we were all fucked either way."

"You broke your promise, too," James whispers.

Sirius swallows harshly. "Yeah, I—I did. James, I didn't mean to. I heard his name, and I just—I couldn't just—"

"He meant to," James says, his voice cracking. "That's the difference. He lied to me, on purpose, Sirius. He was always planning this, and—and I can't—it's all such a mess, because my mum is safe because of him, but he still—it's not that I want her in danger, or you, it's just that he meant to—"

"James," Sirius cuts in gently.

"This hurts so fucking much," James chokes out. "It hurts, and he knew it would, and he meant to hurt me."

"It was always going to hurt anyway, no matter how it went, and I'm sorry that it is. I'm sorry that I have to leave you. I'm so sorry, James." Sirius blinks past stinging eyes. "I can go in and make sure he gets out, and you two will—you'll work it out. You'll live and be happy, and I'll—I'll still be there, because just like you're always with me, I'm always with you."

"But you won't be," James says, his chin wobbling.

"Forgive me anyway," Sirius begs, because he needs it, even if it's a lie. He doesn't want to die without James' forgiveness.

James seems to choke on a sob, gasping on it, shuddering and shaking through it as he hunches in himself and breaks down all at once. And still, through his tears, for Sirius, he finds it within himself to say, "I do. I do forgive you, Sirius."

"James," Sirius says, his voice soft and hoarse, and he slides further up the bed cautiously, unsure if—

The moment he comes within range, James unfurls and reaches out to snatch him close, clinging to him as he heaves out deep, gasping sobs. James' fingers twist in the back of his shirt, holding him so tight that it's hard to breathe, but Sirius grasps him back and lets his lungs protest.

"I can't, I can't do this, Sirius, I can't, please," James whimpers, the words tumbling out of his mouth. He doesn't stop crying for a long time, but when he does, he sags into Sirius' arms and repeats, "I can't do it."

"You don't have a choice," Sirius murmurs, peeling back and grasping James by his shoulders, holding his gaze.

"Yeah, because of him," James says, and there's strength in his voice again, finally, fueled by anger. "You think me and him will be happy? You're wrong. I fucking hate him. I hate your stupid fucking brother and his stupid fucking lies and his—"

"Alright, lay off," Sirius cuts in, a little sharp, but James just continues to glare. "Look, you need to—"

"I don't want to talk about him," James interrupts coldly. "We won't work it out. Me and him, we won't be happy, Sirius. He's—I just can't. He's the one who—he—"

"Regulus. His name is Regulus. You can say it."

James purses his lips and looks away, stubborn.

"Listen to me," Sirius insists, "if you don't—"

"I won't talk about him," James corrects, his eyes flashing, jaw firming. "I'm not doing it, Sirius. It's done. Me and him—we are done. I hate him, and that's it."

Sirius heaves a sigh and pulls his hands back. "James—"

"I said that's it!" James explodes, and Sirius instantly shuts up. Alright, so James isn't ready to talk about Regulus. Got it. Maybe it's best if Sirius revisits this later.

"Okay, sure, that's it," Sirius mutters, not believing it for a second. "You, ah, hate him. Not my business, but his well-being is my business as his brother, so… Well, whatever else, I know I can ask this of you and be certain that you'll do it. I'm going to make sure he makes it home, so just… Take care of Regulus, James, please."

The last time Sirius asked James that, he was sixteen and heading for the arena. James didn't get to answer then before Sirius was dragged away, and he doesn't answer now, but Sirius doesn't need a response to know he'll try his best.

He always does.

"Ah, are you all avoiding me, then?" Pandora asks, poking her head out the door to the balcony.

Remus points at himself and corrects, "Sirius, actually."

"And James," Regulus mutters, raising a hand.

"Fair enough," Pandora muses as she sweeps out to plop in the chair across the table. "Suppose I'll come avoid them, too."

"What reasons do you have to avoid them?" Remus asks, lips twitching as he arches an eyebrow at her.

"Well, Sirius is all mopey, which makes me sad," Pandora explains, shooting Remus a pointed look. Right after, she shoots Regulus a pointed look, too. "And James is all…angry, which makes me concerned. I need a break, honestly, so neither of you are allowed to be anything other than calm and neutral for the next five minutes, please and thank you."

Remus chuckles and echoes her with, "Fair enough."

For the next five minutes, they literally do not speak or do anything other than gaze out over the balcony. Pandora starts humming quietly, and it's soothing. Remus closes his eyes and tips his head back, breathing in and out, in and out.

"Pandora," Regulus says, eventually.

"Hm?"

"I—I wanted to ask… How's your father?"

Remus opens his eyes and glances over at Pandora, who takes a deep breath, then mumbles, "He's—yeah, he's still mostly the same. Still sick. Not getting better, and—and the healers say there's not much time left, maybe a month or two."

"I'm sorry," Regulus murmurs. "I wanted to… Well, I had hoped that I could—be there for you when…" He exhales and looks away. "The only reason I brought it up is because, ah, I have a bit of advice. Just, um, have someone with you when you're sorting through his things. It helps."

"Okay. Thank you," Pandora whispers. She pauses, then frowns at him. "Wait, I thought you said you didn't know anything about the process?"

Regulus blinks at her. "Oh, well I still don't, really, but my parents died on the last night of the victory tour. House fire. We found out when we got back. It was—well, we're certain it was Riddle's doing, but either way—"

Remus is up and out of his chair in a heartbeat, jerking the door open and practically sprinting through Regulus' room and down the hall. He bursts into Sirius' room and finds it empty, then swivels to go to James' next. Doesn't even knock, too frantic to even consider it, and Sirius is there with James, both of their heads snapping up as he rushes in.

Sirius springs up off the bed, swiveling towards him with wide eyes, seeming to hold his breath.

"Your parents died," Remus chokes out. "Your parents died, and I didn't know, and I wasn't there. I couldn't be there."

"Remus," Sirius says, his face softening.

"I'm sorry," Remus tells him, heartfelt and desperate, full of so much regret and sorrow and grief for so many things, because it's hitting him all at once that he misses so much with Sirius, too much, and here he is like a damn fool, missing more.

"Okay, hey, it's—that's okay, Remus. It's not your fault. Come on, don't do that, yeah?" Sirius moves closer, holding out his hand with visible trepidation. "Let's just—we'll go and talk about it, alright? Can we go? Will you go with me?"

Remus would honestly follow Sirius anywhere, into anything. He reaches out and takes Sirius' hand. Sirius shares a look with James, who nods in silence, offering Remus a weak, trembling smile. It's clear that he's been crying.

A few moments later, Sirius is leading Remus right into his room and straight to the bed. He kicks off his shoes and drops Remus' hand, climbing into bed and getting situated before peering up at him with blatant hope in his eyes.

"I'm sorry," Remus whispers again as he slides into bed next to Sirius, curled up on his side, facing him. Just looking at each other. Not touching. "I should have been there."

"Remus, you quite literally couldn't," Sirius murmurs. "And I don't blame you for that. And…actually, in a way, you were there for me, really. You know, I would go out every night and talk to the moon like I was talking to you, and I was. Every time, I was just talking to you, and talking to you helped. Even with my parents dying, it helped."

"It's not the same," Remus croaks.

"But it was something," Sirius says softly. "To me, that was everything. Please don't diminish the way you managed to take care of me, even when you couldn't be there."

Remus blinks hard and fast, swallowing thickly. "Okay, I won't do that, then. But I've—I failed to be here for you today, Sirius, and I'm sorry for that."

"You're human, Remus, and you needed space," Sirius tells him. "There's nothing wrong with that. It's okay."

"I didn't," Remus rasps. "I'm just scared."

Sirius' eyes go gentle, unbearably so, and he reaches out tentatively to cup Remus' jaw. The moment he leans in, Remus meets him halfway, sinking into their first kiss since their last at the party on the victory tour. Sirius' mouth is just as warm, just as inviting, as Remus remembers it.

"I love you more than the tides love the moon," Sirius breathes out, shifting closer, his fingers trembling as they drift down the side of Remus' neck. "I'm as temperamental as the ocean, and just the same, I'm at your mercy. Give me a ship, and I will wreck it at your command."

"Sirius," Remus whispers, struggling not to fall into Sirius' tender croon and the gentle give of his body.

"Can't steal the moon, can't keep the stars, but can't we be grateful to love them anyway? Despite everything, I'm grateful to love you, Remus," Sirius whispers back. "Are you?"

"Yes, sweetheart, of course," Remus confesses, his voice catching, a little choked up, because it's true now more than ever. He has a galaxy of stars in his arms, and he can't keep it.

Remus ducks in and kisses Sirius just so he won't cry.

Sirius makes a soft noise into his mouth, hand sliding around to cradle the back of Remus' neck, holding him there. It's a slow kiss, deep and unhurried, reverent and thorough. Remus takes the time to relearn Sirius' lips, not that he ever forgot them, but he does fall into the relief of meeting them again after so long. He can't help it. Sirius is worse than a fucking drug, and Remus never wants to quit him.

"Oh, oh fuck, I missed you. I've missed this," Sirius mumbles as he scoots even closer, inhaling sharply as he slides his hand up into Remus' hair. "Shit, I've missed you so much."

"Not a day has gone by where I haven't thought about you, Sirius," Remus replies. "I closed my eyes every night and dreamt of you. It's always you, in any world, in any lifetime."

Sirius, after all this time, still blushes as beautifully as ever. Warmth pulses in Remus' chest when he sees it, that flush that rises to his cheeks when he's flustered, or pleased, or all of that and more. He's precious. Just precious.

"Any lifetime?" Sirius bites his lip. "What about the next?"

"That one, too," Remus murmurs. "Maybe it'll be kinder to us than this one has been."

"Maybe, but for now, this one isn't so bad," Sirius tells him, his breath hitching as he finally slots into place, where he's been trying to get this whole time, pressed right up against Remus. He looks so pleased with himself. "No, not so bad at all, not at the moment. Because here you are. Here we are, for now."

"It's something," Remus says, lips curling up.

"It sure is," Sirius agrees and sounds wholly, wholeheartedly content and adoring about every bit of something they get to have. It's never nothing, and that's always been enough, hasn't it? It still is. It has to be.

Remus finds himself being kissed again, with more fervor this time, more intensity and purpose. Sirius' fingers tighten in his hair, and Remus adjusts. The tone shift steals his focus until he's gripping his way down Sirius' thigh, finally hooking his fingers under his knee and tugging Sirius' leg over his hip.

Sirius moans into the kiss, loud and proud about it, and this sends a helpless thrill through Remus immediately. He wrenches Sirius closer, suddenly bereft for all the day he's wasted so far not doing exactly this. A fog fills his head, and he breaks the kiss to mouth his way down to Sirius' throat.

"Oh, yes, that's—mm, Remus, wait a second," Sirius wheezes, and so Remus does, pulling back to blink at him.

"Alright?" Remus checks.

"Brilliant," Sirius says weakly, and then he coughs a little, his face turning a vibrant red. "I just—well, I was wondering if we could… Um."

Remus smiles at him fondly. "You want to try something? You can just ask, Sirius, it's fine. I'll probably say yes anyway. I can't imagine there's anything I wouldn't do, as long as I'm doing it with you."

That's the right thing to say. Remus can tell immediately that he just hit the bullseye, because Sirius relaxes, and his eyes light the fuck up like he's just discovered a new function on a toy he never even knew existed. Oh, it does this, too? Yes, yes, it does. Remus struggles to stifle a laugh at the pure delight on Sirius' face, his palpable excitement and glee.

"I want to try—the other way," Sirius tells him. "Let me give it a go at realigning your spine this time, if that's alright."

Remus snorts. "Do you actually think of it like that? As that phrase, I mean. Spine realignment."

"James is a terrible influence, but no one knows that because they think he's all sweet and innocent. He is not. He's a naughty little heathen who—" Sirius gasps, and then he props up on his elbow. "Remus, they did that. The spine realignment; it happened. Well, probably. I don't know the details, thankfully, but you get my point."

"James and Regulus?" Remus asks, eyebrows shooting up.

Sirius nods like a bobblehead. "They spent, like, two days straight just…" He wrinkles his nose. "Well, you know."

"So, what the fuck happened?" Remus blurts out. "Regulus didn't say much, but I gather they're…fighting? I mean, I know this is all shit, but James seems really, ah…"

"Regulus volunteered for James," Sirius murmurs, and Remus sucks in a sharp breath in between his teeth. "Yeah, but it gets worse. He, um, sort of promised James he wouldn't—I mean, we all promised we wouldn't volunteer for each other—but Regulus was lying about it. I didn't—I wasn't lying when I promised Regulus not to volunteer for him, or I didn't think I was, but then I heard his name, and I—I couldn't just—and now Regulus fucking hates me, like genuinely. He says I'm dead to him. And James says he hates Regulus, except of course he doesn't, and it's—it's all just such a mess, Remus."

Remus blinks. A lot. All he can say is, "Oh, that's so fucked up. All of this is so fucked up."

"I know," Sirius agrees with a groan, dropping his head forward to bang it against Remus' shoulder, and then he pops right back up. "I don't want to think about it anymore. You never said if—if we could…do that. If you don't want to, that's okay. We can do something else. Or if you don't—"

"Sirius," Remus cuts in, before he can ramble and talk himself out of it entirely, "it's fine. We can do that."

"Yeah?" Sirius breathes out, his face flushing again, but as a sign of eagerness. His eyes dance with anticipation.

"Yeah," Remus confirms, lips curling up, his own anticipation causing a spread of warmth under his skin.

Like he can feel it, as if he's drawn in by it, Sirius surges forward to kiss him, and Remus is so grateful that he did.

Sirius works with Pandora to round everyone up closer to the evening. James and Remus stand in a corner and murmur back and forth while Sirius and Pandora squabble about how to get the screens set up for what they need. Regulus sits in silence, staring down at his fingers without a word.

In the end, Sirius and Remus sit together, and Regulus sits alone, while James, who won't even fucking breathe in his direction, takes a seat next to Pandora. Regulus also won't even acknowledge Sirius' presence in any capacity.

"Right," Pandora says with a deep breath. "So, the schedule is the same as usual, despite being the Quarterly Memorial. The training room will be open today and tomorrow, and in the evening tomorrow, they'll do evaluations. It's very—relaxed this year, less of a required attendance, so you can go or not go as you like. The next day are the interviews, and then—"

She doesn't finish, but they all know.

"I doubt most people will be going to the training room, and I'm just—not," Sirius declares bluntly. He clears his throat and looks at Remus. "I'll pop in tomorrow just to get allies for me and Reggie, but otherwise I'm not wasting time in there."

"Is it a waste, though?" Remus asks wearily. "I mean, no offense, Sirius, but it has been… eleven years since you've, um, had to…you know, fight. If—if you needed to brush up—"

Sirius can't stop himself from laughing. The sound of it doesn't really feel appropriate for the current atmosphere, but he can't help it. Remus blinks at him, startled, and James coughs like he's struggling not to laugh, too. Pandora tucks her lips in, visibly amused. Regulus doesn't react at all.

"Trust me, I'll be fine," Sirius assures him, wholeheartedly confident about this.

Remus still looks unconvinced, which is sort of cute, honestly. Like he can't even imagine Sirius being a threat. "Being cocky isn't the same as being competent, you know."

"No? You don't believe me?" Sirius challenges, raising his eyebrows slowly and tilting his head. Remus' gaze flicks over his face, lingering on Sirius' mouth where a slow grin spreads, and then he narrows his eyes when he looks back up, slowly shaking his head. Sirius hums and hauls himself up to his feet, reaching out to put his foot against the coffee table and slowly push it back to make room. When he turns back around, he claps his hands. "Alright, come on."

"What?" Remus blinks again. "Where am I going? What are we doing?"

Sirius snorts and reaches down to grab Remus' hand, tugging him to his feet. "Since you doubt me, I'll prove it to you. Strong as you are, surely you can take me, right?"

"That's not what I meant," Remus says weakly, his hands hanging limp by his sides. "I just—I was only saying not to neglect the opportunity to—"

"No, no, I wouldn't want to be too cocky, Remus," Sirius interrupts, waving his hands and stepping back. He bites down on a smile when Remus heaves a sigh, still grumbling that he didn't mean it like that, but Sirius isn't insulted anyway. "I'm about to show you that you have nothing to worry about. Now, take a step forward. Just one."

"This is—maybe it's just me, but it feels very…" Remus coughs and gives him a look. Sirius waggles his eyebrows at him, and he actually flushes a little. Oh, he's into this. He's so into this right now. Sirius has never felt such glee in his life.

"Come here," Sirius insists, crooking a finger at him.

Remus huffs out a weak laugh, shaking his head, but he does indeed take a step forward, and his hands come up almost automatically, like his first instinct is always to reach for Sirius the moment he comes within range. This time, he doesn't make it that far. Sirius darts his hand out to grab his wrist, tugging sharply and kicking out with his foot to hook it around Remus' knee, sweeping his leg out from underneath him and sending him straight to the floor. It happens in about five seconds, and then Remus is landing flat on his back with a thud and a punched-out oof.

Sirius clicks his tongue and rolls his head to the side, peering down at Remus with a quiet hum. Remus blinks up at him, wheezing a little bit. He looks good like that. Well, he always looks good, but Sirius is not immune to the sight of a dazed Remus Lupin, gazing at him without hiding his awe. He saw it earlier when they were—

"You barely even moved," Remus blurts out. "What the fuck?"

"You think I spent the last eleven years doing nothing, Remus? Maybe it's the trauma, but you don't really just stop being prepared for anything after the arena, especially when you're a mentor," Sirius tells him, amused. He holds his hand out, smiling gently. "Let me help you up. Are you alright?"

"Oh, I've never been better," Remus replies, reaching up to grasp Sirius' hand and let himself be hauled up, eyes bright as they rake up and down Sirius' body. "Competent. Right, got it. You've certainly made your point."

"Want to know something sexy?"

"Absolutely I do."

Sirius grins at him. "I can do that swing thing where I, like, climb your body while you're standing and toss you to the ground with my thighs wrapped around your head."

"I don't believe you. I need proof immediately," Remus says, and Sirius bursts out laughing, shuffling forward to slip his arms around Remus, muffling his laughter in his shoulder.

Remus chuckles and presses a kiss to his temple, squeezing his hips before ushering them back to their seats. Sirius feels better, just knowing that Remus is—well, he's not okay, last night was proof of that, but he's not letting that come in between them. It's a huge relief, honestly, because Sirius was so scared that Remus would pull away permanently.

They never have enough time, and Sirius doesn't want to waste one second that they do have. He wants to spend as much time together as he can get away with just being…happy, or as happy as they can be with all of this going on.

"Alright," Sirius announces. "Today, we're brushing up on the other Victors and their games, which means we're watching highlights and taking notes. It'll be, like, a group-bonding activity for all of us. Get cozy, turn the lights down low, kick back and relax a little as we—"

"Sirius," James says shortly, and Sirius promptly shuts up.

"I thought it was funny," Remus whispers in his ear, most likely just indulging him, but it makes Sirius press a smile into his shoulder nonetheless. Remus slips an arm around him, one hand coming up to lazily play with his hair, and this—it's exactly this that Sirius wants. Just this. Them.

Their something.

Regulus is pretty sure he's got the layout of the land as far as the other tributes go. There's Sirius, of course, whose games Regulus knows backwards and forwards; it's practically engraved into his brain, even eleven years later.

In district one, there's Bellatrix and Narcissa, which is a whole mess just on its own, and that's not including how fucking ruthless they both were in their games.

Bellatrix approached her games like—well, like a mad woman. She was a death eater—of course she was—and she had no shame in slaughtering anyone she came across. The death eaters made it to the end in a group of five, and Bellatrix was the last one standing after they turned on each other.

Narcissa was not a death eater, but she seemed to have made allies with the death eaters and practically every other tribute that was willing to fight. She portrayed herself as delicate, in need of protection, and she barely had to lift a finger until it came time to shoot someone in the back. And she did exactly that, over and over again. She even did it to win. Literally, at the end of the games, she shot a man in the back with an arrow before he could even realize that the previous cannon meant there were only two tributes remaining.

From two, there's Yaxley and Rabastan Lestrange, both death eaters in their games. Yaxley won by riding the coattails of his betters and getting lucky in the end. Rabastan won by being a favorite among the sponsors and getting a lot of support.

District three is Alecto and Thorfinn—also both death eaters in their games. Both strong, both ruthless, both smart. It's the blatant intelligence that really worries Regulus, because most death eaters—from what he's seen—win because of brute strength or just a group effort until the very end, as well as favoritism from the sponsors. But Regulus can tell that Alecto and Thorfinn are two to watch out for, because they're the sinister sort completely unafraid to play mind games, too.

Four is Majesty, who wasn't a death eater, but they were a little thief. Secretive and light on their feet, Majesty won the games by literally sneaking around, planting bombs and mines, then running away. They never actually fought anyone, moving through shadows and staying out of sight. Another smart one. Asher, in contrast, poisoned a water supply and killed everyone off that way; her games lasted two days, and she came out entirely unscathed.

Alice Fortescue and Augusta Longbottom from five, and Regulus can tell that this is difficult for Sirius the moment the highlight reels start playing. Alice won their games a year before James and Regulus, and they did so more traditionally, just by fighting when they had to. They weren't a death eater, and they had to kill a couple of death eaters they came across, but other than that, they mostly stayed to themselves until the very end where there was a brutal fight that only they got up and walked away from.

Augusta is an older woman, and in her time, she was deadly. Out of everyone, other than Sirius, she has the highest kill count, which rounds out at nine people she killed in her arena. She's sixty-three years old now, but that doesn't automatically mean she's weaker or less capable. After all, Effie is fifty-four, and she's dangerous.

Seven has Victors who won their games in similar ways. Lester and Henri both stayed mostly hidden and ran from danger, all the way up until the end. Henri got lucky when it was just him and another tribute, the last dying of dehydration before the final fight could even reach them. Lester—he didn't get lucky and had to fight at the end, but he had a crossbow, and didn't miss when he shot it. He makes Regulus think of Mathias.

Both from eight—Alowyn and Warwick—won their games through environmental means, though they both got into various fights along the way. It's just that the elements handled the competition for them, for the most part.

Emmeline from nine, which does make Regulus' stomach drop out from under him, because he actually does like her, and her highlight reels make it clear she's a threat. She's fucking unshakable. She never once breaks down or falters, not even when killing people. She's also a bit of a loose cannon from what Regulus sees; random things would just set her off, and then someone would be dead moments later. The blood never seemed to bother her, from his viewpoint.

"No, that's just how she coped," Sirius murmurs, when James, who also notices, speaks up to ask. "She compartmentalized a lot in her games, or so she's told me. It hit her after, though."

Dixon was Emmeline's mentor before she took over for him, and he was a death eater as well. He's older now, but still someone to be concerned about, just because of how strong he was and likely still is, if he kept practicing.

Mavis and Velvet Oswald are married, and they were dating when they went into the games, two years apart. Velvet was Mavis' mentor, and the Hallow ate up their love story, which is no surprise. Sponsors got them to the end, just so they could make it home to each other. And now they're going back in, together. It puts a lump in Regulus' throat just thinking about it, because it's genuinely that fucked up.

Marlene… Well, Regulus is startled by watching her highlights, because he's met her, and she's a little rough around the edges at times. In her games, though, she was just—scared. Quiet. Timid, even. She ran from fights and didn't take opportunities to kill when they passed her by. It wasn't until she was cold, thirsty, and starving that her survival switch seemed to flip, and watching it is like seeing the birth of the woman she is now. After that switch flipped, she was ruthless, and wholly unexpected. Even knowing she won, her progression through the video is shocking, but maybe it shouldn't be. After all, he knows just how the arena affects someone.

Eli, her mentor, was a glowing young man when he went into his games. Bright and charming. Beloved by sponsors. He's older now, and according to Sirius, he's a drunk. Pandora says he was quite literally wasted at the reaping, and Regulus can't help but feel a deep sadness for that man, who changed after his games. It reminds him vividly of his Uncle Alphard.

The last two from twelve—Coen and Camilla—are very different. Coen won his games just by surviving the elements, while the other tributes failed to, but he's clearly smart when it comes to anything environmental. Camilla, on the other hand, was ridiculously smart by joining the death eaters and then murdering them all in their sleep on the very first night. She outlasted all the rest and killed the last on day six.

"So, what do we know?" Pandora asks, once the screen is off.

"Bellatrix and Narcissa are going to be an issue," Sirius announces immediately.

Pandora grimaces. "Right. Is there any chance that family loyalty will come into play here, or…?"

Sirius snorts. "For each other, yeah, but not us." He gestures between himself and Regulus. "They're probably going to be working together, and I don't doubt Bella will want to team up with the death eaters, so Cissa will probably go along with her. Chances are, I'll be a target again, just because I have the highest kill count from my games, and also I'm so adored by the Hallow. They'll want to get me out of the way early, and Regulus as well, probably."

"The Hallows love them, too, though," Pandora points out.

"Yeah, but the other death eaters will want to use that to their advantage. The Hallows love all the members from the Black family. We're their favorites. The most entertaining," Sirius explains, wrinkling his nose. "It's because we're all fucking mental. Makes for a good show. They love the drama, no doubt, and there's no family more dramatic than ours."

"They should be careful with that," Pandora mutters, her face dropping into a scowl. "Insanity isn't a contained event. It can reach them, too. I hope it does."

"Too right," Sirius agrees, nodding righteously. "Yaxley, Rowle, and Carrow will be death eaters, I'm sure, but they were never really favorites. Lestrange was, though, and he'll also be a death eater, that I'm certain of."

"That's six already," James mumbles, lips tipping down.

"Maybe seven, if Dixon joins up again," Sirius says, "and I don't see why he wouldn't. Being a death eater in an arena full of people this dangerous? Well, it's smart. It's a clear line right to the end, if it's done right, because that's access to the best fighters beside them and sponsors who will support them."

"Coen and Camilla hate each other," Remus announces, and he coughs when everyone stares at him. "They're, um…from my district, so I—I know this. Trust me, they're going right for each other as soon as the games start."

James' eyebrows fly up. "What happened?"

"Camilla killed Coen's boyfriend in her games, and they've been feuding ever since. I mean, bad feuding," Remus tells them. "Like, there were times that people had to tear them apart before they killed each other. I can guarantee you that the urge hasn't passed in the last six years."

"Right. Um, let's see…" Sirius hesitates, then blows out a deep breath. "Augusta's weakness is Frank, and so is Alice's, I think. Marlene—"

"Dorcas," James says quietly. He closes his eyes when everyone looks at him. "Dorcas, for sure. They have—a thing. From what I know, it's pretty complicated, but the way Marlene talked about her… Yeah, Dorcas is a weakness for her."

Pandora makes a small sound, glancing over at Sirius, who looks like he's about to throw up. "Okay, no, let's not—we're not doing this. Are they—I mean, will they even be a threat?"

"Well, they're not just going to lay down and die if we ask them nicely enough," Regulus snaps.

"No, I just meant—" Pandora huffs, crossing her arms. "Obviously they'll be an issue, but won't they be allies, at least in the beginning? Some of them?"

"I think so, yes," Sirius croaks. "To start with, I'm sure we'll all be allies, just the same as the death eaters. It'll be me, Reggie, Marlene, Emmeline, Augusta, and Alice. Mavis and Velvet will be together. Dixon and Eli are wild cards. Coen and Camilla will be fighting each other, apparently, but they'll be wild cards outside of that. Majesty, Asher, Lester, Henri, Alowyn, and Warwick will be wild cards, too, but I suspect they'll all try to get through alone. The rest will be death eaters."

"What about the mentors?" James asks.

Pandora blows out a deep breath. "Well, Lucius for Bellatrix and Narcissa, obviously. He's good with sponsors, and it'll help that Narcissa is his wife. He'll use that angle, possibly even neglect Bellatrix to do it."

"Yaxley was the last mentor for two, but he's back in, so who is it this year?" Sirius muses.

"Rodolphus Lestrange," Pandora announces, and she nods when everyone stares at her in surprise. "Yeah, he's Rabastan's older brother, so Yaxley will likely be neglected, too."

Regulus can't stop himself from grimacing, unable to halt his brain in drawing the similarities into the previous year, when his older brother was his mentor. Sirius worked himself to the bone for him, and James, so if Rodolphus cares about his little brother even half as much as Sirius did… Well.

Regulus shuts that thought down immediately. Cuts it at the quick and shoves it somewhere he can keep it under lock and key. Sirius doesn't care about him anymore, not the way Regulus thought he did, not the way Regulus needed him to.

"Dolohov for three?" Sirius continues, none the wiser.

"Mhm," Pandora confirms. "He's not the best with sponsors, honestly, but Alecto was more favored over Thorfinn, if I remember correctly, so if he's smart, that's who he'll focus on."

"What about four?" James asks.

Pandora sighs. "Donica."

"Ah." Sirius sighs, too. "She's…a mess, honestly. Usually high the whole way through the games."

"Frank," James says, and that's all he says. Regulus doesn't mean to grind his teeth, but it happens anyway. James doesn't notice, or care, because he's still acting like Regulus doesn't exist.

Sirius clears his throat. "Yeah, Frank. He's—he'll be one to watch, James. He's a damn good mentor with people he's not close with, but for his mum and Alice? I suspect he'll be working harder than he ever has. He'll also probably be a fucking mess, because not only are they in the arena, but so are the rest of his friends. Just…check on him if you get the chance, okay? Lean on him. Let him lean on you."

"You're new," Pandora tells him gently. "They'll—well, that will be an advantage. No one's ever had access to you as a mentor before, so you'll catch their interest. You'll also…"

James presses his lips into a thin line. "What, Pandora?"

"It'll be a balancing act," Pandora whispers. "It's your best friend and your—and as far as they know, your…lover. You will need to lean into that, James."

"By lean into that, you mean…"

"I mean, if Sirius needs something in the arena, then expressing how much he means to you as your best friend, as well as how much he means to the Hallows, will help you get donations to use for him. And—and for Regulus, if he needs something, then expressing how much you…love him—"

"Right, got it," James cuts in sharply, the muscle in his jaw twitching. "Faking a love story. Nothing new there. Hey, I even have practice."

As soon as the words leave James' mouth, Regulus stands up and leaves without a word, heading right to his room. He shuts the door gently, locks it, and goes to start a bath. At least there, when he cries, he can lie to himself about why.

Horace's least favorite state of the Phoenix is after a mission has taken place, because it's always a bit chaotic when those who left have finally returned. A lot of people running, a lot of people rushing around to pitch in and help, a lot of people coming in fresh with no knowledge of what's going on.

He doesn't like the reminder that he was once clueless, too. It feels like a stain of shame he can never quite wash clean. It's true that ignorance is bliss, and Horace has spent most of his life blissful, but that's no more.

Coming to the Phoenix was the equivalent to being beaten over the head with a harsh, hideous reality he never once was aware of. A reality where people are suffering. A reality where war is boiling beneath the surface, rising higher every day. A reality where there are true problems in this world—his part of the world, specifically—and he helped perpetuate them.

A reality where he's had a hand in murdering people.

Children.

It never seemed that way before, which feels ridiculous and stupid in retrospect. His way of life in the Hallow was—well, it was normal. He was surrounded by people who felt just as he did, an echo chamber of praise and agreement, no one ever stepping outside of the context they grew up with to look at what was happening with clear eyes.

He didn't know. He truly did not know. A part of him still wishes he didn't, because sometimes he doesn't know how to handle knowing what he does now.

Being in the Phoenix has opened his eyes to all the things he couldn't see before. The things Dorcas talked about, and more. A lot of people here are from districts, and they're not shy about telling him what they suffered, things he has never once had to deal with. For a long time, facing head on what they've dealt with made him uncomfortable, made him want to turn away and ignore it, and it took time before he could set aside his own guilt and shame and discomfort to actually learn the problems, as well as realize he wanted to help fix them.

Minerva helped with that. Horace is ashamed to admit that he didn't recognize her the day she held her gun to his head before he boarded the train that took him here. He knew of Minerva, of course, though he'd never spoken to her, and since she wasn't someone he could form a useful connection with, he didn't care to take note of her at all. She always made her moves quietly, not one to be flashy or boastful, rarely relying on networking to get her where she wanted to be. Even in the Hallow, they were living in two different worlds.

That makes sense now, knowing that she's in the Order.

In any case, Minerva had a few meetings with him about the head gamemaker position, getting advice from him for what to expect. He was admittedly frightened of her to start with, seeing as she did hold a gun to his head, but she also taught him a lot about what it is to be a Hallow on the other side of things. If not for her, he doubts he would have ever come forward to offer help to Albus.

But he did. He took that step on his own, going right to Albus and telling him everything he knew about Tom, about the Hallow, about the government officials and how the games worked. It was startling to realize that Albus was the man who assassinated Gellert, because he remembers that. He and the rest of the Hallow were told that the Victor who killed Gellert was captured and executed for the crime. Apparently not.

The thing is, Horace wants to help—he does—but he doesn't want to fight. He doesn't want to risk his life. Maybe that's shameful and despicable after all that he's done and not done in equal measure, but it's true. He's happy to be a consultant, answering questions and giving vital information, selling out the secrets of his home with an eagerness that grows by the day. He just feels—inadequate in a way he never did in the Hallow, like he could be doing more, like he should be.

He thinks, if he finds the chance, he will do more.

And then, of course, the chance finds him.

The Phoenix is bustling with activity at the moment, and all Horace knows is that someone very important was ushered into surgery, while someone else also important was escorted directly to Albus' office. There's not a clear count on how many arrived, but Horace would bet over twenty, which is the most he's ever seen come in at one time.

Either way, he decides it's best to stay firmly out of the way, which leads him right to his room, where he slips in, shuts the door, and turns around to find Dorcas Meadowes sitting on the edge of his bed, gun in hand.

Horace freezes instantly.

"Ms. Meadowes," Horace blurts out, incapable of removing the squeaky quality to his voice. He can't help it. Dorcas frightens him more than Tom Riddle ever managed to. It's different when someone will kill you just because than when someone wants to kill you. She does. He sees it every time he looks into her eyes.

"Hey, gamemaker," Dorcas greets coldly, clicking the safety off her gun, "I think it's time we had a little talk."

"Ah, now is a really bad time," Horace tries, then just gives in and starts to dive for the door.

Dorcas is on her feet with her gun pointed to his head before he makes it, hissing, "Don't even think about it." Horace wisely stops and swallows thickly. Dorcas hums. "Good. Now, I have a few questions, and you're going to answer all of them."

"Questions?" Horace rasps.

"Yes, questions," Dorcas confirms sharply. "Questions only a head gamemaker can answer, starting with where the arena is and how someone would go about stealing those inside it."

Horace blinks. "You… What?"

"The tributes," Dorcas snaps. "I need to get them out. Some of them. All of them. I don't care. Just—more than one."

"Ms. Meadowes, that's impossible," Horace says slowly.

Dorcas' eyes flash. "Nothing is impossible."

"I—well, yes, but it's—it's quite difficult," Horace stutters out, and Dorcas narrows her eyes. "There's no way you could pull off all that it will take to manage it."

"Oh, I'll find a way," Dorcas informs him, and the glint in her eyes makes him believe her. "Start talking, Mr. Slughorn."

Horace takes a deep breath, then slowly lets it out. "You don't have to point the gun at me. I'll tell you all that I know. If this is something you plan to do, though I doubt you can, I'd like to at least contribute by my own choice."

"Is that so?" Dorcas murmurs, studying him. There's a long pause, and then she lowers her gun. "Go on. I'm listening."

"Right." Horace clears his throat, standing straighter from the surge of self-pride that shoots through him for actually being useful for once. "So, first thing you need to know, the arena is surrounded by very advanced protection…"

"How is she?" Lily asks as Poppy steps back and lets her slide off the bed, pulling her pants back up with a little hop and grimace, her leg now doctored and cleared to go.

"Recovering. She did well in surgery," Poppy tells her. "If she made it here even an hour later, she would have been in critical condition, but she's going to live."

Lily nods and rolls her shoulders. "That's good. The others… There were a few on the train I had to take care of. Were there any losses, other than…?"

"No, no other losses," Poppy murmurs. "You did good. We have a couple of broken bones, more than a few bullet wounds, but otherwise we got incredibly lucky."

"Right," Lily says quietly, her heart clenching when she thinks about all those people that never made it out of the district. All those that died, Ted among them. Everyone that did make it got lucky; Euphemia made it through surgery, Andromeda reunited with her daughter, and there were survivors. Funny how luck works, though. You can be lucky enough to live, yet be saddled with so much loss that it doesn't feel like a blessing; it feels like a curse. She forces herself not to think about Remus. "Thanks. I should clear out, let someone else who needs the bed more have it."

"Lily," Poppy cuts in, reaching out to grab her arm, holding her gaze. "It was your first mission. Those are always the hardest. How are you holding up?"

"Oh, it was just a graze, Poppy. I've had worse than being shot by a very attractive woman, trust me," Lily tells her, amused, though it's not like Poppy wouldn't know. Poppy was the one who got the bullet out when she was shot in the shoulder.

Poppy's lips twitch faintly. "Yes, there are worse things, I can't argue that, but that…isn't what I meant. How are you doing here?" She lifts her hand and gently taps Lily's temple. "If you need to talk to someone, I will—"

"I'm fine," Lily cuts in, stepping back and clearing her throat, giving her a tight smile. "Yeah, I'm fine, Poppy. Really."

"It's okay to not be fine, Lily. You know that, don't you? I wasn't after my first mission," Poppy assures her.

Lily hums. "Sorry, can't relate. Anyway, I have to go."

Poppy heaves a sigh, but Lily quickly takes her leave, getting as far away from that conversation as possible. She'd really rather not think about it, honestly. All she wants to do now is slip into her room, grab her cigarettes, and find her way to the surface so she can chainsmoke her problems away.

Not that she has problems. She's doing just fine.

Lily has to swallow a groan when she enters her room and catches sight of a form on her bed out of the corner of her eye, thinking at first that it's Ember, still here and waiting for Lily to finish what she started. As much as Lily would love to make the earlier interruption up to her, she is dead on her feet and really just wants a smoke. Or five.

"Listen, I'm really tired, so—" Lily shuts up the moment she fully turns and sees that it's not Ember. "Oh. Dorcas! Wait, Dorcas? Aren't you supposed to be—"

"Yeah," Dorcas interrupts dryly, "I'm supposed to be doing my job, I know, but I have more than one occupation, as you know, and now I've gone and added a third to the list."

Lily blinks. "Oh? What's that?"

"Stylist, rebel, and now a thief," Dorcas says.

"Oh, well, good for you," Lily replies supportively. "What have you stolen, then? Bring anything to me? You know I love when you bring me gifts."

"Lily, I love you," Dorcas announces without any warning whatsoever, and Lily gives a violent twitch, freezing in place as her eyes bulge and the urge to run for her fucking life grips her immediately. Dorcas snorts. "Oh, for fuck's sake, calm down, would you? You didn't even let me finish. I was going to say, I love you, I really do, but we have to stop having sex, because I'm quite in love with Marlene McKinnon."

"Oh, shit," Lily wheezes, reaching up to press her hand over her racing heart. "Fuck, Dorcas, don't do that. You can't just say shit like that to me! Are you mental? I nearly had a fucking heart attack."

"I wish I could have fixed you," Dorcas muses, lips curling up sadly, and there's an echoed sadness in her gaze. "You have so many issues, you know that?"

"I'm fine," Lily rattles off, clearing her throat, and she ignores the faint pulse in her chest that feels like…regret. There's a thought in the back of her mind taking shape no matter how much she fights it that's sure she could have loved Dorcas. Really loved her. Properly. She forces the thought down and exhales slowly. "So, Marlene, huh? Love?"

Dorcas' face softens. "Yeah."

"That's—oh, that's… She's a tribute," Lily whispers, and the pulse in her chest this time is much louder. "Oh, Dorcas…"

"Yeah," Dorcas repeats, standing up straighter. "So, about me being a thief…"

Lily stares at her. "Did you—have you stolen Marlene?"

"No," Dorcas assures her, then, "not yet anyway."

"Not yet," Lily repeats.

Dorcas smiles. "Exactly. I'm going to need a little help. So, Lily, how do you feel about a little abduction? All in the name of love, of course. Oh, and justice. That, too."

Lily stares at her again in silence for a beat, then heaves a sigh and says, "Can I smoke on the way?"

Dorcas starts laughing, and Lily grins at her sheepishly, feeling a rush of fondness for Dorcas as she tugs Lily over to the bed and lays out everything she knows, as well as her plan.

As it turns out, Lily will have plenty of time to smoke, so really, she's on board with no questions asked. She tells herself it's about the justice part of it.

But, in reality, love motivates her the most.

Chapter End Notes

(just a quick note to address my note last chapter. thank you all for the kind words and support. i didn't particularly mean for anyone to feel the need defend/reassure me, that was just me addressing something i really needed to, but thank you all the same. im not the best with compliments/praise, so i generally get overwhelmed by it and don't know how to respond. not that i don't appreciate it, because i do, and i can't thank all of you enough, im just an awkward, anxious dude with a heavy dose of imposter syndrome, probably. but, again, i really do appreciate all the love and support, and that note wasn't to make anyone feel bad about the way they comment or anything; literally most of everyone has been kind and honestly a lot of comments are so funny, i love them. i do read them all, even if i can't respond to them, so i just. i guess i wanted to say thank you, so thank you <3) okay! starting from the top!

the hallows are protesting!!! bet no one saw that coming. remember when we were all shitting on the hallows for being vapid, soulless beings. aw, they DO care <3 they're a little misguided, considering they didn't care BEFORE it was their favorites in the line of fire, but...growth, maybe??? hm. to be seen...

remus and regulus just chilling and watching the protest with relish bc it probably pisses riddle off. i love how salty they are together 😭 just a couple of friends who love to get together and bitch about things and swap gossip. love that for them.

but also, regulus telling remus he'll have his back on hating him ☹☹☹ noooo, stop that. and that horrible, human moment where remus looked at regulus and realized that he's the reason sirius is going back in... the fact that they were hiding together!!! just. sorry, remus and regulus as friends mean a lot to me. we will see a bit more of them before the arena, i promise.

then on the flip side, we've got james and sirius, who are not handling things well. james is having a rough go of it, still, which is fair. lmaoooo sirius being like: okay you don't wanna talk about it, got it, noted, we'll put a pin in it 😭 HELP HE WAS TRYING SO HARD. it will indeed be revisted later. sirius has plenty to say, and say it he will.

and then pandora my beloved <3 she genuinely just wanted five minutes to chill, and she's so valid for that. regulus still trying to be a good friend to her 😭 remus and sirius... OH HOW THEY MAKE ME ACHE. i love them dearly. they'll be like a breath of fresh air in all this other mess, BUT rest assured, they will actually have a Talk about sirius going back in and how they feel about it etc. just give it some time.

NOT THE SPINE REALIGNMENT. i swear im never letting that go 😭 sirius being excited about trying new intimate things!!! and remus literally just being like: i will genuinely never say no to you STOP I LOVE THEM

James has to go to this stupid mentor function where he's meant to do social networking with sponsors and various gamemakers while other mentors do the same all around him.

Sirius has done it many times, and he's given James a very thorough rundown of how it'll go, as well as a strangely meticulous list of every sponsor by name. He knows things about these sponsors that honestly surprises James—their parents' names, or children, or spouses; their favorite drinks; what they want out of life, and how to make them feel very good about themselves. James knew Sirius was good with people, good with finding what makes them tick and how to use that to his advantage, but even James is blown away by the groundwork he's put in and how he essentially knows every angle to best manipulate these people with, like puppets on his strings. It's incredible. And unsettling.

Either way, James listens dutifully and does his best, because it's Sirius and the other one who need him to pull through for them. To help, he has to make an effort to do this, and that means enduring the people fawning all over him for being put in such a horrible position, or even the less tasteful people who want to know which person he'd rather make it out.

It's a two hour event.

James lasts thirty-seven minutes and forty-four seconds exactly, just long enough for Lucius to make his way over and say, mockingly, "I'm surprised you showed up, James. I rather thought you'd be too busy fucking Regulus while you still had the chance. Running out of time now, aren't you?"

He is smirking when he says it, blunt and shameless right there in front of a crowd of sponsors, and it's clear they're living for the drama. James doesn't care. He just slips his hand down to grab his cane, grips it tight, and swings out to collide the handle across Lucius' face so hard that he goes crashing into the chairs behind him. A collective gasp echoes through the room as Lucius clutches at his face and spits out blood.

Frank is there in what seems like seconds, hastily grabbing James by his arm and tugging him away as Lucius flings himself to his feet, nostrils flared, blood staining his teeth. James flips him off, but Frank quickly shoves his hand down.

A low murmur starts up in the room, and Frank has to stop by to talk to Aurors who were making their way steadily towards the commotion. He dissolves the tension and de-escalates the situation by promising to escort James back to his suite.

"You can't do that, James," Frank hisses as he's walking him quickly away from the room. "There is a certain way you have to conduct yourself as a mentor, not only for the sake of your tributes, but also for you. As much as you might wish to, you can't go around beating the shit out of people with your cane when they piss you off. It runs the risk of costing Sirius and Regulus sponsors, if not getting into trouble yourself."

"I just—" James clenches his jaw and comes to a halt, squeezing his eyes shut. "Frank."

"Yeah?" Frank murmurs.

"I'm really fucking angry," James whispers, "and I don't know how to make it stop."

"I heard about Regulus volunteering for you," Frank says softly, and James grits his teeth. "I —I get it. My mum… I asked her not to beforehand, and she did it anyway. It's—I get how enraging it is to have someone you love do that, especially when your best friend is in the mix, just another person you love. I get the anger, James, I really do. That being said, this is as much of an arena for us as it is for them. We are fighting for their lives and our own, and anger? It doesn't save anyone."

James looks down and doesn't respond. Frank sighs and reaches out to squeeze his shoulder, gently guiding him all the way back to the suite, where James waits for Frank to walk away before he slips back inside.

Sirius groans and tightens his hand in Remus' hair, tilting his head down to see the latest mark blooming on his chest, which makes him immediately squeeze his eyes shut and tug on Remus' hair to ask for another.

"If only you could spell out mine in marks," Sirius says dreamily, then hisses sharply and gives a violent twitch because Remus has gotten teeth involved, scraping against the skin over his ribs. Oh, Sirius loves when he gets teeth involved.

"I think the marks get the message across well enough," Remus murmurs into his chest, soothing the now-bruised skin with his tongue. Sirius shudders. "Not that anyone would see it, since I doubt you'll be walking around shirtless, but this is definitely a…statement. You are —" He draws back and flicks his gaze over Sirius' torso, then arches an eyebrow at Sirius, who grins at him. "Frankly, you look like you got into a fight with a vacuum and are ridiculously pleased about it. Does this actually feel good for you? Genuinely?"

"Yes," Sirius assures him, a little embarrassingly earnest as he essentially smooshes Remus' face back down to wordlessly encourage him to continue.

Remus does.

He's still doing just that when the sound of raised voices reaches them and makes them both freeze. Slowly, at the same time, they raise their heads to stare at the door, then look at each other. In the next second, they're scrambling for their shirts and rushing right out of the room.

The thing is, Regulus is out. He went to the training room, so he's not here. James isn't supposed to be here, but that's most certainly his voice, drowned out by Pandora, who is yelling at him. The fact that Pandora and James are arguing is—not good. Very not good. And bewildering.

When they make it into the main room, Pandora is standing right in front of James, pointing a finger in his face, her eyes flashing like she's not afraid of him in the least. "Are you out of your fucking mind?!"

"Yeah, maybe I am," James snaps, his eyes flashing, too.

"Woah, what's going on?" Sirius blurts out as he rushes forward to physically ease Pandora back, because she's rattling in rage in a way he's legitimately never seen before.

"James assaulted Lucius!" Pandora hisses. "Smacked him in the face with his cane."

"Oh, nice," Sirius says reflexively, then shrinks back when Pandora turns a withering glare on him. He coughs. "Sorry, no, I mean—oh no, James, how could you?"

Remus snorts, then immediately smooths his expression of amusement out when Pandora shoots him a glare, too.

"Do you have any idea what you've just done?" Pandora asks sharply, focusing on James, who doesn't flinch under her glare at all. "You think you're the first mentor that wants to attack other mentors, James? No, you're not, but they don't. Do you want to know why? Because if you do, it puts you in danger. You could be punished for that. Not only you, but Sirius and Regulus. And, if by some miracle, you all scrape by, Lucius could still find ways to make everyone's lives a lot harder. He only needs to bribe the right gamemaker to make Sirius and Regulus suffer more than they already will, and if he wasn't going to get his tributes and the other death eater mentors to focus on Regulus and Sirius before, you can bet he is now."

And that—that makes James flinch.

"Stop it, Pandora," Sirius mutters, heaving a sigh as he glances at James, who has horror blooming in his eyes. "Don't—James, it's fine. I mean, definitely don't do it again, because she's right, you could be punished. Likely won't be, if you weren't the moment it happened, but still. What happened?"

James swallows and rasps, "I was just—I was talking to sponsors, and—and Lucius came over… He said—just right in front of everyone, he said something about…your brother. I didn't—I was just so angry, and I—I—"

"Did the Aurors get involved?" Sirius asks.

"Started to, but Frank handled it," James whispers.

Sirius chews on the inside of his bottom lip for a moment, and then he nods. "You're too beloved by the Hallows to get punished in the middle of all this, especially if a fight didn't properly break out. And you were defending Regulus, I take it, which the Hallows will like. They'll eat it up, really, so it's not going to cost you sponsors. Just—most of the time, they like their mentors to be more put together, yeah? Calmer. Not violent. Not traumatized. They don't like having to face what the arena actually does to a person, so keeping it together is vital, James. Doing it in the defense of Regulus is—well, that's fine. So, lean into that, alright?"

"Alright," James says, his gaze downcast.

"See? It's fine. Pandora, it's fine," Sirius tells her, because she still looks furious. "Lay off. I mean it. He's doing his best."

Pandora softens, slowly. It takes a few minutes, and then she sighs as her shoulders slump. "James, I'm—I know that this is hard for you. I'm sorry I yelled. I'm just…really stressed."

"I'm sorry," James mumbles, his voice scratchy and thick. He lifts his gaze to look at Sirius. "Did I—have I put you and…him in danger? Sirius, tell me."

"It's—not that simple," Sirius murmurs. "Look, Lucius can't make Bella and Cissa do anything they don't want to do. If they decide they're coming for me and Regulus, that's what they'll do, regardless of what he says. If they decide not to, then they won't, and that's that. The rest of the death eaters will be coming right for us if they're smart anyway. Lucius could bribe a gamemaker, sure, but the one with the most power is Minerva McGonagall, and she does not strike me as a woman easily bribed by anything. Regulus and I are in danger in the arena, no matter what, and we'll—handle that when the time comes. You just keep doing your best. That's enough."

"I told you," James chokes out. "I told you I couldn't do this, and I'm—I'm fucking it up. I'm going to get you killed. I'm—"

"Okay, hey, stop that, you're not," Sirius says gently, moving over quickly to get his arm around James, hastily escorting him from the room the moment he breaks down crying.

Remus and Pandora don't follow.

Sirius' heart clenches as he gets James safely in his room and into his bed. He climbs into James' bed right beside him, watching sadly and helplessly as James lays there and fucking sobs. Sirius gets it. He sobbed a lot, too, his first year as a mentor. And many years after that. All the years, really.

That's the thing. No one but mentors actually know how hard it is to be a mentor. It's fucking hell on one's nerves, for one thing, because you're quite literally holding lives in your hands, and it rides on you to do everything you can to save those lives. Every move you make, every word you say, it impacts your tributes. You can make mistakes and bring more danger to your tributes; you can make mistakes and cost your tributes life-saving support that might have helped them win.

Worse than all that, you can do everything absolutely right and still watch your tributes die anyway.

It's a heavy thing to hold. It's a hard burden to bear. It's just a different arena, and not one you can fight your way out of. For James, who feels a deep need to help, to save Regulus and Sirius in particular, the pressure is crushing him.

Sirius can do nothing but comfort him, reassure him, soothe him—so that's what he does. He doesn't stop until James falls asleep, exhausted and drained, likely needing the rest. Sirius sighs and gets up to gently tug James' shoes off, then drag his blanket up to cover him. For a moment, he just stands and stares at him with this horrible, harsh pain in his chest, hardly able to breathe when thinking about how, very soon, James won't have him around to be there for him at all.

Swallowing thickly, Sirius slips out of James' room and heads to his own, shaking as he lets himself in. Remus is there, waiting on him with sorrow in his eyes.

"You—you have to—I need you to take care of him," Sirius gasps out, his shoulders heaving. "Remus, please, I—"

"Hey, shh, sweetheart, come here," Remus whispers, leaning forward to grab his hand and reel him in. Sirius slots in between his spread legs where he's sitting on the edge of the bed, and he slides his arms around Remus' shoulders, leaning into him as he pushes shaky fingers into his hair. Remus tilts his head back, resting his chin on Sirius' stomach, his eyes gentle. "Of course I will. It's not even a question."

"He'll—he'll take care of you, too," Sirius croaks. "That's his first instinct—take care of everyone else. It's not to take care of himself, so you—will you just—"

"Yes, Sirius, I promise," Remus murmurs.

"Like you took care of me?" Sirius checks, slipping his hand down to trace the arc of Remus' eyebrow, the one with the scar running through it.

Remus gives him a small smile, like a tiny bit of treasure, just for him. "Well, not exactly the same, but…"

"I—yeah, maybe skip the kissing and stuff," Sirius agrees with a huff of laughter, his voice all wobbly.

"I don't know… I bet he's a brilliant kisser."

"Oh, shut up."

Remus laughs softly, and Sirius finds it within himself to smile in response, something in him settling down with the reassurance that Remus will have James, and James will have Remus. Through this, they'll have each other.

It's not much, but it's the only comfort Sirius has.

Regulus exhales and releases the dagger, watching as it sails through the air and lands with a loud thunk into the target's chest, dead center. Behind him, someone slow-claps.

Shit.

The training room was empty.

Regulus glances over his shoulder, lowering his arm and going stiff as a very large group comes in. The death eaters, traveling in a pack like they all met up. Bellatrix and Narcissa are among them. So is Dixon.

Bellatrix, Narcissa, Yaxley, Rabastan, Thorfinn, Alecto, and Dixon—they go right to the center where the weapons are, talking casually amongst themselves. They look unbothered, aloof, completely at ease while making it very clear that they're a group, that they're this year's death eaters, and that they all saw him when coming in. He wonders who clapped.

Regulus feels his heart drop when he sees Bellatrix pluck up a few daggers of her own, swiveling them through her fingers with the same ease and practice that he does. He'd hoped…

See, Bellatrix was his favorite when he was young, and she was good with daggers first. That's why he liked them so much, because she did. A part of him sort of just—suppressed that, honestly, or refused to think about it. He'd secretly hoped that she found a love for some other weapon, or maybe just got rusty with them over the years, but seeing the way she handles them now—yeah, she's still an expert. Fuck.

Narcissa goes for the bow and arrows, and she knows them well. Willa was good with a bow. Narcissa? She's better.

Thorfinn and Rabastan go to the mats to do hand-to-hand, it seems like, while Dixon and Yaxley split off to go around the stations. Alecto and Narcissa remain at the weapons. Bella makes her way right for Regulus, presumably to make use of the stalls, but he doubts that's all it is. Of course not.

"Hey, munchkin," Bellatrix greets as she sidles up to the stall next to him.

"Bella," Regulus replies, his shoulders tense.

"Can't help but notice Sirius isn't here," Bellatrix muses, and he doesn't bother replying. She leans up against his stall and flicks her hand without looking, sending one of her daggers twirling through the air. It lands in the center of the target's head, which makes his stomach churn. "Yet, here you are."

Regulus exhales and turns to face her. "What do you want?"

"What, I can't talk to my favorite cousin?"

"After I stabbed you with a fork, I'm still the favorite?"

Bellatrix chuckles. "Oh, bygones and all that. Honestly, you could actually kill me, and I'd still like you better than Sirius. He's such an ungrateful, mouthy little shit. Besides, you were protecting your boyfriend. Sweet of you, really. It's cute."

Regulus doesn't say anything. He doesn't—he can't figure out what it is that she wants. He knows she's after something, because she's got that glint in her eye, that slightly mad gleam that everyone in their family gets when they're plotting. Even him. It's a family trait they all share.

"Shame about that, by the way," Bellatrix says, turning her head to stare at the target. There's actually a note of bitterness in her voice. "Having to go back in, I mean. Must be especially hard for you. I heard you were upset when Sirius tried to take your place, and here you are anyway, not knowing if you'll make it back to Potter."

"What. Do. You. Want?" Regulus grits out.

"It's hard for Potter, too, clearly," Bellatrix continues lightly, still just staring at her dagger. "He smacked the shit out of Lucius with his cane earlier, you know. Have you heard yet?"

Regulus blinks. "He—what? When? Why?"

"Guess you haven't heard. You must have been here." Bellatrix shakes her head, snorting. "Lucius showed up back in the suite, raging about Potter. Apparently he said something about how you and Potter have so little time together, and Potter whacked him in the face. He's got a lovely little bruise now, his lip all swollen. It's hilarious."

"Hilarious," Regulus repeats, eyes narrowing.

Bellatrix hums. "Yes, absolutely. He gets all red in the face when he's raging, like a grape. You just want to pop him, you know?" She looks at him with a grin. "In any case, he wants you and Sirius to pay for it."

"Bet you love that," Regulus mutters.

"I love that for Sirius. Less so for you." Bellatrix swivels her dagger between her fingers, holding his gaze. "Why isn't Sirius here, munchkin? He just left you all alone?"

"So?" Regulus snaps.

"So," Bellatrix says with a huff, "it's clear you two aren't handling this as well as Cissy and I are."

Regulus arches an eyebrow at her. "And how exactly are you two handling it?"

"Get each other to the end, then see who moves faster," Bellatrix announces with a grin. She leans forward and winks at him. "Between you and me, I think it'll be me. She has to grab an arrow. I'll have a dagger already in hand."

"Glad you two found a solution," Regulus says, his voice sharp and unforgiving. "I still don't know why you're pestering me."

"You're in danger, munchkin," Bellatrix tells him, "and it sounds to me like Sirius doesn't care about that. He's a selfish little creature, always has been, and you hate him—I can see it all over you. Trust me, I know what it looks like."

Regulus presses his lips into a thin line.

"It could be us, you know," Bellatrix continues softly, not looking away from him. "A proper family at the end. Me, you, and Narcissa. You'd be safer with us, Regulus. No one who wants to target you would dare to, if you were with us."

"You're—asking me to be a death eater?" Regulus says.

Bellatrix grips her dagger, going still. "I'm telling you, if you want to survive, you'll listen to me when I explain why the best thing for you to do is join us."

Regulus stares at her, his heart thumping hard in his chest, the very tips of his fingers tingling. Slowly, he looks at the target with the dagger sticking out from the head, and then he looks at Bellatrix and whispers, "I'm listening."

A triumphant smile breaks out on Bellatrix's face.

Sirius doesn't take long in the training room. He's at the fire-starting station, just to lazily brush up on the skill, but it's not one he's forgotten. He gets it on the very first try, then spends a long time thinking wistfully of Regulus, who left the moment he came in. Sirius really wishes—

"Oh, rubbing two sticks together because you don't have two brain cells to rub together, I see."

"Piss off, Marlene," Sirius says.

Alice laughs. "No, really, it's so impressive. Do it again."

Sirius sighs and ignores them as he pushes to his feet. He has something of a crowd at the moment, basically all watching him just for the sole purpose of mocking him. Marlene has gotten more than a few jabs in, Emmeline keeps laughing at him, and Augusta didn't even have to say anything to make it clear she wasn't impressed or intimidated by him in the least.

"Oh, teach me how to start a fire, Sirius, please," Marlene says breathlessly, clasping her hands together and staring at him with faux pleading in her eyes. The growing grin on her face sort of ruins that effect, not that she cares.

"You're so talented," Alice simpers, fluttering their eyelashes at him and twirling a strand of their short hair around a finger.

"What would it take for you to protect me, a damsel, who will soon be in distress?" Emmeline asks. "Burn fires for me, Sirius. Just me. Choose me. Pick me. Protect me."

"You're all going to gang up on me and kill me the moment we're the last ones standing, aren't you?" Sirius asks flatly.

"Yes."

"Absolutely yes."

"Without a doubt."

"And quickly, too," Augusta adds, once everyone else has responded. She doesn't even look ashamed.

Sirius rolls his eyes and turns away from them, snuffing the fire with his boot as they coo and laugh in the background. He's glad he can be a source of entertainment for them, because this is all very fucking boring otherwise.

The training room is fairly empty, and it has been since he arrived and Regulus left. Augusta and Alice were the next to come in, and Augusta didn't hesitate to come right up to him and ask, rather bluntly, if he and Regulus were going to be allies or not. When he said yes, Augusta nodded sharply and promised not to kill him or Regulus before it came time, which was…nice of her, he supposes. Sort of.

When Marlene, Eli, and Emmeline showed up, Augusta did the same thing to them and gave the same response when they all agreed. Eli, who is very drunk, has since gone to a corner to pass out in after he secured his allies. No one bothers him.

Augusta asked about Dixon, and Emmeline's lips had pressed into a thin line before she admitted that she doubted he'd be an ally. She thinks he'll side with the death eaters.

Velvet, Mavis, Lester, and Henri have not shown up. Alowyn and Warwick had shown up briefly, but they quite literally went in the opposite direction any time someone tried to approach them. Coen and Camilla also showed up for a short amount of time, only to get into a brawl and have to get dragged out by Aurors. No death eaters have arrived.

Sirius figures it could be worse. He has, in so many words, secured allies for him and Regulus, though he knows that their allies were already sort of known, in a way. In an arena full of very dangerous people who already have experience…well, having allies is the smart choice. The more, the better, especially when there's a big group of death eaters.

And there will be plenty of those, Sirius doesn't doubt that. It helps that he already knows who to be prepared for. Know thy enemy, or however that saying goes.

At least he won't be blindsided.

James wakes up slowly, drowsily, his eyes gritty and his jaw cracking with a yawn. His whole body shudders as he stretches out, and oh fuck, he really needed that nap. He can't remember the last time he slept so hard, and with no nightmares, which may have something to do with what he suspects was a quick little rest. A couple of hours, at most. Those are the best sort of naps for him. They get him through when he's exhausted.

He's exhausted a lot these days.

Blowing out a deep breath, James turns over and blinks at the sight of Regulus sitting in a chair next to his bed. Reflexively, James smiles at him, lopsided and warm, because, for just a moment, he's living in a world where seeing Regulus fills him with joy, with delight, with love. It takes a second for reality to catch up to him, for him to remember, for his smile to fade.

Regulus' lips are pressed into a thin line, and his elbows are sitting on his knees where he's leaning forward, his hands threaded together and his gaze sharp.

Oh, he's here for a fight.

Alright. Yeah, James is happy to oblige.

"What the fuck do you think you're doing?" James snaps as he pushes himself up, glaring at him. "Get out. I don't want—"

"Shut up," Regulus interrupts coldly. "You attacked Lucius?"

James feels a sharp twist in his chest, a burning sensation, and he can't breathe for a second. He—that was—it wasn't what he meant to do. He never meant to endanger them further; he's just so fucking angry, feeling like he's going to explode at all times, and Lucius never seems to know when to watch his fucking mouth. Maybe next time he'll think twice.

It makes James want to scream. Sirius assured him that he could spin it to his advantage, and James will. He'll do what it takes, whatever it takes for both of them, but the anger is still festering away. Hitting Lucius didn't help.

Nothing helps.

"Let me make something very clear to you, James," Regulus says, his voice sharp like a blade. "You hate me? Fine. Hate me, then. But the moment it starts affecting you, it's a problem. You could have gotten into trouble. Whatever you have to do to get your shit together, you're going to do it. Understood?"

"I don't need you to tell me that," James hisses, flinging himself around so he can sit on the edge of his bed, facing Regulus. "I know, alright? I fucking know."

"Really? Because if you knew, you wouldn't be assaulting people just because you're pissed off. Get it together."

"I'm working on it!"

"Work harder."

"Don't you think I'm trying, you insensitive prick?! How dare you? As if you know what this is like. I'd like to see you in my position, handling it well. Oh, wait, it would've been you if __"

"Oh, for fuck's sake!" Regulus explodes, launching out of his chair to bolt straight to his feet, scowling. "Let it go, James! You're revisiting something we already know. Yes, I lied to you. Yes, I volunteered for you. It's done! You can't change it, you can't do a damn thing about it __"

"Because of you!" James shouts. "This is on you! All of this could have been avoided if you __"

"Avoided? Avoided?! Grow up, you idiot!" Regulus shouts back, his eyes flashing, face flushed. "There was no avoiding this! No matter how it went, no matter what happened, we still would have ended up right here."

"No. No, there is a difference! You lied to me!" James roars, shoving to his feet and flinging his arms out as his chest heaves. He steps forward and jabs a finger at Regulus. "You did this to me! You. You're so fucking selfish, and a liar, and I hate you. I—I hate you. I—"

James falters, shaking from head to toe, his blood pumping and his ears ringing. Their gazes don't catch, because they've been staring at one another this entire time, glaring into each other's eyes without wavering or breaking. The room is so hot, so stifling, thick with tension that feels so close to burning out of control. One wrong move. One mistake.

That's all it'll take.

A part of James wishes he could disappear. If he could, he would just turn on the spot and evaporate to go somewhere else, to get away from this, because he knows what's coming. He can feel it in the tremble of his fingers. He can feel it in the heat of his skin. He can feel it in the air between them, a fragile distance that will be so easy to close.

The worst part is, James is still angry. Even with all this want whipping through him like a storm, the rage hasn't faded in the least. He's rattling like he's about to fly apart, and he is, and he wants, he wants, he wants—

"I hate you so fucking much," James chokes out, because that's the only explanation, that's all this can be. The words barely spill out of his mouth before he's catching Regulus' face in his hands and kissing him desperately, furiously, pathetically.

Regulus' hands fly up to clutch at him, to drag him closer, and the space between them burns down to nothing until they're pressed together. The kiss is biting, ruthless, harsh with all the emotions they can't articulate or accept. There's tongue and teeth and the low vibration of a moan, though James doesn't know who it comes from, himself or Regulus. Maybe both.

James isn't thinking, just acting, and he's shoving frantically at Regulus' shirt, trying so fucking hard to get it off, to get it away. He hates it. He hates everything. It's a button-up, so James doesn't bother wasting time, quite literally gripping it and yanking it open so vigorously that buttons pop off and scatter all over the floor. Regulus makes a muffled choking noise into the kiss, and James kisses him harder as he pushes Regulus' stupid fucking shirt off.

The moment there's skin to touch, James can't stop himself, his hands running over Regulus' shoulders, down his chest, gripping at his waist as he goes stumbling back. He drags Regulus along with him, who is more than happy to follow, even eager about it. They go crashing into the bed, James wobbling in place before losing his balance and plopping down on it, the kiss breaking for the very first time.

Regulus doesn't waste time. He just reaches down to snatch at James' shirt, making a sound of frustration until James finally lifts his arms and lets Regulus whip it off of him. His glasses get tangled up in his collar, leaving them lopsided on his face, but when he starts to lift his hand to carelessly toss them aside, Regulus catches his wrist to stop him before promptly climbing right into his lap and kissing him again.

James shudders as Regulus' fingers slide into his hair, clenching and pulling, and for a second, James allows it. James sinks into it, letting it happen as he slides his hands up Regulus' back, fingers draping over his shoulders, clamping down tight like he can keep him here, just like this, forever.

But he can't.

The reminder is a sour one, and it only serves to infuriate him more, until all he can do is fall back and push Regulus to the side. James follows the motion, pressing Regulus down into the bed and catching his wrists, tugging Regulus' hands from his hair and slamming them down to the pillows.

"James," Regulus gasps out, his fingers flexing like he wants to reach out and touch. He's flushed, unable to be still, his pupils blown and his mouth slick and swollen. He's a masterpiece, so heartbreakingly beautiful that James wants to take a fucking picture. James wants—he wants a lot of things.

"No. Keep them there," James tells him, his voice rough and hoarse, low and harsh in his throat. He squeezes Regulus' wrists to indicate what he means, then lets go. Regulus doesn't lift his hands. "Good. Don't touch. If you do, I'll stop."

Regulus shifts, restless, his chest heaving. A truly obscene groan spills out of his mouth with what sounds like a mixture of approval and frustration. His hands fist in the sheets, clinging, and that's enough for James. It satisfies him, a clear sign that Regulus is going to do what he's told.

With that, James lifts up to latch on the underside of his jaw and slowly, leisurely, works his way down at his own pace. It's not the first time he's done this, kissing Regulus all over, but he'll never get enough of it. He'll never have enough of Regulus under his mouth, under his hands, splayed out, willing and wanting. Eternity wouldn't be enough time.

The scars don't bother him. They never did, not from the very first sight of them. Are they heartbreaking? Absolutely. Does it make Regulus any less enticing? No, not at all. James is still sure he's never seen someone as beautiful as Regulus Black.

There's one spot where there's no scars at all. Regulus' right hip, the very arc of his hip bone, a place James has sucked loving bruises into. This time, he bites it. He remembers wanting to, once, in the arena. He was angry then, too.

Regulus sucks in a sharp breath between his teeth, his hips bucking, and James plants his hands against his thighs to hold him still. A long string of curses leaves Regulus' mouth, all breathless, and it coalesces into broken pleas very quickly.

They've done this…a lot. As much as two people can in two days, really. In their defense, they had a lot of built up tension to work through—over a decade of it, in fact—and two days were not enough. Two days didn't even make a dent.

Regardless, they've had sex many times in many different positions, and they still didn't get to do everything. They didn't have enough time. But they have done this, James going for Regulus' belt and putting his mouth to use. Regulus is usually a bit more involved, hands in his hair, fingers curling over his shoulders and his nails digging in. He doesn't mean to, but he has left scratches on James' shoulders and back. James didn't mind. He liked the burn of them. The reminder and the proof. It had left him smug.

This time, Regulus yanks at the sheets and chants James' name like a prayer, like an oath, like a promise. He did then, too, and he broke his promise anyway. James hates him. James needs him so bad he can't fucking stand it.

It's frantic and desperate from start to finish, until Regulus' breath audibly catches, and then he's arching, moaning, but never once letting go of those sheets. He doesn't let go, even after he slumps back against the bed, while James lifts his head and crawls up the length of Regulus' body to stare down at him. Regulus gazes up at him, starry-eyed and dazed, his gaze hazy and his mouth slack as he pants.

He's looking for something. Forgiveness, James thinks. He's not going to find that, but he's still gripping the sheets, never once letting go or lifting his hands, and that deserves a reward, doesn't it? So, James dips down and kisses him, gently.

Regulus sighs into it, soft and sweet, finally settling down as he calms. James sinks into the kiss, pushing everything to the side for a moment, granting himself just one kiss where he lets himself pretend. Just one kiss where he ignores his anger, as much as he can. It works all the way up until he slowly pulls away. Regulus' eyes flutter open, and for a beat, they just gaze at each other in silence, everything rushing right back in.

James shakes his head and rolls to the side, reaching out for his cane as he pushes to his feet, his leg stiff from being in one position for too long. He ignores the arousal demanding his attention, clamoring for priority within him, and makes his way to the bathroom without glancing back.

"James?" Regulus calls, his voice cracking.

"Get out," James says, staring at the bathroom door.

"James," Regulus whispers.

James does look back then, pausing at the bathroom door as he meets Regulus' gaze. All he says is, "Well? Don't you recognize a parting gift when you see one?"

Regulus' eyes sink shut, and James leaves him there like that, shutting the door on his pained expression. Yeah, parting gifts aren't quite the gifts they're meant to be, are they?

Sirius glances up as Regulus comes sweeping out of the door, a very specific gleam in his eyes that makes Sirius' heart sink.

Sirius had returned after his own brief visit to the training room and went straight to Remus, no waiting. Remus was brushing his hair for him, the both of them murmuring back and forth when Pandora slipped inside and nervously said that Regulus had gone into James' room before Sirius came back, and she was worried, unsure if they should intervene or not.

As tempted as Sirius was to get involved, he made a promise to stay out of it, and so he kept it. Made Pandora do the same. Remus had made the comment that it wasn't going to end well, and he's never really wrong, is he? Pandora had settled in the room with them, and they all heard it when James and Regulus started yelling at each other.

They heard it when the yelling stopped. They couldn't hear anything else, but some part of Sirius had dared to hope they were just—working through things, being there for each other, maybe having a nap or something. It was optimistic of him, he knew that, but he'd really hoped they'd be alright.

They are not alright, which became apparent when Regulus spent all his time locked in his room, refusing to open the door for anyone, even Remus. James didn't try; he was the only one who didn't, and that spoke volumes. When Sirius tentatively asked what happened, James had explained, flatly, that they had ill-advised hate-sex, which had honestly made Sirius really want to smack them both upside the head for being fucking idiots apparently determined to hurt each other.

Sirius is especially frustrated because Regulus won't even let him be there for him. Won't have anything to do with him. He is just as angry at Sirius as James is at him, and if he sees the hypocrisy in that, he clearly doesn't care. It's different anyway. Different between them as brothers and James and Regulus as lovers, or something close to it. Would have been. Could have been. It's all lost to them now, all of them. That's not different at all. Everything is fucking ruined.

In the end, Regulus wouldn't see anyone before the evaluations, and he never resurfaced until it was time to go to the evaluations. Regulus has been stone-faced and silent this entire time, not saying a word, not acknowledging Sirius at all. And now, seeing the look in Regulus' eyes after his evaluation… It's wild. Fierce. Defiant.

"Sirius Black," is announced over the intercom, and Sirius heaves a sigh as his shoulders slump.

All of this is so messy.

Complicated.

Shaking his head, Sirius goes to do what he has to. Entering the evaluation room, the first thing he does is look up to see the various gamemakers, government officials, and whatever high-roller sponsors could work their way in—all watching him, fixed and eager.

Except McGonagall. She's just watching, calmly, focused but not like a vulture. Waiting. Sirius flicks his gaze away from her, to everyone else, and the differences are so obvious when compared to her. They're all practically frothing at the mouth, desperate for whatever show he's going to give them, like he's theirs, like he belongs to them and always has.

He knows they believe that, truly. He has let them believe that for a long time, and he's suddenly struck with the realization and the overwhelming freedom in the fact that he no longer has to. They're wrong. He's not theirs.

Slowly, Sirius turns his head to run his gaze over his options. There are weapons he could show off with, and for a second, he's tempted to go pick up a spear. No, not yet. There are so many things he could do to show just how competent he is, everything from fighting to his aptitude in survival depending on the environment. It's been years since people have seen him in this context; they must be eager to see what he can do.

As Sirius turns his head, he feels his breath freeze in his lungs, his heart giving a harsh kick in his chest. Regulus' evaluation hadn't taken too long, and now Sirius knows why.

The mats are embedded into the ground, blue and thick, not moving. They stretch from one side of the room all the way to the other, taking up half the room. In big, jagged letters, carved from a dagger, a message has been left that reads:

HALLOW

HOLLOW

There are Aurors trying their best to rip the mats up, but currently failing to. Sirius stares at it, his heart clenching and swelling at the same time as he thinks, oh, Reggie.

It's not like Sirius hasn't noticed it, the underlying rage that's sweeping through the Hallow, but not only them. The Victors who are now tributes again, too. Even the death eaters. Sirius took note of it while waiting for his evaluation, gazing around at everyone, studying them. No one is happy to be here, to be going back in, not one damn person, not even those that thrived on their games the first time.

Because they all know. They all know what it is to do this, and to come out of it. They weren't supposed to have to do it again. It's almost this sort of—unifying thing? Just a quiet, unspoken understanding between all of them that honestly makes something in Sirius wilt with sadness, because he knows it won't last. It can't. As soon as that starting cannon in the arena sounds, they'll all be ready to slaughter each other.

Fuck the Hallow for this. Fuck Riddle, and the gamemakers, and the sponsors, and every single fucking person involved. They think they have control? Really?

No.

No, not yet. Maybe when the platforms raise and the countdown reaches zero and the cannon sounds, but not a second before. Not now.

Sirius swivels his head to stare at the people watching him, their demanding eyes, possessiveness in their gazes. They really do look at him as if he is theirs, as if they own him, as if he is a puppet on their strings. Fools. They're all fools.

It's not necessarily just sexual in nature. There are plenty of people who feel they have a claim to him just because he is him, and not because they want his body. They want his mind, too. His performance. His presence. His compliance. They want him just to say that they have him.

The only person who has him, truly, is Remus.

Without a word, Sirius reaches up and begins unbuttoning his shirt, slowly, one button at a time so his shirt falls open in little slivers. The people—excluding McGonagall—all lean forward eagerly, pleased, enthralled by what they believe is a strip-tease. Murmurs break out. Soft laughter. Gleaming eyes of encouragement and praise, like they didn't expect this, but they're delighted by it anyway.

All of that stops the moment he eases his shirt off, revealing skin littered in marks that Remus left behind, still quite fresh even now. Sirius holds his arms out and does a slow spin, letting them look, letting them wonder.

There's a mounting frustration from them that Sirius can feel from here, their curiosity running rampant, their envy twisting into bitterness. They believe he is theirs, and these marks say differently. They may think it was a Hallow who left them, but it wasn't them, and they know that; they don't know who, and they're aware they'll never get to find out.

It's like a toy in your sandbox that you haven't gotten to play with, and you find out that someone else has come into your sandbox to play with it before you could, without your permission. That's how these people think. That's how they see him. And now they see these marks that say, quite clearly, that he belongs to someone else. He's not their toy, and the sandbox is on fire, so they can't even get in to get to him.

Look at me, Sirius thinks. Look at me and see who I belong to. Not you. Never you. I belong to me, and I've given myself to him, and there's nothing you can do about it.

With that, Sirius scoops his shirt back up, puts it back on, and gives them all a bright, defiant grin. He bows, slightly, letting his smile soften into a smirk as he runs his gaze over everyone, and then he stands up and walks out.

When the evaluation scores come out, Sirius gets the lowest out of everyone, the lowest possible score to get, a score that no other tribute in history has ever gotten before him, and when he sees it, amongst everyone else's dismay, he laughs.

Regulus waits for two hours after the evaluation scores are out before he leaves his room. He got a fairly high score, only one below the year prior. Sirius got the lowest ever in history.

Sirius had thought it was hilarious for some reason, while Pandora despaired, Remus went pale, and James rubbed his temples like he had a headache. Regulus didn't react at all, didn't even acknowledge him. No matter how much the others asked, Sirius wouldn't say what he did in his evaluation.

He didn't have a problem telling anyone what Regulus did, though. It was like he was tattling on him, fussing to James and Pandora, while Regulus scowled as Pandora lectured him, and James…

Well, he just looked at Regulus. First time he looked at him since he left him in his bed with the cold remnants of a parting gift settling heavy in Regulus' bones. His jaw had been clenched, nostrils flared, eyes full of heat and anger. Regulus' heart had started beating hard and fast, because he knew James wanted to fuck him stupid, which is—yeah, Regulus is okay with that, actually. The parting gifts are not great, as it turns out. They hurt quite a bit, emotionally speaking. Regulus is greedy for more anyway.

In the end, James had only said, quick and sharp, "Stop being stupid," and looked away, his fingers flexing. Regulus wanted to go crawl into James' lap and let those fingers flex around his throat. He thinks that maybe, just maybe, he's going insane.

James is driving him insane.

It's getting close to night now, but not quite, and he has somewhere to be. Leaving seems simple at first, but then he is caught by Sirius and Remus, who just so happen to be folding laundry together in the main room, talking and laughing like a scene out of a domestic homemade film.

"Where are you off to?" Remus asks as he attempts to casually slip by, unnoticed. Sirius seems to know better than to speak, which is for the best. To him, Regulus wouldn't respond anyway. Remus is… Well, Remus gets a pass.

"Just going for a walk," Regulus mutters. "I'm tired of looking at the same four walls."

"You can come help us fold laundry," Remus offers.

"Thanks," Regulus says flatly, "but I think I'll pass."

Sirius clicks his tongue, reaching out to run his fingers through Remus' hair. "You tried, my love, don't worry about it. I'll fold laundry with you as much as you like."

Regulus could gag, honestly.

"You really shouldn't be out wandering around," Remus murmurs, glancing over at him. "You have a busy day tomorrow with the interview. You should get some rest."

"Right, I won't take long. Just felt like going to the roof," is all Regulus says, vaguely, and then he continues on without saying anything else.

He enters the lift.

It goes down, not up.

Down, down, down. All the way to the first floor. Not the basement level, or the ground floor, but the very first floor with a suite for those from district one.

The lift dings, doors sliding open, and Regulus exhales all at once as he sets his shoulders and sweeps down the hall. He reaches the suite, firms his jaw, and knocks on the door.

Regulus is glad he prepared himself, because the sight of Lucius when he opens the door nearly makes Regulus break out into a grin. The side of his jaw is swollen and purple, a terrible bruise on display, stark against pale skin. Regulus very nearly starts giggling. James smacked the shit out of him.

"Regulus," Lucius greets, a tad bitterly.

"Lucius," Regulus replies, his mouth turning up in one corner as he pointedly eyes the bruise before flicking his gaze up again to see Lucius glare at him. "Rough day?"

Lucius looks like he's tasting something sour, but Narcissa must have gotten ahold of him at some point, because he's behaving. He steps back wordlessly and lets Regulus in.

"Ah, there he is," Bellatrix calls, and the room falls silent as she raises her arms, grinning at him. "I always knew you were the smarter brother, munchkin!"

"It's hardly a revelation. Sirius has always been, and will always be, a fucking idiot," Regulus drawls, leisurely dragging his gaze over everyone in the room.

The death eaters, all of them and some of their mentors. Bella is standing with Rodolphus Lestrange, pressed right up against him rather provocatively, honestly, which he seems quite happy about. The little brother—Rabastan—is close by, leaning against the wall as he flicks his gaze over Regulus with visible curiosity. Narcissa is by the window, smoking, even as she eyes him with a small, sad smile. The others all have drinks, clearly in the middle of mingling before he popped in.

"Well, come in, come in," Bella says, waving him into the room and blowing curls out of her face. "Grab a drink, settle in, mingle a bit. Might as well get used to everyone. We'll talk more when the food is ready."

Regulus, perhaps childishly, makes a beeline right for Narcissa because he knows her better than anyone else, other than Bellatrix, who is probably about eight seconds from dragging the eldest Lestrange off to her room, by the looks of things. And she calls him the cock-slobbering slag.

"She's determined to go out with a bang," Narcissa says dryly as she flicks ash and gives him an exasperated look that he fully understands as a younger sibling who also has an older sibling that's basically the embodiment of a walking headache.

"Clearly," Regulus mutters.

"Want one?" Narcissa offers, scooping up a pack of open cigarettes off the windowsill, holding it out to him with her eyebrows raised.

Regulus shakes his head. "No thanks. I don't smoke."

"Mm, Sirius never roped you into that, did he?" Narcissa muses, sitting the pack down again.

"He didn't start until after his games, and we weren't really… Well, we weren't on good terms then," Regulus mumbles.

Narcissa inhales, letting little tendrils of smoke escape her mouth as she studies him. In the end, she just offers him a small smile and murmurs, "You know, every Black who has gone into the arena always made it back out. This will be the first time that doesn't happen."

"I know," Regulus says quietly.

"It's a shame, isn't it?" Narcissa whispers, her eyes drifting shut, expression strained. Just like everyone else, she's rightfully upset about the predicament they're all in.

Regulus swallows, hesitating, then he admits, "Andromeda came to see me off on the train." Her eyes snap open, fixing on him immediately, and his heart clenches. "She didn't know about you and Bellatrix going back in at the time, I don't think, but she said something I think applies to all of us. Something that I think she'd like you to know, too."

"What?" Narcissa demands, searching his gaze, her fingers twitching around her cigarette.

"When I pointed out that only one of us could win, she said, make them pay for it," Regulus tells her.

Narcissa doesn't react for a moment, and then she huffs out a weak laugh as her face softens. She looks away, her eyelashes fluttering. "Of course she did."

"I'm going to," Regulus confesses, holding her gaze steadily when she looks at him again. "Are you?"

"Yes," Narcissa says softly. Her gaze once again trails across the room, snagging on Bellatrix for a moment, and then she looks back at him, something sharp in her gaze. Sharp like shattered glass that was supposed to be tucked away, never meant to be touched—not because it was fragile, but because it would cut deeper than anything else if it was broken—and now it has been dropped. "Yes, I believe we all are."

"Good," Regulus announces firmly.

They don't say anything else after that, and Bellatrix doesn't have enough time to drag Rodolphus away, because the meal is ready before she ever gets the chance. The suite isn't meant to hold this amount of people—twelve altogether—so they have to pack in around a table that could comfortably hold only half of that, at best. Regulus is tucked in between Bellatrix and Rabastan, feeling very crowded, and Narcissa sits across from him with visible amusement on her face.

For the most part, no one bothers him. Rabastan talks to him a bit, and he's…nice? Oddly enough, he is fairly nice and has a warm, charming disposition. Attentive and observant, but not in an overbearing way. He's handsome in a peach-colored shirt with a dip in his collar revealing a silver necklace with a tear-drop ruby nestled against brown skin at the dip of his chest. He has a nice voice, smooth and deep, so deep that doing a double-take is absolutely necessary. The sort of voice that sounds like it's probably vibrating in his chest every time he speaks, like you could actually feel it if you were to reach out and touch. He has a nice smile, too.

Regulus understands why the Hallows like him. He's easy to talk to, easy to listen to, easily funny and rather laid-back, honestly. Put together and poise, Regulus doesn't doubt that the Hallows admired him before and likely will again. Personally, other than Bellatrix and Narcissa, Regulus suspects he'll gravitate towards Rabastan as well, especially as a person who understands what it is to be a little brother.

For a second, Regulus watches Rabastan laugh when he makes a dry quip about needing more wine to deal with all of these idiots, and he feels his stomach drop out from underneath him when he's hit with a horrible wash of deja-vu just thinking about Evan. Last time, Regulus made a friend—a best friend, no matter how hard he fought it—and then he got him killed. Suddenly, Regulus isn't sure he wants to have anything to do with Rabastan in the arena at all.

Regulus looks at him, and looks around at everyone, and he realizes that they're likely all going to be dead in a matter of days. Here they are, eating and chatting like that reality is out of reach, as if it's not a set of walls closing in around them all. It turns his fucking stomach.

For the most part after that, Regulus just sits and listens, remaining quiet and observant. Narcissa does, too. The others, though… They talk about what's coming. They speculate about the arena, discuss other tributes and their weaknesses, and carry on quite a bit about the people they feel the need to target most. Predictably, Sirius is a high priority target that they feel is important to get rid of early while they still have the numbers to overtake him, because these people may be fucking awful, but they're not stupid. They know Sirius is a threat. They know it will take effort to kill him.

Emmeline is another one they're sure needs to be targeted quickly, as is Marlene, and also Asher and Majesty. They don't know very much about Alice, don't view Augusta as a threat, and find Eli absolutely laughable. The rest are those they're sure they'll handle along the way.

Sirius is the main target, the one they're all going for the moment they get the chance, preferably as a group. Multiple times, as people talk about Sirius, they look at Regulus like they have something to say, but Bellatrix and Narcissa apparently frighten them enough that they keep their mouths shut. Well, most of them. One is not as wise as the rest.

"So, what, you have no comment about us planning to kill your brother, Regulus?" Yaxley asks, curling his lip in distaste.

"Oh, awkward," Rabastan mutters under his breath.

Regulus reaches down to pick up his napkin, wipes his mouth, then sits it down and sighs. "Corban, what is it, exactly, that you expect me to say?"

"I'd mind your tongue if I were you," Bellatrix warns, her gaze fixed on Yaxley. "He's a terror with a fork, and so am I, and there are plenty on this table. Tread carefully."

"You can't honestly expect us to sit here and act as if he's someone we can trust," Yaxley hisses.

"You can't trust anyone in the hunger games," Alecto says, arching an eyebrow at him. "None of us can trust each other. At some point, Corban, we will all turn on each other."

"Yes, obviously," Yaxley grits out. "But that will happen when it is necessary, and not a moment before. How can we be sure that he's not planning to turn before then? It's his brother. That sense of loyalty, it's a concern. If it was yours, Alecto, would you so easily abandon him? Kill him? And you, Rabastan? Even you, Bella, Narcissa—you're here together. Am I just meant to believe that Regulus has turned his back on Sirius and will be an asset to us?"

"Oh, I'd snap Rodolphus' neck the first chance I got," Rabastan says lightly, sharing a grin with his older brother, who flips him off and rolls his eyes.

"I think the concern is valid," Dolohov mumbles, staring down at his glass with a frown.

"Trust me, the fact that Regulus is here is proof enough," Bellatrix snaps. "He wouldn't be here if he wasn't willing to do what it takes to be here. You forget, he has other family here as well. He has me and Narcissa. You don't know him the way we do, and you can't see it, but it's so clear that he hates Sirius. He is here because he wants to be."

"Excuse me if I find it a little hard to believe that you two are more important to him than his brother. Besides, hasn't it been years since you all saw each other?" Yaxley challenges.

"Stop," Regulus says, his voice firm, and Yaxley's eyes fixate on him. A lot of eyes do. "You want to doubt me? Be my guest. I have no interest in appeasing your insecurities. You're afraid of me. You've just made that clear to everyone at this table, and what do you think that means for you?"

Yaxley's nostrils flare. "I'm not afraid of you."

"Then you have nothing to worry about, do you?" Regulus tilts his head at him. "After all, how much threat could I pose to you if you're not as weak as you're presenting yourself now? Are you worried I'm better than you, Corban?"

"No," Yaxley says sharply.

Regulus holds his gaze. "You should be."

"You're not better than me," Yaxley declares, his voice harsh.

"I am," Regulus informs him simply. "And so is Sirius. He's better than you and everyone else at this table. He will kill all of you easily, effortlessly, and without faltering for a second. No one at this table would be able to win against him. The only weakness Sirius has in the arena is me. If you were smart, you'd realize that you need me."

"Oh, is that right?" Yaxley sneers at him. "So, you're just going to stand there and let us kill him?"

"No," Regulus says, and everyone stares at him. He never looks away from Yaxley as he announces, without even the tiniest waver in his tone, "The only person who can kill Sirius is me."

To that, no one has a reply. Regulus picks up his fork and resumes eating, and—after a few beats—everyone else follows suit. Bellatrix looks pleased. Narcissa looks at him, looks at him, looks at him and then she looks away.

Regulus doesn't say another word. He doesn't have to.

He said enough.

Chapter End Notes

well. That Happened.

giggling and twirling my hair at james smacking the fuck out of lucius with his cane. that man is on a WAR PATH, and he is Very Sexy To Me. you may not think james is/can be/will be dangerous, but you are Very Wrong.

pandora and james fighting ☹ but it does show just how basically none of them are handling this well. they're stressed, they're at the end of their ropes, their nerves are frayed.

also james breaking down because he's trying SO HARD and he's under so much pressure and just. god, he's dealing with so much. it's day two. it's literally been two days since the reaping, and things have only gotten worse.

then there's sirius, who is trying just as hard to help him, and help them all. also him asking remus to take care of james 😭 he WILL be asking james to take care of remus, too. (even though he knows james will, just like he knew remus would take care of james, but like, sometimes these are things you've just Gotta Say, ya know?)

and then regulus meeting the death eaters. STOP GLARING AT ME. i can feel all of you glaring at me rn. listen, listen, listeeeeen. trust the process, okay? there is a Reason for this, I PROMISE!!!

but god, the juxtaposition between regulus talking to bellatrix and hearing her out vs sirius being teased by his friends and saying he AND regulus will be allies. oof. the dramatic irony....

and then the Jegulus Fight 1.0. yes, i say 1.0, because they will indeed hash things out soon (quite soon, believe it or not), but they've just gotta get past this rough patch, and in the midst of getting to that point, they have. um. Encounters...

look, can you blame them? they're angry and crazy about each other, leave them be 😭 they only had TWO DAYS to, ah, work through some sexual tension, and that was not nearly enough. i mean, they still want each other really, reallyyyy bad, so it's like. well, it's genuinely driving them both a bit mad, because they're mad for each other and doing their best with that in the worst situation they could possibly ever be in.

james giving regulus a "parting gift" 😟 you know the wild thing? it never seemed fucked up when regulus did it, and yet, when james does...

i think we have this idea of james as like this happy character who doesn't do cruel things like this, especially to those he loves. and like, that's a fair assessment, but trust me, please. this DOES get expanded more on later—like his reasoning behind why it hurts so much, and why he labels his feelings as hatred, etc. his part in all of this—along with regulus'—is addressed later, i assure you.

moving on, learning more about the death eater side of things! just a reminder: the death eaters in this fic are not meant to be representatives of death eaters in canon; it's a reference/parallel, yes, but this is an au in which none of these characters have done anything they did in canon, excluding murder—which, in the context of this fic, is a slightly different topic. my feelings on characters in canon vs aus/fanon aren't automatically the same.

EDIT: i had a note here (that i had to delete to not go over the word limit to explain this), and it was about me (and many others) believing the lestranges were canonically black. as it turns out, they were not, and the reason for that is because jkr is a sick individual who perpetuates mistreatment of characters of color, as well as various other marginalized groups. leta lestrange in fantastic beasts had a black mother and a white father, and she was the only poc in the family—as ive been updated on. there's a horrible background to all of that that jkr created, which is very disgusting and can be triggering to read about. you can research it if you're curious, but please be aware that it only further shows just how horrible jkr is. i was unaware and have depicted them as black and will continue to do so, because fuck jkr, and i still stand by what i said before—representation matters.

"Hey," Sirius says, "where were you last night?"

Regulus pauses, his hands stilling in the middle of spreading cream cheese on bagels, because he's taken it upon himself to make breakfast. Sirius doesn't know if bagels count as breakfast, but he also doesn't have the heart to question it. For some reason, Regulus seems to really want bagels right now.

As always, Regulus doesn't respond. Doesn't look at him. Doesn't have anything to do with him.

Sirius feels his heart sink a bit, and he can't really figure out why. He knew this would happen. Regulus told him that Sirius would lose him. It's just that Sirius never wanted to.

Regulus wasn't on the roof last night. Not all night, at least. Sirius knows this because, after Remus left to go back to his cell, he went up to the roof with the idea that he'd go up there and spend a little time with Regulus, maybe chainsmoke a bit, maybe try to talk to him. He misses him. It's this horrible ache right where his heart is that throbs with every beat.

But Regulus wasn't there, and he didn't show up. He came back to the suite late in the evening, after Sirius had given up and came back down to wait on him, and he once again didn't acknowledge Sirius before going to bed.

Sirius assumes that Regulus went somewhere else to be alone, somewhere no one could find him, like he'd occasionally do back home. He gets that Regulus finds comfort in isolation sometimes, especially when he's having a hard time, and things are very fucking hard right now. Sirius just wishes Regulus would still find comfort in him.

Sirius heaves a sigh and turns away from Regulus, glancing around the kitchen. James isn't up yet, but Pandora and Remus are setting the table, chatting together.

They have their interviews soon. Regulus doesn't seem nervous or scared this time, like he was last time, but Sirius thinks he wouldn't show it if he was. Especially not to Sirius. As for Sirius, he's not really nervous or scared either. He has a way with the Hallows, always has, and some part of him is relishing in another chance to be defiant again.

Regulus' hands briefly pause on the bagels once more when the sound of James' cane hitting the floor announces his approach. Everyone focuses on him as he enters with a yawn, knuckling at one eye under his glasses, looking exhausted. When he drops his hand and blinks open his eyes, he looks at the bagels, and his face seems to turn to stone.

"Hungry, James?" Sirius asks, hoping to snap him out of whatever furious state he's gone into now.

"No, I've just lost my appetite. Fucking hate bagels," James mutters, then turns around and walks right back out.

Sirius stares after him for a bit, feeling wrong-footed in a way he never has before when it comes to James. He looks over at Pandora and Remus, as if they have the answers, but they look just as lost as he does. Finally, Sirius looks to Regulus, who has his eyes squeezed shut as he strangles the edge of the counter with both hands, and he's so visibly not alright that Sirius aches, aches, aches to comfort him. He can't anymore.

He lost that, too.

Regulus isn't sure how it happens exactly. Just one of those odd coincidences that no one sees coming, one that leads to a very awkward, tense moment for everyone involved.

There was no preparation for the interviews this time, seeing as there's really no point. Sirius and Regulus have done this before. They know what to expect. Really, they all just sat down and discussed what Rita would likely bring up, but there is one aspect of this that's unknown. The interviews are different this year, in that all the tributes will be on stage together at one time, sitting towards the back and taking turns to come up to the chairs. It's a Quarterly Memorial thing, apparently, but that's not the uncharted territory. No, it's the fact that all the tributes are already Victors, and none of them are happy about being here. It could lead to trouble.

Regulus hopes it does. He hopes that each and every interview is used to twist the knife deeper into the Hallows. He hopes it fans their flames and invites in more rage. He hopes Riddle watches and feels his power tremble in his hands. Though he may never lose it, Regulus relishes in the thought that, even for a moment, he might feel the fear of that possibility.

Dorcas has gotten him and Sirius ready, and this time, she's made them both look equally dangerous. Like walking weapons again, dual blades ready to cut. They're in some sort of lightweight, shimmering armor that glimmers and glints with stars. They are stars, in name, and as beautiful as stars are, they could envelope the world and set it ablaze.

They look like they're going to.

Regulus likes the way he looks, even more so because James clenches his fists, leans against the wall like he wishes he had brought his cane to brace against, and inhales sharply the moment he sees him, though he doesn't say one word.

It's an altogether silent walk to the lift to get to where they're going for the interview, Dorcas and Pandora coming along. It's in the lift where things get dicey. See, the lift is spacious enough that no one is really too close, but not spacious enough for that to remain the case when, at the next floor, the doors open to reveal a rather large group waiting to get on.

By large, Regulus means Frank, Alice, Augusta, Marlene, and Eli. Five more on top of the five that's already inside. They all shuffle inside with low murmurs of apologies and chuckles, shifting around to make room. Somehow, in all the quick movement and arranging, Regulus ends up pressed right up against James in the corner, rather against his will.

Regulus really doesn't mean to. It just sort of happens, and then there's not really any room to do anything about it. Frank ends up smoosed close to Alice, which makes Augusta squint suspiciously at both of them. Dorcas and Marlene seem to go to desperate lengths to avoid each other, which means Dorcas practically stitches herself to Pandora's side, who gets visibly flustered when she accidentally gets a face full of Dorcas' chest as she tries to duck out of the way. This makes Marlene glare at her from where she's sort of just holding Eli up, because he is, as always, very drunk. He may or may not be sleeping.

Sirius, the fucking bastard, seems to be the most comfortable right in the middle of it all, bumping elbows with Marlene and chatting cheerfully with Frank. James, on the other hand, is stiff and audibly grinding his teeth.

"Could you back up?" James whispers heatedly, his nostrils flaring as he pins a harsh look on Regulus.

"Sorry," Regulus mumbles, feeling his face get hot as he tries, and fails, to invite space between them. His arm has somehow gotten trapped behind James' back, and he braces his other one against James' hip, because he honestly doesn't have anywhere else to put it as he tries to shift away.

James' free hand flies down to grab Regulus' wrist, and their eyes meet, and that's it. They both stop moving. They don't speak, don't even breathe, just simply stare at each other. The lift dings. The doors open. Everyone files out.

Regulus and James do not.

The lift empties, and Regulus swallows thickly as he darts his gaze out the doors currently sliding shut to see the others continuing on, none the wiser that they're missing two. At the last second, Pandora glances around, then back, locating them. She blinks, and then the doors close all the way.

The moment they do, the lift starts moving again, and Regulus turns his gaze back to James. His heart is racing. He feels a bit mad, honestly, standing here and shaking and struggling to breathe, because he knows—he knows what's about to happen.

Sure enough, James reaches out to smack the stop button, the lift coming to a halt, and then he's backing Regulus up against the wall and kissing him like his life depends on it.

Regulus meets him halfway, or maybe he tugs him in, he isn't sure. All he knows is that he has James under his hands again, and he doesn't care about his makeup or his clothes or anything at all other than this, this, this.

James, despite his anger and the hatred he claims to feel, touches and kisses Regulus desperately, with reverence, groaning in defeat, utterly pitiful. Regulus would feel sorry for him if he wasn't in the same exact predicament. It's difficult staying away from someone you want this badly, and Regulus can feel James' want matching his own, tangling with it, harsh and burning with simple, unspeakable need.

Regulus knows that James is a complicated, complex tangle of emotions in regards to him at the moment, hardly able to make sense of it all, or balance it. There's nothing to be done about it, not when it feels this fucking good.

James' love has grown thorns, and Regulus is happy to bleed.

"I'm going to kill Dorcas. You look so fucking—" James cuts himself off and practically whines into Regulus' throat, his hands gripping Regulus all over. A helpless, choked noise falls out of his mouth, and then he's bringing his head up to kiss him again, deeply, passionately.

Regulus clutches at him, giving as good as he gets, and then he's pushing James back, his chest heaving. James looks at him, gaze hooded as he studies Regulus, the very tip of his tongue touching his shiny-bitten bottom lip.

That look sizzles between them for a beat, and then Regulus is frantically walking James back against the opposite wall of the lift. James lets him, moving like a lure to draw Regulus in, and he braces his hands against the rail once he has gone as far as he can go, waiting, his eyelids hanging heavy, hooded, a sensual look that beckons at Regulus, hooks into his navel, crooks a finger and makes him want to kneel.

So he does.

Regulus proceeds to sink to his knees. James groans at the sight, and then his head hits the wall with a thunk. If anyone's waiting for the lift, well, they'll just have to take the stairs.

"What did you do?" Dorcas blurts out in despair, looking completely and utterly horrified in a way Sirius has honestly never seen before. The shock—the drama of it all—is such a Hallow thing that he's reminded in a way he often isn't that Dorcas is a Hallow, too. Just one of the better ones.

Sirius swivels his head to see what she's looking at and is faced with the sight of James and Regulus approaching them quickly. Regulus no longer looks as put together as he did before, his hair a mess and quite a bit of his makeup smeared. He fails to meet Dorcas' eyes, his cheeks bright red.

"Um," Regulus croaks, then clears his throat rather violently, giving James a furtive side-eye, obviously asking for help with a look that tells everyone why he's in this state to start with.

James offers no help at all. He's not even flustered.

"Oh, oh, you are so lucky I am prepared at all times," Dorcas hisses, reaching out to grab Regulus' arm and march him off to the side with a scowl, digging in her purse. Pandora, as always, moves over to do damage control, soothing over Dorcas' frayed nerves while Regulus stands like a scolded child and holds still for Dorcas to get him presentable again.

Sirius turns to James and flatly says, "Really?"

"I don't want to talk about it."

"So, you hate him, but you just can't keep your hands off him, is that it?"

"Sirius, I said I don't want to talk about it," James snaps, his voice low and sharp. "Besides, you're meant to be staying out of it, aren't you? So, stay out of it."

"He won't talk to me, James," Sirius chokes out, and James looks at him, swallowing. "He won't look at me, or have anything to do with me, or let me be there for him. He won't let me comfort him. Don't you get it? I'm dead to him."

James' face twitches, then softens. "Sirius…"

"He said it, and he meant it, and I just—I have to make my peace with that," Sirius continues, his voice thick. "But it's especially difficult when I'm just stuck watching you two hurt each other, and I can't even comfort either of you about it. He's—it's breaking his heart, James. You're breaking his heart. And I know, I know he has broken yours in every way possible, but he goes into the arena tomorrow, we both do, and this—it's only going to make it worse. You have so little time left—"

"Okay, that's—just don't. Please don't," James rasps, squeezing his eyes shut. He shakes his head, breathing in and out, his features twisted. Sirius can see him actively fighting the reminder. The truth.

"James," Sirius whispers.

"Please," James chokes out, flinching so hard that Sirius wants to reach out and pull him into his arms.

Sirius is planning to do just that, but they're interrupted by Pandora, who rushes over to say, "Sirius, they're about to bring the tributes on. You and Regulus have to go."

"You'll be watching from here?" Sirius checks, glancing between her and James.

"We'll be right here," Pandora assures him. "Dorcas will be out in the crowd, though, if you need a familiar face."

Sirius nods and reaches out to squeeze James' shoulder before pulling away, because that's really his only choice. He follows Regulus and Dorcas out of the room and down the hall. Dorcas is still fussing over Regulus as they walk, and he just puts up with it in silence, less chastised and more resigned now.

There is a large group waiting in the space off to the side of the stage, all the tributes dressed up and looking pretty, lingering in silence. Dorcas does one last thing to Regulus' hair, steals a quick glance at Marlene, who quickly looks away as soon as she does, and then she's rushing to go find her place in the crowd. After that, it's just waiting.

Sirius stands next to Regulus, wanting to say something, wanting to offer advice or words of comfort, but feeling so cold. Regulus is freezing him out, a thick wall of ice that won't melt or crack. Sirius can't get through to him, not anymore, so he knows trying would be fruitless.

It's not very long before someone is stepping out to usher them into motion, waving them through to the stage in order of district. Sirius and Regulus file in behind Augusta and Alice, and the muffled sounds of the crowd break through as soon as he starts climbing the stairs.

They're going ballistic, absolutely caught up in the sight of their favorites walking out in glitz and glam, trophies melted down in rivers of gold for them to fawn over. Rita is laughing, loud and delighted, announcing each pair as they come in and take their seats. It takes a while for the crowd to calm down.

"Well, well, well, what an invigorating welcome to the 85th Quarterly Memorial!" Rita calls, raising her hands to silence the crowd before they can start up again. "Why don't we get into it, shall we? Let's start with the Hallow's darling Narcissa Black, from district one!"

"Thank you, Rita," Narcissa says softly once she reaches the seat at the front of the stage, her hands folded gently in her lap, a very small hunch to her shoulders. There's just the slightest wobble to her voice that depicts fear, but only a little, like she's doing her very best to cover it up.

Sirius listens as Rita talks to Narcissa about the fact that she's originally from district six and that she's here with three relatives, one who is her older sister. They also revisit her first games, touching on the fact that she was deadly with a bow and arrows and played a lot of people for fools, which likely won't be possible again this year, now that people are prepared for her. Narcissa takes this in stride, bluntly stating that she's still very good with a bow, but she wouldn't think for a second that this group of people are those she can outsmart the same way she did the first time around.

She's very…diplomatic, Sirius would say. She's good with her words, picking and choosing wisely what to say, leading the conversation without Rita even realizing that she has lost control of it. Sirius doesn't remember a lot about Narcissa, but watching her highlight reels, thinking about what family she comes from, what life she chose with Lucius, and how she's handling this interview—well, she's on Sirius' level when it comes to manipulation. Oh, she's good.

Throughout the interview, there are little moments where Narcissa's words catch, where she has to clear her throat and blink harshly, seeming to need a moment to get herself together. It doesn't take very long before Rita can't resist pointing it out, focusing on it like a vulture.

"My dear Narcissa, you seem quite emotional about something," Rita says gently, reaching out to cover Narcissa's arm as she gazes at her sadly. She clicks her tongue. Tut, tut, tut. Oh, she's awful, truly. "I understand being upset, especially since you're inside the arena with three family members."

"Three would be upsetting, but what's really too much to bear is…" Narcissa trails off, tears building in her eyes as she lifts her hand and places it on her stomach, resting it there carefully. "Well, actually, it's four."

Rita goes pale so fast that it's almost comical. The entire room is filled with immediate gasps, and Rita snatches her hand back from Narcissa's arm like she was just burned. Her eyes are very wide. "Four? You—you're pr—you're—"

"Pregnant?" Narcissa fills in sadly. She looks down at her stomach, her tears falling. "Yes, just so. I was going to name them Draco."

Instantly, the crowd loses their fucking minds. To Sirius' right, he hears a soft, punched-out laugh escape Regulus, and Sirius can't stop himself from echoing it. Fucking hell. Oh, shit.

"You can't send a pregnant person into the arena!"

"Stop the games! Stop the games!"

"She was going to name them Draco!"

"Keep her out! Keep them all out!"

The room is a mixture of people shouting or people sobbing hysterically, a cacophony of pure chaos as Narcissa sniffles and strokes her stomach, while Rita looks about five seconds away from a fucking panic attack. It takes everything in Sirius not to fold over in his chair and just —bust out laughing.

Oh, fucking shit, this is—it's brilliant. Narcissa likely isn't even pregnant—Sirius is almost one hundred percent certain she's not, considering their last conversation—but the Hallows don't know that, and they're pissed. They're absolutely rioting in outrage on her behalf, and it's fucking glorious to witness. Helplessly, for just a moment, Sirius is so fucking proud to be related to her that he can almost recall the feeling he had long ago, like a wisp of a dream, back when she was his favorite.

"O-Okay! Okay, that's—that'll be all!" Rita calls loudly, stuttering over her words. She quickly ushers Narcissa up and gestures her to go back to the seat.

It takes ages for the room to fall silent again. A particularly furious group towards the back have to be escorted out by a few Aurors, shrieking the whole way out. Towards the middle, Dorcas is sitting with her fist pressed against her mouth, but it does very little to hide her grin.

Sirius is practically vibrating, because as much as he might not like her, Bellatrix is next, and she's fucking insane. There's no way Rita is equipped to handle her; no one is, really.

Sure enough, Bellatrix's interview goes a bit wonky, too. At first, it seems fine. Rita does not mention that Bellatrix is apparently an aunt in the making. Instead, she focuses on Bellatrix's last games, asking if she's going to be a death eater again—the answer is yes, and it's delivered with no shame whatsoever, which makes Sirius wrinkle his nose. Rita also asks what Bellatrix has been up to since her games, how she likes living in district one, and if she has a lover.

Bellatrix answers everything with an aloof, bored sort of indifference, like none of it interests her. What does seem to interest her is the threats she keeps sneakily slipping in to Rita, slowly at first, barely even noticeable, but then they get more obvious, and Bellatrix watches with delight as Rita squirms.

Bellatrix's promise to be a good show is what everyone loves about her. The drama. The maniacal energy that just radiates off of her, unapologetically. She's looking forward to killing; she wants to get started right away.

"It'd be an honor, wouldn't it, to die by my hand? Bloody and brutal. Your life, taken by me. I'll own it. I'll own you," Bellatrix says, and she's speaking right to Rita, but the whole crowd seems tuned in, drawn in by morbid fascination from her promise of malevolence and violence.

Even Rita isn't immune, it seems. Bellatrix leans forward in her chair, going to Rita in a way no tributes ever do, lifting her hand and crooking her finger. Rita sways in like a worm on a hook, looking absolutely terrified, but completely unable to get free anyway. A snake caught in the trap of deadlier snake that bobs and weaves, charmed by it, mirroring it helplessly.

"Wouldn't you like that, Rita?" Bellatrix asks, her voice soft and sweet as she curls her finger under Rita's chin, stroking her cheek with her thumb. "Hm? Wouldn't it feel so very good to bleed out in my hands? There's something everlasting between the dead and their murderer. You'd be with me always. Don't you want that?"

"Yes," Rita chokes out, the answer wrenched out of her like she's never been so afraid in her life.

Bellatrix smiles at her, wide and bright, then lifts her hand and boops Rita on the nose. Rita flinches, jolting in place, and despite that, she's flushed and flustered. Laughing, Bellatrix leans back, relaxing into her seat with a gleam of satisfaction in her eyes. What a mad, mad woman.

In this context, Sirius can respect it. He even finds a sick, twisted sense of vindictive amusement in it.

After Bellatrix, there's Yaxley, who admittedly had two very tough acts to follow. He doesn't manage so well, not a favorite of the Hallows, and not someone Rita seems afraid of enough to refrain from verbally abusing. Yaxley takes it all with a plastic smile on his face, his eyes blazing with anger.

After Yaxley is Lestrange, who does much better. He was beloved by the Hallows the last time, and he still is. Very charming, that one. He leans into the fact that his older brother is his mentor, talking quite a bit about the fact that he'd be missed terribly by him if something were to happen, shameless in how unfair it is for him and his brother to be put in this position, particularly by the Hallow, a home to people he states he's also considered family as well. Whether it's true or just something to stir up the crowd, it does indeed cause a lot of people to be upset. Like Rabastan is their brother, too.

Sirius feels a sharp sensation in the center of his chest that he can't make sense of, really. It's a burning feeling that spreads and makes him—well, he doesn't even know, but it upsets him as he sits there and listens to Rabastan Lestrange talk. It's not until Sirius steals a glance over at Regulus, who is blank-faced, that he realizes the feeling is jealousy.

There has never, not once, been a time in Sirius' life where he was jealous or envious of someone else in regards to Regulus. He's never been put in a position where he's had to feel that way, because every time he and Regulus became distant, it was a mutual thing. They always lost each other, by choice, a broken bond they both walked away from.

This time, it's just Regulus, so Sirius listens to Rabastan talk about how much he loves his brother, and he feels—jealous. The harsh, brittle pressure of envy. He doesn't regret making the decision to do everything to get Regulus home, but he wishes that, until he's actually dead, he could still be alive to Regulus. Still here, still his big brother, always his big brother. He wants that. He wants them to be okay. He wants to be told that, no matter what, Regulus does love him.

He's going to die never hearing Regulus say he loves him, because even if he said it years ago, or even as a child, Sirius can't remember. Sirius doesn't know if he does, not anymore. Maybe he never actually did.

Following Lestrange is Rowle, who—like Yaxley—is a bit verbally abused by Rita at first, until he starts talking about his willingness to kill, and then she seems to be afraid of him, too. Carrow is after, and like Lestrange, she talks about her brother, and she talks about how upset he was when he found out that there was a chance she could be going back in. She skips no details on how awful the Quarterly Memorial announcement was for her and her family, and it only further angers the crowd.

Majesty is next, who is commended for their last games, and they admit that they're just going to do what they do best and survive however they have to. After that is Asher, who is very good with poisons and isn't shy about owning up to this fact. She dodges most of Rita's questions and laughs when asked, wryly, if she expects the games to end so soon this time, like it did last time for her.

Alice is first from five, and Sirius feels his heart jump as he looks out at them. He can't help but think about how close Frank is to them, his best friend, and Sirius might have to…

They're good through their interview, for the most part. They seem to stutter over the topic of their parents, which does intrigue Sirius, admittedly. As far as he knows, Alice gave their parents the house they got as a Victor and moved in with Frank, but they have a good relationship with their family, unlike Frank's strained relationship with his mum. Rita clearly sees Alice's difficulties with talking about it, pressing on it like a bruise, but Alice shuts her down, coldly.

Augusta… Oh, she's—she is a sight to behold, honestly. She gets into the seat and immediately starts tearing Rita apart one sharp, derisive word at a time. She looks down her nose at Rita and no doubt makes her feel small. It's a mother's talent, that ability to make you feel absolutely worthless, and Sirius would know. Augusta weaponizes it against Rita, and if Rita didn't have mother-related issues before, she certainly does now.

Sirius is after Augusta, and he is so thoroughly entertained by all that's happened so far that it's not that hard at all to flash a knee-melting grin at the camera as he heads towards the seat at the front of the stage. He knows Remus is currently watching from the suite, and it makes him feel warm.

"Here he is, Sirius Black, as I live and breathe," Rita greets him with twinkling eyes, looking absolutely delighted to be speaking to him. "I must admit, I'm very excited about having the chance to talk to you, Sirius."

"As you should be, Rita," Sirius tells her, leaning back in his chair with his hands lazily resting on the arms in a sign of easy confidence. He spreads his legs a little, like he's comfortable, like he's splaying out for their eyes to feast on him.

"Why don't we start with your reaping then?" Rita asks.

"Which one?" Sirius replies, arching an eyebrow.

It's a testament to everyone's displeasure with the Quarterly Memorial rule this year when, with one simple question, the crowd starts muttering in distaste and anger. Rita looks massively uncomfortable, out of sorts, and to further put her out, Sirius looks out at the crowd gently and lifts his finger to his lips, saying I know, I know in a soothing tone that has each and every one of them settling down. Completely at his mercy. If he snapped his fingers, they'd be out of their seats in seconds. It's a power that he knows exactly how to use.

Rita visibly doesn't like the fact that he has more control than her on her own show, but there's very little she can actually do about it. She can be a fucking prick, though, and that's exactly what she does. "Well, I suppose they're both very similar, aren't they? At both reapings, you volunteered for your baby brother, and both times, he still ended up going in anyway."

What Rita doesn't know is that Sirius anticipated this, and he knows exactly how to use it to his advantage. She's a fucking idiot too blinded by the power she thinks she has to even realize the magnitude of the power he knows he has.

"Yes, it's—" Sirius swallows harshly and sweeps his gaze over the crowd, beseeching. "It's tragic. The worst thing I could possibly think of. You know, I—I would give anything, do anything, if only it wasn't this way. Does it have to be this way, truly? After all the love and warmth we've invited into your lives, all of you, this just feels as if it's being thrown back into our faces. All of us up here on this stage had and still have so much to offer, and you don't want it?"

This, predictably, riles the crowd up quite a bit. There are outcries of people arguing, promising they do want it, they want him; there are countless people making the fact that they don't agree with this, any of it, very clear; there are more than a few people shouting demands for the rule to be changed, for the Quarterly Memorial to be abolished.

This time, Sirius doesn't stop it.

At one point, someone front the front row literally throws themselves out of their seat towards the stage, sobbing, shouting about how much they love him. They try to climb up, but Aurors come rushing in to drag them out while they thrash and scream that this isn't fair, that it's wrong.

"Okay! Okay, let's just—hey! Let's hear what else Sirius has to say!" Rita shouts, waving her hands frantically until at least a few people calm down so she can speak over them as she turns to address Sirius. "You—yes, you spoke of love, didn't you? Let's talk about your love, Sirius. You sure have a lot of that to go around, from what I hear."

"Is that so?" Sirius asks, and the moment he speaks, the entire room falls quiet to listen again. He chuckles and glances at the camera, feeling his face soften. "Funny you'd say that, Rita, when my love is truly for one person. Just one."

"Oh?" Rita asks, now sounding gleeful. "Really? So, there's someone out there that has your heart?"

"Yes," Sirius murmurs, and the room fills with low hisses and quiet gasps. "Yes, there is."

"Well, don't keep us in suspense," Rita says. "Tell us about them. When did you meet them? Are they waiting for you back home, or is it someone from the Hallow?"

Sirius bites down on a smile, feeling his face get hot, knowing he's blushing and not caring one bit. "They're here, in the Hallow. I found them shining like the moon in the sky. My moon. I love them more than I could ever explain."

"Who is it?" Rita continues eagerly. "A sponsor? A fellow mentor? Someone here tonight?"

"Oh, they know who they are," Sirius says, smiling as he looks at the camera again, and when he looks away, looks at the crowd, he lets his smile fade. "It's a shame. What I would not give to remain a glowing star in the sky with my moon, but I fear I'm a star on the cusp of going out."

Someone out in the crowd bursts into tears again, and Sirius gives a sad smile, looking down and shifting in his seat to close himself off, shrink into himself, small like a star already dying right before their very eyes. No one is happy about it.

Rita coughs. "Ah, that's—yes, just a shame, but—"

"You know," Sirius interrupts, his voice gentle, "I've never been so loved by anyone as I am by my moon, and if I had the choice, I would not leave them. I wouldn't leave any of you, if it was in my hands to decide. But it's not. It's in Master Riddle's hands, and I have to ask…

Why should we have to pay for the crimes of someone else that came before us? Our bonds with the Hallow is true. I don't believe any of us have ever, or will ever, give room to doubt that, so why does Master Riddle? Is it not true that, since it was in his hands to make this rule, it's also in his hands to unmake it?"

"Okay! Interview over! Back to your seat, Sirius, thank you for joining us!" Rita calls out over yet another outpouring of demands and fury from the crowd.

Sirius stands amongst all the rage, all the tears, all the pleas for his life, and he ducks his head the same way he's seen Remus do, puts his hands behind his back just the same way Remus has, and goes to sit back in his seat.

After all, he's a servant to the Hallow, too. They all are.

Here he is, demanding their freedom.

You could not pry the words from Regulus with a fucking crowbar, but he is genuinely so pleased with what Sirius just did. It's actually difficult not to turn and beam at him for this, just for a second, so simply proud of him that he nearly does it, only to stop all at once when the same feelings come rushing back in. The pain. The anger. The betrayal.

It's such a horrible thing, because only days ago, everything in Regulus was at ease with Sirius. Comfortable with him, comforted by him. Safe. Trusting. Even admiring.

He should know by now how quickly things can change.

The room is practically shaking with the people that are throwing fits on their behalf, and Rita is struggling to get everyone to calm down again. It takes a while, and it doesn't seem to help that Sirius remains hunched in his seat like a shadow, unobtrusive, unreachable. They all want to keep him, and they can't. It's causing quite a bit of trouble.

If Rita thinks that the tides will change with Regulus' interview, she is very fucking wrong. He intends to keep the momentum going, whatever it takes.

This time, when Regulus sits down in the seat, he doesn't do it under a veneer of innocence. He remains stoic, blank, very sharp and very cold. He holds Rita's gaze and can practically see her hope for this going better die in her eyes. Good.

"Regulus," Rita greets weakly, swallowing. "I—well, if I'm honest, I…genuinely hoped I wouldn't be speaking to you again so soon, especially not like this."

"Me and you both," Regulus says.

Rita grimaces slightly, and the crowd is already so pissed off that his response only seems to make it worse. "Yes, well, I do think there's some honor in it, though. You chose this. Surely you have no regrets about taking your love's place."

"No," Regulus admits. "I have none. What I do regret is that it had to happen at all. Did you know, Rita, that a mere five minutes before the Quarterly Memorial announcement, James and I stood together in a kitchen and shared hot cocoa? He held me. We laughed. We were happy." He glances out at the crowd, seeing multiple stricken expressions, and he just keeps going, fucking ruthless about it. "I think that was the last time we got to be truly happy together. After all that we went through, all that we fought for, and we still ended up nothing more than a great, big tragedy."

"Oh, that's messed up! It isn't fair!"

"Stop the fucking games!"

"He was just here last year! Don't make him go back!"

"What if James loses him?! Oh, fuck, what if—"

Rita shouts over the crowd again. It takes a few minutes, and then she's whipping towards him, face strained. "Yes, that's just—oh, it's quite terrible, but surely you're planning to do everything you can to get back to him, right?"

"But how could it ever be the same, if I managed to?" Regulus counters bluntly. "Of course, there's the fact that I might not manage to. After all, there are twenty-three other people who are skilled and much farther away from past trauma than I am. You know, the trauma from the arena I was in only just last year. Have you ever thought about that, hm? The trauma one has to deal with in the aftermath of their games? It does impact our lives, believe it or not, and it surely has impacted mine and James'. That's not even to mention James' grief when he looks at me, looks into my eyes, so like my brother's, and sees his dead best friend, if I were to make it out. Tell me, Rita, what plan could I have that would save us from all of that?"

Rita opens and closes her mouth, staring at him in shock. She says nothing. No one makes a sound.

"Go on," Regulus insists, flicking his gaze over the crowd, then staring right at Rita. "Surely you have the answers on how to make sure my love story has a happy ending. I'd love to hear it, because I just don't know. So? Go on, then. I'm waiting."

"It's—it's not impossible, I don't think," Rita croaks. "If you fight, you could—"

"I shouldn't have to fight," Regulus snaps. "I already fought, didn't I? We all have. And here we are, forced to fight again. What's a love story without conflict, right? That's this. That's all of this, I hope you realize. All of you are the conflict, and the worst part—the absolute worst part—is that we were so close to our happy ending. So close, but never close enough."

"You—you have so much motivation, though," Rita tries, having to raise her voice over the people sobbing out in the crowd. "It's—ah, well, I believe in you. We all do, don't we?"

This does not get the response she seems so desperate for. The Hallows are absolutely furious. Rita has never looked so powerless, so worried, as she does right now.

"It's a shame…" Regulus sighs and shakes his head. "You know, I could almost find it in myself to—to just be grateful for what James and I did get to have, if it wasn't for the promise of the future we were so close to. And we'll never have that future together. It's gone."

"No, you mustn't think that way, Regulus."

"But it's true. Our plan—well, that can never happen. If it wasn't for that, then I think I wouldn't be so upset."

"If it wasn't for…what?"

Regulus once again glances around at everyone, taking in the tear-soaked faces and pure rage, and he lets himself think about how much it fucking hurts that James is lost to him, and will only slip further away when he speaks next. He lets it show on his face as he says, "If it wasn't for the wedding."

"The—" Rita chokes, staring at him with bulging eyes, the entire room ringing with stunned, horrified silence. "The wedding? You and James were—"

"Getting married? Yes. We planned to, anyway. We even hoped to have the wedding here in the Hallow," Regulus declares, a boldfaced lie that makes him ache and makes him feel sick and makes him want to rip the fucking world apart. "He was going to be my husband. But we lost that chance, too. I suppose that's something we only get to have in some other life."

The silence only lasts for a few seconds longer, and then everyone erupts all at once, people shouting and crying and once again making demands.

Rita doesn't even have to dismiss him.

He gets up and walks back to his seat, glancing at the camera where he knows James is watching. He hopes James will understand, even while he knows James will be upset.

Regulus promised himself he was going to make them pay, and he meant it. That's the promise he's chosen to keep.

Maybe, one day, James will forgive him for it.

Dorcas scrubs her hand over her mouth, her heart racing in her chest as she watches a group of Aurors have to pull out yet more Hallows causing a scene. Her mouth is so dry, and her hands are shaking. She's never seen anything like this before.

At first, it had been good. Dorcas had relished in it. She couldn't help it, because she can only imagine how Riddle is feeling right now, safe inside his castle, watching everything spiral out of control. The consequences of his actions, his choices; even he isn't safe from them.

It had felt good to realize that, to start with. But now, Dorcas is scared. She's scared for Sirius and Regulus in particular, who caused trouble no one has ever dared to. Trouble that will no doubt get them into trouble. They're pushing it, showing too much defiance, invigorating rebellion right here in the Hallow—and Riddle surely won't stand for it.

If they push too far, she doesn't know what could happen. There's a time crunch they're all on, whether or not they know it, and Dorcas still has so much to do. Lily has so much to do. This isn't something they can have done so soon, and with Sirius and Regulus stirring up trouble, it feels like the clock is only ticking faster. Her plan is very delicate, and what Sirius and Regulus have just done is—bold.

What's the saying about tables that turn?

The worst part is learning that Minerva—and Dumbledore, infuriatingly enough—was right. The world is on the brink of a war, and this… Just like Minerva said, the rule is doing what it's supposed to. Dorcas hates that Dumbledore's plan is actually working, and she hates even more that, if she had let the war be a priority as she meant to, then she would be in full support of this. But, as Minerva put it, Dorcas is leading with her heart, and she'll go to desperate lengths for it.

For Marlene.

For her friends here that she cares about.

For those who never deserved to go through this again.

The interviews continue, and the momentum is not lost, not even once. Those from seven and eight are quiet and fairly mild-mannered, but they take it upon themselves to express their discomfort with the rule that forces them to go back in, commenting that it would be nice if they didn't have to, which keeps the fires of anger throughout the crowd still blazing, if not growing out of control again.

District nine is, first, Dixon. He talks about being a mentor. He talks about how restricting it is, how there are rules to follow, like not falling in love with fellow mentors, which could split loyalties, and he also talks about how much money goes into the games that could be used for starving districts instead. He talks about how the Hallow is known for rejecting people when they get tired of them, how that's what happened to him, forced out of his mentoring position and now forced back into the arena. The insinuation that the Hallow is now rejecting each and every previous Victor on that stage, those that all these Hallows hold dear, is not handled well at all.

Following Dixon is Emmeline, who keeps the momentum as well. Dorcas—despite her previously jealousy—finds that she has a lot of respect for Emmeline who gets right up there and bluntly questions the morality in the Quarterly Memorial, after the blatant promise that Victors could live safely after they won their games. A promise broken by Riddle himself. She states it outright, asking how anyone can trust the Master of the Hallow when he can't even be taken at his word, when he won't uphold traditions that have never once been broken before. It's a very, very dangerous thing for her to do, and she doesn't even fucking flinch when she does it.

After Emmeline is Mavis, who drags Velvet up to join in on the interview, too. They both claim they want to spend as much time together as they can, and their blatant love for each other sends the crowd into hysterics yet again. Velvet and Mavis do something that no one—other than James—has ever done before. They lay down an ultimatum of sorts, promising that, if they're forced into that arena together, they will kill each other and die together rather than have to lose one another or be without the other.

Predictably, this does not go over well, not one bit. The Hallows are fucking devastated by this, and no matter how much Rita tries to change their mind, they refuse. They say it, and they swear they mean it. Dorcas believes they do.

After them, it's Eli, Marlene's fellow tribute. He's…drunk. It makes Dorcas so incredibly sad when she watches him get up and stumble to his seat, flopping down gracelessly and missing his mouth when he swipes at it a little sloppily. Rita's nose crinkles in visible distaste, so Dorcas is assuming that he's sweating copious amounts of alcohol right now.

"Right, Eli," Rita mutters. "It's been some years since you've been back in the Hallow, hasn't it? At least five now."

"Long time," Eli slurs, bobbing his head. He hiccups and looks out over the crowd. "Kept looking for Alphard, but I—I couldn' find 'im. Been looking for a long, long time."

"Alphard…" Rita's eyebrows fly up. "Do you mean Alphard Black, Eli?"

"That's the one."

"Who was he to you?"

"Everything," Eli responds simply, blinking almost sleepily at Rita, not seeming to realize that everyone is staring at him in disbelief, including the entire Black family currently present.

"Do you—by everything, do you mean that with…romantic connotations?" Rita asks, visibly baffled. Eli squints at her, seeming to struggle with parsing those words out, and then he just nods. "He was your lover?"

"Yeah," Eli breathes out, his weathered face sagging as his eyes flutter shut. "Yeah, he was. Couldn't—we couldn't be together, you know, once the Hallow found out. Kept us apart, made him stop being a Mentor. They said he found his way into a bottle and never found his way back out. Suppose I did the same when he found his way into a grave."

"Oh," Rita says softly, then she clears her throat and darts her gaze towards the other tributes. "Eli, did you—are you aware that Alphard's nieces and nephews are here?"

"I miss him," Eli whispers. "Still miss him."

"Eli?" Rita mutters.

It seems Eli has fallen asleep. Just—slumped over, cheek braced on his loose fist, mouth slack. He's even snoring. The room is silent, heavy, thick with upset for just one more thing. Even fucking Eli has managed to keep the momentum going.

No matter how much Rita tries to wake Eli up, he remains passed out. In the end, Marlene has to get up since she's next and help him out of the chair and back to his original seat. He wakes up, confused by being in motion, but falls asleep again once he's settled in. Marlene pats his shoulder before swiveling and marching to sit across from Rita.

Dorcas feels her breath freeze in her lungs just looking at her, just as it has all night. Marlene's stylist isn't Dorcas, but there is genuinely nothing Marlene wouldn't look good in, Dorcas is sure. She does look uncomfortable, though, in a dress. Maybe if it wasn't as short as it is, she wouldn't, but Dorcas can tell that she's not a fan of it, just by how she tugs at it and how awkward she reacts to it, like she can't be herself in it, with so much skin showing to all these people she doesn't trust.

It's making her tense, and Dorcas hates it, because as gorgeous as she is, always, Dorcas would never have put her in clothes that made her feel so exposed. Yes, fashion can be about expression, but it can also be about protection, too. Marlene feels better in clothes she has room to move in, clothes that she doesn't have to accommodate, but rather those that will accommodate her. She likes clothes that she can use as just another shield, and why shouldn't she? What's wrong with that? She deserves to be comfortable.

Marlene deserves to be safe.

Dorcas is going to do what she has to so Marlene will be safe, or she'll fucking die trying, dammit. All she needs is for Marlene to get through this without putting herself in even more danger than she's already in. Is that too much to ask for?

Apparently it is, because Marlene is not hiding the fact that she's fucking furious about being back here. Even sitting there in heels she has already kicked off and a dress she keeps tugging down repeatedly, obviously frustrated by it, Marlene breaks through her own visible discomfort and doesn't hesitate to make it very clear that she's pissed.

Rita seems to sense this, and like an idiot, she thinks that addressing it would be a good idea. "You seem quite worked up, Marlene. Is it your outfit? You look really nice, shockingly. I don't think you had a stylist that really enhanced your beauty the last time you were a tribute."

"Well, the clothes surely aren't fucking helping, but no, Rita, if you'd believe it, that's not my primary source of frustration at the moment."

"Oh? Is it perhaps your family, or a lover, or—"

"You know what it is?" Marlene cuts in sharply, her shoulders one tense line as her eyes flash with that same anger, that same resentment, that Dorcas first saw in her the day Vanity and Hodge died. "I'll tell you what it is, Rita."

"Actually," Rita starts, because now she can sense the danger, but it's a bit late for that, at this point.

"No, shut the fuck up," Marlene spits out, and Rita's mouth drops open as she rears back, absolutely appalled. Marlene obviously doesn't give a shit. She turns to address the crowd, who all seem restless, just waiting for one more thing to get pissed off about. "The reaping—you know what it was always meant to be, a simple game of odds, yeah? May the odds be ever in your favor, you all say. Where the fuck were my odds when I was one of the only two tributes on my stage? This isn't a fucking game. Call it what it is. It's—"

"Alright, that's—yes, I think we're done here," Rita cuts in sharply, because the crowd is getting worked up again.

"Oh, no, we've just gotten started," Marlene retorts. "What it really is, what it's always been, is an execution with extra steps you're all too blind to see properly because they dress us up and parade us in front of cameras and tell you our deaths don't mean anything just because we can't do anything about it. How many children have been executed to this? Who's to say yours aren't next? Who's to say you're not next?"

"That's enough!" Rita bursts out, gripping her chair as the crowd starts responding, growing in volume, a ripple effect of fear sweeping across them as Marlene lays it all out and makes them fucking look at it.

"Your beloved fucking Master can go back on the promise to keep Victors out of the arena, clearly, and who's to say he won't go back on his promise that you, all of you, are safe from this fate?" Marlene demands. She launches out of her chair, kicking her heels aside carelessly, face flushed. "And when it's you, your lovers, your friends, your family, your kids—what will you do? Will you stand up then? You would, wouldn't you? So stand up now! Stand the fuck up! Get up!"

The first person out of their chair is Sirius, followed very swiftly by Emmeline, and then Regulus, and then all the tributes on the stage are standing up all at once, and the crowd follows suit. It's immediately chaos , a riot breaking out that has the Aurors flooding the room in waves, people yelling and protesting. All the tributes are standing at full height, even Eli, who is being held up by Emmeline and seems very confused about all the commotion, but is supportive nonetheless.

"Cut the cameras! Cut the—" Rita's voice is drowned out, but the cameras all immediately dip, except reality isn't just a daydream or a nightmare reeling on a screen; it keeps going even when the cameras are off.

Dorcas is a bit caught up in the whole thing, seeing as everyone around her got to her feet, and it was either do the same or get trampled. Not that she doesn't want to participate, obviously, but she really can't have her position for what comes next compromised in any capacity.

She stays long enough to see Hallows fighting Aurors for possibly the first time in their lives, utterly enraged; she stays long enough to see the tributes on stage being escorted swiftly away, walking tall and proud; she stays long enough to be sure that Marlene is safe, at least for the moment, and then she gets as far away as fucking possible, as quickly as possible.

She makes it out just before the gunshots start.

"I want them dead."

There's a beat of silence, patient, calm. Riddle means that. He is absolutely, unequivocally not joking. Not that he's the type of man to joke in the first place, nor the type of man to not have people killed when he wants them dead, unless—on the rare chance—he can be convinced otherwise. Severus has known him for years, at this point, and the only person who has ever managed to change his mind is Minerva McGonagall, who he just so happens to be speaking to now.

Severus dares to believe she will manage it a second time. It's absolutely vital that she does, because there are twenty-four soon to be tributes (again) being held at an undisclosed location within the building, quite literally one order away from execution.

"Yes, well, tomorrow will be the beginning of seeing to that," Minerva says simply. She's sitting on the other side of Riddle's desk, her back to Severus, seemingly relaxed. She has every reason to be afraid, and yet, the horcrux hornet in a jar on the desk remains settled down. No signs of fear from anyone.

Riddle is… Well, Severus has seen the man in various states before—angry, focused, calm, bored, displeased—but he has never once seen him in agitated distress.

It's oddly satisfying.

"I want them to suffer," Riddle hisses, eyes flashing as he leans forward to pin a sharp look on Minerva. "This cannot simply go unpunished. This blatant defiance demands a response that will prove the futility in even attempting anything further."

Minerva gives it a pause, then calmly says, "I do believe that the arena will serve as adequate punishment. Sir, the…uprising that just took place resulted in the loss of Hallow lives; our people; your people. A response would only prompt a further outcry. Your silence on the matter—unless you're actually willing to change the rule entirely—will speak volumes. The games will commence just as they always do, and that will prove the futility in defiance on its own, just as it always has."

"That's not enough," Riddle insists.

"Would you see them marched out and killed, then?" Minerva asks bluntly. "Perhaps we could televise it and infuriate the people even more? Shall we kill all the tributes and start over? Throw another reaping?" She waits, and when he says nothing, only balling one hand into a fist on the desktop, she gives a terse nod. "This is one occasion that I believe simply seeing it through, as it were, is the best and only option. In any case, I can assure you, they will indeed suffer in the arena."

Riddle is silent for a long time, his expression smoothing out as he relaxes his hand and slowly starts tapping one finger to the desk. After a beat, he says, "There will be one winner. I do not care what it takes, but you will not allow it to be Sirius or Regulus Black, am I understood?"

"Yes, sir."

"And that McKinnon girl, I want to see her suffer before she dies. Make her know it. Bottleneck any and all support from any sponsors and do not give her a moment of peace."

"Yes, sir."

"Severus."

"Yes, sir?" Severus asks instantly, stepping forward with his hands shaped around his gun.

"The McKinnon girl—does she have family?" Riddle asks.

Severus doesn't hesitate. "Parents, as well as extended family. An aunt, uncle, and a cousin with a husband and infant child."

"Kill them all."

"Yes, sir."

"I want her parents brought here in her final moments before being lifted out into the arena; have them executed in front of her," Riddle informs him. No different than the Prewetts. Well, Severus can't say he isn't consistent. "The extended family can be killed within the district. Have there been riots?"

"Only one so far."

"When?"

"Today, within the last hour," Severus admits, because he just got the report from the head Auror in district eleven. It was, predictably, in response to McKinnon's demand to get up during her interview. Her district did not take the words lightly and rioted on such a mass scale that he's going to have to send in new Aurors to replace the dead ones.

Riddle's lip curls in visible anger. "Dispatch someone to have the Aurors there immunized, just in case. In fact, I want every Auror in the districts and within the Hallow immunized."

"Yes, sir," Severus agrees, dipping his head. He's not too terribly fond of the memory of being immunized.

While it does protect him from any form of horcrux hornet venom, it wasn't a pleasant experience. The injection had burned enough that he had to grit his teeth and fight through the pain of it, and it had taken days for the itchy discomfort of heat to fully leave him. His body had adjusted, after a period of being quite ill—a belated effect of the immunization that took place days after he got it—but once the rash cleared from the injection site, he healed well enough.

Severus unfortunately knows very little about it, so he didn't have much information to give Albus. He isn't sure how the formula for the immunity to horcrux hornet venom came to be, or what ingredients it took to make it. All he does know is that it took months of trial and error before someone managed to survive, and even then, the effects of the horcrux hornet venom still persisted. It took more time and more trial and error before they were able to eradicate the effects enough that an immunization could be cleared, conveniently in just enough time for district six to be completely decimated.

As one of Riddle's closest consultants, Severus was chosen first out of all the Aurors to receive the immunization. Being the chief of all Aurors is not a light undertaking, and not one he takes lightly. He was given the position rather young, six years ago, because Riddle doesn't believe age impedes one's ability to properly prove themselves. He wouldn't, seeing as he came into his position as Master of the Hallow at a young age himself.

Severus worked hard to get where he is today. With him being from district two, this isn't much of a surprise. It's where Aurors are trained, and being an Auror is hailed as a high honor and a goal everyone should meet. A militaristic district cupped in the palm of the Hallow's hand. Severus never wanted to be an Auror; he only ever wanted to take care of his mother. Very little good that did him, in the end.

Sometimes, Severus wonders if Riddle even remembers her name. He knows the answer to that. Of course he doesn't. Riddle doesn't care to remember the names of the people he is responsible for the death of. He doesn't care about anything.

"The tributes," Riddle grits out, "are they still being held?"

"Yes, sir."

"Release them. They have one final night, then collect them in the morning before the sun has even risen. Don't allow them to say goodbye. Don't allow them breakfast or showers. Don't allow them to be escorted by their mentors."

"Yes, sir," Severus says, once again dipping his head.

"You're dismissed," Riddle replies, flicking his fingers.

Severus dips his head again and turns to leave. He has a lot of orders to follow, and a lot of orders to give. There are a lot of people to have killed in a short amount of time, while also balancing the rise in rebellion throughout the districts, and now the Hallow. There's people to dispatch to inform the families of the deceased Hallows a proper cover story that likely won't be fully believed, tributes to release after they've been left to stew and kept on edge, and people to get in contact with about immunizing every Auror beneath him, a sure sign that war is not just coming; it's already here.

He also has to get in contact with the Order as Albus' secret informant to keep him updated, and also in the hopes that Albus will at least manage to save McKinnon's extended family before Severus and his Aurors can reach them.

The fate of her parents, however, is sealed.

then marleneeeee!!! oh, marlene, my beloved <3 she is so 😩 I NEED HER!!! i think it's hilarious that dorcas "bold" meadowes is like: can u all pls just chill? and they all literally just went: No, Let's Not. marlene really said get the fuck up!!! i, too, would shoot to my feet if marlene shouted at me to stand up. i love her.

also yes, the interviews were cut short. coen and camilla didn't even get to their interviews. marlene is just THAT powerful. 😌 then the snape POV. listen, i know a lot of people don't like him, and frankly, i don't care. like, my personal feelings on him as a character is not reflected on him in this as an au. just like with the other characters, this is a whole other world with cheeky references to canon but no actual basis from canon, really. snape being a secret informant is a cheeky reference to canon, yes, but his pov is actually necessary to show the other side of things.

like, the things we just learned from his pov were IMPORTANT. the bit of information on the horcrux hornet venom and how immunity works—that immunity was achieved when someone survived (cough you know who it is cough) but the EFFECTS of the venom still persisted, so the formula had to be created to neutralize those effects, which it eventually was. we also just learned how dumbledore got his information on the venom in the first place. and we learned how dumbledore learns which districts need support from riots and such. if you notice, severus got his position around the same time that remus was captured and lily was saved—if you ever wondered how the order knew to send out people to try and save them, that would be severus (he wasn't there, but he got information about greyback being murdered and called the order). just the same, if you're wondering who has people killed or participates in killing people (like gideon and fabian for example), that's severus, too. he's playing both sides—another cheeky reference to canon, BUT he is ultimately on the order's side. so, love him, hate him, do whatever you want, that's up to you. just know his pov was necessary.

The first thing Sirius does as soon as he makes it back to the suite is throw himself into a tight hug with Remus, exhaling in relief as he holds onto him, eyes drifting shut. He tucks his face down against Remus' shoulder, breathing him in, the tension draining out of him slowly, in increments.

It had been awful, just waiting, not knowing if the last time he saw Remus would be the last time he ever got to see him. Not knowing if he'd ever see James again. Not knowing if he, along with his brother and all the tributes he was waiting with, were about to be killed for their blatant act of rebellion.

None of them had spoken. There had been a heavy silence in the room, but there remained an unspoken agreement not to simply take whatever was coming lying down. They'd all braced themselves, tense and at the ready, the moment that a group of Aurors had come sweeping into the room.

In the end, they had simply been…let go.

Just like that.

Maybe it shouldn't have surprised Sirius. After all, why waste the ammunition to kill them now, when all but one will be dead soon enough anyway? And in such a way that it'll be profitable, too. Yet, it did surprise Sirius. For a moment there, he genuinely believed that was it.

The relief of still having more time is overwhelming, and all he wants to do is be with Remus. They have so little time overall, especially since Remus will have no choice but to go back to his cell soon. Sirius just wants to hold onto him forever.

"Hi," Sirius whispers.

"Hi," Remus replies, gently. His warm hands cup Sirius' sides, the blunt tips of his fingers curving around Sirius' ribs. For a moment, Sirius wants Remus to crack him open and fold himself inside; just live there, stay there, in him.

"I thought—" Sirius stops, then swallows past the lump in his throat, squeezing his eyes shut even harder. He exhales and tightens his grip. "I love you. I really fucking do."

"I was worried. I mean, I was—well, at first I was…ah, rather delighted," Remus admits, sounding sheepish, "but that was just because of what you said in your interview, and then things escalated, and I—I—"

Sirius clears his throat and pulls back to give Remus a trembling smile. "Liked that, did you?"

"You were right," Remus murmurs. "No one loves you as I do. No one ever will, Sirius, I can promise you that."

"I believe that, actually," Sirius admits with a weak chuckle, slowly easing back, as much as he hates to. "James?"

"In his room. He's been panicking. I was—well, actually I was getting him a glass of water," Remus tells him. He flicks his gaze over Sirius' shoulder, towards where Pandora is with Regulus off to the side, murmuring to him. "You should—I, ah, think you should go see James."

"Alright, but—but wait for me in my room?" Sirius asks hopefully, holding his gaze.

Remus nods. "Yeah, of course I will."

"Check on Reggie first, though, would you?" Sirius mumbles, because even through all of that, Regulus still wouldn't talk to him. Still won't, even now. What is he going to do, just ignore Sirius in the arena, too? He's so fucking stubborn.

"Okay," Remus agrees, then sways in to kiss him quickly, right at the corner of his mouth, pulling away swiftly like if he doesn't, he never will. Sirius gets it. He feels the same.

They break apart and go in separate directions, Remus heading for Regulus and Sirius heading for James. When Sirius reaches the door, he doesn't bother to knock, just turns the handle and steps inside. James' head lifts. He's sitting on the edge of the bed, and the moment he sees Sirius, he shoves to his feet and rushes forward to snatch Sirius into his arms.

"I thought—oh, fuck, Sirius, I was so—they wouldn't tell us where they were keeping you, and I didn't know if you were okay, if I'd see you again before—" James chokes off, his fists pressing harder against Sirius' back, trying fitfully to keep him locked in the unrelenting safety of his arms.

"It's alright, James, we're alright," Sirius murmurs, holding him just as tight. "They just kept us for a bit, probably just wanted to put us on edge while they decided what to do with us. It's okay, yeah? Hey, breathe, it's okay."

"I was so scared," James rasps, his voice thick.

"Me too," Sirius admits in a whisper. He wouldn't usually admit it, but this is James. If he can't tell James about it, then who can he tell? Besides, James knows already. He knows Sirius too well not to know that.

For a long time, they stand there in complete silence, just holding onto each other, breathing in sync. Sirius' chest feels tight with this horrible, unshakeable grief for James, and for himself. There's fear in this, too. What is James going to do when Sirius does die? He's going to be a fucking wreck, and Sirius won't be here to help him pick up the pieces.

Yet again, Sirius feels the tragedy and unfairness of this entire situation bear down on him, a heavy weight he feels far too weak to carry. He's going to collapse. Maybe he already is. Maybe they all are. Maybe they've all been collapsing in slow motion since the very first tremor that caused them to topple. The foundation of them all has been crumbling since Sirius was sixteen years old, and there's nowhere to stand anymore.

"You were—so brave," James croaks, pulling back slowly to peer at him, eyes shiny. "What you did was so brave, Sirius, and I—I am immeasurably proud of you."

"Some would call it reckless."

"Well, I'm calling it justice."

Sirius quirks a small smile. "You're only saying that because the consequences haven't caught up to us yet."

"No matter the consequences, what happened today during those interviews was brave. Nothing can change that."

"Do you feel that way about Regulus?"

Predictably, James' expression shutters. There's more to it as well. There's pain. So much pain. "That's different."

"How?" Sirius asks softly.

"He lied," James chokes out. "A fucking wedding, Sirius? He knew that would—he knew it would hurt, and he did it anyway. He didn't care."

"You really need to talk to him, James," Sirius tells him, and then he shakes his head when James opens his mouth in visible protest. "No. Look, I love you, and I understand your anger—it's more than justified—but this isn't something you have time to work through. Do you understand what I'm telling you? There's no time. I will—I am going to do everything I can to get him home, and die trying, but anything could happen. I could fail him. I have before."

"Sirius," James breathes out, eyes wide.

"Don't make the same mistake I did. Don't waste time; don't be too late," Sirius murmurs. "I got lucky by getting you both back and having more time. You won't. Whether it's me or him or both of us, James, you won't."

James releases a horrible noise like he's aching, like he's just cracking right in half. It's a terrible, cruel reality, and Sirius hates to be the one to force him to look at it, but not looking at it doesn't mean it's not there. James is fighting it so hard, with everything in him, and he's going to wish he didn't.

Even now, James is fighting it. He shakes his head and drapes his fingers over Sirius' shoulders, squeezing. He says, "No," and then, "I can't," and right after, "I'll—I'll be with you. Can I just be here with you?"

"James, listen to me," Sirius cuts in. "What you need to do is make things alright with him again, because when I don't make it back, you will need each other to help make it through. If you two don't resolve this now, I'm worried you never will after—after I'm gone, and knowing that you two have each other is something I need."

"Stop it. Stop it, stop it, stop," James chants, his eyes sinking shut as his face twists. He's shaking.

"James—"

"Please. Please stop. I can't—I don't—where are we? Sirius, when—what's happening? What's—"

Sirius' heart clenches violently in his chest. It's been a while since James has gone in and out of time like this, especially so severely. "We're in the Hallow, James. It's the Quarterly Memorial, the day of the interviews. You're not a tribute; you're a mentor, and you're safe. You're not in the arena. You're here with me, and I've got you."

"Where's my cane?" James gasps out, his chest heaving as he grips Sirius' shoulders, clearly trying to ground himself.

"It's propped up by the bed. I presume you didn't need it before I came in. Do you need it now?"

"No. No, I'm—I'm just—"

"It's alright," Sirius says soothingly, breathing in and out slowly, deeply, letting James match him and calm.

James' eyes flutter open after a few minutes, and he gentles his grip on Sirius' shoulders. "I just want to stay with you."

"I know. Because you're scared," Sirius mumbles, and that's what it is, really. When they're scared, they go right to each other. "But me and you? James, there's…nothing to settle between us. No matter where we go, or what happens to us, we'll always be with each other, yeah?" He raises his hand and taps James in the center of his chest, right in the middle of his lungs. "Every breath, in and out, that's me and you."

"If you stop, I stop," James whispers.

"No, none of that," Sirius chides gently, despite the fact that he felt the same, when it was him in James' position. "You'll carry on anyway, because I'm telling you to, and you can be angry with me all you like for it as long as you do it. Because Effie and Monty shouldn't have to lose us both. Regulus shouldn't have to lose us both. So, you'll breathe. You will. I'll be the fucking air in your lungs, even when I'm gone."

James just ducks his head forward and sort of slumps against Sirius with a small, hurt sound, like a wounded animal. They go right back to holding onto each other; they don't have time to waste not doing it. The clock continues to tick.

"There's something I need you to promise me," Sirius murmurs, still holding onto James. "I need you to promise me you'll look after Remus through this. He's not—he isn't one to really share when he's struggling, but he's—he'll need support. He'll need someone to take care of him, and it can't be me, so I need you to do it for me. And I need you to promise you'll keep doing it, year after year, every time you come back as a mentor. Because I know it'll be you. And I know you can make it to where he gets assigned here again—Pandora will help. So, just please promise me you'll do that, James."

"I promise," James replies instantly, not missing a beat, because of course he doesn't. Sirius sags with relief and swallows down a choked sound of grief, muffling it as he tightens his arms around him.

Tick, tick, tock. Time is circling the drain. They're not ready. None of them are ready, James especially. There's still something he has to do first, and he needs the push, so Sirius doesn't hesitate to give it to him.

"It's not me you truly need to find peace with right now," Sirius says sadly, even if there is a terrible, tiny part of him that selfishly wants to have all the time with James that he can, even if he's stealing it from someone else. From Regulus. But Sirius won't; of course he won't. He's always volunteering to take the brunt of pain for Regulus, so why should this be any different? "Talk to Regulus, James."

James just grunts. It's an unhappy noise, full of complaint, a bit petulant with a heavy dose of reluctance. Sirius takes it for what it is and slowly pulls away.

"In the meantime," Sirius teases, "I'm going to go get my spine realigned, so you can't stay with me anyway."

"Okay, to be fair, I'm—I'm very supportive of that for you," James mumbles with another sniffle. "I'm a good best friend. I've been a good best friend to you, haven't I?"

"The best," Sirius says softly.

"Alright. Good. I'm—" James voice catches, and he's clearly trying so very hard to keep it together. "I'm glad that I was."

"You still are, James. You always will be, until the very end."

"Sirius—"

James doesn't get much further than that, and Sirius sighs sadly as he watches James' face crumble again. He reaches out and tugs James back into his arms, holding onto him for just a little longer as he whispers, "I know, James. I know."

Regulus can't really explain the peace that Remus brings him, just by being present. Perhaps it's just that it's Remus. Perhaps that's just who Remus is, some sort of magic that exists in him wherever he goes, so effortlessly comforting to all those near him and completely oblivious to this fact. Perhaps it's just because Remus helped him with one of his greatest fears when no one else could, or because Remus is still his friend, or because—despite everything—Remus doesn't ever look at him as if Regulus is responsible for his pain.

"We haven't talked about it," Remus murmurs. "Your plans for the arena, I mean."

"I know," Regulus says, and he doesn't elaborate further. They'll all find out soon enough.

"It just seemed like…" Remus hesitates for a beat, then turns his head, staring out over the balcony edge. "Well, the way you were in your interview, it just seemed like—like you're planning to fight. Really, properly fight."

"Yes," Regulus agrees softly. "That's exactly what I'm going to do. I'm going to fight harder than I ever have before."

Remus is silent for a beat, and then he exhales shakily, his head ducking forward as he croaks, "As I'm sure you know, Sirius—he's going to—he'll be fighting for you. To get you home. And I—I think that he's—well, I've never been so sure that one person can do anything they decide to, no matter the odds, until him. So, you—all of this anger you feel for him, you have to—Regulus, you need to let all of that go before it's too late, before he—before—"

"Do you think it was in vain?" Regulus cuts in absently, very gently tracing the seam of his trousers as he stares out over the Hallow, not even seeing it.

"Regulus? Hey, are you even listening to me?"

"Hm?"

"I'm—" Remus heaves a sigh. "Look, I know you're—"

"Do you think it was in vain?" Regulus repeats, tilting his head up to look at the sky. It's not dark out yet, but even if it was, the stars aren't visible here in the city. It's just another thing Regulus hates about this place. "Him volunteering for me, I mean? I'm here, aren't I? What did he achieve?"

"He's your brother," Remus whispers. "He did what anyone would do for someone they love. He did what I did for my best friend. He did what you did for James. Sacrifice is—it's just a byproduct of love; genuine, unshakeable love that grips us like grief. It's cruel. It pushes us to do the unthinkable."

Regulus hums thoughtfully. "I'm aware that this casts me in the light of a hypocrite, but it is different."

"Why? How?"

"When I lied to James and made a promise I knew I wouldn't keep, I did it because I know better than him what will hurt him the most. I've spent most of the years we've known each other just hurting him, learning the shape of his pain, trying to mold it in the beginning and then trying to eradicate it by the end. I know James' pain inside and out. When I decided to do what I did, it was for him. It did achieve something."

"What did it achieve?"

"It kept his mother safe, for one thing. But Sirius? He didn't do what he did for me. He did it for him."

"He didn't know you would be volunteering," Remus tells him quietly. "He—when he took your place, he had no way of knowing that you would… Regulus, he did that in the mind that he was keeping you from the arena."

"Didn't do him much good, in the end. Didn't do him much good the first time either," Regulus mutters. "That's not the point anyway. My point is, he did it for him. I told him, Remus, I told him to choose me, and I told him exactly how. And he didn't. You know what he chose?"

Remus audibly swallows. "What?"

"He chose to leave me behind. Again." Regulus turns to look at Remus, who watches him with his eyebrows drawn together, expression pained. "He chose to abandon me. Again. He chose to break something we worked so hard for, the only thing I needed from him, the only thing I have ever needed from him; all I ever wanted was for him to choose to keep me, and he didn't. Again. And this time—this time, I didn't just stand back and watch. I didn't just accept it. I fucking made him look at it, and I'm going to make him regret it. He will regret it this time, Remus. He's going to."

"Did you…?" Remus stares at him, his eyes widening as his breath catches. "Regulus, did you—did you volunteer for James just to get back at Sirius?"

Regulus pauses, then says, "The plan was always to take James' place, but I'd be lying if I said the words didn't leave my lips a little easier knowing that Sirius would choke on them."

"That's so—you're so—" Remus groans, his eyes sinking shut. He lifts his hands and scrubs them over his face before he drops them heavily, looking weary. "You are one the most unbelievably fucked up people I've ever met, you know that?"

"Takes one to know one, I suppose," Regulus replies wryly, arching an eyebrow at him.

Remus huffs out a weak laugh. "Yeah, can't argue that."

"Go on, then. What's the worst thing you've ever done?" Regulus asks, inclining his head towards him.

"I killed someone," Remus says softly.

Regulus did not know that, until now. If Sirius knows, he hasn't said. Maybe he doesn't. Regulus doesn't care either way; he isn't going to tell him, obviously. Remus' secret—if it is a secret Sirius doesn't know—is safe with him. And, frankly, it's not a secret Regulus cares very much about, in the sense that it doesn't bother him in the least.

He holds Remus' gaze steadily and replies, "Yes, well, I've killed five."

"Five?" Remus repeats, blinking. "I—sorry, have you killed two people since—I mean, I know about Avery, Quinn, and Irene, though she really doesn't count as—"

"You're forgetting Evan," Regulus cuts in.

"What?" Remus looks stricken. "Regulus, you—you didn't—"

"And Sirius," Regulus continues, watching Remus give a violent blink, lips parting in disbelief. "I killed him at the reaping the moment he volunteered for me."

Remus stares at him, something shifting in his eyes that looks a lot like pity. The worst part is, Regulus can see the question drifting through Remus' head, a very valid question that twists itself into something sharp, made for carving, an intrusive thought. That very simple question. Which one?

That is the question, isn't it? After all, it happened twice. So, which one? Regulus knows it's both. It shouldn't even be possible for it to occur twice, for him to watch Sirius turn cold and lifeless, to have him slip through his fingers, to slip the dagger in and twist. How do you kill what's already dead?

You revive it just to watch it rot.

Without a word, Regulus pushes to his feet and sweeps into his room, grabbing clothes and heading into the bathroom. He shuts the door and starts running a bath, gaze vacant as he stares at the water. It doesn't make him cry as often anymore. He thought it was a good sign, but now he's quite sure it's because he's no different than the dead he associates with water. Just another pair of cold hands that death clings to.

Six.

He was wrong before. Not five. Six. He has killed six people, and he's staring at the last in the reflection of the water.

Dorcas paces furiously in her suite, glaring down at her cell. Even just the sound of Dumbledore's voice infuriates her these days, though she is pleased to know that he's fully distracted by all the current activity that's going on to really notice what's happening right underneath his nose.

Nonetheless, she has been given orders, those that she has known already—further recruitment. Frank. Huey. James.

If not for James, Dorcas would disregard the orders entirely, but—frustratingly enough—Dumbledore has just reminded her of one oversight she may have been too busy to really think about. It's hard playing so many sides of one thing, especially when you're in such a prominent position that you can't even brush one side off for another.

The thing is, getting tributes out of the arena is going to be hard enough. Adding additional people from inside the Hallow is just going to make it more difficult, but she—well, she can't just leave James behind. Not him, and preferably not Pandora, so maybe Frank can come along as well. He's nice enough, and it'll be good to have someone else capable of fighting when they all no doubt have to make their daring escape. She may as well grab Huey along the way, even just as a sign of good will to Dumbledore. Like a child getting in trouble at school but trying to show off a good report to take some of the heat off of them because they know damn well their parents are going to be pissed. Dorcas doesn't care, but it can't hurt to appease the man, seeing as she's about to cause quite the mess.

Dorcas halts on the spot when her cell starts buzzing in her hand, and her breath catches as she answers it, waiting in heavy silence as her heart races.

"Patronus?" Lily whispers.

"Starfish," Dorcas replies, exhaling all at once. "How are you even talking to me right now, Lily? What the fuck?"

"Poppy has a phone in her locked office drawer, so I picked it open and nicked it while she's out on a mission."

"What mission?"

"Recon. She's out in a small separate team back to district six to see what came of the place after… Well, I—um, I'm not actually supposed to tell you, but—"

"Is it in any way vital to the other plan?"

Lily pauses, then she mumbles, "Euphemia and Fleamont Potter are here. That's what all the chaos was about when you were here the other day."

"Wait, what?" Dorcas inhales sharply, her eyes growing wide with disbelief. "Why didn't you tell me?"

"Fuck's sake, Dorcas, we were busy dealing with other madness, and you didn't stick around very long, did you?"

"Oh, I'm sorry, I can't help it I have to fucking work, Lily."

"Yeah, yeah, yeah," Lily mutters, and Dorcas would bet a lot on the chance that Lily is rolling her eyes right now. "Long story short, we swooped in and stole James' parents—really lovely people, by the way—and managed to save…a bit of the district residents, but most? Well, it wasn't good. Not good at all, if I'm honest. There's this whole fucking green fog shit—"

"Biological warfare," Dorcas whispers.

"Yeah, pretty much," Lily says. "Anyway, Poppy's going to look into it and see what she can make of it; had to go dressed in a weird rubber suit, but she was with a small team. A whole other team has to go into district eleven on new orders."

Dorcas swallows. "Eleven? For what?"

"That, I don't know. I wasn't chosen for this mission, which works out, because I have time to work on the other things."

"Right, and how is that going?"

Lily snorts. "Oh, I'm making progress. Might be able to move everything up a day, at least. Or at least the night prior than we originally planned." Dorcas can't stop herself from making a muffled sound of pure hope, and Lily laughs. "Soon, Dorcas, really soon. You do your part, and don't worry, I'll do mine."

"You're a marvel, Lily. I love you dearly."

"I will hang up."

"You love me, too."

"Or throw up. That's an option as well."

Dorcas closes her eyes, feeling some tension drain out of her shoulders, her heart fluttering. "Really, Lily, thank you."

"Mhm, no pr—oh. Ah, shit. Just a minute!" Lily calls, coughing loudly. "I'm—I'm using the stapler, Molly! Give me a second." Her voice drops to a low hiss. "Okay, I have to go. If I can call again, I will. 'Kay, bye."

"B—" Dorcas doesn't even get to finish before the line goes dead. She huffs a weak laugh and pulls her phone away from her ear, blowing out a deep breath.

The stapler. Lily fucking Evans, everyone.

Shaking her head, Dorcas drops her phone off on the counter and swivels to survey her suite. It's not very similar to the suite that the tributes get with their mentors, and she doesn't get a servant. She could technically pay an extra fee to have one, but she never does. The suite itself is all one open floorplan, the kitchen and sitting room and bedroom all in one place with no doors anywhere. The bathroom and laundry room, at least, do branch off in a separate, small hallway. It's very compact.

This means it's easy for Dorcas to pace from the kitchen to the bedroom, back and forth, as she crosses her arms and lifts one hand to run a finger idly over her lips again and again, her mind racing a mile a minute. Oh, she has so much to do.

Well, she knows precisely how to recruit James, at least. She wasn't too worried about that anyway, if she's honest. Perhaps it's naivety, but she truly believes he considers her a friend enough to trust her about this. However, the backup plan is now his parents; of course he'll be especially willing if he knows that they—and whatever remains of his district—are all in the Phoenix already. Plus, he'd likely just go wherever Sirius and Regulus went, and Dorcas is going to do everything she can to make sure they end up safe with the Order.

What about Frank? Hm. His mother is a big factor, surely. If Augusta is saved, then Frank is no doubt following. But he's also close with Alice and Emmeline…

Ah, fuck, Emmeline. Dorcas clicks her tongue and fights a grimace. That would be indescribably tactless and cruel of her to not try and save Emmeline simply because she's been with Marlene. Dorcas swats away the mere thought with a scoff. Yes, she's not a good person, because there are no good people in war, but that's a low even she refuses to reach. So, there's another person added to the list. Six already—Marlene, Sirius, Regulus, Augusta, Alice, and Emmeline.

From a strategic standpoint, Asher would be incredibly helpful for the war efforts, considering her knowledge of poisons. It would be remiss of Dorcas to not at least try to scoop her as well. Ah, not that she's going to be doing any of the scooping, but she will be giving directions, as much as she can.

Dorcas' stomach suddenly flips over as she comes to a halt and realizes all at once that she's —she's just doing the same exact thing that she was furious at Dumbledore for doing.

Choosing lives.

After a long beat where Dorcas fears that she's going to be sick, she exhales shakily and sets her shoulders. No. No, she will not fall prey to a power like this and lose herself in the process. Marlene first, sure, because she isn't afraid to be selfish in that regard, but after that? All of them. Any of them. Whether they'd be a help or a hindrance to the war, regardless of what they can offer her or what they can't, she will see to it that she saves any and all that she can.

She fears she may not be able to save as many as she would hope to. Twenty-four is the goal, really, as impossible as that sounds, but that would require all of them to survive long enough to be saved. She doubts that will happen.

Marlene, though… Dorcas needs Marlene to survive that long. All of this is happening because it needs to, because it's what's right, but Dorcas' heart is practically keening with the truth of it all. Dorcas' priorities have shifted, have been shifting for some time, and Marlene? Marlene is the top priority.

Whatever happens to her in that arena… Dorcas closes her eyes, breathing in and out. She knows that Minerva can't simply allow it to be—easy. It has to be brutal. It has to be the worst fucking thing anyone and everyone will ever see, just to incite further rage and defiance, encouraging a revolt. It has to be sickening, vomit-inducing, nail-bitingly awful to the point that it's painful to watch; a flashing, neon sign to everyone looking on that they should hate it, that it's wrong.

Dorcas knows Minerva. She knows just what that woman is capable of, and to win this war, that woman will do what needs to be done. It's something Dorcas has always respected and still likely would if it weren't directly affecting the woman she loves and the friends she's made along the way. If anything happens to Marlene, Dorcas isn't sure she's ever going to be able to forgive Minerva, knowing that she's behind it all.

How will she feel, looking at Minerva? The same way she feels looking at Slughorn? The thought terrifies her.

Dorcas can't fret about that, though, because she needs to focus on what has to be done. Her plan. Also her orders. Yeah, lovely, she still has to do that. Recruit. Right, so James will be easy, she can likely convince Frank, and if she has to pick Pandora up and carry her out herself, then she will. Huey… Well, Dorcas doesn't know him, really, but Minerva said the best angle would be to guilt him. He wants to help, feels that he's obligated to, and she can work with that. She's done more with less, honestly.

A knock on the door yanks Dorcas right out of her spiraling thoughts, and she swivels to blink at it. After a pause, she moves over to the door to open it with a small frown of confusion as to why someone would stop by. The frown slips away, and Dorcas' breath catches when she sees who it is.

"Marlene," Dorcas breathes out. "What are you doing here?"

"It's my last night," Marlene murmurs. "I'm not waiting around for you to be too late this time."

With that, Marlene's hands raise—she's still wearing the ring on her thumb—and they catch Dorcas' face as she surges forward to kiss her with enough force that they both go stumbling back a few steps. The moment Marlene is officially inside, she's kicking the door shut with her foot and steadily pushing Dorcas back against the closest wall.

Dorcas is—so okay with this, actually. Oh, she really should be spending her time doing something productive, but nothing seems to matter as much as Marlene's mouth on hers, and Marlene's hands on her skin, and Marlene just being here, alive, warm and solid under Dorcas' fingertips.

"Bed?" Dorcas chokes out.

"Mmm," Marlene hums against her jaw, her lips curling up in a pleased fashion, and then they go stumbling away.

It's nice, really, that the bed isn't even that far.

Regulus wonders if James still thinks he's beautiful.

Well, no, he knows that James is attracted to him, that's not something he doubts, really, but that's not what's weighing on his mind. He stares at himself in the mirror and wonders if James still finds him beautiful on the inside. A person worthy of kindness. A person worthy of love.

James has never been this cruel. Regulus doesn't know what to do with it. He knows James has every right to be upset, but he doesn't know how much longer he can do this. Perhaps that makes him weak. Perhaps he's pathetic for being pushed to the brink and still so willing for whatever James will give him. He gets it now, what James meant when he said Regulus could do anything to him and he'd thank him for it. James breathes, and Regulus wants to thank him.

Swallowing, Regulus drags the towel away from his damp hair and hangs it up, then trails his fingers over his chest, lightly pressing in on the raised scar over his heart. It's a strange thing to have a favorite scar, but this one is his. This one is a reminder that something tried to take his heart away and failed. No one or nothing can have it, because it belongs only to James; somehow, after all the times James has kissed it, Regulus feels like the scar is just proof of that.

Dropping his hand, Regulus plucks up his shirt and slips it on, then turns to leave the bathroom. When he steps back into his room and looks up, he freezes.

James is perched on the edge of the bed.

For a beat, they just stare at each other. Regulus' heart is already racing, because he doesn't know what's about to happen. He isn't sure what's coming. Is this—is James about to give him another parting gift? It is Regulus' last night, so it would be fitting. Regulus will take it. He'll be all that more hurt for it, but he'll take it anyway, gladly.

"We—" James' voice dies in his mouth, momentarily, a loud click in his throat as he swallows. His voice is gruff and low when he speaks again. "We need to talk."

Regulus doesn't think it's fair that those words scare him. It's not like things can get worse. "Those dreaded words. You're aware you can't break up with me again, yes?"

"I didn't break up with you," James snaps. "I didn't exactly get the chance, seeing as we weren't together in the first place."

"Yes, we were," Regulus whispers. In his head, they were. In his heart, they still are.

James clenches his jaw, making the bolt of down past his ear visibly pulse, the muscle twitching. Regulus finds this incredibly attractive. He would like to lick it. "No, we really weren't. The two days we spent—well, those don't count."

"No, but they do, though," Regulus counters, flicking his gaze over James slowly, trying to get a read on him. He can't, which is frustrating. Regulus can't tell if James wants to fuck or fight, and frankly, if it's not the former, he'd much prefer James to just leave; he's in no mood to do the latter.

"Look, I'm not arguing with you about this. You're wrong."

"I'm not, actually."

"What did I just say?" James asks, staring at him incredulously.

Regulus sighs and takes a step forward, stopping the moment James tenses up even more. There's a pause, both of them sizing each other up, reevaluating the atmosphere and trying to figure out what comes next. Finally, in the end, Regulus doesn't bother beating around the bush. "So, are you here to fuck me, or do you want to be a prick some more?"

James stares at him for a beat, then narrows his eyes and scoffs. "Maybe a bit of both. Can't I do both?"

"You can do whatever you want, James," Regulus informs him rather honestly, holding his gaze. "Especially to me."

"I can't protect you," James counters, and he doesn't say it softly. It falls from his mouth harshly, an accusation, escaping him with sharp edges that cut them both.

Yeah, Regulus isn't doing this. When James said they needed to talk, he didn't think James actually meant they would talk. Like, properly. About the things they haven't truly dared to talk about yet. Regulus doesn't want to do this. He's going to fucking cry; he knows he will, and just—no. Fuck that.

"Look, are we fucking or not?" Regulus asks, his voice clipped, his stomach curdling with rising nerves. "Because if not, you can just do us both a favor and get the fuck out."

"I said we need to talk, so—"

"Not happening. No thanks."

"No, come on, we've got to have this out," James insists, pushing to his feet from the bed, his eyes flashing. "You can't just outrun this. You did it, now fucking face it."

"Oh, you mean about the wedding?" Regulus says, arching an eyebrow at him. "I take it this is you refusing my proposal?"

"You absolute bastard."

"So, it is a no, then?"

"You shouldn't have done that," James whispers. "How the fuck could you do that? You knew —you knew it would—that I would be upset, and you just—you—"

"Believe it or not," Regulus cuts in, "this actually wasn't about you. I understand your confusion, considering your necessary involvement, but it was about hurting them. Infuriating them. It wasn't…" He swallows. "I didn't have anything else, alright? I only matter to them because of you. It was the only thing I had, and I used it. I didn't do it to hurt you, James."

"But you did," James rasps. "You always do."

"Yes, I know," Regulus murmurs, fighting the lump in his throat as he clenches his jaw and looks away. "Was that all you wanted to talk about? Are we done here?"

"Done? Done?" James repeats, his voice rising in pitch, looking absolutely furious. "We've barely even gotten started! You got right up there on that stage, again, and felt the need to tell everyone that you'd marry me, which is yet another lie—"

"No, it's not," Regulus retorts sharply, and James huffs out a harsh breath, face twisting in a scowl.

"Don't lie to me. Why are you always lying?"

"I'm not lying, James. Not about this."

James stares at him, his body strung tight as he glares right into his eyes, and then he makes a furious, frustrated noise and takes the three strides he needs to reach Regulus. It's easy, meeting him halfway with an open-mouthed, teeth-clacking kiss that they both moan into the moment it connects. James hooks a hand behind his neck and holds him there. Regulus never wants him to let go.

But, inevitably, James does. He breaks the kiss to gasp out a shaky, "Fucking liar. You're a fucking—"

"M'not," Regulus mumbles, pressing closer, sliding his hands up James' chest and feeling the awareness of his own twisted temptation, because oh, oh, James still wants him so badly. The thing is, Regulus gets it. He knows exactly how different desire feels when you're fighting it; the heady draw of forbidden fruit. James can't resist taking a bite, and Regulus knows just how to make sure he's sweet for him.

"You wouldn't," James argues, practically hissing it, and then he does take a bite, nipping at Regulus' bottom lip with a defeated groan as he tugs him back into a kiss.

Regulus speaks against his mouth to say, "I would've."

"No," James denies, breathless as he mouths along the line of Regulus' jaw, reverent and needy.

"I would have married you," Regulus whispers, eyes fluttering shut as James makes a sound against his throat like he's just been gutted. Regulus tips his head back further and gives James more room, if he wants it.

Jame does not want it. He pulls back a little. "Shut up. Fucking hell, just—just—"

"Even if we had to have a wedding here, I would have, and we could have had a real one at home," Regulus continues, still just pushing. Always pushing, pushing, pushing. Picking at it —at them—like a fucking scab, struck by the habitual need to draw blood again. "You would have asked, and I would have said yes. I would have said yes the moment—"

"Shut up, shut up, shut up. You're awful, you're the most cruel, vindictive man I've ever known, and if you don't shut up—"

"You still haven't said no, you know. So, James, will you accept my proposal or—"

Regulus doesn't have to take it much farther than that before James is kissing him so thoroughly he can't even catch his breath, steadily moving him to the bed. They go down in a rough tangle of limbs as Regulus winds his arms around James and feels love bleed between them like the open wound it is.

"Does it hurt?"

Remus purses his lips and peers down at the indent of teeth on his shoulder, because apparently, when Sirius bites, he bites hard. Very hard. So hard that it probably would have hurt if Remus wasn't in the middle of sex when it happened.

Sirius looks a mixture of worried and smug, which is rather adorable, honestly. His expression shifts swiftly each time his gaze flicks from Remus to the mark—worried, smug, worried, smug, worried, smug. It's cute.

"No, it's fine," Remus assures him, though he won't be prodding it, even if he's tempted to. It throbs a little. He's honestly rather pleased with it.

"Well, in that case, there you go," Sirius teases. "Something for you to remember me by."

Remus stares at him. Quietly, he says, "It'll fade."

"I know, but…" Sirius trails off, then swallows, turning his head to stare at the ceiling. He closes his eyes. "I know."

In silence, Remus turns on his back, lying on the bed next to Sirius in nothing but pants, neither of them touching. It's abruptly cold between them, in the small sliver of space where their bodies aren't pressed together, seeming like some great distance to cross all of a sudden.

For just a moment, Remus really lets himself feel it, what's coming, what he's about to lose. He hasn't felt it, really, since that very first night when he couldn't build up some sort of internal defense against it. He put it somewhere else, just so he could focus on being here with Sirius while he still had the chance, because he knows what it is to not get to say goodbye to someone he loves, and he knows what it is to wish he better used the time with someone he loves that he did have.

Letting himself feel it, as it turns out, is a very stupid idea. Because it's there, underneath it all; the anger, the grief, the pain, the complete and utter relentless weight of desolation with all of it. Even deeper, the selfish, pressing need to ask, to beg, for Sirius to come back to him. Please just come back.

"It's not fair," Remus whispers. He doesn't move, but he hears Sirius' hair brush against the pillow, a sign that he turned his head to listen. Remus can feel Sirius' gaze latched onto the side of his face, heavy and intense. "It's not—this isn't—"

"Remus," Sirius says very carefully.

"Please," Remus chokes out, turning towards him desperately to reach for him, to take his face in his hands and stare into his eyes imploringly. Sirius looks pained. "Please, sweetheart. Just—I know it's wrong of me, I know it's not fair, I—I—"

"Shh, stop it," Sirius cuts in quickly, lifting his arms in between Remus' to cradle his face, too. "It's okay. This is just what it is to be human, my love. You're not a bad person for it, for wanting—" He stops, swallows, then gives Remus a soft smile. "You can say it. You probably shouldn't, but—"

"Come back," Remus whispers, like it's a sin, and Sirius' breath hitches. He stares at him, lips parted, gaze shiny like he's never been so enamored by a concept before in his life. "Okay, Sirius? I'm—I'm selfish enough to ask, even though I know your answer, and I—I understand it. But I have to, I have to ask, I have to at least—I have to try. Because I want you to live, and I want you to come back to me. I'm sorry. I'm so sorry, Regulus is my friend, but you—you're something else. You're precious to me. I want you to, please."

Sirius studies him, licking his lips, and then he exhales slowly and whispers, like a secret, "Do you know that you're the only person who has asked me that? Everyone else—they all just accepted it, what I'm going to do, and there was no one who even—I mean, no one even…argued, or protested. Maybe it's because I'm so stubborn and they know it wouldn't get them anywhere, but—but no one tried. And maybe it makes me selfish, but I'm so glad that you have."

Remus gets it, really. It's not a slight to anyone else for how they're responding to the situation. This is very hard, and no one is really in the position that he is, because yes, Remus does care for Regulus, but he doesn't feel for him what he does Sirius. He is a friend, but he's not Lily. Remus doesn't hate Regulus—of course not—but, if it were left up to him and only one brother could come home, it wouldn't be the youngest.

Even Remus knows that it's pointless to ask, because he knows Sirius, but Sirius deserves to have someone ask anyway. It's not even that Remus is angry with him for it, because he gets it. Because if it was him, if it was him and Lily going into the arena, he would do no differently than Sirius is for Regulus, than Sirius would for James. It's not about not choosing to come back to each other; it's about who they are.

It's about how they love.

"He's my little brother, Remus," Sirius rasps.

"I know," Remus croaks.

"I—" Sirius swallows, darting his gaze to the side, bottom lip catching between his teeth. After a beat, he squeezes his eyes shut, expression collapsing into something like shame, and when he begins speaking again, he does so softly, a mere breath, like the words are so wrong, so taboo, that to even speak them is blasphemous. "If—Remus, I will do whatever it takes for him, okay? I will. But. But if—just, if something happens, if something goes wrong and he—if I fuck it up, if I fail him, then I'm—I'm not going to stop fighting. I'm going to keep fighting to come back to you, okay? Is that—can that be enough? Tell me that's enough, because it's all I've got."

"You'd do that?" Remus asks quietly. "For me?"

"Yes," Sirius breathes out, eyes fluttering open. He still looks unsure, like he's made some grandiose mistake he can never be forgiven for by simply being human enough to want to live. It's heartbreaking. "I—I doubt I'll ever be…what you're used to now. It'll change me, losing him, and I can't—I won't be able to promise you that you'll still love what comes back out of that arena if I don't die there for my brother, but for you, I'd come back out anyway. Of course I would."

"Sirius, there is not one version of you I wouldn't love," Remus informs him simply. "You don't have to be anyone other than who you are. I just… Well, I'm—maybe it surprises me. I don't really understand why. I know you love me, but I can't give you more than a few visits a year, and I'm so—there are so many restrictions involved in our relationship because of my position, and it's such a hassle, so—not James? Me?"

"James—if he loses Regulus, if we lose Regulus, it'll be… I don't know. I think, for some time, we won't be—we won't really recover from it for a long time. Not coming back out is just as much for James as it is Regulus, in a way. Can't you see?" Sirius murmurs. "I'd die for them, but I'd live for you."

Remus has to blink hard against the sudden stinging in his eyes, because he knows better than most that dying is easy, but living? Sometimes, living is the hardest part about being alive.

The fact that Sirius would do that for him, that he loves him enough to, is something too special to Remus for him to even try to put in words. Remus, who has nothing to offer Sirius other than himself, and even that's in short supply. He can't give Sirius everything to live for, only something, and for that to be enough… Oh, Remus feels like his chest is cracking open and flooding with warmth all at the same time.

"Thank you," Remus chokes out.

"Just—just to be clear," Sirius murmurs cautiously, "this isn't me saying I won't do everything I can to save him, Remus. I will. I'm going to. I'm not planning to come back."

"I know. I do know that," Remus tells him, and he loves Sirius for that, too. For who he is and how he loves. Any version of him, even this one, perhaps especially this one.

Sirius reaches out and crosses the tiny gap between them to gently run his fingers over the bite mark on Remus' shoulder again. "You know, we talk about our something quite a bit, but what would our everything look like? Have you ever imagined it?"

"I have," Remus admits, and Sirius' lips curl up into a quizzical little smile, curious eyes peering at him patiently. "We have a house. A bit quaint—"

"Like the one you grew up in?"

"Yes. Do you—did you like it when you were there?"

"I did," Sirius confirms. "It was warm. Homely. Nothing like the house I grew up in before I ever found out what a home could feel like when I moved in with the Potters."

Remus hums. "Well, our house is a home, too. Except for the staircase; that's not very quaint, because it's a bit frivolous. It has to be one of those twisty, ridiculous staircases so you can make a dramatic entrance every time you come down it."

"Oh, fuck yes," Sirius agrees immediately, breaking out into a grin as he starts shaking with laughter. "No, that's perfect. I want a bell at the top I can ring so everyone—but especially you—knows to turn all eyes to me when I start to descend."

"Very convenient. I like it."

"Mhm. Oh, and James will love it, because I'll build him a chair to take him up, and he'll get to spin around and around. I can hear him, actually. Just: wheeee."

"That's—hilariously accurate," Remus muses with a chuckle, shaking his head. "Shit, I can hear that. I have not known him long enough to justify knowing what that sounds like."

Sirius snorts and reaches up to, with no warning whatsoever, poke Remus in the side of the mouth, tugging at it playfully as he says, "Eh, some people you just understand, no matter how long you've known them. Anyway, what else?"

"We have a back porch with rocking chairs where we sit on warm nights and just—enjoy the fresh air."

"Under the moon and stars."

"In the name of cliches, yes," Remus says wryly, as Sirius' finger pulls away from his mouth to stroke along his jaw with a quiet, mindless devotion that makes Remus' heart squeeze.

"Can it be a bench?" Sirius asks. "Or a swing? Just so we can sit together, I think. We can cuddle up under the moon and stars in the spirit of more cliches."

Remus smiles. "Mm, there's a thought. A swing, then. A padded one we keep a blanket tossed over the back of."

"What else?"

"We don't have a dryer. We hang clothes out to dry outside, like my mum always did. It was—well, I always loved the routine of it, the sort of…realism of planning around storms, then inevitably having a storm blow in when you least expect it anyway. We'd all run out in the rain, laughing and slipping in mud, and rush to get the clothes back inside so we could wash them again when the sun came back. I miss that."

"Only you, Remus Lupin, would find it in yourself to be nostalgic about regular disruptions."

"You'd be surprised by the things you'll take for granted until they're gone."

Sirius sighs. "Trust me, I wouldn't."

"Sorry," Remus says with a wince. "That was tactless of me."

"No, it's fine. I get what you meant. So, no dryer. Do we have a washing machine? Can we fuck against it?" Sirius replies. "Or on it? I'm not picky."

Remus blinks at him, then arches an eyebrow until Sirius' face starts to turn red, just like he knew it would. Once the blush is there, Remus lets his laugh go. "You want to—"

"Oh, shut up—"

"No, no, I want to hear about this secret fantasy of yours to have sex on or against household appliances. Do tell me more, sweetheart. Give me all the filthy details."

"Why do you insist on fucking with me? Why—"

"Is it just the washing machine? What are your thoughts on the oven? We'll keep it off, of course, but—"

"Remus," Sirius groans, drawing his hands back like he's trying to cover his very, very red face.

"Personally," Remus teases, reaching out to catch Sirius' wrists and gaze at him fondly, "I'm partial to the kitchen table. It'd be nice, I think, splaying you out there and enjoying you like a meal. Wouldn't that be nice?"

Sirius clears his throat violently, and his voice still cracks a little bit when he says, "That'd be—yeah, that—that sounds nice. Really, ah, nice. Do you—would you care to elaborate on that, actually? Like a meal, you said?"

"Well, you know, when you have a very delicious meal laid out in front you, the best thing to do is savor every bite," Remus says casually, watching Sirius peer at him with parted lips and a stutter in his breath, chest hitching, flushed for an entirely different reason that has nothing to do with embarrassment.

"I want you to fuck me on the floor," Sirius blurts out, and Remus' eyebrows fly up. "And the bed. And in the pantry. And on the stairs. Just all over the house. It's our everything, right? We can do everything everywhere all the time. Whatever we want. And we can sleep together, at night, all night. I'll drool on you and you'll still call me pretty in the morning."

"Yes," Remus agrees softly.

"We'll take showers together and fight about what color we want the drapes to be in each room and wash dishes side-by-side after every single meal we share."

"Yes."

"You'll tell me what to do all the time, and I'll listen because I'm madly, deeply, desperately in love with you and just want to make you happy, so happy, and I'm—I'm so—I'm so fucking sorry I can't, Remus, I'm sorry, I'm—"

"Sirius—"

"I'm so sorry," Sirius chokes out, because he's suddenly crying very fucking hard, his body curling forward as he presses closer to Remus, holding onto him tight. "Oh, oh, I'm—I don't want to do this. I don't want to leave you. I'm—I—"

Remus makes a pained noise and draws him closer, his eyes stinging as he squeezes them shut and ducks his face down to bury it in Sirius' hair. Because, the thing is, something is enough, but it is so human, so simply natural, to want everything. They can't have it; they were never going to get it, but that doesn't make it hurt any less.

For a long time, they just lay there and cry together, and grieve, and cling. Remus realizes all at once that Sirius, too, hasn't really let himself feel it. That's something Remus has known subconsciously, just from how maturely Sirius has been approaching it, but it's something that catches up to him anyway. There's no way to outrun this forever.

"It's okay," Remus whispers, his voice hoarse. "Everything is going to be okay."

"Remus?" Sirius croaks, lifting his head to stare at him through teary eyes.

"Yes?" Remus murmurs.

"I want you to promise me that—that you'll—that even if I'm not here to remind you, you'll never forget your worth, how invaluable you are. Never forget that," Sirius rasps.

Remus swallows harshly. "I promise."

"Come here," Sirius whispers, slipping his hand up to cradle the back of Remus' neck, drawing him into a slow kiss.

"I love you," Remus presses into his mouth, and his skin, and maybe his fucking soul, trying to pour it from himself until Sirius is full of it, until he'll never be without it.

Sirius takes it from him, greedily. Sirius takes it all, gratefully.

Somehow, inexplicably, it's everything.

Dorcas peers at Marlene through the mirror, hesitating. Marlene holds her gaze steadily, waiting, not hesitant in the least. They're both tucked in the cramped bathroom, wearing nothing but big t-shirts and no pants, Dorcas' makeup smeared and her braids piled haphazardly on the top of her head, sagging a bit from the loose grip of the stretched-out hair bobble, one end of a braid hanging over her forehead. Marlene is sitting in a chair, legs spread as she leans back like she doesn't have a care in the world.

"Are you sure you trust me to do this?" Dorcas asks, yet again.

"If I didn't, we wouldn't be here," Marlene replies dryly. She flicks her fingers and rolls her eyes. "Just do it."

"Right, but—"

"Dorcas, you're literally a stylist. Like, this is literally something you're qualified to do."

"I'm not your stylist, though," Dorcas points out.

Marlene smiles at her through the mirror, too-sweet, eyes squinting a bit with simmering passive aggression. "No, but you are my friend, aren't you? What are friends for?"

"You know what, McKinnon?"

"What's that, Meadowes?"

"Bite me," Dorcas mutters.

"Where and how hard?" Marlene replies instantly, lips twitching as her smile softens into something real.

Dorcas huffs and leans forward over the back of the chair to cup Marlene's chin and tilt her head back, staring at her from upside down. "We're not friends."

"What are we, then?" Marlene shoots back, a challenge.

"More," Dorcas murmurs. "Definitely more."

Marlene studies her for a long moment, then she huffs a weak laugh and mumbles, "Hell of a time to reach that conclusion, Dorcas. Always too fucking late."

"If it helps at all, I always knew," Dorcas confesses. "I just wasn't—well, I fucked up. I didn't make you my priority, and I should have. I'm sorry that I didn't."

"Have you now?" Marlene whispers.

"Yes," Dorcas tells her, firm, then dips down to kiss her with that same firmness, leaving no room for doubt.

Marlene is grinning when Dorcas pulls away, and it's a very carefree, exhilarated grin that makes Dorcas' heart clench. She can see Marlene fiddling with the ring on her finger, twisting it around and around, and the light in her eyes—oh, she looks so happy. Dorcas can't think of a time that she's ever seen Marlene look genuinely, wholeheartedly happy. It crushes her to think she's been a part of holding that back.

"You have the worst timing," Marlene declares, laughing again as she tugs her head forward and goes back to looking at Dorcas through the mirror, her gaze fond.

"Better late than never," Dorcas muses, earning a snort, and she sighs in exasperation as she reaches out to pluck the scissors up from the counter. "Alright, if you're actually okay with me doing this—"

"I really am. I want it. I want—" Marlene halts and lifts her hand to reach up and catch a strand of hair over her shoulder between two fingers, staring at herself with a furrow in her eyebrows. "Sometimes, I look at myself and don't recognize the person staring back at me. She looks like—before. If her hair falls the right way, you can't see the scar on her neck, and she—she used to love her hair, you know. Curled it sometimes or let her cousin do some cute hairstyle, but she doesn't do that anymore. She doesn't care about it anymore. She's not even here anymore. It's just me now, and I—I want to see me. I've gone so long without seeing me."

Dorcas feels her face soften. "She was beautiful. So are you. Tell me what you want to see, and I'll show it to you."

"Cut it short," Marlene says, holding her own gaze in the mirror. "Nothing that will get in my face. Nothing anyone can easily grab onto. Can you do that?"

"I can do that," Dorcas promises, and then she does.

It's intimate, somehow, in a way it never is with anyone else, in a way it never has been when Dorcas has done this for friends, or even for Regulus. They're both quiet, glancing at each other through the mirror after every snip of the scissors. Hair drifts down, cut away, an unburdening.

It's acceptance, Dorcas thinks. Marlene's relationship with herself has been, from what she's seen, a journey full of turbulence. Clinging to someone she can never be again, and now, here, letting go to be who she is with no shame for it. The arena changed her; she is who she is, regardless, and whoever that may be is hers. The reality of horror from the reflection of all that she did to survive, and she is hideous in the eyes of those afraid to look at the realest thing they'll ever see, but so beautiful to those who can't look away.

To Dorcas, Marlene is the most beautiful person she's ever seen, or known. No one else has to look. Dorcas is more than happy to never turn her eyes anywhere else.

Dorcas cuts Marlene's hair gently, tenderly, with care. She cuts it short, leaving some of it spiky and flyaway at the top and slightly on the sides, then brings out the clippers to buzz at the bottom, giving it a more natural look. She's careful and sweet when brushing off remnants of hair, never once tugging or pulling throughout the entire process.

Marlene watches avidly the entire time, focused on every clip and snip and buzz like she's fascinated by the process, by the transformation from before to after. Her old self she's no longer trying to find, and who she is now that she's been waiting to see. She looks happy again. It's beautiful.

"Done?" Marlene breathes out when Dorcas sits the clippers down and steps back.

"Done." Dorcas smiles and nods. "Do you like it?"

"Yeah," Marlene croaks. "Yeah, I—I really do. Thank you."

"You're welcome," Dorcas tells her, ridiculously pleased.

Marlene unfurls from the chair, swiping off hair and running her hands over her head, turning and tilting to see from all angles. She smiles again, at herself, then turns to smile right at Dorcas. "Do you like it?"

"That doesn't matter, for the record. It only matters that you do," Dorcas says. "But yes, I do. It suits you."

"That's good," Marlene murmurs, swiveling her head to peer at herself in the mirror again, like she can't help it. "When I die, I want to die as me."

"You're not dying," Dorcas retorts sharply.

"Dorcas," Marlene says softly, turning to face her fully, her eyes sad. "I will fight, okay? I will, but—" She sighs and shrugs a little. "But, well, the odds are never in my favor. I beat them last time, much to everyone's surprise and a lot of people's displeasure. I don't think I'll do it a second time, and if Riddle is as pissed off as I assume he is for what I did in my interview, then I won't be able to do it a second time."

Dorcas wavers in place for a long moment, debating with herself, because there's a reason she hasn't told Marlene her plan. For one thing, it's very fucking dangerous, because if even a hint of it gets back to Riddle in any capacity, even just as a subconscious worry that he takes the measures to handle, then the whole plan will fall apart. For another thing, to tell Marlene would be to put her at further risk, because it could influence how she behaves in the arena, how she acts and how she fights and how she survives.

And, finally, Dorcas is…scared. That's horrible, it is, but it's honest. This is one category in which Dorcas' boldness has failed her. She has, in so many ways, been lying to Marlene. Holding things back. Making decisions based on the selfish need to keep her safe, even when she knows that Marlene wouldn't appreciate it. Marlene would have taken right to recruitment; she would have wanted to be involved, and said as much all the way back when Vanity and Hodge died. Dorcas blocked every opportunity to bring Marlene in on this and made sure to keep it from her, as well as let it come between them over and over again and didn't even have the guts or decency to explain why. She broke Marlene's heart over this.

It's going to catch up with Dorcas eventually either way, but she has enough to worry about as it is, so she has simply decided to handle one problem at a time. This one can come later, because really, it's not smart to tell Marlene or anyone that's going into the arena what's being planned behind the scenes. It's not smart to provide the promise of it when she doesn't even know it will work, until it does. She can't do that. She can't risk everything, put Marlene in danger, give false hope she can't be one hundred percent sure of, and tackle the problem of her past mistakes.

So, Dorcas reaches up and cautiously brushes her fingers over the arc of Marlene's ear, stroking short hair she couldn't grab onto even if she wanted to, studying her expression for any sign of discomfort. There is none. Marlene looks enraptured by it, focused, her lips parting and her breath hitching.

"Survive," Dorcas orders, demands, insists. "Survive, Marlene, and keep surviving, and don't stop surviving. Do you hear me? That's what you do. Just survive."

"That's all I ever do anyway," Marlene replies, her voice soft and shaky, head tilting into Dorcas' hand.

Dorcas holds her gaze. "That's all you have to do, and the rest will work itself out."

"If you say so." Marlene's eyes flutter shut, and she sways closer, exhaling quietly. "I—oh, I like—I like that. It's different with my hair like this. Feels different. Good different."

"Yeah?"

"Yeah. You can—I mean, if you want… More?"

"Mm, I always want more," Dorcas murmurs, sliding her fingers up further and delving them into the shorter, spiky strands of Marlene's hair, feeling them brush along the inside of her knuckles, soft. "Between you and me, we'll find it."

Marlene releases a punched-out sound and sinks forward, her eyes still shut, utterly relaxed as she finds her way to Dorcas' mouth. She kisses her, gentle and slow, with all that she is and all that they have, and more.

Just a bit more.

James doesn't know why he keeps doing this. Well, no, okay, he does know why; because he can't help it, because he's pathetic, because it hurts and he likes that it hurts in some sick, twisted way, and because he's needy and desperate and falling apart and so fucking drawn in by Regulus every single time; because of Regulus' eyes, and because of the dagger's edge of his words, pressing into James' throat, cold with threat, always pressing harder just how he likes, and because Regulus is so irresistibly exhilarating that there's nothing that feels better and worse than simply having him, almost.

In the moment, James is always overcome, caught up in it, completely lost to any and all things Regulus; how he sounds, feels, and tastes. It's no different than James spending ten years unable to ignore Regulus; if anything, it's the extreme version of it. Like this, James feels like he's unable to fucking breathe without Regulus, like his skin and every kiss is more vital to him than oxygen. James isn't thinking, here, his mind entirely empty of everything that's not the way Regulus moans his name, his body unaware of any sensation other than the way Regulus desperately clutches at him, his emotions taken over by the relentless beat of pleasure that rattles his bones and erases the world around him until it's just them and just this.

And then it ends.

That's the tragedy of it. That it ends. That it has to.

James has had a lot of sex in his time, alright? He has, and most of it wasn't actually with Regulus at all, but nothing or no one has taken James apart and put him all back together again the way Regulus does. Every single time, something inside him climbs the rungs of his ribs like a ladder to reach up and knock on his heart, seeking entry just to warn him about the inevitability of being torn apart again, because he will. Because he always is, over and over, without fail.

The worst part is, he lets it happen. He comes back to it each time. He wants it, can't get enough of it, doesn't know how to stay away. James wishes he could be angry at Regulus for it, and he is, but he's also aware that Regulus isn't all to blame.

"Wait, James, just—wait, please," Regulus blurts out the moment James starts to roll away from him after they've both slipped back into pants, his voice pitched high and desperate, eyes a little wild. He's always a bit more laid bare after sex, vulnerable, less shields up in the aftermath of James dismantling them, slowly. He savors every second of it, of watching Regulus give into it, the pure nakedness of trust and desire intermingled in the way they do this. There's nothing casual about it, between them. They're too much for it to be anything other than ardently momentous every time.

"Clearly, talking to you isn't going to get me anywhere other than—right here," James mutters, unable to keep the bitter note out of his voice, purely because there's nowhere else in this world he'd rather be. "So, yeah, I'm just going to go—"

"James—"

"Let me go. Now."

Regulus does, his hands falling slack and slipping away, and then he does quite possibly the last thing James could have ever—or would have ever—expected him to do. He covers his face with his hands and proceeds to start crying.

James cannot see it, but he can hear it, and it's immediately the most harrowing thing he's ever listened to. He knows the sound of a child choking on their own blood; he knows the sound of a splash as bodies hit a river glinting crimson. And yet. And yet, it's this that horrifies him the most—the sound of Regulus crying, because James has hurt him.

James doesn't think he's ever in his life hurt Regulus before, to the point of him breaking down into tears, at least not on purpose. He didn't even know he could. He wasn't aware that he had that power, and absolutely no part of him wants it.

"Stop," James blurts out reflexively, genuinely so taken off guard that he can feel the tips of his fingers tingling, numb from the pure shock of it all. "Stop it. Wait. That's not—wait, hey, don't—please don't do that. Please don't."

Mere moments ago, James would have scoffed and been angry at the idea of Regulus crying, just another form of emotional manipulation to make him fold, to make him give in, but this is absolutely not that. This is Regulus hiding his face and turning on his side as he curls up on himself like he's trying to shrink and disappear, like he's trying to save James from the sight of it, but he's too far gone to make the distance it would take to cover it up. This is Regulus breaking down hard, suddenly and all at once, like he's been suffering some unbearable, inescapable weight pressing down on him, and now he's finally, helplessly buckling underneath it.

James doesn't feel good about the fact that it's him. That he's the reason. That he did this. He thought—well, no, he never really thought he'd enjoy seeing Regulus like this, but he never once stopped to think that he could have a hand in making Regulus feel like this. He never once assumed that he could push Regulus to this point, certainly not so quickly.

James lasted ten years dealing with Regulus hating him, and being unkind, and ignoring him.

Regulus didn't even last five days.

"Okay, hey, shh," James whispers, a bit fretful, his voice strained as he eases back onto the bed and cautiously presses himself behind Regulus, curling around him, cradling him.

It's devastating, honestly, to witness something like this while knowing you're the one responsible for it, at least in part, or just mostly. James is sure that it's other things, too—including going back into the arena tomorrow, as well as the strain that exists between him and Sirius, and maybe he misses his flowers, and maybe he just wants to be held, and maybe he just wants to go home. Maybe, like James, he just wants all of this to stop feeling this way, and being this way, and maybe, just the same as James, he wants, desperately, to jump around in the rivers of time to find the calmest puddle to rest in.

Regulus isn't necessarily resistant to James touching him; it's more that he's curled up in a tight ball and tucked in on himself, leaving very little room for touching at all. James tries anyway, folding himself behind him and slipping his arm over Regulus, snaking it up between Regulus' arms to hold it to his chest, a secure weight that Regulus adjusts to and wraps himself around almost instantly. He clings to it, to James' arm, so stiff and tense that the shuddering sobs that escape him travel through every inch of his body.

James can't take it. Genuinely, he is not built for shit like this. All of his anger has gone unhelpfully silent, shutting up like a chastised child too scared to speak up again. All he is now is pure, unadulterated distress, everything in him craving to comfort, to fix, to try, try, try.

It takes a while for Regulus to calm down, and even when he has, he won't unravel himself from where he is. All he does is make these sniffling noises and slight hitches and hiccups in his chest and breath from where he was hyperventilating a bit, all of which tug at every single one of James' heartstrings. At some point, he makes this quiet, fussy sort of noise and grasps James' hand to cradle it between both of his own, fingers trembling as he traces brown skin and hardened calluses and the lines of raised veins. He has apparently claimed James' hand for himself, and at this particular moment, James has no intentions of taking it back.

"Can you turn over and look at me?" James murmurs.

"No," is Regulus' mumbled reply, raspy and petulant.

James sighs and ducks his head down, tucking his face into the crook of Regulus' neck. It's the side with the scar, but that doesn't stop him from kissing it, gently. This earns him another sniffle, and Regulus drags his hand up to kiss the curled fingers like they're exchanging gifts of tenderness.

"I didn't mean to make you cry," James admits.

"All you've been doing is making me cry," Regulus retorts, a bite to his tone, which isn't unexpected, because he's him. He can't be pushed to the point of breaking down and resurface among the ruins without rage for what got him there.

James feels his heart sink. "Have I?"

"No, James, I've just been having a grand time while you were treating me like shit," Regulus snaps, abruptly letting James' hand go and rolling away from him. Just like that, he's on the move, restless, a burst of energy fueled by fury, and it needs somewhere to go. Perhaps it's only fair that he directs it right at James. "You know what? You wanted to talk, yes? So, let's talk. Get the fuck up. We're talking."

"Hey now—"

"No, no, you're the one who wanted to do this. So, we'll do it. Why don't we start with how much of a hypocrite you are?"

"I—excuse me?" James releases an incredulous sound of pure disbelief and rising anger, because oh, there it is. It's back, just like that, just that easily. Regulus isn't crying anymore; he's just as pissed off, and James can easily, effortlessly, match him in this. He does just that, flinging himself to stand on the side of the bed across from Regulus, jaw clenched as he glares right at him. "You're calling me a hypocrite? Me?!"

"Yes, you," Regulus bites out. "Because you're one to talk to me about outrunning things, but look at you! As if you're doing any different, James!"

"I'm not outrunning anything," James says sharply. "You're the one who does, always, and you can't do that."

Regulus releases a sharp, humorless laugh. "Oh, and why can't I outrun it, James? Is that only something you get to do? What, you think this is easy for me? Do you think I'm having the time of my fucking life here?"

"Well, maybe you should have thought of that," James retorts, nostrils flaring. "Maybe you should have taken all that time you spent lying to me—"

"Oh, fuck you, James," Regulus hisses. "We're really doing this again? Either fuck me about it, again, or shut up about it."

"Doing this again?! We've never even done it!" James bursts out. "You did it! You did this. You made the fucking decision, and you lied, and you hurt me, and the worst part—the absolute worst part—is you don't even care!"

"Yes, I lied, because I knew you would never promise not to volunteer for me if I didn't promise, too. Yes, I hurt you, but I had my reasons. And don't you dare say I don't care," Regulus grits out. "You can't even begin to comprehend how much I actually do. And you know what? At least I know I'm a bit of a hypocrite, but you? You don't even see it, do you?"

James rears back in disbelief. "Are you fucking joking? Of course I don't see it, because it's not there! I'm the only one who actually managed to keep their damn promise!"

"Good for you, do you want a gold star?" Regulus snarls, moving further down the bed, and every step he takes, James matches and follows, a mirror. "That's not what I'm talking about. You are a hypocrite. Why don't we talk about our games, hm? Why don't we do that, James?"

There's a long pause. James stares at him, his mouth slowly closing, eyebrows drawing together. Their games… They've never actually talked about their games. Not once.

"Oh, of course, I forget it doesn't matter when it's you, right? When you've decided to sacrifice yourself for me. When you're the one doing whatever it takes to keep me safe. When it's you so close to death, as long as it's not me," Regulus lists off, and James' face falls slack. "Isn't that right, James? It's perfectly okay for you to do that, to make that choice and never fucking tell me, and then plan to die anyway when I did what I could to make sure that wouldn't happen. All of that is alright, isn't it, because…why? Because it's you?"

"I—that's not—" James sucks in a harsh breath, his face twisting as he squeezes his eyes shut. He reaches up and runs his hand through his hair, gripping it and tugging fitfully, and then he releases a sound of frustration as his hand falls and his eyes shoot open. "There are some differences, aren't there?"

"Name one," Regulus challenges in a low hiss, swinging around the end of the bed at the same time that James does, chin tilted up as he stares James down.

"Well, for one thing, I didn't lie to you about it," James grumbles, scowling at him.

"No, you just—purposefully omitted that information until you had no choice but to reveal it," Regulus corrects sharply, and James swallows. "Not much difference between what you did and what I did, really. Try again."

"I never promised I wouldn't fucking do it."

"No, but you purposefully led me to believe that, didn't you? Don't you think I remember, James? Every time I indicated that we would be fighting, that we would both be trying to win, you allowed it. You never corrected me. You knew I was sure we were both on the same page, and you didn't want me to find out that we weren't. Again, not so different. Try again."

"Two wrongs don't make a right," James snaps.

Regulus hums. "No, but it sure as shit makes you a fucking hypocrite, James Potter. Because here you are, hating me for the same exact thing you did, or just very close. Holding it against me, when I didn't hold it against you. And I—I get it, I get that you're angry, and you have every right to be, but I have just as much as a right to be furious with the double standard. Why is it okay for you, James, but not me? It's not different."

"Yes, it is!" James protests. "It's different because I never did it to fucking hurt you! I did it to save you!"

"What the hell do you think I'm doing?!" Regulus holds his arms out, eyes bulging. "You think I chose to do this to hurt you? Is that it? Are you fucking mental? Do you really believe I ruined us for any other reason than because it would ensure that you would be safe?!"

"I didn't ask that from you!"

"I didn't either!"

"My reasons weren't selfish, though!" James bellows. "I never did it thinking it would hurt you, don't you get that?! I thought you fucking hated me, but you? You knew how I felt about you when you did it! You made an informed decision—"

"Oh, fuck off," Regulus hisses. "My reasons were no different than yours, and you can't fucking stand it, can you? You can't stand that I'm making you feel the way you've made me feel, just like I can't stand that you're making me feel how I've made you feel. This is what it feels like when you do shit like this for people, and to people, and for what? Us turning it around on each other like one of us is actually in the right, when we're not? We both have our reasons, James! What makes yours more noble than mine?"

James makes a harsh noise in the back of his throat, his heart feeling battered, pure fury coursing through his veins. "You fucking prick, I do everything I do because I love you!"

"So do I!" Regulus snarls, his voice raised, trembling with fury and this horrible, inescapable desperation that echoes out between them, blunt and harsh like a stab wound. James snaps his mouth shut instantly, his battered heart giving a strange pulse, the whole world shaping around him anew. Different now. Different instantly. Different, because he didn't know.

The silence is heavy.

Love. Regulus has never said that before, that he loves James. Not outright, not in a blatant way like that. He's talked around it, sure, and he's said things to Hallows, but that's not the same; that's not real like this is.

He hasn't said the three words, but he has said three words that may as well be the same fucking thing. James wasn't aware that love confessions could come in any other form, but so do I has taken upon itself to prove him wrong.

There's no mistaking the impact of it, the way everything just stops, neither of them moving or looking away from each other. Regulus is frozen, and James isn't breathing. It's written all over their faces; oh, this means something.

"So do I," Regulus repeats, his voice weaker, throat bobbing on a harsh swallow. "My reasons are as noble as yours."

"You can't just—you can't say that and—and expect that to fix anything," James chokes out, his eyes stinging, something in him begging and pleading for him to let it be the balm to the wound, some part of him knowing it's enough.

"James," Regulus says, and it comes out plaintive, a rising panic in his eyes, so much regret and remorse there in his face that James never saw until this moment—and he was always looking for it, waiting for it, needing it.

James wants to let this drop, leave it alone and take it no further, just exist in this world-altering moment where love is being held out to him like a peace offering. He wants to take it; he wants to grip it like a lifeline and never let go. He can feel it already, wearing him down, weakening him. It feels so fucking good; it's what he's wanted for so, so long. Yet, he has to fight it, because it can't be that easy. "I didn't make a promise knowing I would break it. I stood on that stage and nearly died the moment I heard your name for the third time, just like I did the times before, and it took everything in me, all the love and respect I have for you to not hurt you by volunteering for you. It fucking killed me, and I still didn't do this to you. It's because I love you that I would have never done this to you."

"It's because I love you that I had to," Regulus whispers. He shakes his head. "Don't you get it? Because it's true. Oh, oh fuck, you cannot even begin to imagine how true it is. I love you. I love you so much, James. I've loved you since I've known you, and I've loved you this whole time. I still do. I—"

"Stop it. Stop, Regulus, just—" James chokes off, feeling those words crawl into him and invade every single cell in his body. It's the first time James speaks his name since telling him that he hated him. It breaks in his mouth no different than Regulus broke his promise, just as damning, just as revealing.

"I—I love you, okay? What—what was I supposed to do? What could I do, any differently than you did for me out of love? Of course it was love, James. What else can it be? What else is this?" Regulus gasps out, and fuckshitfuckingfuck, here come the tears again. He's clearly trying to fight it, but he can't talk without everything coming out all at once, ripped open from throat to navel, a complete mess of blood and tears and love; desperate, hideous, needy love. "You don't understand how much I love you. I—I would do anything for you, anything, absolutely anything you needed. And you needed your mum. You needed—you—no, okay, I needed you to be safe, and if—if I lost you to make sure, then—then that'd be okay, that's okay, because you're safe, you're alive, and I love that you are, I love you, I love you ceaselessly, at all times, and I know—I know I don't get it right, I know I'm not—"

"Regulus," James croaks.

"I love you, and I'm sorry. I'm so sorry that I do, because I never do it right, but I still do. I still love you," Regulus continues, and it comes out as sob. "I'm not sorry for doing what I had to so you'd have all that you need, but I'm sorry I had to lie to do it. I'm sorry I had to hurt you to do it. I'm sorry we're even here right now. We should be dancing by a fire."

James makes a muffled sound, his vision blurring to the point that wearing his glasses doesn't help him see anyway, because his eyes are too full of tears to make anything out. He's not sure who moves first out of either of them, but that doesn't matter when it seems like a blink and a decade passes before they're colliding into each other, holding each other. Their grips are tight, clinging, and they're both a mess of tears and the simple need to be in one another's arms, trying to fall apart at the same time they're trying to keep each other together.

"Not this," Regulus chokes out. "We didn't deserve this."

And suddenly, framed that way, none of it is different. Because Sirius was right; there's no way this could have gone where it wouldn't have gone to shit. Because Regulus was right; no matter what anyone did, they would have all ended up right here, trapped in this, imprisoned in dire circumstances none of them ever deserved. Because, past all the promises and the lies and the different forms love can take, none of them are truly at fault for any of this, and each of them are suffering through this, together, equally as ruined by the cruel hands of fate, a crash and scatter of dominoes that leave them lost among the wreckage of the steps they took in the aftermath of the first falling. But none of them chose this.

They never wanted this.

It hits James all at once with a mounting horror that this is exactly what Riddle wanted. Exactly this. To further break them all, to drive people apart, to rip hope and chances right out of their fingers until they're empty-handed, left with unfulfilled fantasies of a future they'll never get to have.

Nearly a year ago exactly, Regulus said something to him. It was spoken in an entirely different context, and yet it's applicable to every aspect of their relationship, from the very beginning all the way to now. Empty hands and unfulfilled fantasies; it's all very tragic, isn't it? he'd said.

It was the first time he called them a great, big tragedy. He knew then, in a way James couldn't really understand. He always knew. And it's not fair. It was never fair. They were a tragedy in the making the moment Regulus laid eyes on him the first time and blushed when he smiled, when Regulus threw a snowball at him on his fifteenth birthday, before the last arena and after it, standing in a kitchen and daring to try, and here, now, breaking in each other's arms with a distance shoved between them that neither of them wanted.

He didn't want this, James thinks, shaking all over like the seam of himself is splitting open, overstuffed and spilling out. He didn't want this, no more than I did.

It's with a sickening lurch in James' gut that he realizes he's been wasting time. And yes, Sirius has said it. Sirius tried to tell him. But it was so hard to look past all the pain and anger to see the cruel reality he so desperately wanted to escape. There is no escape, and he can't outrun it. They've all made mistakes and hurt each other; they're all doing their best with what they have, with what's forced on them, with the demands of their love that they have to answer. The horrible, ugly truth is that none of them—Regulus, included—ever wanted, or deserved, to be put in this position.

They should be dancing by a fire, and here they are anyway, trying to find some way to live with the love that led them here, except it's not love's fault. Regulus responded. No different than James did the first time when they went into the arena together, he responded to the threat with the guiding hand of love, a hook dragging him along, a hook that pierces them both. Together, they bleed. Neither of them want to.

All this time that James could have spent trying to patch them up and stem the blood flow, he's spent finding new places to rip open. He could have been holding him. He could have been comforting him, because no matter what they do, Regulus is going back into that arena, and he has to be scared. James could have spent this time loving him.

He did, is the thing. He did. James finds that his hatred isn't and never really was hatred at all. Even this, even like this, it's love. He didn't know love could cut, but it can, and it has, and he's sorry, too. It's easy to label love as hate when one wants their love to only ever be gentle and painless, but the horrible reality is that James, like everyone else, is human. He's human, and his love can cause pain just the same as Regulus' has.

Because that's love, too. It always was, wasn't it? Regulus said it, but James is realizing it now, understanding it here on the other side of it. Regulus hated him and never truly hated him at all. Regulus always loved him. Regulus still loves him.

"Oh, oh no. No, no, no," James chants on a broken, desperate whine under the weight of his regrets, peeling back from Regulus and continuously moving back as if he can physically travel back through all the time he wasted and get a second chance. Time—he struggles so much with time. Doesn't really understand it anymore. Looking at Regulus now, he's sure this is the first minute they've met, and simultaneously convinced they've been in love for sixty years. "I'm—oh, fuck, I'm sorry. I'm so—shit, shit, I just—I've wasted all this time—"

"Don't do that," Regulus cuts in instantly, his eyes going gentle, face softening. "Please don't do that, James. Don't blame yourself for feeling."

"Reg," James whispers, "I'm sorry."

"I'm not angry," Regulus murmurs. "I never was, really. You do have every right to be upset with me for lying to you. That was wrong—and for that, I am sorry."

"Thank you," James croaks. "I'm sorry you were put in a position where you felt forced to lie to me. I'm sorry any of us are forced into any of this at all."

"That's not your fault. It's Riddle's," Regulus states bluntly, his eyes flashing, going bright with true anger. Nothing like the anger between them; this is cold and calculating, something that will not pass, something that cannot be changed. "Do you see why I—I did what I did in my interview? To him? Not you, but to further ruin him. Because he did this to us."

"I see. I do see," James admits, because he gets it. In the wake of his fury and with proper explanation, he even finds it very fucking attractive, actually. It helps as much as it hurts that Regulus wasn't really lying. He would marry James, if he could. He wants to. He wasn't lying about that, and that matters more to James than anything else.

"Do you still think you hate me?" Regulus asks.

James could laugh, honestly. He actually does, a bit, because of course Regulus—the fussy, stubborn little shit that he is—will insist that James just thought it was hate, when it really wasn't, and well, he would know, wouldn't he? He did it first. And, the thing is, James doesn't think that anymore. He knows what that feeling was now, what he mistook for hatred was just desperate, keening love, because he loves Regulus so much, so fucking much, and he doesn't want this to happen to either of them, any of them.

"No, I don't think I hate you anymore," James whispers.

"Are you still mad at me?" Regulus whispers back.

"I don't know," James confesses. It's not that simple. There's still this snarling thing right at the center of his chest every time he looks at Regulus, and he doesn't know if it's this deep-rooted protectiveness demanding him to keep Regulus from any further pain, or anger that Regulus lied to him—no matter his reasons—and helped put him in this position where he's going to lose one, if not two, of those he loves the most in this world. Maybe it's both. It's probably both.

Regulus studies him for a long moment, and then he blows out a deep breath as his shoulders slump like all the fight has gone out of him at once. He moves forward and reaches out to cradle James' face, drawing him down a bit and leaning up to press his forehead to James' temple, bumping into his glasses and nudging James' cheek with his nose. James' eyes flutter shut as the snarling in his chest dies down, and he slips his arms around Regulus to pull him closer.

"That's okay," Regulus breathes out, his voice a little wobbly, words escaping him shaky and scared. "You don't have to know. You don't have to be anything other than you."

"I have to let it go," James mumbles. "It's getting in the way."

"James," Regulus says softly.

"I don't feel like a good person anymore," James tells him, his voice cracking. "I don't—I'm not—"

"You are," Regulus interrupts fiercely, pulling back to hold his gaze. "You're a good person. You're the best person this world will ever know, and that doesn't mean you can't be angry, or make mistakes, or get things wrong. You can, and that doesn't take away from how good you are. You're so good, baby."

James is not prepared for how hard those words hit him, how deep they reach within him, how good they can feel when nothing else feels good at all. He isn't really sure what the sound that leaves his mouth is, but he muffles it anyway by surging forward to kiss Regulus.

Naturally, predictably, Regulus proceeds to melt.

"I love you. I love you so much," James chokes out, reaching up to cradle Regulus' cheek and press fervent, desperate kisses across the other one. "I'm so sorry, love. I'm sorry this is happening. I'm sorry. I love you so fucking much."

"Shh, you can forgive me tomorrow, before I go," Regulus tells him, tugging him towards the bed.

"I forgive you now. I forgive you, Reg."

"Then forgive yourself, too."

"I need your forgiveness first for that," James declares bluntly.

Regulus' face softens again. "You have it. You always had it."

"Okay. Okay, that's—okay," James exhales, crawling onto bed and beckoning Regulus to follow, and Regulus does. James feels better than he was prepared for, because not only is it refusing to let Riddle win in the ways that it matters, but it eases that rage in James so much that he can breathe again. He's still angry, just at all the things he feels he should be angry at. Being angry at Regulus hurts. It hurts them both, and he doesn't want to do it anymore; he's not doing it anymore.

"James," Regulus murmurs, once they're lying curled up on the bed, facing each other with their hands tangled loosely between them, "there's something I need you to know."

"What?" James asks quietly.

"Everything I do in that arena," Regulus whispers, holding his gaze, "it's for you."

"I'm not going to judge you for how you survive in there, love," James assures him. Regulus swallows and squeezes his eyes shut. "You—I know you don't want to hear it, but you have to make peace with Sirius. You have to—"

"Shh, no, let's not talk about any of that." Regulus' eyes snap open, and he legitimately places a finger over James' lips to shut him up. James only just resists licking it. "Not now, not tonight, not here. We can—I'll explain more tomorrow, alright? But, for right now, can this just be us? Please?"

"Yeah, alright," James agrees gently.

"James?"

"Hm?"

"Would you marry me?" Regulus says softly, just gazing at him, his hair spilled out around his head and face in waves, eyes fixed right on him. He doesn't look like someone who just asked that question; there's no warning for it, just a simple desire to have an answer. Not will you marry me, because James can't, but would you marry me, if you could? Then and now, before everything and after, during and always—would he?

"Yes," James whispers.

Regulus' lips curl up, and then they keep curling up, and then they curl out of control until a broad, beaming smile breaks across his face in a bloom of the most beautiful thing James has ever seen. He's grinning. It's a goofy grin, one of delight and the sweetest joy James has ever been hit with. Regulus' face flushes, pleased and flustered like he's still a young boy with a crush, eyes lit up as he sucks in a deep breath and holds it. He looks like he wants to scream, but in a good way; he looks like James feels just looking at him, so in love that he's glowing from the inside out from it.

James huffs out a helpless, stunned laugh of pure amazement, the rush of it spreading to him as well, despite the fact that it's the last night and everything will fall apart tomorrow. And yet, somehow, that doesn't really matter right now, like this, when happiness can grow even in the harshest of conditions, when it exists between them so blatantly with something as simple as a possibility they may never get to have.

The palpable giddiness and excitement from Regulus does not wane. If anything, it just grows stronger until he's scooting almost frantically across the space between them to kiss James eagerly, earnestly, utterly breathless and happy. So happy.

Right now, there's no room for tragedy between them.

Chapter End Notes

alright, from the top!

not the prongsfoot goodbye. james asking if he's been a good best friend to sirius—i am going to go play in traffic 😃 that shit is DEVASTATING. but indeed sirius was spitting nothing but facts!!! put some respect on his name, he's been handling this like a champ!

then remus and regulus being miserable and hot together. i love them dearly, i truly do. their friendship means a lot to me, but it's also in a very complex position at the moment, which is fair, considering the circumstances. but they really are just the epitome of: regulus 🤝 remus: being unbelievably fucked up. they bond over being unwell and being salty and sharing gossip and bitching about people they don't like. the dynamic is so funny to me lmaoooo regulus' little moment of talking about, like, his feelings on sirius and just—the fucking CLUES. god. i can't Say Anything because of spoilers, but this whole arc between sirius and regulus makes me VIBRATE.

and then skip to dorcas, who has a lot on her plate, as we can clearly see. a lot of shit going on in the background. i love her and lily bickering so much. you know the term like "that's my work husband" or "that's my work wife"? lily and dorcas are work wives <3 and then marlene "im not waiting for you to be too late this time" mckinnon showing up!!! sweeping dorcas off her feet!!! an icon!!!

back to wolfstar. the way remus begged sirius to come back to him. the way sirius would die for james and regulus, but he'd live for remus 😭😭😭 NO STOP IM SO UPSET I LOVE THEM SO MUCH. and them talking about their everything!!! IM GONNA BANG MY HEAD AGAINST THE WALL.

then switching back to dorlene. oh that scene of dorcas cutting marlene's hair was so, so special. like, ive known since chapter 13 when i established that marlene doesn't like her hair to be pulled that she would be cutting it off before she went back into the arena a second time. it just signifies such an important turning point in her character. i love her more than i could ever express <3 also!!! it's a win for wlw!!! they finally agreed they're not friends, that they're more!!! IT ONLY TOOK 46 CHAPTERS! NO BIGGIE!!! also like, lmaooo, dorcas really does have the worst timing 😭 and finally, jegulus. this was very, very jegulus heavy, because it was the climax of this arc, as well as the resolution. this was a very important arc for them to have, because like. just this: "James is realizing it now, understanding it here on the other side of it." like, it was a big thing for james to experience this and really understand regulus and how he feels/has felt, and just the same for regulus to understand james. it WAS a role reversal, basically, but one that brought them closer together. this is it, in the sense of like, okay they KNOW now, ya know? they know it's love and how it's love and what love feels/looks like for each other.

on a lighter note, the resolution was really bittersweet, and then very sweet, in my opinion. also!!! regulus confessing his love oh my god!!! after all this time, there it is!!!

oh, and bursts into tears THEY'RE ENGAGED 😭 well, okay, not really—but tell that to regulus, who will ABSOLUTELY be running with this new information lmaooo. this is the same man calling james his ex when they weren't even together. james just stating he WOULD marry regulus if he could—yes, regulus' brain has immediately decided they're engaged now. james, babe, you really should have seen that coming 💀 regulus: would you marry me if you could james: yeah

regulus: so what im hearing is we're engaged now. we just got engaged. that's what this was.
james: ...that's...not... why do i even bother trying to keep up with you? sure, whatever you say!

like PLEASE 😭 THIS MAN JUST GETS UPDATES ON HIS RELATIONSHIP AND HE'S LIKE: oh! so this is what we're doing now! okay!

i love them so much.

HONORABLE MENTIONS:

-remus being delighted by sirius' interview
-james being supportive of sirius' spine realignment
-dorcas now knows the potters are at the phoenix!!! 👀
-dorcas plans to save people from the hallow!!! 👀
-sirius and remus breaking down and just holding each other and finding everything in each other
-james being unable to keep his hands off of regulus in literally any capacity lmaooo
-regulus "are you gonna fuck me or not" black being a mean little shit
-also breaking down crying because james has been mean to him for a few days 😭 (he's so valid)
-james folding like a law chair the moment regulus' waterworks started
-them literally going: fighting -> sex -> fighting -> breakdowns and being tender -> fighting again -> love confessions -> breakdowns again -> making up -> discussing marriage 😭 HELP THEY'RE INSANE

They come in the early corners of the morning, before anyone is awake, before the servants are released to return to their duties, before the sun has even risen.

There is no warning. It's not handled gently. The door bursts open, and a team of Aurors flood in, going into rooms and marching Sirius and Regulus out with guns trained on them. James and Pandora do not handle it well, but guns are trained on them, too, keeping them there, not letting them follow.

It's a mess of shouting and desperately trying to hold onto each other, pleas and fighting, and then nothing. Just nothing, because the door shuts, Sirius and Regulus are taken away, and James and Pandora are left alone.

No one even got to say goodbye.

When Remus steps into the suite, he knows immediately that something is wrong, even as he cautiously pulls his mask off. Pandora is sitting in the main room next to James, her face puffy from where she's clearly been crying. James has his head in his hands, but he lifts it and looks at Remus, his expression fracturing. And, just like that, Remus knows.

"He's gone, isn't he?" Remus whispers.

"I'm sorry, Remus," James rasps, gripping his cane and pushing to his feet. Slowly, with a more pronounced limp than usual, he makes his way over to Remus until he stops in front of him and holds his gaze. Swallowing, he reaches out with his free arm to tug Remus in against him, shorter than him, but not by very much. It's easy to tuck his face down into James' shoulder and hide the way it scrunches as his eyes sting and grief clogs his throat. "I'm so sorry."

Remus holds very still until he's sure that he's going to be able to breathe without crying, and then he wraps his arms around James in—solidarity, maybe? Friendship? Comfort, giving and receiving? Perhaps all of it. "Both of them, I'm assuming."

"Yeah," James mumbles, clearing his throat as they break apart. He squeezes Remus' shoulder. "They just—the Aurors busted in about an hour ago, dragged them out, and took them away. We fought and—and we tried, but—"

"They're not even letting you say goodbye?" Remus hisses, utterly furious. "You're their mentor!"

James blinks hard, swallowing. "I know, but—they said not this time. I didn't even—Regulus and I weren't even awake when they came in. There was no warning. They just…"

"What are they going to do?" Remus snaps. "Hold them all day until the games start? Alone?"

"Yes," Pandora says, then immediately bursts into tears.

"It's because of the interviews, we think," James tells him, glancing wearily over at Pandora, his shoulders slumping. "I took the lift down to go see if it was the same with Frank, and it was. All the tributes are gone, Remus. It's—punishment."

"Did—did he say anything? Sirius, I mean?" Remus asks.

"Er, he was a bit busy yelling about being woken up. He spit on one of the Aurors," James admits sheepishly, and Remus releases a weak chuckle. "But um…no, there wasn't really time for anything to be said. Not from Sirius or Regulus."

"I'm going to—" Remus stops, inhales, exhales. He takes a second, looks at James and Pandora, then forces the tension out of his body. "Okay, this is what's going to happen. On the first day of the games, everyone watches without going anywhere, so we'll all be here together for this. Tomorrow, James, you'll have to go handle mentor duties and such. But, for today, we are all going to go into that kitchen and put something on our stomachs before we have to watch."

"Yes," James agrees firmly, gripping Remus' arm and leaning into him for support as they walk towards the kitchen. "I'll make you tea. Sirius told me how you like it. Unless you want coffee? We can have coffee, if you want. Pandora, come on, we're having breakfast. Get up."

Pandora miserably pushes to her feet, sniffling, but she dutifully follows. Remus goes at James' pace, taking every measured step with the same defiance and resilience that he takes every day one at a time. Sirius and Regulus are not here, no one got to properly say goodbye, but to crumble under the weight of that does not help any of them.

"Tea is fine," Remus says softly, and so, that's what they have.

Time passes slowly.

This is ironic, Regulus thinks, because it didn't last time. Just last year, in the lead up into the arena, everything felt like a blur after the initial wait. The moment they left the suite, it all sped up; and he was there, hugging his brother, not wanting to let go; and he was there, shuffled through the process with no knowledge of what was coming; and he was there, watching Gideon be murdered before his very eyes, the first murder he would witness in person, the very same day that he would cap off the night with the first murder of his own; and then he was there, rising on a platform to the arena, squinting against the sun, listening to the countdown to the very first cannon that would signal the change of everything.

This time, he is left with a tracker in his arm and a quiet, cold room. Not clean from a morning bath to prepare for the filth that surely awaits him. Hungry from the lack of breakfast he should have been granted as a gesture of a last meal. Just the steady presence of discomfort, waiting, time dragging.

There's nothing to glean from the outfit he had to change into. Well, no, there is. Having no coat at least tells him that it likely won't be cold, but that does very little to reassure him. He's just in a black shirt and black trousers specifically designed for activity, easy to move in, lightweight and durable. His arms are left bare, revealing his scars, which—well, on one hand, it makes him uncomfortable, because he's always in long-sleeves, but on the other hand, he is intrigued by the idea that seeing his scars will further infuriate the Hallows since the reminder of how he got them and how unfair it is that he may be getting more can't be ignored with them on display.

Regulus realizes it as he sits there, never moving or doing anything at all, just breathing; he isn't scared this time.

Not even a bit.

He stares at the closed tube around the platform and waits in the uncomfortable seat, hands threaded together, ready. Oh, he's so ready. Possibly more ready for this than he has been anything else in his entire life.

There can't be any hesitation, any faltering, any caring. There can't be anything other than going in and doing what he needs to. There can't be one moment where he looks at Sirius and Regulus closes his eyes, exhaling slowly, trying to shake himself free from the swell of emotion he hasn't let break out since the reaping, since Sirius volunteered again. He shuts it down and thinks, instead, of the gentle way James traced his skin last night. How James brushed Regulus' hair back and scanned his face leisurely, carefully, taking him in like he had all the time in the world and would spend it doing just that.

After all the fighting, all the pain and grief and fear, they touched one another with such reverence and love, smiling into kisses and whispering sweet words into each other's skin, letting time slip away from them like burning, midnight embers of a cigarette. Ash, ash, ash. They blazed, and then they cooled, and then they settled there, together, waiting for the wind to come in and blow them away.

It has.

Sirius, if you'd believe it, is very fucking bored.

Over time, the anger from being dragged out far too soon at gunpoint and the frustration with not getting to properly say goodbye to Remus had faded. It turned sad, and anxious, and just helplessly defeated. He had planned to kiss Remus' mask one last time, and kiss Remus, too. All he wanted to do was kiss Remus at least one more time. That's all he ever wants to do, really.

He has gone around in circles about what's coming and what he's going to have to do, again, quite literally spending hours just pacing restlessly around the room.

He has lost moments, thinking so hard and so much that he works himself up, and then he blinks and finds himself parked in the chair, no recollection of when he sat down. It worries him, frankly. This is something that doesn't happen very often anymore, unless in very stressful situations that his mind simply can't handle, and the arena is sure to pose many of those, but he can't afford to slip away. He has to be present; he has to remain here, for Regulus, he has to.

Fortunately, Sirius has never once lost himself in a fight. When James lashed out at him, or when Regulus did back in the early stages right after his games, Sirius remained planted firmly in himself, perhaps even more tethered there by the rush of adrenaline and surge of survival instincts that pushed away any possibility of escape. He stays here when there's nowhere else to go, and in the arena, it's just the arena. It's nothing but adrenaline and survival instincts. He'll do what he has to. He will. No different than he did at the reaping, reflexively.

The boredom is what gets to Sirius, in the end. He's left in a room alone with literally nothing but himself, an unopened tube enclosing a platform, and a cold, steel chair. At one point, he's just sitting there, twiddling his thumbs and bouncing one leg restlessly, full of all this built up anticipation that leaves him feeling fundamentally trapped with nothing or no one to focus his energy on. He spends at least an hour doing some cuticle maintenance and repeatedly re-doing his hair over and over to the point that his hair bobble is probably sick of him.

That's why he can't be blamed when, finally, his name is called and the tube opens up, and the first thing he does is shoot to his feet with a deep exhale of relief. Maybe that seems horrid, but honestly? The suspense was fucking killing him; it wasn't good kind of suspense that Sirius associates with Remus' light caresses, but rather this heavy dread settling in his bones. He just wants to get it over with. He just wants it to be done.

He wants it to never have happened at all.

It's not until Sirius steps up onto the platform that the reality of it starts to properly sink in. He thinks of what it feels like to have Remus' fingers in his hair, Remus' mouth brushing along the curve of his throat, Remus' arms wrapped around him; he thinks of their everything, the spiral staircase and the porch swing underneath the moon and stars.

For a second, Sirius closes his eyes, and he lets himself concoct a wistful little fantasy of having all of that instead of this, and then he's slapped with the full force of his reality by the distant, muffled crack of a gunshot from somewhere within the building, followed very quickly by another.

Sirius' eyes fly open.

There's a hiss and pop of the tube closing again, and then the platform starts to rise. He tilts his head back to watch the circular opening give way as he goes higher, blinking slowly when he can't see sunshine on the other side of it. The only indicator, at first, that he is moving into an entirely different environment is the swift change in the air, going from cold and almost metallic down below, to warm and a bit stale from up above. As he's lifted up, he can feel how muggy and humid it is, and it's still quite dark, even when the platform stops.

Heart racing, Sirius swivels his head automatically to look for Regulus, only to see enclosed walls of overgrown, thick hedges on either side of him. He cranes his head back, eyes narrowing into slits. The top is obscenely high, to the point that he can't quite make it out from here, though he has a general idea.

It's a snarling mass of green and brown; a thick tangle of roots and leaves; branches and foliage so compact and impenetrable that he can't even see through it. This means that Sirius can't see who is on the other side of him, if anyone is at all. This means that Sirius has no fucking clue what Regulus' starting position is, or anyone else's for that matter. Great. Just great.

The sky is visible, but it seems like something from another world, something entirely out of reach. It's a big, blue blanket with a bright tinge of sunshine to it, large numbers displayed counting down along with a voice echoing out in time with it.

26, 25, 24…

The sunshine doesn't reach them down here, cast in the large shadows of the hedge walls, left to a murky dark that feels fitting somehow, like the ugly underground where rot festers and creatures dwell. Here they are, nothing more than the monsters they were made into, and finally, after all this time, there's a place that reflects it. There's some sort of cruel irony that he would find it in the arena. Of course. Where else? Where else other than the place they were created?

17, 16, 15…

In front of him, Sirius can see a long, dim passageway straight ahead. If he squints, he can make out the opening at the end, like the hall of greenery will lead him somewhere. He'd bet a lot on the fact that it's the weapons and supplies, depending on the layout. If this is what he thinks it is…

9, 8, 7…

A labyrinth. A maze. Sirius would fucking laugh if he had enough air in his lungs to do so. Oh, Minerva McGonagall. That woman. Quite the comedian, he thinks. Very on point, honestly, throwing them in a maze like a bunch of lab rats all just trying to find their way out; she is fucking hilarious. Even if she doesn't know it, even if she's doing it subconsciously, there is no way to deny the fact that this is exactly what the tributes are every year—the Hallows' stupid fucking lab rats, being played with for their morbid amusement, strung along and driven to desperate lengths by the promise of cheese.

3, 2, 1…

As soon as the cannon sounds, Sirius drops off the platform and sidles up to the hedge to his left, closing his eyes and straining his ears to listen. He can hear it, faintly, the sound of feet pounding against the ground.

Shit.

Without a second of hesitation, Sirius swivels on his heel and tears off down the passage in front of him, because if he knows one thing for sure, it's that there's going to be a fucking fight waiting on the other side of that opening at the end—one Regulus will also be caught up in.

Right at the end of the passage, there's a bag sitting on the edge that Sirius plucks up as he's running, not even stopping to think about it as he does it, not wondering why it's there, or what it means. He breaks through to the wide open space where people are pouring out of their own passages all around, and then he immediately collides into someone so hard that he and whoever it is goes sailing to the ground.

Sirius rolls with the motion, easily and agile, dropping the bag and bracing himself as his head snaps up to see who he hit. He blinks to find Narcissa mirroring his position exactly, though she doesn't have a bag. For a long, tense moment, neither of them move or do anything at all, and then, slowly and very carefully, they ease to their feet, gazes locked.

"Cissa," Sirius says, his tone clipped.

"Sirius," Narcissa murmurs, flicking her gaze over him, assessing. After a beat, she drops her hand to her stomach and arches an eyebrow at him. "Come now, surely you wouldn't harm me and little Draco, would you?"

"I'm going to give you one chance to run," Sirius tells her, holding still, "and take little Draco with you."

Narcissa breaks into a grin, huffs a laugh, then doesn't hesitate to whip around and fucking run. Sirius watches her go for about five seconds, then shakes his head and snatches up his bag to turn and survey his surroundings.

"Andy, that was for you, by the way," Sirius mutters under his breath, gaze darting around as he takes in the chaos currently spreading throughout the area.

It's like an open portion of a maze, a big square with weapons scattered around all over. There are a lot less bags, maybe five that he can see in all, which tells him that this is mainly a cache spot for weaponry. Sirius can see at least two or three different spears sticking out of the ground that are all very tempting, but not as tempting as it is to find his brother. All around, there are countless openings to run into, to delve further into the labyrinth. When Sirius peeks, the one he just ran out of is already closing up into a wall of dark green.

Everywhere Sirius looks, people are sprinting, some that he recognizes as they dart around, and some he can't even properly make out in the dim lighting. Everyone is trying to snatch up weapons before anyone else can get one and attack, making the most of the seconds it takes to prepare.

The sound of one cannon, followed quickly by a second, seems to draw everyone to a halt. Everything sort of just—stops. Two deaths already, that soon, and they all seem a little stunned by it, an eerie silence draping over everyone and everything, and Sirius gets it. There has been this underlying sense of camaraderie between everyone, none of them as of yet turning on each other, and it hasn't even been two minutes, so to think that already there's murder is just…disheartening, honestly.

But, when the source of death is located, Sirius is halted by a heavy sense of solemnity. It's Mavis and Velvet; they'd done exactly as they promised they would. They found weapons, found each other, and they died together. Their bodies are splayed out on the ground right beside one another, curled close in death like the lovers they were in life.

For a long moment, maybe half of a minute, no one moves. No one speaks. No one does anything but stare. No death eaters take the opportunity to attack anyone, and there's just this quiet, momentary mourning and respect for two people who loved each other and decided, together, that they would not participate in a game as cruel and sadistic as this one. They went out together, in complete control of their own fate, and they never deserved anything other than a long life full of love.

And then, unprompted, Regulus' voice rings out, nearly snarling. He's addressing the sky, the audience, the Hallows in a low hiss of derision when he declares, "When you take them, you take them together, and know that it's your fault."

The moment Sirius locates Regulus across the open field, he's running full-tilt right for him, and this pushes everyone back into motion. Sirius knocks into someone, clipping them as he goes by—Emmeline, he thinks—but he's not stopped, so he keeps going. The first initial deaths have passed, and the floodgates have opened. Some people are taking escape routes into the maze, uninterested in starting the fight so soon, but that's not the case for all of them.

For one thing, Sirius sees Coen scrambling away from Camilla as she runs after him with a fucking club in hand, both of them darting into the maze and shouting angrily at each other. For another thing, Regulus is in the middle of diving for the dagger closest to him when Henri tackles him to the ground, going for the same exact thing.

Sirius had yanked up his bag as he sprinted, which he now uses to swing directly at Henri's head so hard that he sails to the side, torn away from where he was just strangling Regulus.

It takes less than ten seconds. Sirius drops his bag, drags Henri back, and proceeds to ruthlessly press his boot to Henri's neck, grabbing his arm roughly to yank at it and stomp on his throat at the same time. There's a sickening crunch and Henri's choked noise sputters out into silence as his head hangs awkwardly on his broken, crushed neck.

The cannon sounds.

"Hey, hey, are you okay?" Sirius blurts out, dropping Henri's arm carelessly as he moves to Regulus' side. He reaches down to help Regulus sit up as he coughs and lightly touches his throat. "Reggie? Look at me. Let me see if—"

Regulus swats his hand away with a huff and scowls as he scoots further back and pushes to his feet. Sirius follows him, stepping around Henri's body to grab his bag, still watching Regulus, scanning him for further injury. He looks fine, just sort of pissed off, which—fair.

"I just saved your life. Again," Sirius says pointedly, arching an eyebrow at him, because surely now Regulus can see that the silent treatment and cold shoulder is just immature and does neither of them any favors in the fucking arena of all places. "You're welcome for that, by the way."

Regulus stares at him for a beat, jaw clenched, then he says, in a flat voice, "Thanks," and immediately punches Sirius in the face right after.

Sirius reels from the force of it, not at all seeing it coming, and he goes stumbling back with a sharp curse of pure disbelief, his face already aching from the hit. He barely has the chance to get his bearings before he sees Regulus shake out his fist and surge forward to slam his shoulder into Sirius' chest while yanking the bag right out of his hands. Sirius wheezes, the air knocked out of him as he hits the ground, meeting Regulus' eyes with his mouth hanging open in shock.

Without a word, Regulus starts backing up, swinging the bag that the little shit just stole up onto his shoulders and pausing long enough to snatch up the dagger he was fighting for in the first place as he goes. And then, easy as that, he turns and takes off sprinting without looking back, ducking into the maze and just—leaving Sirius behind.

Sirius stares after him, genuinely so caught off-guard that he can't even form any thoughts for what the fuck just happened, or why. He doesn't—he can't understand. Why—

"Get the hell up, you idiot!"

At the sharp, familiar hiss in his ear, Sirius blinks harshly and scrambles to his feet, still disoriented and confused, but very sure now is not the time to focus on that. He swings around and comes face-to-face with Marlene, first seeing her swollen eyes and tear-stained cheeks, as well as the fierce gleam in them despite that, and then her new haircut.

Sirius glances down to find Marlene already holding a sword, then glances around to see that the chaos has died down. Most of everyone has already left, leaving only four others; those that are already allies. Augusta, like Marlene, has a sword in hand. Emmeline has a crossbow and quiver of bolts already settled against her back. Alice has apparently managed to grab a bag of supplies, and they have a machete gripped in one hand as they dig through it with Augusta peering over their shoulder, which seems to annoy them, but they don't say anything or look back at her for doing it.

Sirius is the only one empty-handed. Lovely.

"Well, this is shit," Emmeline announces, turning in a slow circle as she examines the area. It's cleared out, nothing left behind; no supplies or weapons otherwise.

It's not a place for provisions or anything. It's not even a place for claiming, frankly, because it's surrounded at all sides with openings into the maze. Now, it's just a field that offers no defense, shelter, or protection. No wonder everyone left.

Usually, there's a place right at the beginning that has an abundance of weapons and supplies, as well as shelter, for people to claim, generally the death eaters. This just had weapons, and not enough to go around for everybody, and it was very scarce on supplies. Sirius realizes how incredibly lucky he was to come across the bag he did before his sneaky prick of a brother fucking decked him and took it.

"Well," Augusta says dryly, "it certainly could have gone worse. Only three dead, and two weren't even really killed."

As one, they all swivel their heads to stare at Sirius, who is responsible for the first genuine kill in the arena. He huffs and throws his hands up, because honestly, what was he expected to do in that situation? Henri was strangling Regulus. Of course Sirius snapped his fucking neck.

"We can't stay here," Alice says firmly as they zip up their bag and stand to their feet, eyes darting around, visibly tense.

"The death eaters already fled," Emmeline notes. "What do you think their plan is?"

"I don't know, why don't we ask Regulus?" Marlene snaps.

Sirius' head immediately whips around towards her. "What's that supposed to mean? Regulus isn't a fucking death eater."

"No? Because he sure seemed to feel safe enough running in the same direction they all did," Marlene tells him, her voice sharp and her eyes cold. "You've got a bruise already blooming that says he's not your ally—or ours, by extension."

"Look, he's just—throwing a tantrum, basically," Sirius grumbles, grimacing as he reaches up to prod at his jaw, shooting Marlene a glare when she scoffs. "His issue is with me, not anyone else, so he's not a threat. He'll get over it."

"Hate to break it to you, boy," Augusta tells him, "but he's not a secure ally, from what I can tell. I get he's your brother—"

"Yeah, exactly, he's my brother," Sirius cuts in harshly. "He may be angry at—no, okay, he is angry at me, but that's between us. He's not a death eater. He's just not."

"And if he is?" Marlene challenges. "What then, Sirius? Because if you expect me to hold back if he's trying to attack me just because he's your little brother—"

"Watch it, McKinnon," Sirius says shortly.

"Why?" Marlene snarls. "Huh? Why should I? Because he's your family? Well, you know what? Families die. They die. That's what they do. They—they—that's what they—"

"Marlene," Sirius murmurs gently, because he can suddenly see that she is shaking, and her breath is hitching in her chest, and tears are building up in her eyes.

Marlene chokes out, "My parents, Sirius. They killed them. They killed my—"

"Fucking hell," Sirius whispers, moving forward to catch her the moment she drops her sword and breaks down crying, ducking her face against his chest and rattling in his arms. He cups the back of her head, instinctively wanting to block her from sight, and he raises his gaze to find the other three watching with sickened, pained expressions.

Marlene starts explaining through her tears, the words muffled and stuttered, but audible all the same. The two gunshots he heard—they all heard—right before being lifted into the arena. That was Marlene's parents being murdered right in front of her eyes where she could do nothing to save them, where she could do nothing at all but watch.

It's horrible. It's fucked up. Haven't they all been through enough? Isn't the arena punishment enough? Yes, Marlene called for riots and rebellion, and she did so more bluntly than anyone else, but that's just too much. That's—well, that's exactly what a man like Riddle would do.

Someday, Riddle is going to fuck with the wrong person, and they're going to slaughter him, and on that day, the whole world is going to shine just a little brighter.

"Okay, Marlene, look at me," Sirius orders firmly, pushing her back by her shoulders, then cupping her face and gently wiping her tears away. "I am very sorry. They didn't deserve that, and neither did you. But, right now, you have to keep it together. They want you to fall apart, alright? That's exactly what they want. Don't give them the satisfaction."

Marlene swallows, blinking hard and fast, and she's so strong for how she handles it, how she adjusts to the weight of it and shifts her shoulders, and stands taller, and firms her jaw. It hits Sirius then, the reminder why the vessels of the sea are often called she, because no one bears the brunt of a storm like a woman. The worst part is, Marlene shouldn't have to. No one should, and yet she does. She breathes in and out, takes a step back, and picks up her sword. There she is, ready to survive.

"Sorry, I really am, but we can't stay here," Alice repeats.

"We need more supplies. A water source. Preferably some shelter. And we can't just stay here where anyone can easily find us," Emmeline lists off, docking a bolt in her crossbow as she frowns around at all the different routes they can take. The death eaters—and Regulus—all went towards the right.

"Well, I don't know about any of you, but I'm going that way," Sirius states, pointing to the right. "I have to find—"

"Oh, come off it, Sirius," Marlene snaps. "You know as soon as all the death eaters group up, they're coming right for you. Going that way is dangerous."

"Regulus went that way."

"Again, how do you know he's not with them?"

"He wouldn't. No matter how angry is, he'd never do that to me. He'd never—" Sirius halts, the mere concept making his chest ache. He shakes his head at Marlene. "He'd never hurt me, Marlene. Certainly never try to kill me."

"He already punched you," Augusta points out.

"Yes, well, brothers do that sometimes. I'll get him back for it when I see that little shit again," Sirius grumbles.

"But in the arena?" Marlene challenges, clearly refusing to let it go. "That just seems like a statement you can't really miss. I mean, did he ever say he was actually our ally, or is that just something you automatically assumed?"

Sirius clenches his jaw.

No, Regulus never said that, but…it's Regulus. He wouldn't. He just—he wouldn't. Not for anything.

"Well, that changes things," Augusta says firmly. "If the boy has no intentions of being an ally, then he won't be treated as such, and you may not like it—"

"Look, do any of you have siblings?" Sirius cuts in, his voice sharp. He glances around at all of them. "Well, do you? No? Exactly, so you don't know what it's like to know someone inside and out the way I know my brother. Whatever you think he's doing, I guarantee that you're dead wrong. I know him. He may be fooling all of you, but he can't fool me."

"I think, because he's your brother, you're the easiest to fool," Marlene argues, eyes narrowing.

"Okay, you are very cynical on anything family-related due to grief, and you're valid for that," Sirius mutters, "so I'm going to let that slide and not count you as a reliable source. Just… Look, I'm your ally, right? You have to trust me on this."

"And if you're wrong?" Augusta asks bluntly.

"I'm not," Sirius declares, steady, unwavering.

Marlene's lips press into a thin line. "Alright, fine, we'll take your word for it. But, if—and I mean this—if he attacks any of us, I will kill him, Sirius."

Sirius gives her a sad smile. "You can try."

"You think I won't kill you?" Marlene asks.

"I'll be offended if, at some point, you're not at least a little tempted," Sirius tells her with a lopsided grin, and she snorts weakly and looks away. "Right, so back to my original point. I'm going after Regulus. Who's joining?"

"Going in that direction is just asking for trouble," Emmeline says, arching an eyebrow at him.

"Well, you know, all for one and one for all?" Sirius tries weakly. No one looks amused. He sighs. "Okay, then leave me to it. I'm not going to ask all of you to take that risk. I'll take it on my own, and you can all go whatever way you like. No one said allies have to remain together."

"It'd certainly be more prudent if we did, though," Augusta informs him, huffing and shaking her head.

"So, come with me. That's your only option. We all stay in a group, all of us, or you all leave me to go on my own," Sirius announces simply, "because there's nothing or no one that's going to stop me from finding my brother. Up to you, really."

Alice clicks their tongue. "Oh, for fuck's sake. Does it even matter, truly? I'd bet my life on the fact that all these passages connect in some way or another, so I doubt we won't all be running into each other along the way anyway. You know the gamemakers will find some way to get us exactly where they want us. I vote we stay together. Safety in numbers and all that. It'd be worse if we came across all the death eaters without all hands available, yeah?"

"They do have a point," Emmeline agrees.

"Yes, unfortunately they do," Augusta concedes grudgingly.

Marlene grunts and side-eyes Sirius. "Stubborn bastard."

Sirius just hums, pleased, and flashes them all a grin. Again, none of them look impressed in the least. In fact, they're all eyeing him like they're considering just killing him now so they won't have to deal with the headache he is sure to be. He's so ridiculously fond of each of them, truly.

The sound of rustling and heavy footfalls wipes the grin off his face, and they're all on edge immediately, swiveling to face the sound of what's clearly an unsteady approach. Marlene and Augusta have their swords up in seconds, Emmeline raises her crossbow, and Alice grips their machete tight. Sirius doesn't have a weapon, but he also doesn't need one to fight, so he just waits, eyes narrowed, body tense and at the ready.

The moment a form comes stumbling out of an opening into the clearing, Emmeline shoots, and the only reason she misses is because the form trips and lands flat on their face.

"Shit," Marlene breathes out.

Groaning, Eli pushes himself up and haphazardly makes it back to his feet, bracing himself against the spear he'd dropped when he fell. He hiccups, blinks blearily at them, then raises the spear up like a trophy, coming dangerously close to stabbing himself in the face with it.

"Look what I found," Eli slurs, swaying on the spot.

"Shit," Marlene repeats, this time with a heavy sigh.

"Sirius, go take that from him before he falls on it and dies," Augusta orders, shaking her head. "It'll do you better than him as it is. Goodness, is he still drunk?"

"He's going to have a bitch of a time drying out over the next couple of days," Marlene mutters with a grimace.

"If he even lives that long," Emmeline says bluntly.

Sirius eases forward with a frown, watching Eli poke the pointy end of the spear, face slack. "Hey, Eli, you wouldn't mind too terribly much if I took that, would you?"

"Nah." Eli smacks his lips and swings out the spear so wide that Sirius has to jump back, hissing in distress as his eyes bulge. Eli squints at him. "Just gets in the way, seems like. Well? Are you gonna take it or not?"

"Right." Sirius coughs and swiftly plucks the spear away from Eli, swiveling it artfully in his palm so the handle swings around his hand and balances back over. He rolls the handle along his fingers, adjusting to the weight of it, then turns his gaze back to Eli. "Have you been on your platform this entire time, Eli? Just…doing what, exactly?"

"Mm, there was a boom; haven't heard one of those in a while," Eli mumbles, scratching his head. "Startled me a bit, so I fell on the ground, maybe took a quick little nap. When I got up, I found that." He gestures to the spear, then drops his hand and smiles at Sirius. "Say, you wouldn't have a drink on you, would you? I could really use one. Haven't had one all day."

"You took a nap." Sirius turns and looks at the others, and now they look amused. "He took a nap."

"Eli Zatish, you never fail to amaze me," Marlene says with a fond chuckle. "Come on, old man, we need to get a move on, and you have a really bad night ahead of you."

Eli gives a sad little frown. "Oh. Don't like that."

"Join the club," Sirius replies wryly, clapping him on the shoulder and keeping him steady as they all turn as a group and head towards the maze. Marlene moves over to help Eli along as well, and Sirius glances at her. "Hey, McKinnon?"

"Yeah, Black?" Marlene replies, turning tired eyes to him.

"I like your hair, by the way." Sirius watches her eyes get just a little lighter, pleased, and he smiles. "It suits you."

Marlene looks away, but not before he sees her lips curling up at the corners. She doesn't reply, but Sirius doesn't need her to. Together as a group, they continue on.

Finding food, supplies, water, and shelter—those are all vital to their survival and well-being, but frankly, Sirius is worried about one thing and one thing only.

Finding Regulus.

Regulus is lost.

He really, really doesn't like this. The maze, that is. Well, he doesn't like any part of this, obviously, but the maze is fucking with his head, and it's only been twenty minutes. He goes down one passage and takes a corner to go in the opposite direction, only to feel like he's going in the same one, and when he tries to backtrack, he finds that there's nothing to backtrack to. Everywhere he turns, it's all the same, one tall hedge after the other, nothing different about any of them.

There's no sense of direction, not here, and it's disorienting. Left is right, and forward is back, and straight is a turn that loops back around. He's dizzy from it, his heart racing as he constantly swings his head to check in front of him and behind him interchangeably, on rotation, not at all appreciating how there's really nowhere to fucking hide.

It's not quiet. There's a muffled rustling from the hedges at all times, like something is about to reach out and grab him. He can't tell if someone is coming up behind him, or if someone will take a corner in front of him, or if there's an opening ahead that someone might run out of. It puts him on relentless tenterhooks, paranoid, too tense to really think clearly.

For a second, just one second, Regulus regrets not taking the chance to stay with Sirius.

It's just this stupid instinct he's been wrestling with for days, the one where, when he's scared, something in Regulus simply wants his brother. He can't help it, can't stop it, no matter how much he's been fighting it, and continues to fight it.

But, in this moment, if Sirius appeared in front of him, Regulus knows he'd be unable to stop himself from going right to him, because he'd feel safer, as ridiculous as that is.

Regulus comes to a screeching halt, breathing in, then slowly breathing out. Because no, no, there can be none of that. Just because Sirius is here does not mean that Regulus needs coddling. It's the fucking hunger games; of course this is terrifying. He's just going to have to get over it, deal with it on his own, and stop relying on his brother to fight his battles for him. All his life, that's all Sirius has done, really, and this time they're on the same battlefield; just on opposite sides.

Slowly, Regulus crouches down low and eases the bag off his back to quickly open it and see what, exactly, he managed to steal from Sirius. His gaze darts back and forth, checking his surroundings, and it's still Sirius' voice in his head reminding him to be cautious, to not linger too long, to keep going until he locates a water source at the very least.

Inside the bag, Regulus finds his first possible stroke of luck he's ever had in his life, and it's terribly ironic that it's not even his luck, but actually Sirius' that he just so happened to steal. There's a flashlight, a lighter, and an odd container that Regulus is quite sure he saw in the training room, used to collect rainwater. The sight of it puts a knot in Regulus' stomach as he tilts his head back to stare at the sky.

Oh.

Not good.

Very not good.

Regulus doesn't really do rain. When it's raining, he simply doesn't leave his house. He doesn't go outside. The one and only time it rained when he just so happened to be out at the tree back in district six, he literally broke into the mortuary and waited the five hours it took for it to stop.

If it rains here, Regulus is fucked. There's nowhere for him to go. It's just open sky above him, nothing to hide in or under; even the hedges are too dense for him to crawl into, but he would literally bear the brunt of sharp leaves and vines and whatever else the hedge is made of if it meant he could get out of the rain. But he can't. He'll be stuck.

Swallowing thickly, Regulus glances back down and continues to sift through the bag. It's not raining now, and that will just have to do. He's got this. He'll—he'll be fine. Probably.

For a moment, selfishly, Regulus wishes James were here.

The irony of that desire is not lost on him. He doesn't really want James to be in danger, just…here. Just right next to him, to touch, to talk to, to lean on. James would lift his shirt and let Regulus crawl under it to block the rain. James would crack open his chest and shelter Regulus inside, if he had to. That kind of devotion, that kind of love, it lives in their blood, in the marrow of their bones. Regulus can feel it resonating all the way from here, knowing James is watching him, knowing James…is probably quite mad at him. Again.

Well, at least this time, Regulus doesn't know about it. Doesn't have to see it. Doesn't have to live with it. He likely will never forgive Regulus for this, but maybe someday, he'll understand that it's as much for him as it is for Regulus. It's for them both.

There's a full water bottle at the bottom of the bag, along with two granola bars and a package of dried meat and berries. In a separate compartment, there's a small first aid kit, complete with bandages, antiseptic, burn cream, and a needle already threaded with a small spool of thread. Frankly, it's startlingly helpful, to the point that Regulus' eyebrows are raised so high in disbelief that they're practically stitched into his hairline.

He's going to start stealing Sirius' luck more often. Fucking hell, how Sirius managed to find a bag carrying at least a day's worth of food and water to survive on—which goes a really long way in the arena—as well as incredibly useful supplies, even of the medical variety, is beyond him.

There's a stir in the air behind him, a shift, a presence that sends a chill up Regulus' spine and has him moving on pure instinct. He swivels on the balls of his feet and springs up quickly, blade twirling in his hand and settling directly against Thornfinn's throat, who instantly freezes where he has a hatchet not unlike the one James used to use raised high as if he was preparing to strike.

"Rowle," Regulus murmurs.

"Black," Thorfinn replies, holding still.

Regulus flicks his gaze towards the hatchet, then arches an eyebrow at Thorfinn. "What do you think you're doing?"

"I saw your bag," Thorfinn mutters. "Plan to share?"

"No."

"Well, that's not very ally of you."

"Neither is planning to take someone's head off with a hatchet. Fucking hell, aren't you supposed to be smart?"

Thorfinn glares at him. "Look, you can't blame me for trying. No one even knows where you stand, no matter what your crazy fucking cousins think. So, I mean, if you're actually an ally, now is the chance to prove it."

"What's mine is mine," Regulus informs him sharply, though he draws his dagger back as he says it. "Try and take it from me, and I'll shove this dagger through your face. That includes this bag and trying to kill my brother."

"See, you say shit like that and then wonder why no one trusts you," Thorfinn snaps. "Who cares who actually kills Sirius if he's dead anyway, yeah?"

"You don't listen very well, do you?"

"Maybe you need to start listening, Black. I'm telling you now, the second I see your brother, I'm getting that kill, no matter how much you want it to be you. I'm taking his fucking head off, and there's nothing you can do about it."

"I quite literally just told you what I would do about it. If you don't believe me, that's your mistake."

"Yeah? Well, if you want to stop me, you may as well kill me now, because—"

"Okay," Regulus says, then snaps his hand out and shoves the dagger up through the soft underside of Thornfinn's chin, behind the jawbone, driving it up with enough force that he can see the tip split through Thornfinn's tongue and glisten with blood from where his mouth is open.

Thornfinn's eyes bulge, and he makes a grotesque choking noise. Regulus holds his gaze for a beat, holds him there, then rips the dagger right back out. Thornfinn's hatchet hits the ground as his hands fly up to his neck, mouth opening and closing, blood pouring from his lips and between his fingers. He takes a stumbling step back, then another, then goes down. Regulus watches him bleed out, and he doesn't flinch when, minutes later, the cannon sounds.

Regulus really thinks he's alright, for just a moment, utterly unshakeable after that. He had no feelings for Thorfinn at all, and he warned him what would happen. It's the hunger games. Death happens. Murder happens. It's not even Regulus' first.

Yet, the moment he sees blood on his hand, he turns and immediately vomits on the ground so violently that he stumbles to his knees and has to catch himself with his free hand that, thankfully, is very clean. His other hand drops the blood-stained dagger, and he scrambles back from it, gagging harshly and doing his best to catch his breath.

"Oh, fuck, fuck, fuck," Regulus chokes out, squeezing his eyes shut as he frantically drags his slick hand along the ground, trying desperately to get the blood off. The smell of it lingers in his nose, rusty and metallic. He can—he can taste it. He remembers the taste, and he's swallowing, he's choking it down, trying to breathe, drowning again.

The phantom feeling of hands sends him into a tailspin, and he kicks out harshly, scrambling back further as he swipes his trembling hand on his shirt and tucks his head down between his bent knees. He breathes. He tries to breathe.

Regulus isn't sure how long he remains hunched in on himself, only resurfacing when he's jostled out of his breakdown by the sound of yet another cannon, meaning someone else just died. Fuck. He snaps his head up at the sudden gust of wind that sails over and the pronounced sway of the hedges on either side of him as a heli-carrier hovers, coming to get Thorfinn.

Shit.

Shit, shit, shit.

There's no time to have a fucking meltdown, not when he knows that death will draw people in, and the last thing he needs is to be placed at the scene of the crime by the very group of people he's trying to prove his trustworthiness to. He feels like Bellatrix would understand, if he explained that Thorfinn…provoked him, and Narcissa might let it slide, but everyone else would just—oh, they'd decide he's more trouble than he's worth in a heartbeat.

Regulus can't let that happen. It's vital that he remains allies with the death eaters. So, he flings himself to his feet and takes off running, scooping up his dagger and bag as he goes, not even looking at them. He just needs to put as much distance between himself and—and that as possible.

So, Regulus runs, and he keeps running, and he doesn't stop running. His lungs are protesting, and his mouth tastes sour, and he can't—he still feels the blood on his blade, and maybe if he runs forever, he'll never have to stop and face—

The next corner he takes, Regulus runs directly into Bellatrix, quite literally stumbling right into her. She catches him as he trips, her hands darting out to grasp his shoulders, steadying him. He stops, watching her gaze flick over him slowly, and then he turns his gaze to find the rest of the death eaters all standing together. Every. Single. One.

Regulus stands before them, bloody dagger in hand, face flushed and hair windswept, gasping for air.

Again—shit, shit, shit.

"Well, it looks like someone was having fun without the rest of us," Bellatrix says, reaching down to pluck his dagger from his hand. He lets her, feeling weak and faint and close to being sick again. She swivels it, examining the blood curiously, then tilts her head at him. "Who'd you just kill, munchkin?"

Okay, pause.

There are moments in one's life where they can pinpoint the weight of their next words. For Regulus, this is one such moment. If he says Thorfinn, there's a very good chance that at least half of this group—Yaxley, Alecto, Dixon, and possibly even Rabastan—will immediately turn on him. Bellatrix likely will not; he feels like she'd at least hear him out, on account of him being her favorite cousin. But if she doesn't deem his reason good enough, that's it, and she's so fucking mental that Regulus doesn't even bother trying to figure out what her measurement for good enough would be.

One problem, though. They're going to find out Thorfinn is dead in a matter of hours, when the banners play in the sky. He can't say Henri on the chance that someone saw Sirius kill Henri, and if no one dies before the banners, or Regulus says a name that doesn't match up, then he's fucked. There was one other person killed around the same time as Thorfinn, and if he can guess who, then he'll be in the clear.

So, in the shift of one second, Regulus asks himself who is one of the smartest people he knows, and while there's a very long list of brilliant people he's acquainted with, for some reason it's Remus that pops into his head. Thinking of Remus leads him into a rabbit-hole of thoughts that tumble through his head until, before he knows it, he's speaking.

"Coen," Regulus blurts out, the name escaping him blunt and abrupt, but he doesn't waver when they all stare at him. It's the best guess he's got, because Camilla is ruthless enough to murder people—as proven in her previous games—and she is out for Coen's blood. He thinks he saw her chase after Coen. Maybe she actually caught up. "I killed Coen. From twelve."

"What happened?" Narcissa asks.

Regulus clears his throat. "We just—knocked into each other. Got into a fight. I won."

"Hm." Bellatrix swivels the dagger, then lazily wipes it clean on her shirt and holds it out to him, hilt first. She already has a dagger tucked in the waistband of her pants. "Well, good for you. That's five already."

Regulus reaches out and takes his dagger, admittedly grateful that she wiped the blood off for him. He flicks his gaze over the rest of the group. They all have weapons; Narcissa set with a bow and quiver of arrows, Dixon and Alecto leaning on their swords, Yaxley gripping a short-handled spear, Rabastan lazily holding a chain mace, while Bellatrix and Regulus have their daggers, one each. Rabastan and Narcissa have supply bags on their backs, like Regulus does.

When Regulus' gaze crawls back to Bellatrix, she's grinning at him, and she reaches out to grip his shoulder, eyes gleaming as she says, "Now, let's go make it six."

She doesn't even have to say who. He knows.

Sirius. Of course she means Sirius.

Regulus gives his dagger a lazy twirl and steps forward in silence. When they turn to go, ready and willing to hunt Sirius down, he joins them.

Chapter End Notes

here we go again...

no one getting to say goodbye. regulus thinking of james, and sirius thinking of remus before they go back into the arena 😭 the arena! the chapter title gave it away, but like. im stupidly excited about what little bit of this arena we do get to see, because like, it may seem tame now, but it is actually very fucked up and also insanely impactful to how these games go and are viewed!

just as an aside, for those of you thinking it was going to be the arena in catching fire— regulus literally would not have left his platform. they would have had to either blow him up, or get him off of it, and as soon as he hit the water, he would have sunk like a stone. he literally would have just. given up. i couldn't make this poor man swim. we all know that never goes well for him 😭 anyway, sirius!!!! him bumping into narcissa and letting her go for andromeda ☹☹☹ then mavis and velvet!!! henri. rip? i mean, he didnt really stand a chance the moment sirius came within range. sirius killing someone within five minutes of the arena... OH IM SICK 😭 and he did it to save regulus, who IMMEDIATELY PUNCHED HIM IN THE FACE AND STOLE HIS SUPPLIES LMAOOOO.

look, look, okay you can be like REGGIE WHAT THE FUCK but you've gotta admit lowkey that shit is hilarious 💀 he really is a menace, and he was just like: ill be taking that thank you! then dipped.

sirius not believing regulus is a death eater... 😭 NO BECAUSE HE SOUNDS LIKE SOME OF YALL LMAOOO but like, sirius is soooo sure of this—then cut to regulus skipping off in his peter pettigrew (rip) era to go join the death eaters also marlene ☹☹☹ my loveeee. she really does NOT have it easy, so be warned for that, but she's out here surviving anyway, and looking hot doing it! she's not just Over her parents' deaths btw, but like. this is definitely not the place she can really focus on that.

emmeline "shoot first ask questions second" vance my beloved <3 eli would be dead if he had better balance. NOT ELI TAKING A NAP??? HELLO??? eli is so dear to me, you don't get it 😭 and just this little group, like all of them being grumbly and prickly, and then there's sirius defending his brother with his LIFE and just grinning at everyone like he didn't just murder a man (there will be elaboration on this later!).

cut to regulus, who is—yet again—unimpressed with being in the hunger games. zero out of five stars, if you ask him. he's a mess, honestly. but hey, at least he stole some of sirius' luck! sirius will indeed be taking that back and returning the favor of being punched in the face at some point. it's okay, they're siblings, they just Do That Sometimes.

(no, really, sirius and regulus physically hitting each other will not have the impact on their relationship the way you may be worried it will. just trust the process, i am begging you. these things WILL be addressed) anyway. thorfinn! he was supposed to be smart 😔 he was not smart... no one ever listens to regulus. why does no one ever listen to regulus?

regulus: i am telling you explicitly what i will physically do to you if you do This Thing everyone else: does it anyway and is immediately shocked when he follows through like??? DOES HE LOOK LIKE THE TYPE OF MAN WHO JOKES??? WHY DOES NO ONE TAKE HIM SERIOUSLY??? don't come at me and say i wrote it, i KNOW i did, but still. rip to everyone else, but im different. id believe every word that left regulus' mouth 😌 however, the kill did not go over well for him because he is Traumatized, so. i mean, he did what he had to do? he TOLD them no one could kill his brother but him and he MEANT that shit.

and then ofc he immediately ran into the death eaters and was put on the spot, and he did what any sensible person would do, which is ask themselves: what would remus lupin do? PLS HE'S SO VALID FOR THAT 😭 now let's see if he's a good liar...

right, so i will be back to doing numbers at the end of the notes to keep up with those who have died and such, just like i did for the last arena.

Chapter Notes

hello, everyone!!!

warnings for this chapter:

-death (because of the whole arena thing)
-depictions of physical injury
-references to past death/murder
-brief mentions of vomiting
-depictions of withdrawal/detoxification (not too heavy or explicit, bc it's not from the character's pov, so we really only see it from the outside)
-graphic depictions of violence/violent death (not described in too much detail, and only like two sentences, but still)
-very, very vague reference to past child abuse (regulus pov, blink-and-you-miss-it) one mention of suicide (bc of velvet and mavis)

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Everything I do in that arena, it's for you.

James turns those words over in his head as he stares at the screen, watching Regulus walk among a group of six other death eaters. Other. Because there's seven.

Because Regulus is one of them.

Everything I do in that arena, it's for you.

The swiftness in which Sirius and Regulus killed hadn't surprised James. He didn't really think about it, what they would do in the arena, because he was too busy doing everything he could not to think of any of that, to focus on his anger before his fear, because he knew, even then, that only one of them could get better. Deep down, James knew that, whatever kills Sirius and Regulus made, he wouldn't blame or judge them for it. He didn't the first time, after all.

It hadn't shocked James, really, to see Sirius snap a man's neck almost effortlessly, not past the initial surprise of seeing him do it after eleven years of him being away from the violence the arena draws out of someone. Honestly, James' own hands had twitched with the urge to rip Henri apart for daring to strangle Regulus; it had been one of the most terrifying moments of James' life, seeing Regulus in danger and not being able to do anything about it. While Remus had sucked in a sharp breath the moment Sirius killed Henri, James had exhaled in reflexive, selfish relief, because Regulus was safe.

What had shocked James was watching Regulus sucker-punch Sirius, steal his supplies, then leave him behind.

Everything I do in that arena, it's for you.

James hadn't been prepared for it. Much like Sirius, he had just stared, slack-jawed, entirely disbelieving. Pandora had covered her mouth with her hand, and Remus—well, he had pressed his lips into a thin line and narrowed his eyes.

Even here, apart, James is so in tune with Sirius that his initial instinct was to revolt against the idea of Regulus being a death eater, just like Sirius, when Marlene suggested it. Marlene, who is sporting a new haircut that looks great on her. Marlene, who broke down in Sirius' arms and explained for the whole world to see that her parents were killed before her eyes. The camera did not shift away; it lingered, letting everyone see it.

A threat of what Riddle could do? Possibly. James thinks it's a double-edged sword, though. People who are afraid much prefer to hone in on their anger. He would know.

So, James didn't really believe, any more than Sirius, that Regulus was a death eater. Frankly, just watching Regulus and Sirius being back in the arena has been rough on his frayed nerves. Sirius, at least, had a group of people to stay with.

Regulus, to start with, did not.

Or so it seemed.

Everything I do in that arena, it's for you.

He ran into the maze, and so he was alone. James had wanted to groan and bang his head against the wall because of how stubborn Regulus is. James loves him so fucking much, but he is genuinely such a contrarian bastard. Most of the time, this is something James finds endearing. When Regulus is sprinting into a maze alone, away from his brother?

Not so much.

Things went awry, because of course they did. Thorfinn Rowle. A death eater. Someone who suggested that Regulus was an ally of some sort, which James instantly disregarded, despite the familiarity in which they spoke.

It hadn't mattered anyway, in the end, because Regulus killed him. Quickly. He just struck like a fucking snake, absolutely no hesitation, and James knew—he thought—well, it seemed like Regulus was doing it for Sirius, because it was Sirius that Thorfinn made the mistake of threatening.

Regulus doesn't make warnings lightly. When he tells someone he will hurt them if they do something, he means it. He said he would stab Thorfinn in the face, and then he did just that.

Everything I do in that arena, it's for you.

To James, Regulus killing Thorfinn had looked like further proof that Marlene was wrong, while James and Sirius—who know Regulus better than anyone—were right. Because of course they were. They had to be. It's Regulus. He's theirs, and they know him. They know him.

Why kill a death eater if you are one? That sort of defeats the purpose, doesn't it? James thought so, and he thought, then and there, that that was it. A done deal. Signed, sealed, and stamped. No further questions. Marlene and Augusta could take their doubt and toss it aside.

James was proud of himself, even, for having no doubts at all. After everything these past few days, all their issues and fights, James didn't doubt Regulus. Not for a second.

Everything I do in that arena, it's for you.

All that was left was the sickening lurch in his stomach and surge of sorrow as he watched Regulus break down after his first kill in this arena. James had felt like his chest was cracking open, and he just—he so desperately wanted to be there. He wanted to wrap his arms around Regulus and hold him. He wanted to wipe the blood from his hands and kiss each finger to remind him, to promise him, that it was okay. That it didn't make him a bad person. That, no matter what, he was doing his best, and James still loved him.

He just wanted to go there and tell him that, so he would know, so he could be comforted by it, perhaps. Seeing Regulus spiral in the aftermath of murder had left James feeling lost, and trapped, and utterly miserable from the need to simply be there for him. But he couldn't. He can't.

Then, Regulus got back up, and he ran. Swift and panicked, he ran. Desperately, he ran, like he was running from something, possibly from what he just did, or the consequences that were sure to find him if he were to stay. He ran.

Everything I do in that arena, it's for you.

James will likely never again feel the way he did when he saw Regulus run directly into the death eaters. A muffled sound of pure panic had escaped him, and someone was holding his hand—Pandora, he thinks—so he's sure that, at that moment, he nearly crushed all the bones in her hand. He couldn't help it. Regulus had just barreled right into a group that James thought wanted him dead, and he did so in a state that wasn't very promising for his chances of survival.

James is pretty sure his heart has never dropped so fast in his life. He just—he could feel the cold fingers of fear walk down the length of his spine, leaving him short of breath as the blood in his veins turned to ice.

Except.

Nothing.

Happened.

Everything I do in that arena, it's for you.

Regulus lied. It had confused James why Bellatrix stopped to question him about who he killed at all, but it made sense to him why Regulus would lie. It's a good lie, even, because Camilla did catch up and kill Coen, a mere ten minutes after Regulus killed Thorfinn. It was a good lie.

Regulus is a good liar.

Everything I do in that arena, it's for you.

He's such a good liar.

Everything I do in that arena, it's for you.

He tells so many lies.

Everything I do in that arena, it's for you.

James didn't believe it, even then. Even when the death eaters didn't attack. Even when they stopped, when they questioned him, and when they listened.

He thought that maybe, just maybe, it was a family loyalty sort of thing, in which Bellatrix and Narcissa were letting it slide because he's their cousin. He thought that, perhaps, Regulus would be able to talk himself out of the situation and run.

James kept waiting for him to run.

Everything I do in that arena, it's for you.

Regulus did not run. He let Bellatrix take his dagger, and then he took it when she gave it back. She smiled at him, touched his shoulder, and insinuated that he would join all of them in slaughtering more people as a group—Sirius being their first target. And Regulus did.

He joined them.

Everything I do in that arena, it's for you.

He's with them.

Everything I do in that arena, it's for you.

Regulus is a death eater.

Everything I do in that arena, it's for you.

How, Reg? James thinks, staring at the screen with a lump in his throat. How is this for me? Tell me how.

Regulus can't do that, though. He can't explain. Perhaps he planned to, but he never got the chance, and James doesn't understand. He doesn't know how, in any world, Regulus being a death eater could ever, ever be for him. Because not only are the death eaters the ones that relish in murder—even just outside of survival—but they're all hell bent on finding Sirius and killing him as soon as possible. So, how? How could this, in any capacity, be for James?

James doesn't know, and Regulus can't answer, and all that's left is trust. All that there can be is—trust. A feeling and a choice in one. After Regulus lied to him, after he broke his promise, James is once again left on the dagger's edge of trust, precariously tipping from side-to-side.

Everything I do in that arena, it's for you.

And the thing is, somehow, impossibly, James doesn't need to have the answers to know he believes in Regulus. He doesn't know what's going to happen, or what Regulus is doing, but James knows other things. More important things. He knows he loves him. He chooses, here and now, to trust him.

Without hesitation.

Everything I do in that arena, it's for you.

Yeah, that's what James is scared of.

Sirius refuses to think about Henri. Every time his brain skitters around the topic, around what happened, Sirius forces his mind to do an abrupt turn and go in a different direction.

He's no stranger to murder. He has killed twelve—no, thirteen, it's thirteen now. He's killed thirteen people, so it's not—it isn't this impossible concept for him to wrap his mind around. In fact, it's easiest for him to handle it in the arena. He's no different inside it now than he was the first time, because after he made his first kill, after Gunther, Sirius never held himself back from pain—inflicting it or enduring it. He left no room for shame, or for childish fantasies where it never had to happen. It did happen. It's happening again.

And that's that.

So, he doesn't feel it, really. He doesn't need to, and he won't have to, because he's not making it back home, where he would feel it. Where it would hit him. Where he would be sucked into all the things he had to do in the arena to survive.

In a way, it's almost relieving to have other things to focus on. Like Eli, for example, who is slowly sweating out whatever alcohol he had in the humid heat of the maze. Like Marlene, who has gone silent and has shadows in her eyes, this horrible grief clinging to her wherever she goes. Like Alice, who seems very agitated by Augusta at all times and wants basically nothing to do with her. Like Augusta, who doesn't seem to care what Alice wants and hovers close by them constantly. Like Emmeline, who… Well, actually, Emmeline is steady. In all of this, Emmeline is calm, and Sirius genuinely appreciates her so much right now, more than she could ever know.

They've been walking for a while now, but the maze never really seems to lead anywhere. It's one confusing hall of green right after the next, and the only sounds are the hedges that rustle at all times, which is ominous. They can't hear a water source, no distant sounds of trickling or anything, and they haven't happened upon one either. There's no signs of wildlife for a source of food, or any fruit from the hedges, or any other caches that they've come across.

They could start a fire, but honestly, there's no need for one. It's so hot out that they're all sweating, and they're all very fucking thirsty at this point. They have nothing to cook, and no place seems like a good one to stop at, because there's no shelter or sense of defense inside the maze.

For hours, no one speaks. They all just listen, and move quietly, and stay prepared for—anything. Sirius is on edge, waiting for any sign of Regulus, or even the death eaters, but there's nothing. It's just them, this group, and the darkness that's slowly growing thicker as the sun starts to set, except they can't really see that either. The sky above grows dimmer, slowly, and inside the maze gets darker along with it.

There has been two additional cannons after the first three, and Sirius' heart very briefly stuttered with the fear that maybe it was Regulus. He instantly discarded the notion, because no. Sirius won't believe that unless he has proof, so wherever Regulus is, he's just fine, as far as Sirius is concerned.

And yet, when another cannon sounds, the surge of fear hits him a third time, choking him until he shoves it away with force. Okay, so six people are dead. Just six. Three of which Sirius knows already—Velvet, Mavis, and Henri. There are three others, and he knows that the six here aren't it, which leaves fifteen people. That's fourteen people other than Regulus it could be. Regulus is fine. It's not him. He's fine.

Everyone better hope Regulus is fine, because if he isn't, if he's dead, Sirius is going to kill every single fucking person in this maze for daring to live when his little brother didn't.

The cannon draws everyone to a halt. Even Eli, who sways on his feet and groans quietly, as if in pain. They all stare around at each other, no one speaking for a long moment.

"Murder or maze, do you think?" Emmeline asks.

"Probably murder," Alice replies. "The maze doesn't seem to have anything in it to worry about yet, and while I don't doubt it will, surely it won't on the first night. The sun is setting. It won't be long before everyone is turning off their screens."

"Don't be foolish," Augusta snaps. "People die through the night in the games all the time, Alice. They'll just play the highlights the following morning."

Alice scowls and grits out, "Yes, thank you, Augusta, for your input that I didn't need or ask for."

"Well, if you insist on falling prey to idealistic hopes for—"

"I was making a theory, you fucking—"

"Do not interrupt me, or curse me," Augusta cuts in sharply, and Sirius winces slightly at how much it reminds him of his own mother. "Kid, if you think for a second—"

"Don't call me kid," Alice interrupts bravely, their eyes narrowing as they hold Augusta's gaze. "I'm not a kid."

"You're a child—"

"I'm an adult, not a child. You are not my damn mother, so don't treat me as if you are. Because what Frank will put up with from you, I won't."

Augusta's nostrils flare. "And just what, exactly, is that supposed to mean?"

"You know what it means," Alice retorts. "I think I've made it pretty obvious by now, but allow me to make it clearer. I don't like you. I think you're a shit mother. You use the excuse as Frank's mother to control him, not respecting his boundaries, or understanding the basic concept that his life is his own to do whatever he wants with it, no matter your expectations or demands. And I know—oh how well I know that you just love him, and it fucked you up having to watch him go into his games while being his mentor, and you've never been the same since. Trust me, I get that you're the way you are because of something horrible no mother should have ever experienced, and Frank gives you a lot of leeway for that, but me? I don't. You smother him, Augusta. You helped save your son's life just to turn around and barely let him live it."

Augusta's cheek twitches, and so does her hand, around her sword. No one moves or says anything for a long moment, the tension thick between two people who share only one thing; how much they care about Frank Longbottom.

Sirius resists the urge to cough. This is…very awkward. He is absolutely, resolutely not getting involved in this, thank you very much. He has enough mother-related issues on his own to contend with, so he's not inviting more into his life. His heart goes out to Frank, though. That poor man.

"Hey, um, hey…do all of you see that, too?" Eli mutters abruptly, squinting as he lifts his hand to brace against his hairline, peering into the dark behind them.

As one, the entire group turns to see what he's talking about, and Sirius does see it, too. In the dark, there are forms moving right for them, and they're moving fast.

In the next second, Asher and Warwick come barreling closer, and Asher shrieks, "Run!"

That's really all that needs to be said, because one doesn't hear run inside the arena and simply ignore it. In seconds, Sirius is turning with everyone else and tearing down the passage with absolutely no idea what he's even running from.

The sound of heavy footfalls behind them rumbles through Sirius, so heavy that the ground shakes, so he knows it's not a person, or even a group of people. It's something else, something Hallow-made, most likely.

"Give me that!" Warwick shouts, slamming into Emmeline's side while trying to take her crossbow. "Shoot it! Shoot it!"

"Get off," Emmeline snarls, shoving Warwick and whirling away. Warwick hits the ground, immediately trampled by Asher and Eli as they frantically work to keep running. Just like that, left behind.

Warwick releases a horrible, blood-curdling scream that Sirius can't stop himself from looking towards, nearly stumbling when he sees why. There's a very large statue shaped like a man, at least twelve-feet tall, if not more, with stone hands that wrap around Warwick's ribcage to crush it. The statue has no face, no features, which somehow makes it even more menacing when it crumbles Warwick up before ruthlessly ripping the body apart, right in two.

The cannon sounds.

Sirius keeps running, his heart thumping hard in his chest as he scrambles around a corner with the rest of the group, nearly skidding from how swiftly he's moving in the desperate need to put some distance between himself and that statue.

The footfalls pick back up, the brief pause in killing Warwick over, and the pace of the chase brings Sirius no comfort. It's not as fast as them, but due to size, it makes a good distance when it moves. If they can confuse it, maybe they can lose it that way, and everyone else seems to agree, because they're all taking every turn they come across.

Sirius can hear Eli wheezing. He's older and sickly, undergoing detoxification with no water or food or medicine to help him. It's not a surprise when he falls back, when he slows, or when he falls altogether and hits the ground.

"Shit!" Sirius bursts out, because all he can think about is his uncle Alphard, and how Eli, apparently, was his lover. He should leave Eli there, but he doesn't want to be a person who does that. That would weigh on him more than killing Henri did, and he knows it.

Cursing again, Sirius swivels on the spot and runs back for Eli, rushing to his side to help him to his feet again as the sound of the statue draws closer. He's not alone. Marlene came back, too. She's right there with him, hauling Eli ruthlessly to his feet and shoving him back into a run as she yells at him.

"Sirius, Marlene, come on!" Emmeline bellows, swinging her crossbow up and slowing to a halt. "It's right th—"

Sirius and Eli both stumble when the support from the other side is snatched away from them, Marlene releasing a loud scream of pain as the statue grabs her by the arm and yanks. Sirius hears her arm break, the awful crunch echoing in his ears as Marlene is dragged across the ground.

No.

No, no, no.

Not this. Sirius can't. He can't.

A collective cry of, "Marlene!" echoes out as she's lifted up into the air by her awkwardly bent arm, her sword falling to the ground as she kicks and flails, trying to keep the statue from getting ahold of her and completely ripping her apart.

Sirius digs his heels into the ground and raises his spear, launching it forward so hard that he stumbles with a grunt, which he allows to propel him into a run. The spear hits the statue directly in the face, but it just clatters against the stone and slides right off, falling to the ground. However, the force in which the spear hit does make the faceless head rock back as if avoiding a gnat. Like a pesky distraction, at most, but a pesky distraction keeps it from killing Marlene, so—

"Shoot it! Emmeline, shoot it in the face!" Sirius shouts.

"It doesn't have a face!" Emmeline shouts back, but she does release a bolt right at the head nevertheless.

The force from a crossbow versus a spear from Sirius' strength is very different. It's massive, in fact. From the crossbow, the bolt reaches velocity and force that Sirius couldn't make just by throwing his spear. So, when it lands, it does break past stone, little cracks forming around it.

The statue stumbles back, but doesn't let Marlene go.

Shit.

Okay, okay, think. Fuck. Think, Sirius, think. What can he do?

Nothing.

He can do nothing.

"Marlene!" Sirius calls as he stutters to a stop beneath her. She hangs in the air right above him, still struggling while the statue tries fruitlessly to grab the bolt and yank it out, except the statue's hands are too big to manage it. Marlene's feet are right above Sirius' head, just out of reach. She cranes her head down to stare at him, and he scoops up her sword. "Here!"

That's the warning he gives, and she responds immediately, her free hand falling to reach for the sword the moment he tosses it up to her. She cries out, likely from the pain in her arm as she swings herself to drive the sword in the cracks that formed in the face of the statue around the bolt.

The cracks splinter, getting wider, traveling out further like fault lines in glass. Marlene snatches the sword out, gritting her way through another pained scream, then drives her sword in again. The statue's head begins to fragment inwards from the front, and it abruptly lets Marlene go as it sails back.

Marlene crumbles to the ground as the statue starts to fall, and Sirius plucks up his spear, swiveling it in his hands as he runs forward to slam his spear down into the statue's head. The stone cracks and falls apart, the head left in crumbled, dusty pieces as the statue stops and goes still.

It immediately begins to turn to dust.

Sirius swivels on the spot, breathless, and rushes over to Marlene at the same time that Emmeline does. Eli is on his hands and knees, vomiting into a hedge.

"Are you okay?" Sirius blurts out, stupidly, as he falls to his knees next to Marlene, who is pale and cradling her arm to her chest, teeth gritted with visible pain.

"I'll live," Marlene grinds out, then starts laughing. It's dry and harsh in her throat as she tips her head back, grinning up at the sky with her teeth bared. "You hear that, you fuckers? I'll live. I'm still alive. I'm still here, and I'm still surviving! How do you like that? Come on, what else have you got?!"

"Okay, shut up," Emmeline declares firmly, literally reaching out to cover Marlene's mouth. "Now is not the time to go provoking anyone, Marlene. How's your arm?"

Marlene scowls around Emmeline's hand until she drops it, then begrudgingly grumbles, "It's broken."

"Yes, obviously, but where?" Sirius demands. Marlene huffs and closes her eyes before holding her arm out to him. He and Emmeline immediately start inspecting it, and then they share a look. Sirius clears his throat. "Okay, um. Not—not good. You're going to need a splint. Does Alice have—" He stops and looks around, blinking. "Where is Alice and Augusta?"

Emmeline grimaces. "They were running ahead, and they took a corner with Asher before Marlene got snatched. They didn't see it happen, and I—I don't know if they're going to be able to find their way back to us. They might, but until we run into them again, we have no supplies."

"Great," Sirius mutters, then heaves a sigh. A minute later, he barks, "Eli, find me some fucking sticks."

"Ergh," Eli says.

Somehow, Sirius knows what he means. "Take them from the hedges if you have to. I don't care. Just find me some damn sticks I can use for a splint!"

"Here," Emmeline murmurs, reaching out to grasp Sirius' spear on the ground and cutting strips of fabric from her shirt.

"Thanks," Sirius replies, listening to Eli cough and stumble around, mumbling to himself. The rustling of the hedges become more pronounced, and Eli yelps. They all ignore it and him, leaving him to his whims.

"I still have one arm," Marlene says as her eyes flutter open to stare at where her broken arm is swelling and turning purple in certain places already. "I'll be fine. I can still fight."

"No one is saying you can't," Sirius assures her. "Maybe you'll even get some medicine from a sponsor."

Marlene just snorts doubtfully.

"What the fuck was that thing?" Emmeline mumbles, her eyebrows crinkling together as she looks over at the pile of white dust that remains from the statue. "It was huge. The top of it nearly reached the top of the maze."

"Whatever it was, it was fucking creepy," Sirius admits, wrinkling his nose. "At least we know how to kill it, though. Emmeline, you were brilliant. You too, Marlene."

"We know," Emmeline says cheekily, and he chuckles.

Eli abruptly comes stumbling over, smelling quite awful, but carrying over the sticks requested from him. He blinks and sinks down beside Emmeline to peer at Marlene with a glimmer of genuine worry in his eyes. "You alright, girl?"

Sirius thinks that Eli has absolutely no idea what any of their names are, which is objectively hilarious, and yet he still seems to know Marlene enough to care for her. He was her mentor, and not a very good one, still a drunkard even then. He barely even spoke to sponsors on her behalf, and he would get wasted enough to cry every time something went wrong for her in her games. He cried when she won, too. It wasn't happy tears. He just kept saying that she hadn't really won at all.

Sirius knows this, because he was one of the last few that stuck around to watch, because his tribute that year made it all the way down to the last two. He'd wanted Marlene to die, at the time, and now he's so thankful that she didn't. Marlene killed his tribute, and then she became his friend, and now here they are, put in positions where they may have to kill each other, yet still fighting so hard to keep one another alive.

Marlene's eyes soften a bit as she offers Eli a tiny, exhausted smile. "Yeah, I'm alright, old man. You?"

"Could do with a drink, but I've got sticks," Eli announces, holding them up with a toothy grin, missing a couple of teeth past his chapped, wrinkled lips. "The hedge tried to grab me and keep the sticks, but I got 'em just for you."

"Much appreciated," Marlene says with a weary laugh, "even if this is going to hurt like a bitch. Just—just get it over with."

"Want to see if you can break my fingers?" Emmeline teases as she holds her hand out in offering.

"Careful, Vance, I'm really strong," Marlene replies as she does indeed reach out to take Emmeline's hand.

"Yeah, you are," Sirius agrees softly, sadly, his heart aching because she is, they all are, and no one should have to be, not like this. "Alright, brace yourself, McKinnon."

Marlene exhales and closes her eyes. "Do your worst, Black."

Unfortunately, Sirius has no choice but to hurt her in the endeavor to help her, and so he does just that. Marlene doesn't scream, or cry, or do much of anything at all. She bites her lip and muffles a sound of pain, but by now, her tolerance is very high, and she makes it through with just Emmeline's hand to hold onto. Emmeline grimaces right along with her, tucking her lips in and getting through Marlene practically crushing her hand like a fucking trooper.

Sirius is as quick as he can be while still being efficient, using the fabric and sticks to form a splint, then tying off her arm to her chest and side, held there to prevent further damage.

Once it's over, they all exhale in relief.

"Okay, what now?" Emmeline asks as she and Sirius help Marlene stand up, who keeps her sword in her hand.

"Well, we lost Alice and Augusta, but there's no cannon, so they're fine. Asher as well, it seems." Sirius glances around slowly. The dark is so dense now that he can't see either end of the passage, and he can only make out those close to him. When he looks up at the sky, he instinctively looks for the moon, but if it's out, if it's even there at all, he can't see it from here. "There's no point in keeping moving. We all need to rest, and it'll be easier for Alice and Augusta to find us, if they can."

"Still no water or food source, or any shelter," Marlene says.

Sirius sighs. "No, but we can keep looking tomorrow. It's too dark for us to find anything anyway. It's too hot for a fire, and maybe it's better if we're in the dark, so it won't draw anyone or anything in. We should sleep in shifts. I can take the first."

"I'll join you," Marlene murmurs. "Couldn't sleep now if I tried. You okay with that, Em?"

"Yeah, I'm fucking tired already," Emmeline admits, plopping down right there on the ground with a sigh. "I'll wait for the banners, then I'll be out like a light."

"Pretty tired myself," Eli mumbles, and even as he says it, he's slumping to the side to curl up on the ground, eyes fluttering shut. "S'been a long day. A real long, long day."

And, well, no one can argue with that.

They all fall silent and get settled in together after one such long day, preparing themselves for a long, long night.

Regulus would like it on the record that he doesn't like these people. Not necessarily because they're death eaters, which is a complex subject all on its own, in this context.

Dixon, for example. He was a death eater in his games, but he never seemed to like the whole murder aspect of it at all. He did it to survive, and in the arena, does that make him a bad person? Regulus doesn't think so, no more than he thought it made Peter a bad person. The difference is, Dixon didn't hesitate to kill at the end of his games, and Peter did. The difference is, Dixon got to go home, and Peter didn't.

But then there's people like Bellatrix, and Alecto, and even Thorfinn—who is now dead. They all relished in the murder aspect of it in their first games, and while they're all not shy about showing their bitterness with being back here, they seem just as inclined to kill as they were then, but almost more…jaded about it, in a way? Like that's all they're made for. Like that's all they know how to do now, even years after their games. Trauma takes many forms, and this one—well, this one just so happens to be damaging to more than just themselves.

Even Thorfinn made it clear he was bloodthirsty. He was eager to kill Sirius, like it was a prize. I'm getting that kill, he said, like it really is just a game he could reach the high score on. Is that a way to cope? If it is, Regulus finds little to no sympathy for Thorfinn.

Then there's Narcissa and Rabastan. They were the charmers, the pretty things no one could really bring themselves to break in their games. Countless sponsors adored them, so much so that the support of the sponsors and those in the arena with them got them to the end. They killed, of course they did, but only when they had to. It still came across as betrayal when they presented themselves as if they weren't a threat. Narcissa hid behind a veneer of delicacy; Rabastan hid behind warmth and calm that he weaponized to distract from what he was capable of. They're both chameleons, changing the shades of themselves to whatever suits their survival best.

Yaxley… Corban Yaxley, the jester of the death eaters. Never the best. Never adored. A joke. He's a fucking joke, all talk with no follow through, which is one of the bigger reasons Regulus has absolutely no respect for him. In his games, he got cheap shots in, but didn't do very much at all. Killing isn't something to be proud of; Regulus isn't proud of being a killer. Yaxley killed one person at the end of his games—one who was already bleeding out and could barely fight and still nearly won against him anyway, mind you—but he acts like doing that makes him better, or stronger, or dangerous. He's proud of killing, and it's not even something to be proud of, let alone for him, who didn't do very much killing at all. It's fake. Regulus doesn't like fake things, and he really doesn't like Yaxley.

Yet, here he is, staying with all of them anyway.

The maze remains disorienting and directionless. No matter where they go, they never seem to get anywhere at all. They're trying to find Sirius, and there's talk of trying to locate Thorfinn, which Regulus very innocently doesn't comment on either way. There have been three cannons since Thorfinn died. Regulus is choosing to believe that one of them is Coen.

Regulus is also choosing to believe that none of them are Sirius. The thought won't even take shape in Regulus' head. Sirius is here, somewhere, alive. He's still here. He just is.

It's dark out now, and the heat is…very fucking annoying, honestly, but they've kept moving anyway. Regulus and Rabastan have bags that came with flashlights, which they've been using to light the way. Past the reach of the beams of light that penetrate the dark, it's pitch-black.

That makes it immediately easy to spot the banners when they come up in the sky, even before the first trumpets start playing to signal it. As one, the entire group of death eaters slow to a halt, tilting their head to stare at the sky.

As always, it plays in order.

Mavis and Velvet's banners are displayed together, which either means that they died at the same time, or it means that the gamemakers wanted to further highlight the tragedy of their deaths. It's a toss up, honestly. It could be either one either way, and for some reason, their deaths have hit Regulus hard. Maybe because, in a way, they remind him of his first games with James; just two people deeply in love, who did not want to live without each other, who had no interest in being trapped in a journey of suffering together. Regulus thinks, if he and James had come back into the arena this time, their fates would have been similar. Neither of them would have left the arena without the other. Mavis and Velvet just further represent how fucked up all this is.

After them, it's Henri. Regulus presses his lips into a thin line when he sees his face. He hates to admit it, but he'd frozen for a moment, when Henri attacked him. Stupidly, all he could think of was Bernice, and then her baby and husband, and how she had wanted so desperately to live, and how it had been Peter who had saved him when she was strangling him, such a vivid memory that he'd almost expected it to be him yet again.

But it wasn't. It was Sirius, who snapped Henri's neck in less than thirty seconds right after, murdering for Regulus in less than five minutes after the starting cannon. It infuriates Regulus, because there it is again, Sirius killing in his name, not even batting an eye like it didn't even matter to him. But it will matter to him. It will, because these things do. Because they are who they are, and Regulus still has nightmares about Avery, and Quinn, and Irene. Now, because of Regulus, Henri is just another person who will haunt Sirius.

Following Henri is Thorfinn, and Regulus feels his heart drop as he realizes, all at once, that the next person has to be Coen, or everyone is going to know he lied. He's at the back of the group, lighting the path they're all walking on, while Rabastan is at the front, lighting the way up ahead. He grips his dagger, feeling his muscles bunch up, fingers flexing around the flashlight. A few people glance at him, but he remains stoic, stone-faced, as if he has nothing to worry about.

"Wonder what happened to him," Alecto murmurs, and she doesn't sound…pleased, exactly. They did come from the same district, after all. Maybe they were friends. But she doesn't sound upset either, really. Just sort of—resigned. Maybe a little detached, like she'd already come to terms with it beforehand.

Thorfinn's banner fades, and Regulus feels his heart thump heavily in his chest as his muscles tense up in preparation to run. It isn't until Coen's banner replaces Thorfinn's that he feels his muscles unlock and his racing heart slowly calm down. The undercurrent of tension traveling through the group, directed right at him, dissolves all at once.

Regulus feels like he deserves a trophy, or something, for being such a good liar. He gets it from his mother, he knows that, but in this scenario, he is so grateful for it. Look at that, his mother did do something worthwhile for him after all.

Alowyn, from district eight, follows behind Coen, and then Warwick last, also from eight. So, one from twelve, both from ten, both from eight, one from seven, and one from three. Seven dead altogether, just in the first night.

Shit.

Regulus knew it was going to be brutal, he did, but he can't think of one arena in which more than five died on the very first night. Yes, two of the deaths here were suicides, but still. That's still seven people. There are seventeen people left.

He does a quick rundown. Bellatrix and Narcissa from one. Yaxley and Rabastan from two. Alecto from three. Asher and Majesty from four. Alice and Augusta from five. Sirius and himself from six. Lester from seven. Emmeline and Dixon from nine. Marlene and Eli from eleven. Camilla from twelve.

Of all those people, only four aren't in a group of allies. Asher, Majesty, Lester, and Camilla. If Regulus had to guess, they're all going at it alone, and will do everything they can to stay alone, likely hoping the two larger groups will kill each other off. It's a smart plan, frankly. It's also dangerous, because being alone means you're easier to kill.

As for the groups—well, they're evenly matched, really. The allies Sirius has are of little importance to Regulus; he's here for one thing and one thing only.

There is the passing thought of Emmeline—the one he likes most, one that he feels a bare hint of connection to, through Evan. He doesn't—it's foolish, possibly, but he can't help but feel a little sick at the thought of her dying, especially if he has a hand in it. Evan respected Emmeline. It feels like yet another betrayal to him, somehow. Regulus already had a hand in killing his best friend, and now this?

Regulus misses the nightmares Evan would come visit him in. He wants another, selfishly. He wants to apologize. He never really got to apologize, not properly.

There's so much that he's sorry for, now.

"I think we should call it," Narcissa announces once the banners fade. "We're wasting the batteries in the flashlights just roaming about, and we need our rest. Let's stop, Bella."

"You're no fun, Cissy, no fun at all," Bellatrix complains, but she heaves a sigh and nods anyway. "Alright, we'll camp here then, and sleep in shifts. One group of three, the rest in pairs. Claim your partners now. I want Alecto."

"Absolutely not," Narcissa protests immediately. "She's mine."

"You only want her because I said her first," Bella says.

"No, I want her because she's a fucking nightmare with a sword," Narcissa corrects.

Alecto looks quite pleased about being fought over, and she raises her hands, lips twitching. "Ladies, ladies, please, there's no need to argue. There's enough of me to go around. We'll just be a team of three, yeah?"

Regulus thinks Alecto is quite mental to subject herself to a shift of dealing with two of the Black sisters, who are as equally dramatic and ridiculous as the Black brothers when they want to be. He's silently grateful that they didn't feel the need to claim him, which surely would have been a headache, though they probably didn't simply because it would make the rest of the group uneasy. A clear display of family loyalty, or a sign that they're a trio who might be plotting to kill the rest in their sleep, and Regulus can internally admit to himself that he's at least a little tempted by the idea.

"Okay, I want Regulus," Rabastan declares.

Regulus twitches. He doesn't much care as long as it's not Yaxley, who he genuinely isn't sure he'd be able to refrain from killing if the man pushed him far enough. Dixon wouldn't be a problem, he doesn't think. He'd rather it be Dixon, because he's an older, gruff man who doesn't have much to say, while Rabastan is… Well, he's friendly, sort of.

And no, no, Regulus isn't doing this again. He's just not. He feels like he could accidentally become fond of Rabastan in some way, and that's just—not happening. He's not here to make friends. It didn't go well for him last time, literally only last year, down to the same fucking day. Exactly a year ago, Regulus spent the day with Evan Rosier, climbing a tree to get to weapons, learning to trust, not knowing that he was on a clock that was running out where the best friend he didn't even know he would have was going to leave him, before he could even properly find him, and know him.

"No," Regulus says coldly. "I'm with Dixon."

"Fine by me," Dixon agrees with a grunt.

Rabastan smacks his lips. "Well, damn, tell me how you really feel. Just because I'm in the same district as Corban doesn't mean we have to pair up. I do not want to be stuck with this wet napkin of a man—"

"Hey!" Yaxley blurts out, offended.

"Suck it up, buttercup," Bellatrix tells Rebastan, who does not seem to care that Yaxley is glaring at him. "The ladies will take the first shift while you all sleep, then we'll rotate to Dixon and Regulus, then to you and Corban. Sound good?"

A low grumble of agreement echoes out to her, and they all start to settle in. Regulus would not admit it to save his life, but he honestly feels safer with his cousins and Alecto, so that's who he sits beside. Well, actually, he sits behind them, on the outside of the group circle, like he's using them as a shield. He can't help it. His paranoia won't let him do anything else.

He also has no interest in participating in the low chatter they all start up in between passing around water and food from the three bags of supplies in the group. Regulus reluctantly pitches in, because it would look bad if he didn't, but he's not happy about it. He listens to them theorize on what actually happened to Thorfinn, discuss what the plans are for the next day, and make comments about how shit the arena itself is this year. In silence, he eats and sips water.

"Hey, give me more of that," Narcissa demands, holding out her palm to Bellatrix, who was just about to pass the small pack of dried fruit back to Regulus. A tiny smile curves her mouth. "I am eating for two, after all."

Bellatrix clicks her tongue and leans forward to dump out a little more for her, musing, "How is little Draco doing?"

"Oh, they're fine for now," Narcissa replies, her eyes flashing with that very specific gleam that exists in their family; a sign of plotting, a sign of danger, a sign Regulus picks up on right then and there because he's seen it enough to know what it is and what it means. Just like him, and Bellatrix, and Sirius, and Andromeda, and all of their family—Narcissa is prone to her dramatics, too. He knows she's not pregnant.

He respects her so much for pretending to be. He thinks she's rather hilarious for it, actually. There's no doubt in his mind that no one other than their family actually knows she's just lying. Andromeda surely knows, too. Regulus wonders what she thinks about all of this. Is she at home with Ted, watching all of this while forcing Dora to play in another room, so she doesn't have to see? Does she ache, watching her sisters, her cousins, her family in the arena again, all at once?

Regulus forces himself to stop thinking about it.

"Alright, dinner over, lights out," Bellatrix orders, and Regulus clicks his flashlight out at the same time that Rabastan does.

The dark immediately descends upon them, thick and stifling, so much so that Regulus can't see anyone else. His eyes are trying to adjust, and it only puts him more on edge. He doesn't lay down to sleep, not yet, too tense to even manage it.

He can hear the others settling in. Dixon is snoring in less than five minutes. Rabastan requests very politely to use Alecto's lap as a pillow, and she allows it. Yaxley grumbles and complains about Dixon snoring, then eventually shuts up, then eventually starts snoring, too.

"I can see you sitting up over there, munchkin," Bellatrix murmurs, because her eyes have adjusted like his has, just enough to make out the forms in the dark. "Go to sleep."

Regulus doesn't respond, but he stiffly lays down, his eyes wide open as he stares at nothing. He doesn't think he's going to manage to sleep a wink, but then Narcissa starts softly humming a gentle tune she would back when he was young, back before all of this, back before any of them knew the horrors of the arena and it was just him and his brother being looked after by their older cousins in a hollow home and a hollow family still trying to shove their broken parts together, before the games came in and ripped them all apart, for good.

Helplessly, Regulus' eyes flutter shut. With the help of Narcissa's lullaby and the phantom presence of James that his mind conjures right next to him, Regulus sleeps.

Remus takes the lift down to the basement level, his mind still churning with memory of the first day of the games, full of Sirius and all that happened to him.

He's brilliant. Sirius is absolutely, unequivocally brilliant, and so very brave. He killed someone so quickly, and Remus' heart had ached, because he knows Sirius. He knows that Sirius will stay focused and just—not deal with how it affects him, because his main goal is to save Regulus, and to him, nothing else matters outside of that.

But Remus knows that it does matter to him, deep down, or it will. Sirius struggles so much with the feeling that the Hallows have shaped him into something he never wanted to be, and this will surely only add to that. Right now, he gets to use the excuse that he's doing it for his brother, like a shield.

The thing is, it's not beautiful, seeing Sirius murder. He is beautiful, even in the midst of murder, but there's no beauty to be found in the fact that he's put in a position where he has to. Sirius doesn't deserve that. He deserves to exist under the light of the stars, eyes shining, face flushed with pleasure because Remus is touching him, and his family is close by. That's all Sirius wants, really. To be with the people he loves the most, safe and calm, present with the memories that he'll be happy to hold onto. Remus has him all figured out now.

It's simple. Sirius wants a simple life. He wants Remus, and he wants James and Regulus somewhere near, and he wants the parents he's proud to claim. He wants to build, and love, and leave blood and pain and death behind.

Remus wants the same. Maybe that's why they work so well. Because they want their lover, and their family, and their best friends. Because they want freedom.

Because they want everything.

Right now, though, what Remus wants most of all, perhaps selfishly, is for Sirius to live.

Just live.

Please live.

Come back, Remus thinks fitfully, helplessly, desperately. Come back to me, sweetheart, please.

The lift dings, and Remus raises his head as he steps out, moving with habitual silence down the hall towards the cells he has to return to every night. Most of the other servants are likely already there, dismissed after dinner and not kept if they have no other chores or demands to fulfill. Remus, of course, stays until the last possible moment.

It had been necessary, his presence. He wasn't prepared for how much it meant to James and Pandora that he was there with them, nor was he prepared for how comforting it was for them to be there with him. They all sat close together, watching and reaching out to touch, murmuring reassurances and simply trying to get through it as a unit.

They all have mixed emotions about everything that's happened so far, particularly with Regulus. James was steady, Remus could see that, only murmuring that Regulus was a good liar, and an unpredictable man, and this couldn't be just what it seems. Pandora—poor Pandora was so innocently confused, sort of crushed by the whole thing, and she just kept stuttering that it didn't make any sense. But Remus?

Oh, Remus is angry.

I'm going to make him regret it. He will regret it this time, Remus. He's going to, Regulus had said.

Remus can see now that he meant it. He didn't think for a second that Regulus meant it in this way, and it's genuinely pissing him off that this is what he chose to do. He gets that Regulus has very complex issues around Sirius, especially Sirius volunteering for him, but to betray him like this?

It's going to break Sirius' heart.

And so, Remus is angry. He wants to drop down into the arena for the sole purpose of decking Regulus in the face, then take him by the shoulders and shake him. He wishes—oh, he really wishes he had tried to make Regulus see it better, understand it more clearly; that Sirius is doing all of this for him; that Sirius is scared, too; that Sirius wants to live just like everyone else, but he's ready to lay his life down for someone who has chosen, out of spite and anger and pain, to hurt him.

Regulus is ungrateful. That's all Remus can think. Maybe it comes from a place of anger, he isn't sure. Maybe it's just him latching onto whatever excuse he can use to ease the small guilt in him for wishing that Sirius would come back to him, even if that means Regulus will die. Maybe Remus just loves Sirius so much that he automatically wants to beat the fuck out of anything or anyone that hurts him, even if it is his stubborn, traumatized little brother, even if it is someone Remus considers a friend, despite everything.

And Remus knows, rationally, that doing what it takes to survive in the arena doesn't automatically make someone a bad person. He even knows, rationally, that he doesn't actually know what Regulus is going to do, or what his plan is. He also knows, rationally, that Regulus is pretty shit at being a death eater so far, from what he's seen, since he's already killed someone who threatened Sirius.

He knows all of that, rationally, but it turns out that Remus is more than a little irrational when it comes to Sirius' safety and well-being. He's in love. Sue him.

As Remus takes a corner to the hall with all the cells waiting, he hears the lift ding behind him again, originally assuming that it's just another servant coming down after him, at least until he hears muffled voices.

Remus comes to a screeching halt, then immediately backs himself up against the wall and strains his ears to listen, because he is nosy and soaks up gossip like a sponge.

"—don't understand just how strict Ms. McGonagall is. I mean, she really runs a tight ship," says a low voice, the words barely reaching Remus from down the hall.

"You have access to the control boards just like some of the other gamemakers. Surely you can…make something happen, can't you?" is the soft, silky reply.

Remus' eyes narrow. He knows those voices. The first belongs to a low-level gamemaker by the name of Verna. The second is none other than Lucius Malfoy, mentor for district one. Remus knows this, because he's worked parties with them present, even as recent as last year.

"Ms. McGonagall directs everything," Verna insists in a low hiss. "Nothing gets past her, I'm telling you."

"I doubt she would mind this, though, would she?"

"She says she already has plans for Sirius Black. She's keeping a very close eye on him, especially. I was directed to give Eli Zatish a spear just so it would get to him. Whatever she has planned, I think—well, I think it's going to be brutal as it is. Honestly, you should see some of the orders we have coming up. I don't say this often, but it's—it's sick."

There's a pause, and then Lucius sighs and mutters, "What about Regulus Black, then? Does she watch him closely, too?"

"She watches them all," Verna explains. "Like a fucking cat that never blinks. It's terrible. But…I—I mean, I could probably make sure that at least one of her plans will be directed towards Regulus. Maybe. Or I can try."

"Ah, lovely," Lucius says with a hum of satisfaction. "Exactly what I wanted to hear. Come, Verna, let's go through the garage and have a drink at the pub. We'll discuss the particulars of our…agreement."

Remus peels away from the wall and swiftly moves down the hall, turning into his open cell just as Lucius and Verna sweep past the opening at the end of the hall. As he crosses the threshold, the sensor emits a soft ping, the red light above turning green as the cell doors shut with a low clang.

For a beat, Remus just stands there, heart racing, trying to catch his breath within his mask. Fear spikes within him as he sinks down on his thin bed, hands shaking while tears prick at his eyes, pure panic sweeping through him until he's quite sure his heart is going to beat right out of his chest.

Fuck.

Fuck.

Suddenly, Remus has no space for anger within him for Regulus, only fear for his friend. No, all of his anger shifts and points in a new direction, towards Lucius Malfoy, towards the gamemakers, towards Riddle.

Just like that, Remus is reminded of the reality of it all. Like a slap to the face, it hits him that those in the arena are not truly to blame for all that happens in there.

Behind the scenes, someone is always pulling the strings.

James smiles at him, gently, and Regulus can't stop himself from smiling back. It's reflexive. He feels the same little heart flutter he always gets when James looks at him, especially when James is looking at him like this.

"Would we have vows?" James murmurs.

"I'd write you a poem," Regulus says. "You could read it, but not out loud. Only you'd get to know."

"Oh? A sad boy poem just for me?" James bats his eyelashes, his smile growing. "Reg, I'm honored."

Regulus huffs a soft laugh. "Sad? On our wedding day? No, it wouldn't be sad. Not even a little bit."

"You'd be happy, then?"

"Yes. Why wouldn't I be?"

"I make you happy?" James asks.

"You remind me that happiness exists," Regulus admits.

James' smile slowly fades. "So, why are you doing this?"

"Doing what?"

"You know what."

"Stop it, James," Regulus whispers, swallowing harshly as he scans James' features, laden with grief and pain. "You know why I'm doing this. I have to. It's—it's for you, just as much as it's for me. Please tell me you understand."

"I don't," James whispers back, and he pushes up on his elbow, tears forming in his eyes as he looks down at Regulus. "I don't understand, Regulus. Why? It doesn't have to be this way."

"Yes, it does," Regulus chokes out.

"This isn't what I want," James insists. "Please, love."

Regulus flinches when a tear hits his cheek, wet and cold against his skin. "You don't mean that. You'd never say that to me, James. I don't believe you."

"It's true," James breathes out, reaching out to cup Regulus' cheek, except the weight of his hand feels like nothing more than a whisper of wind. "I'm sorry, but it's true. Please don't do this. I'm begging you, Reg."

"James," Regulus rasps, then flinches again when the next tear drops onto his face, and then another, and then a heavier one. His breath catches. "J-James? James, don't—please stop crying. It's—I'm—I can't—"

"It's your fault," James tells him, more tears pouring out, hitting Regulus' face, his exposed arms, his skin. It's wet and cold, making him tremble and try to curl away from it. "It's what you do. This is all you know how to do."

"James—"

Regulus gives another violent flinch when a tear hits the corner of his mouth, though it doesn't taste of salt. The slide of water from his cheek into his mouth makes him gasp on it, choking when more tears break past his lips, and then his eyes fly open as he jerks awake to find that it's raining.

It's coming down hard now, picking up the pace, not visible through the dark. It's still night, still the very first night, and he's maybe had a few hours of sleep, at most. The rain woke him, and the very first thing he does is fling himself back like he can outrun it, but there's nowhere to run.

Distantly, Regulus can make out the sound of Bellatrix laughing in delight, her form twirling around in the rain with her arms held out, Narcissa chuckling in agreement when she hisses how nice the rain feels in the heat.

Lucky them.

For Regulus, it's different. No part of this is nice. He doesn't like water, particularly water he can feel running over his skin, especially his face. Being in a bath is bad enough, and he has that down to a science at this point, comfortable in the routine of it, knowing his limits and adjusted to how he handles his trauma around water. He knows precisely how to wash his hair and his body without freaking the fuck out; he knows precisely how to live a full, clean life without triggering himself to do it.

Rain is not a part of his routine, for obvious reasons. It's the way his hair sags against his forehead and the sides of his face, a weight constantly under the pressure of more rushing water, no different than coming out of the crimson river with his hair plastered to his skin, heavy. It's the water drenching his clothes, weighing at them, tugging at him no differently than in the river, when he fought so hard to get away, to escape the hands and the rush of the river dragging him down. It's the liquid in his mouth, jumbling his mind as he struggles to breathe past it, desperate to swallow to survive, tasting blood and gasping for air. It's the complete lack of control, and no escape, and he's dying again. He's dying again.

Regulus presses himself back into the darkness, further away from everyone, hand flying up to clamp down around his mouth so hard that he's squeezing his jaw, just to make sure no one hears him cry. They can't know. They can't see it, can't see him weak and vulnerable and easy to pick off.

He drags his bag up with his free hand and lays it over the top of himself as much as he can as he curls forward and ducks his head down between the shelter of the bag and his knees. He tucks his elbows in and shrinks as much as possible, pressed into a tight, compact ball. He can still feel the rain hitting his shoulders, the back of his neck, the sides of his arms, the front of his legs. The only thing protected is his head, chest, and thighs, which are mostly blocked from the bag and how he folds in on himself. Water drips down from his hair and the end of his nose right into his lap, tears intermingled with it.

One hand pressed to his mouth to muffle the sound of his sobs and uneven breathing, the other gripping his dagger like a lifeline, Regulus sits there and endures.

Bellatrix continues to play in the rain.

Sirius jerks awake the moment he realizes that it's raining. It's hot out, humid and thick, so the rain feels nice, really. Just not for everyone. Sirius' mind immediately goes to Regulus, and he's on his feet in seconds.

Emmeline and Eli are technically on watch now, though it's clearly Emmeline doing the heavy lifting on that. Eli is a little too busy shaking and sweating, moaning in pain, working what's likely decades worth of consistent alcohol intake out of his system. It's not going well for him.

"Sirius?" Emmeline murmurs.

"I—I have to go," Sirius blurts out, snatching up his spear and squinting through the dark helplessly.

"What? Go? Sirius, go where? What are you—"

"It's—I have to find Regulus."

Emmeline sighs. "Okay, I know, but you're not going to be able to find him now."

"No, you don't understand," Sirius hisses, borderline frantic at this point, feeling the rain drip from his hair. Oh, it's coming down hard. Fuck. "I have to find him, Em, now. He's—he needs me. He needs me right now."

"Sirius, stop," Emmeline says sharply when Sirius whips around, fully prepared to start sprinting.

Sirius swivels back around and snaps, "This isn't a fucking joke. You don't get it. He—he can't handle rain, alright? It's—he has aquaphobia, which means he's likely a wreck right now, so I need to find him, I have to get to him and—"

"If you leave, you won't be able to find him anyway," Emmeline informs him harshly, brutally honest. "It's too dark for one thing, and you won't find him before they want you to. Sirius, there's nothing you can do for him."

The worst part is, Sirius knows she's right. He knows that, and still, all he wants to do is search every inch of this maze to find Regulus as soon as possible. He's not even sure what he'd do when he did. It's not like he can fucking stop the rain. But he could block some of it, right? However he had to, he would. If all he could do is sit there and talk Regulus through it, that's what he'd do. At least he'd be doing something.

"Sirius," Emmeline says gently, "you can't protect him from everything. You can try, but you won't always be able to."

Something in Sirius outright snarls at that. Yes, I can, and I will, he thinks, instinctively, furiously.

Except no, no, he can't.

He hasn't always been able to.

And he won't this time.

Sirius cannot stop the rain, and he cannot get to Regulus, and he feels like tearing the world apart because of it. He feels like uprooting this entire maze to clear a path to his brother. He is helpless, frustrated, and stuck.

All he can think about is Regulus somewhere out there, shivering and trembling, even in the heat. Weeping. Drenched. Suffering. Just as stuck and helpless as Sirius feels, undergoing torture that, in turn, feels tortuous to Sirius.

"Sit down," Emmeline orders, and so Sirius does. "Catch what rain you can and drink that. Stay hydrated. Wherever Regulus is, he's alive. No cannon, remember?"

Sirius does as she says, cupping his palms together to catch handfuls of rain and sip on it slowly. He tells himself, as he does, that maybe Regulus is sleeping through it. Or maybe he did find a place in the maze with some shelter, and Sirius is just worrying for nothing. Maybe, maybe, maybe.

Whether Regulus is maybe, possibly, hopefully okay or not, he is alive, and that matters the most, right now.

The rain doesn't stop until morning, but a cannon never sounds, and Sirius' chest aches with grief and pulses with pride to know that, despite everything, Regulus survived.

Dorcas sits on the very edge of her chair and stares at the screen with wide eyes, breath held as she watches Rita do the recap of the previous night, playing a few highlight reels that weren't broadcasted live. She needs to know Marlene made it through the night. She won't breathe again until she does.

Marlene, who nearly fucking died. Marlene, who now has a broken arm. Marlene, who thankfully still has the ring on her other hand. Marlene, whose parents were killed just the same way Fabian and Gideon were.

Dorcas has been persistently nauseous since the moment the games started, and it's only gotten worse with everything that has gone wrong so far, one right after the next, and it was only the first fucking day. It doesn't look promising for the second.

But there. A small clip of Marlene in the shade of vague green from night vision from the cameras, eyes glinting like opaque orbs, otherworldly and monstrous. Beautiful. In the clip, she's sipping water as it rains in her free hand, the other still tied in a splint against her body. She made it to morning.

Dorcas exhales.

The clip changes to show Regulus, who clearly had a very bad night. Dorcas' heart clenches seeing him like that, small and afraid. She remembers when Sirius came to her after the previous games and asked her, hopefully, if there was any possible way she would accommodate Regulus' aquaphobia by letting him take a bath with a very little water, just as much as necessary to help him get clean, and if she would stay and talk to him through it. She agreed. Of course she did.

She sat right there in the room with him and kept her back to him as she talked, explaining her favorite fabrics to work with, talking about the effect the cut of clothes can have on the perception of an outfit, rambling on about her personal feeling that accessories can sometimes bring an outfit together, or completely deconstruct it. She talked and talked and knew that he barely took in a word of it as he bathed behind her, crying as quietly as he could throughout the whole process.

It had broken her heart.

Seeing him like this does, too.

But he's alive. He made it through the night, just like Marlene did, just like Sirius did. They're all alive, one day closer to freedom if they just keep surviving. They're here, no matter how the night treated them—which was not well, not at all.

Honestly, the night didn't seem to treat any of the remaining tributes well. The clips shuffle through basically all of them waking up at some point from nightmares, or simply paranoid. Eli's condition only worsened through the night, to the point that it was touch and go for a bit, a genuine threat of death on the horizon. He pulled through, but Dorcas has no idea if he's functioning this morning or not. There's Marlene's discomfort with her arm, Majesty sleeping in fits of one or two hours at a time before they apparently felt compelled to get up and move to a new spot, and more than a few people jerking awake in their sleep from nightmares, some even having panic attacks.

This includes the death eaters, which probably shouldn't surprise Dorcas as much as it does. Even they're not free from how being back in the arena affects them. Alecto nearly took Dixon's head off with her sword when he shook her awake because she was groaning and crying out in her sleep. Rabastan woke up with tears glistening on his cheeks.

And then there's Sirius, who Marlene poked with a stick from afar during his nightmare, which turned out to be a good thing when he came up swinging and making vague, belligerent threats to someone named Gunther. When he calmed, it was strange, like he sort of just—detached. He stared off into space for a while, not really doing much or acknowledging anyone, and then he eventually blinked, looked around, and heaved a sigh as he gripped the back of his neck and hung his head.

Rita sure has a lot to say, but she never once acknowledges the clear signs of trauma from each and every single tribute in that arena. It makes Dorcas grind her teeth.

Day two is… Well, it's here whether they like it or not, and Dorcas is absolutely fucking terrified. She doesn't care what any of these people do in the arena; she doesn't care that Regulus is a death eater apparently planning to kill his brother; she doesn't care that Augusta and Alice seem to have no warm feelings between them. None of that matters to her.

What matters is getting everyone out that she can, the moment she can, regardless of what happens inside there. The terrifying part is that the moment she can isn't here yet, and she can do nothing but watch the woman she loves and her friends fucking suffer. She just needs them to survive for a little longer. Just keep surviving. Please keep surviving.

The sound of her phone ringing has her head snapping up as she bolts to her feet and immediately dives for it.

"Patronus?" Lily says in lieu of a greeting.

"Starfish," Dorcas replies quickly. "What is it? What have you got? Please tell me—"

"The third night," Lily cuts in, no-nonsense, and Dorcas' breath catches. "So, tomorrow night. Are you going to be ready for that? Can you manage it?"

Dorcas chokes out a relieved exhale and rasps, "Yes, absolutely I'll manage it. Fucking hell, Evans, you move fast. I mean, we were planning for day five, then you said maybe night four, but now it's tomorrow? How did you…?"

"Meadowes, you know just as well as many others what my mouth can do. Literally."

"Lily, have you been using sex for favors?"

"No." Lily pauses, then snorts. "Well, alright, so this is how it works, yeah? I'm already having sex, and then I'm like, say, look at you all laid out and desperate to give me what I want; don't you want to do this very small, very simple thing for me? And then they mostly always say yes, and they get what they want, all while I'm having a grand time and also getting what I want. See? Win-win. I mean, I couldn't do it with all of them, because I didn't have sex with everyone I talked to, but a lot of people owe me anyway. Six years worth of secrets and gossip will do that for a person, you see."

"I cannot believe that this revolution is partially running on your competency in sex."

"Oh, if only it could fully run on that. Everything would go so smoothly. Shit, we'd win the war in, like, a week."

"Someday, someone is going to humble you," Dorcas informs her with a low hum of amusement. "I just want you to know, on that day, I'm going to laugh."

Lily just snorts, skeptical, and then her voice has softened considerably when she murmurs, "How are you doing, then? Molly has kept me updated on the games. I hear it's been shit and Marlene's…off to a rough start?"

"She's still alive," Dorcas replies, her voice dropping lower, softer, and she has to swallow past the lump that forms in her throat. "She's surviving."

"Well, I thought you'd like to know, that mission in district eleven brought in some more people—and, of those people, there was a small family closely related to the McKinnons. A married couple and their infant son. The wife used to be a McKinnon before she took her husband's last name."

"Marlene's cousin. The baby—a boy, right? Maximus?"

"Mhm, that's the one," Lily confirms, and Dorcas' shoulders slump with relief, her eyes fluttering shut. "Apparently, the district was rioting majorly since Marlene's interview, and it didn't help that the mayor abandoned her post and joined her people against the Aurors. The Order went in and got a few people out, the mayor especially, and from what I've heard, the district is now under lockdown. People kept in their homes, not allowed to leave, Aurors patrolling the streets. There's speculation that eleven will get the same treatment as six did, but that thankfully hasn't happened yet."

Dorcas presses her lips into a thin line. "No, I don't think Riddle will take it that far. He's still keeping what happened to district six quiet. No formal announcement, not even as a thinly veiled threat. Just—nothing. It's smart for him not to, though, because it's…getting a lot worse here. The protests have been getting bolder. They've taken to standing outside his castle now, demanding he stop the games. A lot of people are refusing to watch, and others are so horrified by what they see that it's just pissing them off even more."

"Yeah, I can imagine if they find out that he has the power to wipe out nearly an entire district as easily as he can, they won't handle it well," Lily mutters. "The other districts either, if I had to guess. The spread of rebellion is just growing at a rate that even the Order is struggling to keep up with, so I know for a fact that Riddle can't. You should see Dumbledore. He's not around much, but when I have seen him, his eyes are always twinkling. But, then again, that may have something to do with the fact that his brother is here."

"His—" Dorcas blinks. "Wait, what? He has a brother?"

Lily sighs. "As it turns out, he does. Aberforth Dumbledore, Mayor of district six, which is apparently where they're both from. Talk about fucking irony, yeah?"

"The plot thickens," Dorcas mumbles, shaking her head incredulously as she glances at the screen, sees Camilla walking through the maze, then glances away again. "Okay, that's—it's not important right now. How are the Potters?"

"Oh, they're fine. Euphemia—sorry, Effie, she told me to call her Effie. Anyway, she's healed up and walking around now, though a bit slow and sore. I keep telling her I know exactly how to make her feel better, but she insists she's a married woman, and also far too old for me. Disappointing, really."

"Oh, no, I get you. She's something, isn't she?"

"Truly," Lily agrees. "In any case, she and Monty have been focused on the games a lot, watching Sirius and Regulus, worrying about James. You know, parent stuff. But, I mean, they've also been trying to take care of people from their district. There's a lot of mourning going on at the moment. The grief is heavy here, Dorcas. Really fucking heavy."

"Yes," Dorcas murmurs, "that's to be expected. I think we're going to lift a lot of spirits tomorrow, all over the world. I mean, no one's ever stopped the games before. It's going to invigorate a lot of people, Lily."

"It's war after that," Lily says quietly. "You know that, don't you? Once it's done, there's no going back."

Dorcas takes a deep breath in, then slowly lets it out and focuses her eyes on the screen. "I know."

James makes a beeline right for Lucius the moment he steps into the watch party, his stride full of purpose, lacking a cane today because his leg feels just fine for now.

He doesn't need a cane to scare the piss out of Lucius Malfoy.

As soon as Lucius sees him coming, he tenses up, even when standing next to Lestrange and Dolohov. There's a group of sponsors lingering nearby, rising whispers getting louder the second they see James coming, enticed by possible drama.

"Potter," Lucius greets stiffly.

"James, James, don't—" Frank is suddenly right there, grabbing at James' arm to try and tug him away.

James shakes him off. "Listen to me very closely, Malfoy. If I find out that you've been trying to bribe gamemakers again, the next time I hit you, I'm not going to stop until you're fucking dead, do you hear me?"

"I've done no such thing," Lucius retorts sharply. "I don't appreciate the implication that—"

"No? So, you didn't take Verna—a gamemaker—out to the pub last night to bribe her? To ensure that Regulus would endure worse in the arena, or die quicker? Sirius, too?" James challenges, his voice a low hiss so no one hears but them.

"Obviously I didn't," Lucius snaps. "You're new as a mentor, but allow me to make it clear how this works. Gamemakers can't be bribed, Potter."

"Oh, I know they're not supposed to be, but we all know that it can happen, and has happened," James argues. "Funny, really, because there's a witness placing you at the pub last night with Verna, where you two discussed an agreement." This is technically true, because Remus is the witness, and he told James all about what he overheard this morning over breakfast. "This means that you're purposefully doing what you can to influence the games. Today, it's Regulus. Who's to say, tomorrow, it's not Rabastan? Or Alecto? Or Alice? Anything to get ahead, right, Malfoy? Anything for you to win."

Frank drops his hands from James, and now he's standing right beside him, staring Lucius down.

Lucius looks around to find all eyes on him, the bruise on his cheek gone, likely with the help of Hallow medicine, so there's just an empty spot that James is practically vibrating to hit again. Dolohov takes a firm step back from Lucius, his face dropping into a scowl, and Lestrange's eyes slowly narrow.

There's a long, tense silence.

How many times has Lucius bribed various gamemakers and sponsors to get his tributes farther? How many years did he bring home Victors just because he resorts to bribery and manipulation? There's a fine line between being a mentor who does everything they can within the constraints they're forced into and being a mentor who goes behind the scenes to influence the games themselves.

Sirius, for example. The one and only time he influenced the games was with Slughorn, and that was to get James and Regulus both out. Perhaps, in a way, that's no different than what Lucius has done to bring tributes home; the motivation and intent behind it is different, though. Sirius did it out of love and desperation. Lucius did it for glory.

And this is ultimately worse, because he's actively working to make sure Regulus, at the very least, suffers. He'd like it to be Sirius, too, from what Remus said, but McGonagall is keeping a very firm eye on him, apparently.

This is not a good look for Lucius, not at all. Any respect the other mentors might have had for him is called into immediate question. Their tributes are in the arena, too. It's very, very stupid to make these sort of moves, because once found out, there are repercussions.

Even now, already, there are repercussions. People are watching them, but they have no idea what's going on. The only people who are close enough to hear are Frank, Dolohov, and Lestrange. Just that easily, with that accusation laid out for them, they've all turned cold eyes to Lucius.

"Oh, I see what you're trying to do." Lucius laughs smoothly and holds up a hand. "Don't listen to this nonsense. He's trying to knock down the competition, and who can blame him? My tributes are indeed a threat to be worried about. Solid effort, Potter, but you see—it's my word against yours."

"I don't care about words against words, Lucius," James informs him, speaking low and firm, never once breaking his gaze. "The next time you get in the way, words won't be used. You'll just be fucking dead."

With that, James turns around and walks away, letting that truth settle behind him as he goes, because it was not a lie. James isn't a good liar. He never has been.

If it wasn't obvious, James is not in a good mood. There are many, many reasons for this. One, a general lack of sleep because he spent the previous night worrying about Sirius and Regulus. Two, the push-and-pull on going back and forth on what the hell Regulus is even doing with the death eaters, and still trusting him, despite his confusion. Three, waking up and seeing that Regulus had to spend the night in the rain, blatantly tormented by it, and James could not get to him or help him. And then, finally, when Remus swept in to ramble about what he overheard the previous night, it was just a cherry on top of this shit sundae.

So, yes, James is not in the mood to be making empty threats. He said what he said, and he meant it. He came to say what he needed to, and he did. And now, he has work to do.

"You know, if it comes to it, I'll help," Frank announces as he falls into step with him. "With Malfoy, I mean."

"Noted," James says, heaving a sigh as he abruptly stops and clears his throat. "Right now, though, can you explain how to, um, use a donation?"

Frank blinks at him. "Already?"

James nods and mumbles, "Yeah, I…uh, I need to get a message to Regulus."

"Right, well, be careful not to waste donations too early, James," Frank warns, but he nonetheless points over James' shoulder. "If it's that important, follow me..."

James follows Frank, because it is, indeed, that important.

Regulus has a headache.

Spending all night in a cramped position, sobbing silently, and repeatedly falling into one panic attack right after the next will do that to a person, he supposes. The rain had thankfully stopped when the sky started growing lighter, and the dark began to fade. Regulus was instantly relieved, calmer, more clear-headed. By the time daylight really broke, and everyone could actually see him, he was carrying on as if the previous night didn't even happen. No one even knew.

Well, he doesn't doubt that countless people watching knew. James knew. James likely saw the highlight reels, but Regulus hopes that James can see that he's fine now.

Fine is subjective, really. He is fine comparatively, how about that? Up and moving, focused, vision clear with no tears to block them. Still here and still continuing on.

It's oddly…comforting to know that he survived it. Some part of him didn't think he could, especially not alone, but he did. Right by himself, he got through it. No Barty, no Sirius, no James. Should he be proud of that? Can't he be proud of that?

He is proud of that. Does he want it to happen again? No, absolutely not. Is he sure that he can survive it, if it does? Yes, he is, and it comforts him to know that.

It's day two, and the group is on the move again, setting out once more with the hope that they'll come across Sirius. Regulus walks along with them silently, waiting for whatever the day will throw at him.

The soft chime of a sponsor box has them all coming to a slow halt, every head tipping back as they watch the box float in on a parachute over the top of the hedge. It drifts down gently, bobbing and weaving through the air, sinking into place right over Regulus. He swallows thickly and holds his hands out just as the box softly settles into his palms.

"Aw, your boyfriend sent you a present," Rabastan teases, his tone lighthearted and good-natured.

"Fiancé," Regulus corrects sharply, eyebrows furrowed as he stares at the box. His stomach turns over, and he is so fucking nervous that he almost can't bring himself to open it.

"Oh?" Rabastan says, sounding amused. "Well, I mean you said you two were planning to get married, but I didn't think it was anything official. Good for you, man."

"Munchkin is all grown-up," Bellatrix chokes out with a fake sniffle. "Hear that, Cissy? He's an engaged man."

"Welcome to the family, James," Narcissa announces lightly, lips twitching when Regulus cuts a glare in her direction.

"Are you gonna open it or not?" Dixon mutters.

Regulus scowls, not at all appreciating that he has an audience watching him like vultures. He especially doesn't like that Yaxley is here for this, who has rolled his eyes at least twice already. Sighing, Regulus peels open the box and tilts it towards him to see what's inside.

Immediately, against his will, his face explodes with heat, flushing with some ridiculous inner delight to see a bagel sitting next to a bit of cream cheese in the smallest container he's ever seen in his life, outlined in the shape of a flower. He can't help the way his face softens, automatically, because of course James sent him a bagel, and of course James found some way to send him a flower, even here. After last night, it's a steady source of comfort that puts a bright burst of warmth right in the center of his chest. James had to know that it would make him feel better. Regulus could cry.

What he does, instead, is feel his lips curl up at the corners, his face still hot and his heart still fluttering. Again, he wishes James were here, not for him to be in danger, but solely so Regulus could kiss him. Oh, he misses him so much.

"Fucking hell, is he smiling?" Rabastan asks. "I didn't know he could do that. James Potter, you've got skills."

"Look at 'im," Alecto coos mockingly, "he's blushing."

Yaxley makes a sound of disgust.

"Alright, alright, fuck off," Regulus grumbles, his smile fading as he glares at all of them, huffing when they all just continue to look amused, except for Yaxley. Even Dixon looks faintly entertained by the whole ordeal.

"What'd he get you?" Bellatrix asks curiously, bounding over eagerly and peering down into the box before he can fully snatch it out of sight. She blinks down at it, then lifts her head to stare at him blankly. "It's a bagel."

"Listen—"

"You're getting googly-eyed over a bagel?"

"I'm not—shut up, fuck off," Regulus snaps when Narcissa proceeds to start laughing and Rabastan has to bend over and brace his hands on his knees as he erupts into giggles. "None of you know the context, so just mind your fucking business."

The laughter continues.

Regulus ignores it, reaching past the bagel and cream cheese flower to get the small white card. When he flips it over, there are no words. The card just reads: ???

This is, objectively, sort of hilarious. Just: ??? Just that, which James actively decided to send, most likely because it properly sums up his emotional state at the moment, at least in regards to the company Regulus has chosen to keep.

Grimacing slightly, Regulus glances up wearily and says nothing before crumbling the card in his fist. He does enjoy his bagel, though, as the group continues on.

Wisely, no one asks for him to share.

Sirius watches Marlene pace back and forth, restless, swinging her sword around in her hand. Her other arm looks worse now, in the light of the day. It's secure, at least, but there's no ignoring that it's injured. In a fight, if whoever her opponent is happens to be smart, they're going right for that arm.

Slowly, Sirius trades a look with Emmeline. She raises her eyebrows at him. He shrugs back. They both sigh.

"What?" Marlene snaps, tossing them both a glare.

"Stop pacing," Emmeline says. "It's making me nervous."

Marlene scoffs. "You don't get nervous."

"Well, better to say that than to say it's getting on my nerves. You're annoying, McKinnon. Take a load off, yeah?"

"We should be moving."

Sirius looks skyward, begging for patience. "We agreed to wait as long as we can to see if Alice and Augusta can make it back to us, Marlene."

"Yes, well, clearly they're not. They would have by now, if they could," Marlene grits out. "We'll come across them if we just get a fucking move on. Can we go?"

"Come off it," Emmeline scolds, "Eli had a really bad night, and he's still resting."

This is true. Sirius darts a glance at Eli, who spent most of the night moaning in pain between vomiting, until there was just nothing left for his body to give. They took turns making sure he had rainwater to drink, which didn't help too much, but they made sure he was hydrated in all that mess. The poor man has been sweating, and hallucinating, and begging for a drink any time he gets lucid enough to form full sentences.

Finally, a couple of hours ago, he settled down into genuine rest, which was a good sign. Sirius was actually a bit worried he was going to have a stroke, or a heart attack, and just not make it through the night.

The thing is, Sirius is just as antsy to get up and go as Marlene is, though likely for very different reasons. He doubts she cares very much about finding Regulus, but it's clear that she does not at all appreciate staying in one place too long.

"Well, too fucking bad," Marlene declares sharply, marching over to drop down in a crouch by Eli, leaning her sword up against the side of her thigh. "If we keep lingering, they'll find some way to get us moving, and I don't fancy waiting around to find out what else they have up their sleeves." She reaches out with her free hand and smacks Eli right across the face, not hard, just enough to jolt him awake. "Hey, old man, time to get up and go. Come on, get a move on."

"Blergh," Eli garbles out.

Marlene softens, just a tad. "Yeah, I know. I know it's rough, but we need to go. I'll help you stand, come on."

Grumbling, Emmeline surges forward to help Marlene get Eli up. He looks fucking awful, dead on his feet, hands shaking and still sweating. Sirius grips his spear and keeps a watch around them while Emmeline and Marlene make sure that Eli can walk. He's speaking, but it's raspy and stuttered. He's moving, but it's slow and stilted.

It takes a few minutes, but then they're on the move, and Eli keeps waving people off. He doesn't want to be touched, and he grunts any time someone gets too close to him. Likely due to pain and withdrawals, he's grouchy and harsher. They leave him be, for the most part. Emmeline walks beside him since, for some reason, she's the one he doesn't mind being near him. Maybe because he doesn't recognize her at all. Marlene was his tribute. Sirius… Well, he has the same family genes as his uncle Alphard, so Sirius is probably confusing for Eli, especially with the hell his mind and body are suffering.

Sirius falls into step with Marlene, and he glances over at her with his heart sinking to his feet. "Marlene?"

"Yeah?"

"You said you knew. How…?"

Marlene just looks at him, and Sirius feels his stomach fall out from beneath him along with his heart. A lump forms in his throat, and he wants so badly to stop and pull her into a hug, but he knows she won't stand for it. Not here. Not like this. Not after all that she's been through lately.

Sirius knows, too. He may not know to the degree that Eli is going through it, but he's detoxed and suffered withdrawal as well. Many, many times. He never wanted Marlene to get in that deep, and all he can think about is the times he let Marlene drink because he knew how hard being a mentor was, or all the times he caught the signs of her turning to drinking as a crutch and dismissed them, because they all drink when things get hard, and they all handle it, and it didn't have to mean that Marlene was becoming dependent on it.

But she looks at him, and he knows she did. She looks at him, and his chest aches, because he tried—he always tried so fucking hard—to look out for her, to help her, and he failed. He fucked it up. He didn't even fucking notice.

"Oh, fuck, Marlene," Sirius croaks, "I'm—I'm sorry. Shit, I—"

"Sirius," Marlene cuts in, "don't worry about it. Was it shit? Yeah. But did I get through it? Yeah. I fucking pulled through, and I'm still here. You're part of the reason I am, whether you realize it or not. Let's leave it at that, okay?"

"You could have told me," Sirius whispers. "I would have helped you, Marlene."

"You were one of the people I didn't want to know." Marlene clears her throat and looks away. "Didn't want to disappoint you, I guess. I don't know. I just… You were always trying, for me, and then I—" She shakes her head, swallowing. "I did get help, though. Someone really important to me encouraged me to, and I was brave enough to actually do it. I'm good now, yeah? Don't—I don't want you to treat me differently."

Sirius stares at her, stricken. "I wouldn't. Never. I swear it. I—well, not many people know this, but I know, too. I needed help, too, and there's no shame in it. I'd never be disappointed in you, okay? I'm proud of you."

"I didn't know you…" Marlene trails off and looks at him, her lips tipping down. He gives a tiny shrug and a small, sad smile. There's a lot people don't know about him, things he could never reveal when playing the role he did in the Hallow. Her gaze is soft. "Yeah, well, I'm proud of you, too."

That's all that's said about it. That's all that needs to be said, between them. He leans over and gently bumps his shoulder into hers, the uninjured one, and they continue on.

"Hey, does everyone hear that?"

Regulus unfortunately hears that. And, by that, he means the increased rustle of the hedges ahead of the group, so loud that everyone has come to a sudden halt. The wall of green on either side up ahead is shaking.

"Well," Rabastan says, "that can't be good."

"Thank you, Captain Obvious, as if that wasn't becoming increasingly fucking clear," Alecto hisses, already backing up while everyone joins her in doing the same.

The moment—literally the exact moment—that Regulus sees a pale, clawed hand burst free from the hedge, he's turning and sprinting without looking back. Fuck the rest of them, he knows what the hell that is.

"Go, go, go!" Dixon roars.

Regulus doesn't need to be told that. He is gone. He's running as fast as he ever has, possibly, not waiting on anyone else or caring where they go. Not that they can go anywhere, really, because they're all trapped in a long passage together. There was, at some point, a different passage to turn into, but it seems to have disappeared on the way back.

The rustle of the hedges grows more pronounced, shaking violently on either side of him, then right up ahead. In front of him, hands burst forth from each side, spilling out all the way from the top to the ground, clawed fingers desperate to grab onto something. Regulus' chokes out a harsh breath and dives forward through it.

A sword slices right beside him, sending various hands to the ground, gushing blood, the scent of it thick in his nose. He shakes off the harsh grip of one clawed hand on his arm, nails digging in, swiveling his dagger to slam down into the wrist as he wrenches himself free with a snarl.

He trips forward and skids in the dirt, scrambling to propel himself around the corner that opens itself in front of him, the hedge shuddering as it parts.

Regulus makes it through, still sprinting, still outrunning the hands that continue to burst free from either side of him. He doesn't look back, but he can hear the pounding of footsteps behind him, just one pair, one person panting.

Regulus doesn't care who it is, or that the group just got split up. He just keeps running, and he doesn't stop.

"What the fuck is that?" Marlene chokes out.

Sirius is already backing up, his heart racing as he watches the fog spill out around a corner up ahead, a cloud of bright green pouring out along the passage in front of them. He has no idea what that is, but he doesn't doubt that it's bad news.

"Run!" Sirius orders sharply, then does just that himself, pivoting on the spot and taking off. He can hear the others following, even Eli, who is wheezing as he goes.

Sirius dives around the first corner he comes across, and he keeps going, sucked into the lure of his survival instincts where running is the only thing he knows. His ears ring. He can feel his heart beat in his teeth, and he wants to bite, chew, and taste just how badly he wants to live. He forgot this; he forgot just how this feels, that knife's edge of the worst thing he's ever experienced and the most exhilarated he's ever been.

You never truly do feel as alive as when death is breathing down your neck.

Sirius turns, and he runs. He turns, and runs, and turns, and runs. He goes and keeps going and feels like he's going nowhere, convinced that there is something nipping at his heels, reaching for his ankles, and one give in his stride will end with him on the ground, then beneath it, in his grave.

The world has faded away, and everything else is lost. He doesn't know where he is, where his allies are, or what he's actually running from. He just feels, intrinsically, that he cannot give into the waiting embrace of death that tries to yank him back by his collar, that whispers like the wind against the shell of his ear.

I will have you, eventually, it says. I have everyone, eventually.

Not yet. Not yet. Not yet, not yet, not yet.

And so, Sirius runs, and he doesn't stop running until he takes a corner and slams directly someone else, stumbling from the impact of it until he almost tips. The crash brings the world into sharp focus, and the first thing he hears is weeping.

Sirius inhales sharply when he gets his bearings enough to take in Camilla right in front of him, one eye clawed out, blood pouring down her cheek. There are deep gouges all over her face and neck, as well as her arms and legs, and Sirius' stomach lurches when he recognizes it.

"There were—all the hands, there were so many hands," Camilla chokes out. "They—they kept clawing at me. They—"

"Okay, hey, okay," Sirius blurts out as she shifts like she's going to rush past him. "No, you can't go that way. Trust me, it's not a good idea. There's some kind of green fog, and I'd bet my life on it being deadly, so not that way, okay?"

"We can't go back that way," Camilla sobs, gesturing shakily behind her. "The hands. There's so many fucking—"

Sirius reaches down to grab her hand, swallowing thickly as he looks at her. One eye is fine, the other is a bloody mess. "I can see a place to turn up here. Come on."

"The hands—"

"I promise, if there are hands, we won't go that way."

Camilla's shoulders hitch. "There's nowhere to go."

Seeing that Camilla isn't in the best of states at the moment, which is fair, Sirius just keeps a firm grip on her hand and tugs her into a run. He's lost everyone else, has no idea where they are, but he knows no one has died. There's no cannon. It just seems that the maze is a fucking minefield of horrors at this particular moment. Camilla is right, though. There really is nowhere to go; they're all just rats in a maze with no way out, guided from one nightmare to the next.

The running resumes, now with someone Sirius never really expected to find himself with in the first place. Camilla is still crying, even as she stumbles along behind him.

They sprint down one passage, then take a corner to run up the next. There's an opening halfway down that Sirius tugs them into, only to come to a screeching halt when hands proceed to burst forth from the hedges in front of them. Camilla bumps into his back, then screams.

For a second, Sirius stares at the hands and can't move, thinking of Regulus, the river, the scars on his skin to this day. Camilla yanks at the back of his shirt, pulling on him, and Sirius blinks as the world tilts. He's there, and then—

Sirius blinks again to find himself running, Camilla' scream still ringing in his ears. They're going in the opposite direction, backtracking again. They're—

Sirius blinks as they stop and stumble back, watching a green fog spill out from a corner up ahead, and—

Sirius blinks—

Sirius blinks—

Sirius—

"Oh no," Remus whispers. "No, no, no."

His eyes are locked on the screen, heart in his throat as he watches that curtain fall in Sirius' eyes. A light flickering, and then it goes out, and then he's gone. Blank. There, but not.

"What?" Pandora whines. "What is it? Remus, what—"

The thing is, Remus recognizes it. That fog. The shade of it. He remembers it, even through his torture, what it looked like when it came from a canister. It nearly killed him, and was that it? Was he just a body in an experiment for the games? A mere step on the sequence of events that would lead to this moment, where—what? Other servants died to it. Were they trying to find the right formula where it would cause pain, but not kill? Was Remus the success that led to this?

"Sirius is—he has—there are times when he—when he just sort of—" Remus swallows, the words catching in his throat, and he stares helplessly as Camilla tugs frantically on Sirius' arm, trying to get him to move again. Sirius doesn't.

"Why isn't he running?" Pandora asks desperately, fitfully, her eyes glimmering with tears. She has her hands clasped tight together, legs bouncing up and down with pure anxiety.

"He's not there," Remus croaks. Come back, he thinks, staring at Sirius with wide eyes. Come back. You have to come back now, right now, sweetheart, or you're going to—

The hedge next to Sirius abruptly parts, opening up into a new passage, and Camilla proceeds to shove Sirius inside and dive in after him just as the fog spills out closer and the hands burst free on the other side of where they were just standing.

Remus exhales.

Sirius still isn't there, not really, but he starts running once he's in motion, seemingly just because Camilla tugs on him. It's eerie watching Sirius go through the motions of it, running with no expression. He's not going to remember this, not this part, and Remus wonders if that's a kindness.

"Oh, this is so bad. I feel sick," Pandora gasps out, her arm coming up to cradle her stomach. "This is sick, Remus. It's always been sick, but this—"

"I get it," Remus rasps, because he does.

No one inside that maze isn't going through it right now. All of them are running for their lives. Each group is broken up to the point that it's either people running in pairs, or people running alone. Death is surrounding them on all sides, every single one of them. They all just want to survive.

That's all they're trying to do.

Survive.

Remus continues to watch Sirius, waiting desperately for him to come back to himself, needing to see it, to be sure. It's not the first time Sirius has slipped away. Remus saw him do it briefly during the highlight reel for last night, after Marlene poked him awake with a stick and he came up swinging. It hadn't lasted too long, and he wasn't in immediate peril, so it wasn't as concerning as this is.

It doesn't take that long for Sirius to come back this time either, thankfully. Remus watches it happen, watches him give a harsh blink and stumble a bit in surprise to find himself running, watches him essentially shake it off with a grimace and just—keep running. Of course he does.

It's not like he can do anything else.

Pandora makes a small, muffled noise of fear. "Remus, they can't all run forever, but—but I don't think this is really something any of them can fight. They have no chance, and it's not fair. It's—it's wrong."

"I know," Remus says softly. "Maybe that's the point."

The room is dead silent, packed with so much tension that no one even seems to be breathing. James stands next to Frank, eyes wide as he flicks gaze between the screen and the map displaying the positions of all the tributes.

"This is about to get messy," Frank whispers.

"It's already a mess," James croaks.

It is. It's such a fucking mess in that arena right now, for pretty much everyone. Majesty is alone, running from hands. Lester is alone, running from fog. Bellatrix and Narcissa got split up running from both. Marlene is alone with a broken arm, running for her fucking life. Augusta and Alice are running together, while Alecto is alone, just like Dixon is. Eli and Emmeline are together, an unlikely pair the same way Sirius and Camilla, Rabastan and Asher, and Regulus and Yaxley are—though, Regulus doesn't seem to even realize that Yaxley is running behind him, and since it's the fucking hands they're running from, James isn't surprised by this at all.

They're all so caught up in the midst of escaping external threats that no one seems to care to turn on each other. It reminds James viscerally of the moment he and Regulus teamed up with Axus, Bernice, and Peter to take down the Hallow-made spider wearing Irene's face and torso. Survival is a strong motivator; it can rip people apart, and it can bring them together. James knows this. He's experienced both.

Again, James' eyes flick to the map.

The layout of the maze is intricate. It's a very large square, with one open space in the middle where everyone started, which contained weapons and a few bags of supplies. There are three others that contain food and more supplies, and no one has found those yet. One of them has a shelter with two crates containing food and various supplies, but it's scarce overall. The other two just have bags and two small platforms with a spread of the bare minimum when it comes to nutrition. And that's it. No animals to kill and cook, no streams to stumble across, no caves or trees to hide in.

It's like every tribute's worst nightmare, quite frankly. James hates the arena, purely because of how big of a mind-fuck it is. It only further snatches any sense of security from those inside it; everything they counted on is just—gone. The environment doesn't cater to anyone in any capacity.

That's not even counting that the fucking walls of the maze move. They shift and change whenever and wherever they like. They open up in certain places, then close in others. One passage will turn into a loop with no way out. James watched Majesty walk in a fucking circle for an hour straight.

James remembers how his mum said, once, that the games used to be just people thrown into a field and told to kill each other, and how no one could truly glamorize that. He's finding that this arena feels the same way, except worse, because the people within are thrown in to be tormented and toyed with all the while. It's sickening to watch.

The worst part is, James knows that there are some people out there who are actually enjoying it. People who wave off the tributes' nightmares with a roll of their eyes; people who get excited for the fights and thrive on the violence; people who always have, and still do, live for all that the hunger games stands for, no matter the arena, and—to them—the worse it is for those inside, the better it is for them watching.

They see these real people, and they have no empathy, none whatsoever. James could understand if it was fake, if these were paid actors and no one was actually set out to be hurt, because that's not reality. That's not real. That's just characters that don't actually exist, and no one is actually being harmed. But this? It's real. These are real people dying; these are real people suffering. How can anyone watch that and enjoy it?

It's like the difference between a secret fantasy and what someone is actually willing to do. James, for example. He has had dreams of Regulus, ah, using his dagger during…intimate moments, but is that something he'd actually do?

Well…

Okay, bad example.

Maybe this doesn't need a comparison. Maybe it should be simple enough to understand on its own. Maybe the fact that people—real, live people—are being tormented and killed, or forced to kill, is distressing enough by itself. Or it should be. James is pretty sure it's normal to find that distressing, which means everyone else needs to get a fucking grip.

The amount of people who find it distressing in the Hallow is on the rise, and James thinks he can see why. It's like tributes aren't really people to them, and they can only achieve the label of human by becoming a Victor, inviting a sense of realism to their lives just by being the one to live, and suddenly they are real to these people.

So, now, in the eyes of many Hallows, they're actually watching real people, because these are all Victors; they've already achieved humanity. It's harder for them to see it, and enjoy it, now that they've applied this sense of reality to it.

You look at a body and just see a body, and it doesn't really matter what happens to it because it is not your own, or someone's that you love. But…when you look at a body and see the soul within, too, you can't unsee it.

James remembers coming on the train a year ago, waving out at beaming faces, flashing smiles at those who screamed and cheered at him in pure delight.

"How can you stand yourself, doing that?" Regulus had asked.

"They don't know," James had replied, still smiling. "Just as we've been conditioned, so have they, Regulus. It's not really their fault, if you think about it. They didn't make the games."

"They watch them. They love them."

"Yes, just as they were taught to. Just as we watch them. Just as we were taught to dread them."

James remembers as if it was yesterday, and some part of him that struggles with time so much isn't entirely sure that it wasn't. His eyebrows scrunch together as he watches the screen. Slowly, he tilts his head.

Huh.

He feels the thought take shape in his mind, as farfetched and out of bounds as it seems, but it —fits. Minerva McGonagall is a strict professor, it turns out, and she appears to be teaching everyone who was conditioned to love the games to dread them instead. No one will be able to watch and continue on not knowing, not anymore. Now, why would she do that?

Is she doing it on purpose?

James turns that over in his mind for a bit, then ultimately lets it go, because no matter what lesson these people need to learn, he doesn't at all appreciate his best friend and the man he loves being used in the demonstration.

Regulus takes a corner and is instantly relieved to see a complete lack of hands, and he slows a little as he goes further in and finds the hedges calm. His chest is heaving, lungs on fire, and he just—he needs a second. Just one second.

Fuck.

Carefully, Regulus draws to a halt and raises both hands to brace on his head as he struggles to regulate his breathing, keeping a wary eye on the hedges, but no hands break free. He turns, slowly, and watches Yaxley jog to halt behind him. The idiot bends over and braces his hands on his knees, still gripping his short-spear, gasping for air.

"What," Yaxley wheezes, "the fuck?"

Okay, that's a fair assessment, actually, but Regulus dislikes Yaxley enough that he doesn't bother to agree or respond. He just stands there and feels his racing heart slowly start to calm.

After a bit, Yaxley straights up and tilts his head back as he blows out a deep breath. Regulus stares at him, lowering his arms, his dagger gripped in one hand. Yaxley drops his head forward and looks at him. They're both very still, suddenly.

Regulus' fingers twitch around his dagger. He could…

It'd be simple, really. Just one flick, and the blade would bury into Yaxley's fucking skull. Regulus could lie again, to the others, lie and say that Yaxley was ripped apart by the hands. He could describe it in detail, because he knows what it feels like. He could make it believable.

It's one less person to deal with, and they're all going to have to die anyway. Regulus wouldn't be defending himself, though. He would be killing just to kill, and he's never… He hasn't actually done that before. It was never about taking someone's life when he was taking lives. The closest he ever came to that was Irene, but that had been mercy. A kindness, some would say. It still haunts Regulus, despite that.

But Thorfinn… He killed Thorfinn, not out of self-defense or kindness or even an accident.

Murder is murder, and Regulus doesn't feel good about it, any of it, but his feelings on killing Thorfinn are very similar to his feelings on killing Quinn. He didn't particularly want to kill them; he just…did, as a response, without really thinking about it beforehand. An instinct, really. Quinn threw her spear at Evan, so Regulus threw his dagger at her. Thorfinn said he'd have to be killed to be stopped from going after Sirius, even though Regulus explicitly told him what he'd do about that, and so Regulus killed him. Newton's third law: for every action in nature there is an equal and opposite reaction.

But, to kill Yaxley now, that would be murder for murder's sake. Well, the laws of that are complex here, in the arena, when murder is forced upon people. However, Regulus could simply not kill Yaxley, at this moment, because Yaxley has done nothing to warrant it, other than be someone Regulus doesn't like. He hasn't threatened Sirius explicitly; he hasn't tried to attack Regulus; he hasn't done anything, really.

Before Regulus can decide either way—because, internally, he is genuinely debating it—the sound of approaching steps from behind snatches his attention, along with Yaxley's. They get maybe five seconds to brace themselves, and then two people are barreling around the corner and colliding directly into them so hard they all go tumbling to the ground.

Regulus rolls with the motion, coughing harshly as he shoves himself back and braces one knee on the ground. When he lifts his head, the first thing Regulus sees is his brother.

The second thing he sees is Sirius' fist, just the flash of it, just seconds before it collides with the side of his face.

Well, yeah, okay.

Fair's fair.

Chapter End Notes

to give a bit more in depth warnings for this chapter: at some point through the night, regulus wakes up to find it raining. he doesn't handle it well, and it's stated that he cries/suffers/has panic attacks though it. but he does survive and continue on the following morning.

just the same, sirius experiences dissociative amnesia again, twice. one time is shown through outside povs and he's not in immediate danger. the second time, he is actively running and in danger—it's brief, and he does come back to himself to keep running.

there's a character who is injured where it's depicted that they have claw marks and one of their eyes is very badly injured. it's only mentioned a few times and nothing too explicit, but still.

to everyone else!

WELL.

okay first, shoutout to rae (rollercoasterwords) who called james sending regulus a bagel in the arena all the way back on, like, chapter 39 (i think???) when i said the bagel would be angsty and it WAS, briefly, when james was being petty, but it's sweet again. they were literally convinced that sirius and regulus were going back in the arena and james would be their sponsor because of that damn bagel comment, and they were RIGHT. it's literally using the wrong formula to get the correct answer and i am in awe of them.

regulus dreaming about james 😭 he's just like me!!! but it turning into a nightmare. that's rough, buddy. (sorry i have to make jokes to cope). look, the rain was rough, and i can tell you all that it will NOT be happening again. the rain, that is.

but that juxtaposition between bellatrix playing in the rain while regulus has silent panic attacks a few feet from her, compared to sirius somewhere farther away jumping up out of his sleep as soon as he registers that it's raining because he knows regulus isn't okay. IM GONNA CRY 😭😭😭 then dorcas!!! her being so, so worried about marlene, just so desperate to save her and all the tributes, but she can't yet. BUT LILY COMING IN A CLUTCH!!! these two are NOT playing around. they've decided to dismantle the hunger games and deconstruct the entire plan of the war from the inside of the organization they're affiliated with, and it has taken them LESS THAN A WEEK!!! they're icons, i tell you. where would we be without them?

also the third night!!! only three nights!!! these people just have to survive the rest of this day, then all of the next. should be simple, right? 😃 cut to james!!! on my knees for this man!!! yes babe, threaten to kill people for the love of your life and your best friend!!! king behavior! shout-out to remus "gossipmonger" lupin who went running right to james to tell him EVERYTHING. also shoutout to frank "ill help you beat lucius malfoy up" longbottom, another king!!!

the maze!!! it is getting increasingly more fucked up as we go along, and like. that's the whole point. the callbacks to the past arena with the hands, the introduction of the fog, and that's not even IT.

also just. the whole thing of like, all the tributes being traumatized and dealing with ptsd and all of that. because like, yeah, some of these people have had years between their last arena and this one, but that doesn't matter. and it's like, forcing the viewers to see that, forcing the viewers to acknowledge how fucked up this all is—well, its like with slughorn but on a broader scale. there can't be pushback against a problem that someone doesn't know is there, and yeah some people just flat-out don't care, but some don't even know that there's a problem at all. and now they're seeing it.

oh!!! oh and that bit between marlene and sirius!!! they mean so much to me ☹️ the fact that marlene didn't want to disappoint him, and them saying they're proud of each other!!!

and then regulus and sirius meeting, with fists! sorry im just. im laughing a little because sirius was so eager to find regulus, then immediately punched him when he did 😭 he doesn't even MEAN to, that's the hilarious part. we'll see more of them in the next chapter, which im INTENSELY excited for.

since no one died this chapter, and the numbers are the same as the last, ill do honorable mentions instead bc i lowkey miss them:

-"its a bagel" LMAOOO BELLATRIX THAT WAS FUNNY IM SORRY SHE WAS SO UNIMPRESSED 😭
-regulus calling james his fiance
-emmeline, eli, pandora my beloved <3
-lily. just lily. HER FLIRTING WITH EFFIE GOODBYE
-effie and monty watching the games ☹️
-remus having no idea what the green fog is or how it works, but knowing his involvement is fucked up
-james literally sending regulus a message that just says "???" PLS HES SO REAL 😭 -people protesting outside riddle's castle <3
-some of marlene's family being okay!!!

Brother

listen, please listen, this chapter is very, VERY heavy in some parts, so i will be putting a brief summary in the end notes and some reassurances for those of you who need it, which is very valid.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

The thing is, Sirius doesn't even mean to hit him.

Now, don't get him wrong, he had fully intended to smack the fuck out of Regulus the moment he got in range, purely just to get him back for punching him and stealing his supplies. He's even agitated, a bit, that this hit isn't what that's about.

But, really, Sirius just reacts on instinct. He slams into someone, is shoved, and naturally just lashes out with his fist before he even thinks about it. He's coming down from the rush of running for his life, then unexpectedly thrown off his feet, and then he's punching his little brother in the face before he even realizes what's happening at all.

Regulus eats it. He takes the hit like he was waiting for it.

Slowly, Regulus rolls his head back up, cheek red from where Sirius hit him, and then he smiles. It's not a nice smile at all, and it's followed by a low, raspy laugh. "Oh. Ha. Yeah."

And then he's launching off the ground to punch Sirius so hard that he stumbles back with a grunt. Before he can even get his balance, Regulus is grabbing him by the front of his shirt and dragging him around to shove him down to the ground. Regulus hits him again, and Sirius hits him right back, and oh shit, they're having an all-out brawl.

It's mean. It's nails and hair-pulling and brutal in the way only siblings can be. In mere seconds, they've both made each other bleed, and they don't seem inclined to stop there.

Sirius huffs as he kicks out and slams his boot into Regulus' leg, earning a low hiss of pain, and he uses the space to scramble backwards along the ground. Again, he lifts his leg and kicks once more, his boot colliding with Regulus' chest so hard that he wheezes as he goes sailing back, hitting the ground with a thud and a low groan.

Sirius drags himself to his feet, panting, then spits out blood at his feet as he scowls at Regulus, who is slowly pushing himself up to stand, his movements full of strain.

A grunt from the side steals both of their focus, and they swivel at the same time to see Yaxley and Camilla fighting. Despite Camilla's injuries, she's swinging her club at Yaxley's head with frightening precision.

Sirius doesn't even think about it; he just immediately dives into the fray, reaching out to snag Yaxley by the back of his shirt and wrench him around. Yaxley stumbles, then slams his elbow down into Sirius' arm to get free. He trips forward and knocks into Regulus, who he promptly moves to stand behind, as if Regulus is going to protect him.

Regulus' expression falls flat immediately. He looks absolutely unamused by this turn of events.

"Well?" Yaxley demands, nudging Regulus in the back. "Go on, Regulus, kill him."

Sirius blinks, then he busts out laughing. He nearly drops his spear from the way laughter flows through him and just seems to jump free from his mouth. "Kill—wait, kill? Who, me? Regulus? Regulus kill me? How stupid are you, Yaxley? He's not going to kill me. I'm his brother, idiot."

"You know, Black, that's your problem," Yaxley tells him with a sneer. "You're so fucking arrogant."

"This isn't arrogance. This is fact," Sirius argues. "I don't know where you get off on treating him like some sort of ally—"

This time, Yaxley is the one who laughs. His eyes light up, and he shakes his head. "Oh? Oh, this is just too good. You mean you don't know? You don't even know, do you? Goodness, Regulus, did you not tell him?"

Slowly, Sirius' eyes crawl to Regulus, who holds his gaze steadily, and it's like the world falls out from beneath Sirius' feet for a moment. He feels suspended here, completely weightless as everything gives way around him, and he's left hanging in the balance as everything he believes—everything he knows—is called into question.

Because of that look on Regulus' face. Because of that look in Regulus' eyes. Because, even after all this time, Regulus is still looking right at him the same way he did the moment he shut down at the reaping. Even here, in the arena, Regulus is lost to him. Sirius feels a lump form in his throat.

"No," Sirius rasps, his chest pulsing with this horrible, harsh pain that makes breathing difficult, and in this moment, he wishes James were here to sync his breathing to.

"Yes," Yaxley says with relish, gleeful.

"No," Sirius repeats in a croak, just looking at Regulus and waiting, still waiting, for it all to become clear, because surely Regulus wouldn't. He wouldn't. Not when—not when Sirius is the main target. "You're—no, you're not, Reggie. You're not."

Regulus is blank-faced when he says, blandly, "What? Not a death eater? Is that what you think?"

"Of course that's what I think, because you're not," Sirius bursts out, itchy all over and desperate, his heart beating hard and fast in his chest. "You—you wouldn't be, because they want me dead, and you could have just stayed with me. So, you wouldn't. You're not. You wouldn't do that to me."

"Oh, but that's exactly what I did," Regulus says softly, and Sirius inhales sharply, freezing in place. Regulus' eyes flash, glinting like blades. "I joined them the moment Bella offered. I jumped at the chance, even. So, who's the idiot, Sirius? Because, if you ask me, it's you."

Sirius holds his breath for a long moment, staring at him, and then he exhales and slowly narrows his eyes. "So, you want to kill me, is that it? You think you actually can?"

"Why wouldn't he be able to?" Yaxley interjects, lips curling into a smirk. "You wouldn't be his first kill. I mean, he already killed Coen, so he's clearly capable."

"Uh," Camilla says, "that's bullshit."

"No one asked you," Regulus snaps, tossing her a harsh glare.

Camilla scoffs, looking offended. "Oh, hell no. I did not spend nearly a decade of my life trying to kill that bastard for some little entitled bitch of a brat to try and take the credit. Fuck that and fuck you. I killed Coen. That was me."

"I understand it must have been difficult for you, not getting to kill him," Regulus says calmly, "but creating a false narrative in your head to cope isn't actually reality. It's also not healthy. Perhaps you should seek help."

"Camilla," Sirius says warningly, because he can see her shoulders tense as she flexes her fingers around her club.

"You lying snake," Camilla snarls, then proceeds to launch herself forward right at Regulus.

All hell breaks loose immediately. Camilla and Regulus get into a tussle, and Sirius surges forward to—well, he isn't really sure, at this point, still rather stuck in protect Regulus mode. It's not a mode he's sure he can come out of, honestly.

Yaxley takes the opportunity to sucker punch Sirius while he's distracted, and Sirius releases a low growl of frustration as he whips around towards him, wild-eyed and furious. Yaxley's eyes go round and big with alarm, and he frantically tries to drive his short-spear forward, but Sirius swings his own spear in an arc to knock the aim to the side.

There's the clatter of spear handle against spear handle, and Sirius shoves up with a grunt to yank the short-spear from Yaxley's hand. It goes flying and skids along the ground. A short yelp escapes Yaxley as Sirius snatches him forward by the collar, then proceeds to headbutt him in the face.

Yaxley curses and shoves Sirius back, stumbling forward into him and trying to wrestle the spear from him. Sirius trips backwards until he collides into something—no, someone. Ironically, he finds himself pressed back-to-back with Regulus, who is trying to fight off Camilla.

"You're a fucking death eater?!" Sirius snarls as he dodges Yaxley's elbow.

"Yeah, it doesn't feel good, does it?!" Regulus snarls back, ducking to the side just as Camilla's club comes swinging past Sirius' arm, where Regulus' head just was.

"How is this even comparable, you little shit?!" Sirius bellows, swinging his knee up to slam it between Yaxley's legs, making him choke and bend over with a low moan of pain. "I fucking volunteered for you! This—you're literally contributing to have me killed, Regulus! That's not even close to the same thing! That's, like, the opposite thing!"

"Betrayal is betrayal is betrayal!" Regulus shouts, and he leans back into Sirius harshly as he kicks out with his leg. Sirius can hear Camilla's gasp as the kick lands.

"Betrayal?! You fucking dramatic little—"

"Me?! I'm dramatic?! You're dr—"

"Oh, for fuck's sake!" Sirius bursts out, officially done with this shit, reaching the end of his rope.

Okay, no more playing around. Sirius surges forward and slams the heel of his hand into Yaxley's nose, hooking his foot around his ankle and sweeping. Yaxley hits the ground with a choked noise, and he doesn't have enough time to get his breath back before Sirius swivels his spear up and drives it down into his chest. It's quick, a strike that lands fast and hard enough that Yaxley curls up from the force of it, blood splattering against his lips when he coughs.

Sirius yanks the spear out harshly, the open wound of Yaxley's chest gushing immediately. Yaxley rasps and scrabbles at his chest, stunned as the light slowly dims in his eyes, bleeding out. He tries to say something, but Sirius does not care what he has to say. He turns around to see Regulus shoving Camilla back, who instantly lifts her club to swing it at his head. He ducks at the same time that Sirius jerks forward and launches his spear at her with ruthless precision.

The spear embeds itself right in Camilla's chest, landing so hard that her feet come off the ground as she sails back before she drops with a choked noise, then goes still.

A cannon. That'd be Yaxley.

A beat.

Another cannon. That'd be Camilla.

Regulus heaves out a harsh breath, then turns to face him, and they glare at each other in thick silence.

"Did you even kill Coen?" Sirius snaps.

"No," Regulus admits with no shame whatsoever.

Sirius grinds his teeth. "Regulus Arcturus Black, I do not know what has gotten into you—"

"Oh, well, don't you sound just like Mother?" Regulus hisses, and Sirius rears back in offense. Regulus curls his lip in distaste and mocks, "Sirius Orion Black, what has gotten into you? We didn't raise you this way. Blah, blah, fucking blah. That's what you sound like, I hope you know. You sound stupid."

"You sound stupid," Sirius corrects. "You are stupid. What the hell were you thinking, being allies with the death eaters? Reggie, you can't trust them."

"But I can trust you?" Regulus retorts.

"Yes! Fucking obviously!" Sirius' eyes bulge as he flings his arms out. "Are you mental?! You're my little brother!"

Regulus only seems to get angrier. "No, but I did trust you, Sirius! I fucking trusted you, and what did you do? You ruined it. You ruined everything."

"Regulus," Sirius grits out, "if you don't start using your mind, I'm going to think you've lost it."

"You are the worst person in this world. You are the worst fucking brother anyone could have," Regulus hisses, marching forward and reaching out to shove Sirius in the chest. "You promised. You promised me—"

"Yeah, well, I lied," Sirius cuts in coldly, swatting Regulus hands away with a scowl. "Didn't you do the same? What room do you have to judge me when you—"

"It's different!" Regulus argues furiously, eyes blazing, face a furious red. A grown man acting like a fucking child. Sirius wants to grab him and shake him. "I was going to lose James anyway, don't you get it?! I never even really got to have him! But you—I got you back. I had you back, and you took that from me. You weren't—you promised you wouldn't do that. How could you do that, after I—I begged you not to? And for what? Me? You think you did it for me? No, you did it for you. You tossed me aside, and it's not even the first time!"

"Do you realize how childish you sound?" Sirius asks sharply, staring him down. "You sound like a child throwing a fit because you didn't get your way. Grow up, Regulus."

"You won't let me!" Regulus roars, and Sirius flinches in pure surprise, his eyes widening. "You won't fucking let me. This is what you made me. Disappointed by your own design? You have no one to blame but yourself, because you won't respect me like an adult, because you look at me and see your little brother like I'm still a kid you have to take care of, which is ironic, because you didn't even do that right."

Sirius is not prepared for how much those words hurt. They sting. A lot. Oh, boy, do they sting. He—he tried really hard to take care of Regulus, he truly did, but…

Swallowing, Sirius hoarsely whispers, "I was a kid, too."

"Yes, I know," Regulus says, his volume dropping and his voice going cold. His eyes are colder. "The one who didn't grow up is you, Sirius, not me. You're still that kid trying to protect me at every turn, but I got older, and I learned to take care of myself, and I don't need you anymore."

"Shut up," Sirius says reflexively, his mouth dry, heart thundering hard in his chest. You do, he thinks desperately. You do need me. You'll always need me.

"You cannot even begin to imagine how much I hate you," Regulus informs him, his voice clipped. "How much I've always hated you . The most freeing parts of my life were the ones you weren't involved in."

"Shut up," Sirius repeats, a loud ringing in his ears.

"What I regret most isn't that you broke your promise, Sirius," Regulus continues. "It's that I wasted time caring enough to ask for a promise from you at all."

Sirius squeezes his eyes shut, trying to think, needing to think. It's difficult, very difficult, to push past the spiraling thoughts in his head to try and be rational. Regulus' words cut into him more deeply, more ruthlessly, than his dagger ever could.

"And I don't anymore," Regulus presses on. "Care, that is. It's liberating, honestly. Seeing who you are, truly, after being fooled into thinking you could ever be worth my effort. See, you're stifling. You're selfish. You're every single thing Mother and Father ever said about you. I didn't understand then, but I get it now, what they saw when they looked at you, and why they were so fucking disappointed."

No.

No, it's not right.

No, it just doesn't fit.

Sirius' mind just—doesn't accept it. Not this. Not from his little brother. His little brother. Always his little brother.

Slowly, Sirius peels his eyes open and stares at Regulus, and really, it's the mention of their parents that truly solidifies it for Sirius. Because all he can think about is how, after their parents died, it was Regulus who still loved them. Even after everything they'd put him—both of them—through, Regulus still fucking loved them so much that he couldn't get out of bed for days after they died, and still, even now, misses them when he barely has anything to miss.

"Oh, you're clever," Sirius breathes out, and Regulus blinks, visibly startled. "You—okay, I don't give you enough credit, I can see that. You little genius. I mean, you're still a prick, just to be clear, but that—that almost worked."

Regulus stares at him, then flatly says, "What?"

"You almost had me going," Sirius admits with a snort, shaking his head as he lazily reaches out to slap the dagger out of Regulus' hand, watching it land on the ground before he broadens his stance. "Alright, Mr. Death Eater. Give it a go."

"Give…it…a…go," Regulus repeats slowly.

Sirius' lips twitch, and he arches an eyebrow. "Yeah, you're a death eater, right? You hate me, want me dead, all that. So, give it a go." Regulus just stares at him some more, and Sirius shakes out his hands, rolls his head on his neck, and bounces in place. He grins. "Come on, Reggie, haven't you ever wondered who's better between me and you?"

"No," Regulus says shortly. "I know that already."

"Ah, but what if you're wrong?" Sirius teases.

Regulus sighs. "I'm not."

With that, Regulus shifts forward, and Sirius meets him halfway; hand to hand and hit for hit; two stars colliding in the middle of the day while the brightest laughs like they're not in the midst of burning themselves up.

It's honestly a bit fun, despite everything. The rush of it has Sirius' blood pumping, his whole world narrowing down to blocking every single hit Regulus throws at him. He dodges, leans out of the way, dances out of range; still laughing; utterly breathless as keeps himself out of reach, watching Regulus try desperately to close the distance.

Perhaps that's a bit messed up, but Sirius can't help but be ridiculously warmed by it. Regulus —that's the thing with him, really. His actions have always spoken for him, no matter what words left his mouth. Regulus can say anything he likes to imply he despises Sirius, and yet, here he is, doing everything in his power just to touch him. To have him again.

"Oh, you'll want to stop leaving yourself open here," Sirius announces, swatting Regulus in the side gently. He busts out laughing and jerks back when Regulus tries to slam his fist into the side of Sirius' face, only narrowly missing. "Your form is good, really, but you're getting sloppy."

"Fuck off," Regulus snarls, then tries to hit him again.

Sirius easily pushes his arm aside and says, warmly, "You know, I'll bet you killed a death eater, didn't you? Not Coen, you said, so… Thorfinn? Did you kill Rowle, Reggie?"

"So?" Regulus snaps, abruptly pausing in place to squint at him, his chest heaving.

"Doesn't make for a very good ally," Sirius points out, amused.

"He provoked me," Regulus mutters. "Can't help that. It's not a reflection of my loyalties."

"Mhm," Sirius hums skeptically. "Sure it's not."

Regulus' lips flatten out. "Just what are you insinuating?"

"Tired yet? Need a break?" Sirius asks with a grin, raising his eyebrows. "If you have to catch your breath—"

Sirius yelps and ducks hastily when Regulus' hand darts out. He's fast. Always has been, really. Sirius can't say who's faster between them, because he suspects it depends on the circumstances and just what they're trying to prove. At the moment, Regulus has something to prove, but bully for him, because Sirius isn't buying it.

There's another round of Regulus repeatedly trying to beat the ever-loving shit out of him, and Sirius repeatedly not letting him do so. It's a fun round. Sirius wins again, and he's laughing by the end, when Regulus jerks away with a low sound of frustration. He stomps off, utterly furious, then paces back towards Sirius, looking like he's out for blood.

"Fight back!" Regulus snaps, looking so pent up and rattling with so much rage that it's sort of just—sad. "I didn't take you for a fucking coward. Of all the things you've been, I can at least say you've never been that. What's this, then?!"

"I don't have to fight you," Sirius says simply. "I can beat you without ever laying a hand on you. I'm better, Reggie. I just am, and that's okay. I had to be, for you. I had to be, for this. So, I am, and you can take your time coming to terms with that; you really have some things to work through—"

"You absolute bastard," Regulus hisses, swinging out with his fist again, which Sirius artfully dodges.

Sirius sighs wistfully. "Oh, if only. But no, sadly, I am our parents' son. Their eldest. Less sadly, your big brother."

"I wish you weren't," Regulus spits out.

"Liar," Sirius replies, swatting Regulus upside the head and kicking his feet further apart. "You're not staying steady in your balance. Think about your center of gravity, yeah? If you stand like that, instead of this, you'll be easy to take down."

"Stop it! Just—fucking stop," Regulus declares, smacking at Sirius' hands and glaring at him. He takes a step back, gaze calculating and sharp. "You're not going to fight me."

"No," Sirius says. "I'm not."

Regulus clenches his jaw. "Why?"

"Because I know you," Sirius tells him simply. "You're mad, and you want to lash out, but you don't really want to hurt me. You couldn't kill me if you tried, not even if I gave you the chance. So, sure, you're a death eater. You're a death eater because you wanted to get back at me, since you're a mean, miserable little shit. You're also a death eater to make sure none of the others lay a hand on me. Let me guess, you told them only you could kill me? Something like that, yeah?"

"Oh, is that what you think?" Regulus blinks at him, and it's like all of his anger just—falls away. Before, he was a shattered window that let the storm from within spill out; now, just like that, he's boarded the window up, and everything is still from the inside out. "Has it ever crossed your mind to think that I joined the death eaters because I agree with them?"

Sirius smacks his teeth. "Oh, please. Give it up, Regulus. I've got you all figured out, and you can't fool me. You just can't."

"You've fooled yourself. I didn't even have to do anything; that's how much of an idiot you are," Regulus says. "You think I'm trying to protect you, really? That's more your thing than mine, isn't it?"

"You just do it differently," Sirius mutters. "Dramatically, to be more clear. Besides, you're angry with me. Of course you want to be a prick about the whole thing."

Regulus scoffs. "For fuck's sake, Sirius, you're clinging. Do you realize that? You're so desperate to believe I'd never hurt you that you're forming lies to cope with it. I didn't join the death eaters to protect you, you fucking idiot."

"And what about James?" Sirius asks bluntly, and Regulus goes very still. Sirius hums. "Yeah. He's watching right now, you know. Watching us both. Are you really just alright with, what, killing me right in front of him? You planned to?"

"James…" Regulus trails off, expression twitching, and then his face seems to turn to stone. "Everything I do, I do for James, and for me, and for us. He knows that. I told him that, and he'll understand that, when the time comes."

Sirius heaves a sigh. "You know James. You know him, Regulus. You know he'd never recover from it, and whatever you'd do to me, you'd never do that to him."

"You underestimate how much he loves me."

"No, you do, generally. I know how much he loves you. And I know you don't even fully realize it, because you don't know how to accept it, so I know you're not using that as an excuse to do whatever you're pretending you're trying to do in here."

"Okay," Regulus murmurs, "then you underestimate just how much I love him."

"I—" Sirius pauses, faltering, his mind skipping like a record bumped off the track. He can't help it, that insidious thought that, in his desperation to make it back to James, Regulus would cling to his anger at Sirius just to cope, let it twist into hatred so he could let Sirius die and not feel just how much it hurts. Regulus would do that. He's a messy, complex man thrown into impossible situations and wrestling with feelings he doesn't know how to handle. Sirius hesitates for a long beat, then shakes it off. "No, I'm not buying that either."

"You really want to believe in me that badly?" Regulus asks.

"I do believe in you," Sirius insists, like a challenge, just daring Regulus to prove him wrong, because he can't. He can't trick Sirius, can't sway Sirius, can't change Sirius' mind. "There is nothing in this world that you can say or do that will change that, Reggie. You're my brother. I love you. That's what it is, that's what it's always been, and that's what it will forever be."

Regulus doesn't crack. He doesn't thaw. He remains unmoved and cold. With a sharp nod, he turns on his heel and dips down to snatch the dagger out of the ground. He grips it tight, then stands, pivots, and moves right for Sirius.

"That's your mistake," Regulus announces, and then he's flinging himself forward, and it's—different.

It's immediately different than before.

Sirius can feel the shift, somehow. Regulus is different when he's fighting with a dagger, for one thing. Deadlier. Sharper, like he's becoming a part of the blade. Colder, faster, more ruthless. He's also just different now from moments before, as if he's done letting emotion take the lead.

It's harder, then, to block and dodge. Sirius does, but he's not laughing anymore, because he has to focus. He can't miss one move, one shift of Regulus' body, one flash of the dagger. If he does—well, if he does, Regulus is going to cut him.

It's that simple. It's not Sirius just letting Regulus blow off steam, not now. It's Sirius actively defending himself, because if he doesn't, he's going to get hurt. Possibly very hurt.

Sirius' survival instincts rear up within him, and when Regulus darts his hand out, Sirius catches his wrist and twists. He's trying to disarm him, get the dagger out of the equation, but Regulus—stubborn as he is—refuses to let it go. What he does, instead, is flip the dagger in his bent hand and slices.

Sirius lets him go with a curse, jerking back in disbelief, utterly astonished by the sight of the cut on his forearm where Regulus got him. Blood drips down in a small stream, a tiny crimson river that flows onto the ground.

It doesn't even hurt that much. It's not very deep, and Sirius has had worse, but it's disorienting purely because it's Regulus who has done it. He looks up with a reprimand on his tongue, only to inhale sharply when he sees Regulus still coming.

Sirius reacts without meaning to, yet again. He catches Regulus' hand with the dagger, then swings out with his free hand to punch Regulus right in the face. Regulus grunts, curses, and tries to correct where Sirius just threw him off course. Sirius doesn't let him, doesn't even give him time, just yanks on his wrist and gets an arm around Regulus' throat. Easily, swiftly, Sirius jerks Regulus around and brings his arms up to secure him in a headlock.

"Fucking quit it, you little shit," Sirius hisses in his ear. "This isn't going to work. You're just pissing me off."

Regulus doesn't respond outside of a snarl, and then he throws his elbow back into Sirius' chest hard. Sirius—stubborn as he is—doesn't let go. Regulus shifts, throwing his elbow back again, then reaches back to fist Sirius by the back of his shirt as he launches himself forward, bending in half and fully tossing Sirius right over him.

Sirius feels the world tilt in a swirling rush, and then he lands flat on his back with his breath punching out of his lungs. He wheezes for a second, blinking rapidly, then rolls out of the way when Regulus tries to bury his dagger in his shoulder.

With a grunt, Sirius scrambles to his feet and kicks out before Regulus can stand up. His boot collides into Regulus' cheek so hard that his head snaps to the side, a mark left in the shape of the tread of Sirius' boot, stark and dirty against flushed skin. It takes genuine effort for Sirius not kick him in the face again, then just stomp his fucking head into the ground. Anyone else, and their head would break open under his boot like a melon.

"Done throwing a tantrum yet?" Sirius grits out as Regulus rolls his jaw, then eases to his feet.

"Oh, is that what you think this is?" Regulus asks mockingly, tilting his head. "You've really convinced yourself, haven't you? That I wouldn't betray you. That I wouldn't kill you."

"You won't," Sirius declares. "You can hurt me, because I hurt you, but you won't cross a line. You can't, so just give up. Let it go, Reggie. I'm here. We're here, and it's done. Let's just fucking hug it out and get through this together."

"Only one of us can make it home," Regulus tells him.

Sirius softens, helplessly. "I know, and that's you. It's you, and I know you know that. I know you know I'll make sure you get home, and it hurts, it scares you, but giving into anger isn't going to help. It's only going to make it worse when I'm gone."

"I'm not going to be hurt at all," Regulus states, and he sounds like he means it. He looks like he means it. "I'm going to be entirely at peace when this is all over."

"Stop it," Sirius whispers. "Just stop. Don't you get it? You can't prove something I already know isn't real."

Regulus doesn't move, doesn't break his gaze, doesn't do anything for a long moment—and then, calmly, he says, "Are you willing to bet your life on that?"

"Yes," Sirius says firmly, then holds his arms out and leaves himself an open target. All Regulus has to do is throw his dagger, and that'll be it. He doesn't.

"Are you willing to bet someone else's life on that?" Regulus asks quietly, holding his gaze. "Your moon's, perhaps."

Sirius freezes. All of his muscles lock up as his heart starts beating hard and fast in his chest. "Regulus—"

"I know your moon, don't I, Sirius?" Regulus says, staring him down. "Oh, that would hurt, wouldn't it? That'd make you give up altogether, if I just so happened to say their name."

"Shut the fuck up," Sirius bursts out, frantic and ferocious in a heartbeat, feeling wild and untamed and pushed to the brink just that quickly, just that easily, because it's Remus. It's Remus, and Sirius can't be rational about Remus.

"Their life would be ruined the moment they were connected back to you," Regulus murmurs. "Because that's what you do. You ruin things. Why don't I share with the world just how easily you ruined the moon? A name. That's all it'll take."

"Don't you fucking dare," Sirius hisses, stepping forward and hearing his blood rush in his ears, instincts going haywire, everything thrown off balance by the threat. If Regulus says Remus' name, that's it. Remus is dead. He—he wouldn't do that, right? Remus is his friend. So, why does he look like that? Why is Sirius so scared? "Shut up. Stop. You wouldn't."

"No?" Regulus says softly, never breaking his gaze, never backing down. His mouth opens, slowly, lips shaping around the very first syllable, "R—"

Sirius doesn't let him finish. Doesn't even give him the chance. In seconds, he has Regulus flat on his back on the ground, hitting him once, twice, a third time.

"Shut the fuck up!" Sirius roars, shaking all over as he leans over Regulus and hovers his fist in threat.

Regulus coughs, then slurs, "R—"

Sirius hits him again.

Again.

Again.

And again.

Things go in and out, his mind in an uproar, and he's here, then gone, here, then not, and back again. Sirius feels like the world is spinning around him, swirling in a hazy wash of dull watercolors, the air stale and the stench of death and blood clinging to the inside of his nose.

Everything seems to fall apart, and it hurts, because this—it's proof. It's convincing. Sirius, for the first time, doesn't believe in his brother. Because Regulus wants to say Remus' name, and that would hurt Sirius more than dying by Regulus' hand. This isn't anger. This goes beyond Regulus just being angry at him. Regulus meant it. Oh, oh fuck, he meant it when he said Sirius was dead to him, and he's—he's actually trying to do it.

He actually wants to kill Sirius and get home, whatever it takes. His own brother. Sirius, who was going to die for him. Sirius, who still wants to. Sirius, who still would, if it wasn't for the fact that the man he loves is under threat.

And it's here, with Regulus underneath him, being beaten to death by Sirius' hands, that Sirius realizes he hates him, too.

After everything that Sirius did for him.

After everything that Sirius suffered for him.

After everything that Sirius tried so fucking hard to fix.

After all of that, it was Regulus who threw it away, angry and betrayed and hurt. His little brother. Always his little brother.

And Sirius hates him for it.

"I gave everything for you!" Sirius shouts, then hits Regulus again. "And this is what you give to me?!"

Regulus is gagging on his own blood.

"You ungrateful, spiteful, hateful piece of shit!" Sirius chokes out, his vision blurring with tears until the way Regulus lays there, face covered in blood, doesn't even seem real. Just a simple illusion. A dream. A memory he wants to hold onto and shove away in equal measure.

A rattling breath escapes Regulus, and he lifts his hand weakly, fingers slack around his dagger. "R—"

Sirius hits him again, heaving out a harsh breath that escapes him like a sob, hot tears dripping down the length of his nose as he confesses, "I hate you. I fucking hate you. Why would you do this? How could you do this to me, after I—after all of it? All I've ever done is love you! Everything I did, I did for you! It's your fault, and I hate that you were ever fucking born!"

Regulus pushes the dagger forward, still trying, still fucking trying, even now. It wobbles, swaying weakly through the air, too slow, laughably slow to the point that Sirius easily snatches it from his grip as he wheezes, "R—"

"Shut up!" Sirius bellows.

"You'll—" Regulus coughs again, eyes rolling around before settling on him once more. "You'll have to kill me."

"I will! Don't fucking push me, because I will," Sirius snarls, vibrating in place, suspended in this moment of horrible, sickening rage, and hurt, and betrayal, and fear.

Regulus just looks at him and whispers, "R—"

Sirius hits him with one hand to shut him up, and Regulus twists beneath him, wheezing, only for him to jerk to a halt the moment he sees Sirius raise the dagger up.

Sirius doesn't bring it down, but he wants to. He wants to so badly that he's shaking. He wants to drive the dagger down into Regulus' chest and twist. All he has to do is try to speak Remus' name again, and Sirius will. All he has to say is—

"It's okay," Regulus gasps, one bloodstained hand coming up to shakily cover Sirius' around the dagger. His fingers are slick as they wrap around Sirius' hand, and he swallows, he swallows his own blood just to look right at Sirius and choke out, "I love you, too. Wanted to say it for a while. Sorry. I'm so sorry I didn't. Sorry I'm saying it now, but I do. It's okay, right? It's okay. I love you, too."

Sirius feels a horrible, cold sensation slowly crawl through his body, and he can't—he can't move, can't look away from Regulus' face. His hands ache, knuckles busted, and his little brother lays bloody and beaten beneath him, under the threat of dagger's death, and Sirius is the one who put him there.

And he knows why.

He can see it, suddenly. It does become clear, then, all at once. Regulus did trick him. He did fool him. Just not in the way Sirius was prepared for. He never imagined this at all.

Regulus never intended to go home.

Sirius releases a whine and presses the back of his wrist against his mouth as he stares down at Regulus through the tears in his eyes. Oh. Oh, it's all coming together now.

Regulus knew Sirius was planning to get him home, and he knew Sirius would sooner kill himself than let Regulus do the same, and Sirius is better than Regulus. Faster. Stronger.

Even more efficient, depending on the circumstances.

There was no way Regulus could make sure Sirius got home unless Sirius did. Only Sirius could get himself home, and he wasn't going to, and that was the last obstacle Regulus had to get through. He knew exactly how.

Sirius wasn't going to let anyone kill his brother, and yet here he is, at death's door, because Sirius was tricked. Because Sirius faltered. Because Sirius was goaded into it like a fucking fool. Regulus was never going to say Remus' name, was he? Regulus found Sirius' button, and he pushed it, repeatedly, until he pushed Sirius right over the edge. On purpose.

Sirius wasn't going to let Regulus die for him, and so, Regulus pushed Sirius to kill him instead. A simple, effective plan to twist Sirius' mind around, banking on his survival instincts and just how much he loves Remus. A simple, effective act of turning himself into the bad guy, saying all the wrong things and siding with all the wrong people, becoming something Sirius could hate enough to fight, because once he started fighting, really fighting, that was it.

A sacrifice. It was a sacrifice.

I love you, too.

As if all the times Sirius has said it, every single one, there was an echo of Regulus returning it. There was. Sirius knew that. He knew Regulus loved him.

I love you, too.

How did he forget? How did he let himself doubt, even for a moment, even out of fear?

I love you, too.

The words crack open Sirius' chest, and he chokes out a harsh sob as he drops the dagger. His hands come up shakily to cup Regulus' face, and maybe it was true, maybe Regulus was right when he said Sirius still looks at him like a kid, because it doesn't matter to him that Regulus is twenty-six years old right now; Sirius looks at him and remembers, vaguely, so very vaguely, the way he had a lisp at the age of six because his front baby teeth fell out, so when he giggled and whispered Sirius' name, it didn't really come out right, but Sirius came running right to him every time anyway. It's been twenty years and twenty seconds, and Sirius is still here.

Regulus' eyes snap open, cloudy and hazy, then brighten with growing alarm as he takes Sirius in, weeping over him. His face is swollen and busted open, slashes of crimson across his pale skin, but his panic comes through loud and clear.

"Pick it up," Regulus croaks. "Pick it up. Sirius, pick it up."

Sirius shakes his head, sucking in a harsh breath, chest stuttering around his tears. Regulus lifts his hand to fist the front of Sirius' shirt, desperate, making a low noise. It sounds like he's begging. Again, Sirius shakes his head, eyes stinging. Regulus whimpers, his hand dropping.

The worst part is, Regulus would have seen it through. He got right there to the end before he slipped, before he fucked it up, because he's human, and in what he considered his last moments, he just wanted to say one final thing.

I love you, too.

"Then—then let me do it, okay? Let me do it. Please just let me do it," Regulus chants, his hand frantically patting at the ground as he tries to locate the dagger. Sirius shifts to kick it away hard, and Regulus starts crying in earnest. "Don't, please don't do this to me. Sirius, please just—please do it, or let me do it. Don't make me live without you, please don't, Sirius —"

Regulus is a bloody, blubbering mess and caught on the borderline of a fucking panic attack —and Sirius doesn't care. He reaches down to snag Regulus' collar and haul him up. He's a little limp and loose, delirious from Sirius beating the fuck out of him, so he flows like water and slumps easily into Sirius' body. Sirius wraps his arms around and holds him, staring blankly out at nothing as he cups the back of Regulus' head and the tears fall freely down his face.

Sirius can do nothing but sit there and listen to his brother plead with slurred, choked words. Plead to die. Plead for Sirius' life. Plead with desperation that overflows like a pipe finally bursting, flying apart under the pressure.

Eventually, Regulus gets so desperate that he tries an entirely different tactic. "James," he says. "Sirius, James needs you. He needs you. Don't—don't do this to him. Don't—"

"Regulus, Regulus, stop," Sirius orders firmly, drawing back to grab his shoulders and shake him a little bit. Regulus' chest rises and falls at a rapid rate, eyes wide and wild like an animal caught in a trap. "Stop. It's over. It's done, okay? You—you tried, and it didn't work, and that's it. Just stop."

"I'll—I'll say it. I'll say the name," Regulus chokes out.

Sirius swallows, then rasps, "No you won't."

"R—R—" and that's it. That's as far as he gets. Sirius does nothing, and Regulus' mouth remains open. Sirius waits, and then Regulus' busted lip begins to tremble as the building tears in his eyes spill over. He ducks his head forward and sobs out, "Fuck. Fuck."

"Yeah, I know, you little fuck-up," Sirius mumbles with a weak, tear-filled laugh. He cups the back of Regulus' neck and pulls him back into a hug.

Regulus drops his head down on Sirius' shoulder and weeps. His fingers twist in Sirius' shirt at his sides, clinging, restless. "I'm sorry. Fuck, I'm so sorry. I—I really—I tried."

"I know," Sirius whispers.

"I was trying so hard," Regulus gasps out, shaking and crying, crying and shaking. "I'm sorry. I'm—"

"I know, Reggie. It's okay. It's going to be okay." Sirius swallows harshly, because he knows, realistically, that it's not. It can't be. All this time, he's given so much thought to what his loss would do to James, and to Remus, but not so much to Regulus. A huge oversight on his part, Sirius now knows. He's going to have to leave his little brother, too. For some reason, he could never really look past knowing he would do anything he could to protect Regulus, even die to save him, to see that he would be leaving him behind. Again.

And that must have been the very first thing Regulus became aware of the second he heard Sirius volunteer for him. It's horrible, because the arena has brought Regulus back to him twice, once when Regulus became a Victor and right this very second, but for Regulus, all the arena does is take Sirius away.

Regulus leans against him and sobs like he just lost everything, and maybe, in a way, he did.

With a wince, Regulus dabs at his face with the supplies from the medkit in his—in Sirius' bag. Sirius took it back, and Regulus let him, not saying a word of protest.

Sirius sits beside him in silence, cleaning his arm up where Regulus sliced him open with a dagger.

The heli-carrier has already come by to scoop up Yaxley and Camilla, which is what initially got them to stop crying and separate, because oh, right, they're still in the middle of the fucking hunger games. Reality is a bitch, truly.

Sirius had gotten up to retrieve his spear from Camilla's body, then they started taking care of their injuries. Not speaking. Not looking at each other.

Regulus is worried if he opens his mouth, he'll throw up.

The thing is.

Well, you see, the thing is, Regulus had a plan, right? It was a good plan, and he knows this because it nearly worked. It would have worked if he hadn't fucked it up in the home stretch. All he had to do was keep his mouth shut, or pretend like he was going to say Remus' name again, and then just die.

He was so close. So fucking close.

But of course he fucked it up, because he's a fuck-up, and he always fails when it matters most for him not to. Was he scared to die? Yes, admittedly he was, but not nearly as terrified as he was to die without saying it at least once, just once, needing to say it, a selfish desire to prove that he does have that in him, and all that he was doing—all of it—was because he loves Sirius, too. Sirius and James.

A major part of the plan was making them angry with him. Making them hate him, even. Being someone easier for them to lose and let go of. Regulus knows through his parents that being angry with someone who dies doesn't make it hurt less, but he can only imagine the pain he'd feel if he hadn't been angry with them, if they were good people who never hurt him or Sirius, if they had done right by them.

He was trying, in his own way, to make it easier for them.

He fucked that up, too.

Regulus should have just fucking plucked up the dagger in the first five minutes and gotten it over with, but…well, how the fuck was he supposed to do that, knowing Sirius might have fallen apart after that? It would have hurt him, weakened him, and then the death eaters could have actually had a chance at killing him. Regulus had to be here; he had to, just to make sure no one got to Sirius.

It wasn't supposed to go like this. Regulus had hoped to get farther in the games and bring the numbers down significantly before he goaded Sirius into killing him. Because it had to be Sirius who killed him. Sirius is better—Regulus has always known that, and he was counting on that. If Sirius killed him, if he reached that point, then he'd get out. He'd keep going. He'd have no reason to stop and nothing holding him back.

All Regulus has ever done is hold Sirius back. Drag him down. Sink his claws into him and fretfully, desperately never want him to leave. Regulus could set him free, like this, and it's no less than he deserves, really, after all the pain and trauma and grief that Regulus has invited into his life.

Regulus is his little brother, and all that's ever done for him is make his life worse. Everything—all of it—is his fault. Sirius even said it. Yeah, Regulus wishes he was never born, too.

And, alright, a part of Regulus had hoped that maybe… Well, maybe, like this, Sirius would regret volunteering for him, because he should. Because he has every right to, and why doesn't he? Regulus can't stand it, being loved that much, being responsible for what Sirius' love costs him.

It always costs him.

This time, it's going to cost him everything. He doesn't even see it, why it needs to be him that gets out. How can't he see it? All the lives he's touched. All the people who need him. Effie, Monty, Andy, Pandora, Remus, James.

Oh, James…

Regulus, too. Regulus really needs it to be Sirius who goes home. Because how is he supposed to live with it? The fact that he's killed his brother; how does he carry the weight of that? How does he continue on with that always in the back of his mind? So, he killed himself, too.

It was an easy choice. It's no different than the decision Sirius made for him. Here they are, both of them walking corpses, slain by each other's hands and their own. Only one can keep going, at the end of all this. Only one of them can revive.

Regulus still wants it to be Sirius. It has to be, because Regulus is the sword Sirius picks up, and the sword Sirius falls on, and Sirius deserves the chance to let the sword go.

"Here," Sirius says curtly, holding out a water bottle.

Regulus takes it gratefully, because he can still taste blood in his mouth, and he feels dangerously close to being sick from it. He swallowed blood again. It makes his stomach churn.

The water helps. He swishes it in his mouth, spits it out, then actually sips some down. His entire fucking face is throbbing, but it's as clean as it's can get. It's probably a fright to see, swollen and busted open all over. One eye won't open all the way, and his bottom lip stings every time his mouth moves.

A soft chime has them both tilting their heads back to watch as a sponsor box floats gently down in the space between them. Neither of them move. They both just stare at it like it might bite them, equally wary and chagrined.

For the first time since their fight, they look at each other. Sirius arches an eyebrow. His face is swollen and bruised in certain places, but not nearly as bad as Regulus' at the moment. Regulus can't arch an eyebrow back, because it would hurt his face, so he just inclines his head to Sirius. He's not brave enough to face down a scolding from James first.

Sirius blows out a deep breath and reaches out to snag the box, drawing it into his lap. He hesitates, then flips it open to reach inside. There's a quiet hum of approval when Sirius pulls out a small container of salve for their injuries, which is admittedly relieving to see. What comes out after is two half-loaves of bread and a small spread of cheese for them to share.

"There's no note," Sirius breathes out, tipping his head back to stare up at the sky, stricken.

Regulus looks away, his eyes fluttering shut, chest pulsing with a harsh, horrible pain he almost can't breathe around. James' silence speaks volumes. He must be so upset. I'm sorry, Regulus thinks. I'm so sorry, James.

In silence, they open up the salve to put on their own injuries—Regulus needs most of it—and then they eat and pass water back and forth between them.

When that's done, Sirius stands up and waves him to his feet, mumbling that they should use the rest of the daylight they do have to get away from here. Just to move. Just to not stay in one place too long. The maze has made them paranoid, all of them most likely, but at least the hands have gone away.

The maze is calm now as they walk through it, walking in no direction, walking without a word between them. Sirius has Regulus' dagger, because he doesn't trust him with it. He even said so, blunt and harsh when he picked it up. That's fair.

They walk together in silence for hours.

Regulus doesn't know what to say. Sirius won't look at him, or acknowledge him, and Regulus can't stop himself from stealing quick peeks, waiting for something. Anything.

As the day passes, the salve does its job in healing Sirius, from what Regulus can see. The swelling goes down in his face and hands, bruises fading a bit and knuckles scabbing over. The cut on Sirius' arm scabs over last. Regulus' own face stops hurting as much, but he suspects, since he's worse off, he won't heal fully until tomorrow.

There's not a sound between them, other than their quiet and careful footsteps, along with the consistent rustling of the hedges they walk in the middle of. Regulus keeps waiting for hands to burst out and grab him, but they never do.

Neither of them really do much of anything until they take one corner and both suck in a sharp breath at the same time. In front of them is a small open, shed-like shelter with a back, two walls on either side, and a roof—all made of metal. Under it are two open crates that show packages of dried meat and fruit. Regulus thinks he sees a flashlight, too.

The area is small and square, compact with the shelter at the center, but there's one way in and one way out. At least at the moment. Regulus doesn't doubt that the hedges surrounding the open space could open up or shift; this maze is a fucking mess on one's mind. In fact, the maze isn't really a maze at all, at least not for everyone. A maze indicates there's a way out, but only one person will achieve that.

Sirius and Regulus trade a quick look, and then they move forward at the same time to head into the shelter and pick over the crates. It's very sparse, unfortunately. There is a flashlight, as well as enough food for them to put something else on their stomachs, passing a package of dried meat back and forth as they pick over everything else.

There's also two more bottles of water, which is good, because they finished off one and half already between drinking and cleaning up. One crate has a bit of rope that Sirius immediately plucks out of Regulus' hands to put in his bag. Regulus scowls, but again, fair is fair. He stole from Sirius first, after all. It's not much rope, from what Regulus can tell, only long enough to reach from his feet to his waist, at most.

Regulus wants his dagger, mostly. Despite what Sirius might be worried about, Regulus isn't going to do some sort of sacrificial suicide—at least not yet. Not until he's sure Sirius is the last one at the end, and then it's fair game.

Once the crates are cleared, they both toss them out and make use of the space and security the shelter gives them, putting their backs against the wall and peering out the open front.

The first thing Sirius says to him, after hours of silence, is a very harsh, "You're un-fucking-forgivable, you know."

"That was the plan," Regulus mumbles.

"You're a prick. You're—" Sirius' nostrils flare as he looks over at him. "I mean, the hypocrisy alone, Regulus…"

"I know," Regulus admits. "I know I'm a hypocrite, but so are you. How are you mad at me for doing the same thing as you?"

"You did it in a much worse way," Sirius snaps. "Or you were planning to. How do you think that would have felt for me, huh? If I—if I actually—"

Regulus tangles his fingers together in his lap. "It's—well, that's the thing, isn't it? If you had, you would have been justified. I—I made it to where you could kill me, and that'd be fair. You'd have reason to. You could hate me. So, you wouldn't have felt—I mean, you could—you could live with it, because I'm not a good person, and that's all I was showing you. What were you going to do? Mourn the brother who tried to kill you, who hurt you, who—who ruined your fucking life?"

"You're so fucking stupid," Sirius whispers, squeezing his eyes shut. He shakes his head sharply, lips pressed into a thin line, and then he looks right at Regulus. "Listen to me, there is no world in which I wouldn't mourn the loss of you, because it would be a loss. I don't care what you've done, or how bad of a person you make yourself out to be. You're my brother. Don't you get it? I would never be the same if I lost you. And, fuck, if I lost it enough to kill you? Do you—can you even imagine what that would do to me, Regulus? I—I would never get over that, no matter what you did to goad me into it. Even if all that you said out there was true and not just some trick, even if you crossed the line, I would never recover. Never."

"Oh." Regulus' shoulders slump.

Sirius stares at him incredulously. "Did you honestly not know that? You thought, what, that I'd just—carry on?"

"I hoped," Regulus chokes out, because it's true, and he doesn't know if that makes him foolish or simply desperate, because he wanted so badly to just—just— "Just this once, all I wanted to do was take the burnt of the pain and do the hard things for you this time."

"Fuck's sake, Reggie," Sirius mumbles, heaving a sigh as he rubs a weary hand over his face. He drops his hand and stares at him. "Look, I get that your heart was in the right place here, but—no. Just no. This was not okay."

Regulus' eyes drift shut. "I know I get it wrong. I know that. But I just—I wanted—" His eyes snap open, and he looks over at Sirius helplessly. "I had to try, and that was the only thing I could do, Sirius, because I can't—I can't beat you. I can't win when you're in the race, do you realize that? The moment you set your mind to something, that's it. I only had one chance to outsmart you, and I fucked it all up."

"I thought you hated me," Sirius whispers. "You said I was dead to you. Was that all lies, too?"

"Yes and no," Regulus admits, grimacing. "I do hate you. I hate you and I don't, obviously. And I—I killed you the moment you volunteered for me, both times. Something in you dies, and I know that firsthand now, and it's my fault. Every single thing you've suffered, all that you've lost, it can all be traced right back to me. I didn't want to be at fault for it again."

"Hey, no, that's not—don't do that, Regulus," Sirius says firmly. "That's not on you, okay?"

"You said it. You said you wished I was never born."

"I know what I said. I was pissed off and out of my head, but that's not—it's not true. You clearly didn't mean it when you said you didn't care about me anymore, and I'm assuming most of the rest was just you trying to get me to…"

"Yes." Regulus clears his throat and awkwardly mutters, "I'm sorry. Bringing our parents into it was—low."

Sirius gives him a wry look. "You think?"

"I'm just really good at hurting people I never really want to hurt at all," Regulus says softly, his gaze drifting up against his will, mind turning to James, who is never too far from his mind anyway. "I'm not—good, you know? Not like you."

"Regulus, you just tried to sacrifice yourself for me, and in such a way where you draped yourself in everything bad in an attempt to make it easier for everyone," Sirius says flatly. "It's unconventional, yes, but that's not something bad people would care to do. And what even is good, really? In this world? Here? I don't think anyone is simply good, you know? I don't think anyone can be; I think there are the people who try, and the people who don't, and you—you try. You really try."

Regulus blinks harshly past the stinging in his eyes. "And I fail. Every time, I fail."

"We all do," Sirius murmurs, "and then we try again."

"I'm so tired," Regulus rasps, looking at him with this unshakeable, soul-deep exhaustion. "You should be the one who gets to keep trying. It should be you. I want it to be you."

"Don't you think I want the same thing for you?" Sirius asks.

"There's a difference, though," Regulus whispers. "A stark difference that you're not even conscious of. See, you—you have a family. Not just me, but the Potters. You have James, will always have James, and I—I never really did at all. You can go on without me if you have them, if you have James, and James can as well. You two already did it, didn't you? But me? I never could, Sirius. I never really did."

"You don't know what you mean to us," Sirius croaks, his expression twisting, pained.

"Maybe not. Maybe I do. Regardless, what I do know is that you two never needed me to—to make it. Not the first time, and not this last time. I wasn't there like I should have been for either of you, and you managed, because you need each other. You may want me, too, but we can't have what we want anymore," Regulus explains quietly.

Sirius sounds strained when he mutters, "What about you? What do you need, Regulus?"

"I need you both," Regulus admits, turning to hold Sirius' gaze. "Do you—do you get what I'm saying? I can't come out of this arena. It has to be you. We all need it to be you."

"Reggie," Sirius says softly.

Regulus shakes his head and swallows past the lump in his throat to scoot closer to Sirius, needing to get closer to convey the importance of what he's trying to explain. "It has to be you, okay? It has to, because I don't want to go home if I'm not going home with you. I—I just don't see the point."

Sirius looks stricken. "James. James is the point, Regulus. You two—you could be—"

"Do you think, for even a second, that either of us would ever be able to heal in this world without you in it, even with each other?" Regulus whispers. "He needs you, Sirius. You. I know he loves me, okay? I do. And I—fuck, I love him so much that I can barely stand it. But he made it through this past year without me, and he wouldn't have without you." He blinks hard and gives Sirius a sad smile. "I wouldn't have either."

"Well, we're in a bitch of a situation then," Sirius tells him, his voice cracking, "because I—I refuse to believe that. I don't accept that. You two will be—you'll make it without me. You'll have to, because there is nothing you could say that's going to stop me from getting you home."

"Can you cut it out?" Regulus grinds his teeth. "Stop being stubborn about this. Think about it logically, alright? You never needed me as much as you needed him."

"Shut up. Shut up. Just—"

"You didn't. You don't. He has taken care of you, and I've always failed to. You have taken care of him, and I've barely even started trying to. It's not me, Sirius. Don't you get it? We know this. We spent ten years knowing this. It's always you and him, and not me, and I'm okay with that now."

"Fuck you," Sirius says, his nostrils flaring. "No. Fuck that and fuck you and—and fuck all of this. I'm getting you home."

"What—what about your moon?" Regulus tries, desperate at this point. "Your moon needs you, too. Sirius—"

"Drop it," Sirius cuts in harshly, so harshly that Regulus' mouth snaps shut as he pulls back. Sirius stares at him, and then his face softens as he releases a sigh. "You really love me, huh?"

Regulus is obviously not going to ever say that out loud again unless he's on the brink of death. He gives Sirius a blank look for even daring to expect it. For some reason, this makes Sirius laugh, his face lighting up.

"Yeah, you do," Sirius coos. "Oh, I'm never letting this go. I'm going to hold it over your head until my last breath."

"You know when I said you're the worst brother?"

"I do recall, yes."

"That one was true."

"Ah, you love me, really."

"Fuck off," Regulus grumbles, looking away with a huff, and then he's tilting his head back to stare at the roof when the first little ting hits it, followed quickly by another, and then some more until it grows in consistency.

It's raining.

"Alright?" Sirius asks quietly, no longer amused, not rejoicing in the rain the way Bellatrix did, despite the heat.

"Yeah," Regulus replies, equally quiet, leaning back against the wall to watch the rain, where it's not an issue when he's not stuck in it, where—just as he knew he would—he feels safe, simply because Sirius is with him. "Yeah, I'm alright."

for those of you who need the summary, for the deaths first: sirius kills yaxley and camilla.

for those of you who need a summary with less details: sirius and regulus fight, REALLY fight, and they both harm each other physically and with words. regulus almost succeeds in goading sirius into killing him, by threatening to reveal remus to the world (he does not!!!), but in the end he breaks and tells sirius that he loves him. there's a bit of resolution between them after that, and they talk, and regulus' plan to never go home and get sirius home is talked about and explained.

for those of you who need reassurances: yes, sirius and regulus will talk more and be a team in the upcoming chapters. they will have further resolution than just this, i promise you. and also, regulus himself will have a personal breakthrough/revelation as well. also, remus is very, very safe!!! he will not be found out in the hallow, and it's explained more in the next chapter. trust the process, i beg you, or tap out if it's better for you!!!

to everyone else:

sorry, i have to make the joke. i HAVE to.

bfb regulus 🤝 crimson rivers regulus: pretending to threaten remus' life 😭😭😭

sorry, okay, i use humor to cope. this chapter was...whew, it was a lot. sibling and family dynamics fuck me up more than any romantic or platonic relationship ever could. sirius and regulus' relationship as brothers outweighs literally any ship for me, so you can imagine the mess i was while writing this chapter. i literally cried. regulus and sirius always make me cry over anyone else.

there was a couple things i wanted to cover bc i talk about sirius and regulus a lot on my tumblr, like A LOT, especially in crimson rivers, but not everyone goes to see that stuff. ive done, like, essay-length deep dives on them wayyy too many times to count, so i can't possibly sum up my thoughts/feelings on them here, but like.

blanket statement: neither sirius or regulus are to blame for their child abuse in any world, obviously, and to villainize either of them as a result of how their trauma shapes them or how they coped or how they responded to it (for example, sirius leaving) is not okay.

in crimson rivers specifically, it's even more complex, because of other external issues (the arena and such) that allows these desperate feelings to manifest. because they do love each other, and they both want to save each other, not just for them or for james or anyone else, but for THEMSELVES too. and like, they're put in these horrible, fucked up, complex circumstances where they're pushed to these lengths for each other and forced to see how far they'll go.

like with regulus, he was literally put in this position where he knew his brother was going to be forced to fight and kill for him AGAIN, and what's worse, DIE FOR HIM. and he takes that blame unto himself when it's sirius' choice, and by making himself into something sirius could/would kill, something sirius wouldn't die for, something sirius would fight—well, it was a sacrifice, yes, and also self-punishment in the sense that he genuinely feels he deserves it and doesn't feel that he, over sirius, deserves to live.

and it's like, he does want to be the one doing the hard things this time, he doesn't want to live without sirius, or live with the knowledge that sirius died for him. he's angry and scared and desperate—we see more on it later, and we also see him have a breakthrough and this really, really important progress of like. grasping his own worth and understanding, fully, that he does deserve to live and WANTS to.

and sirius—he couldn't really see the impact his loss would have on regulus specifically, because he's so focused on this, on saving regulus, on doing what he feels he has to. he has his own sort of breakthrough as well in that regard where it's like. hey, i deserve to live as well, and i can fight for myself, too.

so like, there is the promise of future growth, and further resolution, i swear. these two truly do mean the world to me. and no, obviously i don't condone the actions taken here, and it will be further addressed when there's proper time for it.

a couple of brief mentions: james not sending a note!!! also remus! again, we will see more on them later.

Remus nudges a waffle over to James just as James eases a cup of tea in front of him, doing Sirius' partner-ly duties in his stead while he's away. Objectively, this is hilarious.

In reality, it just makes Remus miss Sirius more.

And, well, Remus will never admit it, at least not to James, but Sirius makes his tea better. This may just be because Remus finds basically everyone lackluster compared to Sirius. It's not James' fault; he's really doing his best.

"How are you this morning?" Remus murmurs.

"Oh, you know," James says vaguely, heaving a sigh and lazily pouring syrup over his waffle. He's been miserable, really, since what happened between Sirius and Regulus.

He had come bustling in yesterday, grumpy and huffy about the whole thing, but he just got progressively sadder as he had to sit there and watch his…boyfriend? Fiancé? Honestly, it's unclear, and at this point, Remus is too polite to ask. Either way, he got progressively sadder as he had to watch Regulus list out all the reasons Sirius should be the one to live, in a clear fit of desperation, and on this list just so happened to include James and the tragedy of their whole situation.

"You know it's not—it isn't that he doesn't want to come back to you, right?" Remus asks gently, because he understands Regulus enough to know that for a fact. "He's just—really fucking desperate, James. He's scared. He's… Well, you heard him. He doesn't want to lose his brother."

James sighs and puts down the syrup. "I know. It's just… Look, I don't want to lose either of them, and I can't—I can't even think about it, if I'm honest. But what I can think about is how Regulus views himself. And I—I can't help but think that I somehow contributed to that in some way. Didn't make him realize just how much I—" He cuts himself off, swallowing thickly. "I love him so much. It tears me apart that I can't make him see just how special he is."

"James, as much as we might wish to, we can't make people love themselves just by loving them enough," Remus says softly. "There's no measurement you have to meet for that to be possible. You can love Regulus, or anyone, so much you break the fucking scale, but…some people just don't know how to love themselves, and they have to learn that. Do you think if it could be done for them, you and Sirius wouldn't have managed that for Regulus by now?"

"I…" James closes his eyes, looking pained, and then he blows out a deep breath as his eyes drift open again. "Yeah, I know. I do know what you're saying. He was—I think he was learning to, before all of this. You should have seen him, Remus. It was amazing. He was—he was trying, you know, and—and then this happened, and it's not fair. It's not fair to him, or any of us."

"No," Remus agrees quietly, "it's not."

"I can't even be really upset with him about it," James says, lips tipping down. "What he did, I mean. Or what he was planning to do, and the fact that I factor in it at all. It's like with my mum, yeah? I couldn't be upset with him for making sure she was safe, and I can't be upset with him for wanting to get my best friend back to me—and so many others."

"You're not upset?" Remus asks, startled.

"I'm angry, don't get me wrong. Angry at him for scaring the fuck out of me and taking it that far, and angry at the situation, and just—angry. But in the same breath... It's upsetting that he's so ready to throw himself away for it, but it's like—I get it now, the way he loves. It's—oh, hell, Remus, it's messy the way he loves. Messy and—and almost violent, you know? He does it with all of him, all he's got, and it's just this tangled, complicated force in him that spills out, even when he tries to keep it all inside. Like it's too big for him, and too big for the world, and he thinks he doesn't do it right, but all it really is…" James' face softens, gentle and adoring. "He doesn't know how to stop. That's all it is. And I don't think he should. In a better world, it wouldn't show itself the way it does here. In a better world, it'd never hurt anyone."

Remus turns that over in his mind and thinks of all he knows about Regulus, and—well, yeah. Yeah, that makes sense. It's a pattern with him, the way his love reveals itself in big gestures and dire circumstances. The first time he ever called James baby was in a panic. When Evan died, Regulus released a scream so raw with grief that it was chilling, something awful and quaking rising from the depths of him. One of the secrets he kept close to his chest was that he missed his brother. He tipped himself into a river, believing he wouldn't come back out, and knowing he could never return the same. He tried to get his own brother to kill him just so he wouldn't have to live without him, and he only failed in that endeavor because he needed his brother to know that, despite everything and perhaps because of it all, he loved him. Still loves him.

If the world was different, better, kinder, maybe Regulus' love wouldn't flow out of him this way at all. Maybe it'd be easier, calmer, softer. Remus knows how difficult it is to love here; he knows how much it hurts. He thinks, maybe, Regulus is a very sensitive person. Most probably wouldn't be able to see it that way, but tender hearts grow barbs to resist being bruised.

"I don't know what's going to happen. I just know I love him. I love them both," James mumbles, then sighs again and lifts his fork to poke at his waffle. He doesn't seem very interested in it and raises his gaze to Remus instead. "What about you? How are you doing this morning?"

Remus gives him a wry look and mutters, "Oh, you know."

James' lips twitch at the corners. "Yeah, I suppose I do. Still, I'm checking in. You have to give me something."

"Do I?"

"Mhm. Just open up a bit, please, that's all I ask. Let me… I don't know. Let me help."

"I don't need you to take care of me, James," Remus tells him, shaking his head. "Just worry about yourself."

"No," James says simply, holding his gaze. "No, I'll worry about you, too, thank you very much. Nice try, but that's not how this is going to go. I'm not stupid, you know. You do this thing where you, like, exude this—sense of serenity and calm, as if you're strong enough to bear everything on your own, but that's not going to slide with me. We all need people to lean on from time-to-time, and I'm here. I'm right here, so lean."

The thing is, James is his friend. Remus knows that. But it's here, in this exact moment, that Remus fully settles into their dynamic, letting it take shape around him, feeling the weight of importance shift until it grows just a bit more. Sometimes, you can really feel a moment with another person, like this tangible thing you can reach out to touch, and you just know, somehow, that whatever bond existed before has strengthened. Remus does feel like he can reach out and touch this moment, here, with James; he's quite sure it would be warm.

Unfortunately, Remus does have a habit of not really opening up to other people, and he's almost not sure how to. Even with Sirius, it took time, and it took a bond they worked together to build. He's opened up to Regulus only a bit, and that's—well, he's quite sure it's partially just because Regulus sort of had no choice but to expose his own vulnerabilities to Remus, so Remus simply returned the favor. It did bring them closer together, but they're both equally fucked up enough that they wouldn't have done it on their own.

"Ah, I don't—really know what to say," Remus admits, feeling a bit out of sorts, honestly. Not for the first time, he aches for the ease he always felt with Lily, no matter what.

"Hm." James looks thoughtful, and fortunately for Remus, he clearly knows how to do this whole friend thing and opening up business enough to guide him through it. "Were you okay last night? I didn't even—I wasn't really in a place to ask, but Regulus threatened to—" He grimaces, then coughs. "Well, that wasn't okay, regardless of the reasons behind it."

Remus frowns. "You know, honestly, I wasn't even scared. Mostly I was just—confused. Because, yes, I knew he was angry with Sirius, but he never treated me differently. I couldn't make sense of why he would have been alright with me before the arena and then just…do that. I'm not angry with him or anything. I think I knew he wouldn't really do it. Just from logic, basically. He never specified a gender. He only used the terms the moon and your moon when talking to Sirius. He didn't say my full name, and then…couldn't, wouldn't, even when Sirius actually gave him the chance to."

"Yeah, alright, but you'd still have every right to be upset with him about it," James informs him. "I mean, are you in danger now? Did he—did that put you in danger?"

"What? No." Remus snorts. "The Hallows would sooner believe Sirius fell in love with the actual moon before they believed he fell in love with a servant. I mean, had Regulus said my full name, that'd be different, but he didn't. I'm safe, James, I promise. But…well, I suppose I'm a little upset he used me as leverage over Sirius, just to work him up."

"Mm, I know. He's a prick," James agrees with a sigh, and it sounds ridiculously soppy and lovesick. Remus gives him a flat look, and James looks sheepish. "Sorry. No, I'm—I mean it. You do have every right to be upset. And I'm glad you're safe."

"I'm not… I don't like that he did it, but I also know why he did." Remus swallows and tries to shove back the awful, insidious thought that he almost, almost, almost wished it had worked. He squeezes his eyes shut. Oh, he's so selfish. So fucked up. No different than James, he can't help it.

"Remus?" James says gently.

"I'm fine," Remus rasps reflexively, eyes flying open, and then James just stares him down, waiting like he'll wait here all day if he has to, even though they both know he won't. His gaze is piercing behind his glasses, and Remus gives in. "I just… I think that was it, you know. That was—it was the only chance of—of Sirius getting out."

Because that's the thing. Regulus was right. Sirius was never going to let his little brother die, but if Sirius felt betrayed by him enough to get angry and kill him, that anger could possibly carry him right out of the arena, send him on a rampage, and leave him ruthless in the endeavor to get home. But, if Regulus had simply died or killed himself while Sirius was trying so hard to get him home, it wouldn't matter what promise Sirius gave to Remus about trying to make it back home. He would try, Remus is sure, but he'd be grieving. He'd be a fucking mess. Remus knows firsthand how impossible it feels to achieve much of anything after the loss of one of the most important people in your life; after his mother died, Remus barely managed much of anything, not even with trying to get Greyback arrested and out of the district, because not even revenge could overpower his grief.

So, Remus does think Sirius would have tried, but he wouldn't have had the same chances of actually managing it as he would have if Regulus' plan actually worked. And now? Oh, now Sirius isn't going to let anything happen to his brother, if he can help it. That's it. Sirius likely isn't coming back, and Remus doesn't think he can handle that.

James is quiet for a long moment, then his throat bobs up and down as he swallows convulsively. He breathes in and out, and Remus can see him putting his own feelings aside to be here for Remus, to listen, to let him open up. "You're not a bad person for being hurt by that, Remus. You're only human, and you don't have to—well, you shouldn't be ashamed of wanting the man you love to make it out."

"I'm not ready to lose him," Remus whispers. "I don't think I'll ever be ready to lose him. I—I don't—I can't—"

"I know," James croaks. "Remus, I know."

Remus releases a hoarse, pained laugh. "Yeah, I guess you would, wouldn't you? Fuck, this is—it's awful for you, too."

"It's awful for everyone, I think. Some more than others. Them the most; the ones inside the arena," James mumbles. "I keep trying to—to find some sort of comfort in all of this, like a habit, but the thing is… Sometimes, things are just shit."

"Trust me, I'm well aware," Remus replies. "If there's one thing I've learned, though, impermanence only solidifies importance. You can learn through loss to better cherish what you have, and be thankful for what you got. It's awful, mostly, but you look back and there are glimpses that you can't bring yourself to regret. The inevitability of endings can't remove all that came before it. That still exists, and we get that, and we keep that. And that's—that's special. That's precious."

James looks at him for a long moment, then smiles and softly murmurs, "That was really beautiful, Remus."

"Oh. Ha, right," Remus mutters with a cough, reaching around to rub the back of his neck awkwardly.

"It's—no, I mean it. I—" James clears his throat, his eyebrows crumbling together. "That's something I've been sort of struggling with, because I—I wasted a lot of time with Regulus, you know? These past few days, I mean. Time that could have been better spent, and I didn't…really know how to come to terms with that. So, this is… It's nice, I guess, to be grateful for—for what time we did spend together, right there at the end. We all want more time, I think, and coping with not having it is… It's very fucking hard."

"Yeah," Remus whispers, a lump in his throat. "It is."

"You're a very wise man, Remus Lupin," James declares, playfully pointing his fork at him.

Remus quirks a tiny smile. "I do my best."

"And you do it well," James says, and it's sincere. Remus knows that. He can tell, and it warms him. "See? Opening up a bit isn't so bad. We should do this again sometime."

"Oh, shut up," Remus mutters with a huff of laughter when James grins at him. Remus rolls his eyes, then picks up his spoon to stir his tea, drifting off in thought. After a long moment passes, he looks up and regards James for a beat, pensive, and then he speaks. "My birthday is March 10th."

James blinks at him. "Is it? Hey, I was born on March 27th! You're seventeen days older than me."

"Ah, that explains why I'm wiser than you."

"Ha ha, very funny. Happy early birthday."

"James, my birthday—and yours—is still a bit away."

"Eh, who's counting? Happy belated birthday, then, for all the ones I missed."

Remus shakes his head, amused. "Thanks."

"Not that this isn't lovely information to have about you, but what made you bring it up?" James asks curiously.

"Well, I just…" Remus purses his lips, then pushes them from side-to-side, then blows out a deep breath. "I guess I've just been thinking about all the things I never got to say to—to a lot of people. No one knows that about me, you know. My birthday. No one in the Hallow, in any case. It's not even that important, really, but we were talking about opening up and—and someone should know, I think. Even Sirius didn't know. It's not something that ever came up, and that's only one thing I didn't get to tell him. I don't know his either."

"November 3rd," James says softly. "Four months before us."

"Oh," Remus whispers. "I missed it."

James' face softens. "He was—it was a good day for him, you know. Mum made a cake. He spent a good bit of the day just bothering Reg, who pretended to not know it was his birthday at all. It was hilarious. He wouldn't wish Sirius a happy birthday; he waited all the way until nearly midnight, down to the last second, then opened his window and shouted it across the street. Sirius was on the roof, talking to you, and we all heard him curse and nearly fall off, then laugh."

"Talking to me," Remus repeats.

"Yeah. Talking to the moon, talking to you, same thing," James tells him, waving his fork lazily. "You didn't miss it, not really. You were always there for him, there with him, believe it or not. I know that's—I know it's not fair that neither of you got more than that, but it's…it was…"

"Something," Remus fills in, his chest warm and tight at the same time. "It was something."

"Yeah," James murmurs. "It meant a lot to him. You mean a lot to him, Remus. He loves you so much."

Remus' lips curl up. "I know he does."

James' lips curl up in a response, a gentle echo, warm and tender and bittersweet. They fall silent again, comfortable and perhaps even comforted, and then they both look up when the door opens. Pandora shuffles in looking a little worse for wear, still clad in pajamas, her makeup from last night faded and smeared on her face. Remus and James simultaneously frown and look at each other, and it's been a long time since Remus has had a friend he could communicate with without ever saying a word. Again, he and Sirius can, but. Well, Sirius isn't just his friend. He's his best friend, in a way, and so much more. Never the best friend that Lily was—and still is. No, that's just Lily. It'll always be Lily.

Pandora moves over to the side of the counter in between both of them and reaches out to grab one of their hands in each of hers. Without a word of warning, she brings Remus' hand to her mouth to press a quick, gentle kiss to the back of his fingers, then does the same thing to James. Remus feels his ears go hot, because he knows what that means, a Hallow gesture for deep admiration. No ones ever done that to him before, so he's a bit flustered by it, admittedly.

James, however, is apparently more accustomed to it, because he looks less flustered and more fond. "And just what was that for exactly, Pandora?"

"Well, you know, I woke up and didn't want to get out of bed, then I thought about you two being up and waiting for me, and suddenly I magically found my way to my feet," Pandora says, and it's delivered lightly, as if it's some simple thing, but the sincerity in her voice makes the impact of her words heavier. There's something charming about her, and what she has said, and James must agree, because he kisses her hand in return.

"We're having breakfast before I go," James tells her. He drapes his arm around her shoulders and gives her a squeeze that she seems happy to lean into. "Hungry?"

"No, queasy, actually. But I should eat," Pandora admits, and they both give her a hum of approval and encouragement at the same time, though they both understand how hard it is to keep up an appetite when your loved ones are at constant risk of dying. "And you, James. How's it going, then? You mentioned you handled it with Lucius calmly—" She gives him a squinty, suspicious side-eye, "—so there will be no problems today, right? Do you need anything? Should I come?"

"Pandora, really, I'm fine," James insists. "You stay here with Remus, okay? It helps knowing you two have each other, and that I'm coming back to you by the end of the day. Besides, I have Frank to lean on, and I think I saw Dorcas loitering around at some point yesterday, but I didn't get to talk to her, so maybe I will today. I even spoke to Lestrange a bit. He's mad at Lucius, I suppose, so he made a point to chat with me and shake my hand where Lucius and, conveniently, sponsors could see. It's probably just a whole bunch of nonsense and ulterior motives, but…well, he's alright for the most part, despite his tributes being death eaters. I, ah, don't really have room to judge on that one, all things considered."

Remus should not find that mildly amusing, but James looks so sheepish that it is sort of hilarious. James, in love with a death eater. Who would have thought? Shaking his head, Remus leans down the counter with a huff of laughter.

"Come on, James made you a plate already," Remus murmurs, offering Pandora a tiny smile as he slides her plate of breakfast in front of her. "Tuck in. I have a feeling it's going to be a long fucking day full of nothing but insanity."

And, well, has he ever been wrong before?

Sirius knows the moment Regulus wakes up, because he goes tense and jerks slightly as his head flies up from Sirius' shoulder. He blinks around blearily, getting his bearings, then looks at Sirius' shoulder—which he was using as a pillow only moments before—and immediately scowls.

"Oh, don't look like that. You did it," Sirius tells him with a snort, helplessly amused. Regulus squints at him suspiciously as if he doesn't believe that for a second, but it's true.

At some point during the night, Regulus had eventually nodded off. There's not a whole lot of space in the shelter anyway, so they were nearly shoulder-to-shoulder as it was. Sirius hadn't been paying attention, his head tipped back against the wall and his eyes closed as he enjoyed the easy breeze that blew in, a bit cool from the rain, a marvel in the heat. He'd felt it when Regulus' head had dropped on his shoulder, peeked open an eye to see him sleeping, then closed his eyes and went back to the inside of his mind, where Remus' warm laughter was echoing in his ears and Remus' smile was flashing behind his eyelids.

Sirius didn't sleep. He couldn't. He won't, just on the off chance that Regulus might do something stupid like get himself killed while Sirius is indulging in a nap. Eh, it's fine. Sirius will sleep when he's dead, and hey, that'll probably arrive for him sooner rather than later. Silver lining?

Bad joke. He's glad he didn't say it out loud. The only person he could count on to laugh at it would be Marlene, most likely. Sirius wonders how she is this morning. She's alive. He does know that much. The banners last night proved it.

There are nine people dead now. Fifteen remaining. Five death eaters—not including Regulus, because Sirius refuses to count him—which are Narcissa, Bellatrix, Alecto, Rabastan, and Dixon. Separate from them, an ex-death eater if you will, is Regulus. Then there's Sirius, Marlene, Emmeline, Augusta, Eli, and Alice. Other than that, it's just Asher, Majesty, and Lester. It's only day three… Fucking hell.

The thing is, it's not unheard of. Last year, for example; Sirius couldn't forget it if he tried. By the end of day two, sixteen people remained, and by the end of day three, eleven did. It was considered a brutal year, as far as games go, and this year is clearly shaping up to be even worse. The fact that it's an arena full of hardened, traumatized Victors only adds to that.

With a grunt, Regulus pushes to his feet and immediately looks around for something to do, except there's nothing to do, because Sirius has already handled everything. This, for some reason, only makes Regulus scowl harder.

"Well?" Regulus snaps. "Are we going, then?"

"Mm, breakfast first," Sirius tells him, gesturing lazily to the ground before reaching in his supply back to bring out water and something to eat. "Most important meal of the day, you know, or so the saying goes."

Regulus somehow gets more scowl-y, and Sirius resists the urge to tell him to fix his face. Instead, he points to the ground again and arches an eyebrow at Regulus, who continues to scowl but does nonetheless sit right back down.

They have breakfast.

It's not great.

It is something, though, and going into the day that's sure to be shit with food and water for energy is very important. He wonders how the others are getting on, if they found food or not, because while the rain keeps them hydrated, they have to be hungry by now on day three with no food in them.

The silence between him and Regulus is vaguely annoying, but Sirius refuses to be the one to break it. He has spent a better portion of the night swinging between utter fury at Regulus and some other unnameable, unfathomable emotion that still, even now, pulses tender and bright beneath his ribs.

Just. Fuck. Fuck, fuck, fucking hell. He knows—okay, so he truly does know that Regulus is pretty fucked up. He also knows that he himself is fucked up as well. Maybe it's the family they come from, or the turns their lives have taken, or possibly how they influence each other, how they go round and round in circles, two waves crashing against either side of a ship, tipping it back and forth and waiting for it to sink.

All they want, really, is for the ship to sink.

Just so they can meet in the middle again.

Just so the weltering waters can calm.

It's probably a tangled mixture of childhood trauma and arena trauma and so many other things as well, all things they had actually managed to find a balance with before the reaping. That's where the ship rolled in, and they've been waging war on it ever since. Go away, go away, go away.

It won't. It's here to stay, and there's nothing either of them can do about it. They've been trying anyway. Trying the same fucking thing, for the same fucking reasons, and fucking ruining each other and themselves in the process. They're parasitic and symbiotic all in one, an unstoppable force and an immovable object, planning to lose so they won't lose at all.

Sirius thinks of that fable of the scorpion and the frog. The one where, to cross the river, the scorpion rides on the frog's back. Halfway over, the scorpion stings the frog, despite the fact that it's going to drown as well, simply because that is its nature. Sirius thinks about it, and he can't figure out, between him and Regulus, who's the scorpion and who's the frog.

But, either way, they're drowning.

"Look, do we—" Regulus huffs and grimaces, reaching out to stuff the water bottle back in Sirius' bag. He's not quite looking Sirius in the eye. "Do we need to—talk?"

"I don't know, Reggie, do we?" Sirius asks, arching an eyebrow at him. "What do you think?"

"Well, I don't want to," Regulus mumbles.

Sirius shrugs. "Fine. Whatever. Live with your regrets, then."

"I said I was—I apologized, didn't I?" Regulus says, strained.

"I don't know, it seemed sort of insincere, if you ask me."

"Sirius, come on."

"What's that?" Sirius asks, cupping his ear and turning his head to Regulus. "You were saying?"

Regulus exhales sharply through his nose, then very slowly and very painstakingly grits out, "I'm…sorry…"

"Well, that wasn't very convincing at all," Sirius muses.

"Oh, fuck off," Regulus snaps, pushing to his feet and glaring down at him. Sirius remains in place, aloof and unbothered, just raising his eyebrows at him. "Where's my apology?"

"I'm sorry," Sirius says.

"Exactly, so fu—" Regulus stops and stares at him, then frowns at him. "Wait. For what?"

Sirius clears his throat. "For volunteering for you when I promised not to. I—you know, I didn't mean to. It was—of course I wanted to every time I thought about it, but I knew how much it meant to you that I wouldn't, so I—I planned not to, but I just…" He blows out a deep breath, giving a weak shrug of his shoulders. "I heard your name, and I was sixteen again. It was instinct, you know? A reflex. Like breathing."

Regulus swallows harshly, but can't seem to speak.

"And I'm sorry I'm going to die," Sirius continues bluntly, his stomach cramping when Regulus visibly flinches a bit, his eyes drifting shut. "I'm sorry I have to leave you behind again, and if it wasn't a requirement for you to live, I wouldn't."

"Don't," Regulus whispers, eyes fluttering open. "Don't, okay? For me? Not—I'm not even asking for James or anyone else at this point. Just me. Can't you just let me go?"

"Yeah," Sirius replies easily. "Go home. I can do that."

Regulus' expression falls flat. "You're not funny."

"I'm hilarious," Sirius counters, lazily pushing himself to his feet with a sigh. "We can't keep talking about this, and we're not. Let's just…do this one day at a time, yeah? Me and you."

"Me and you," Regulus repeats, staring at him for a long moment, then heaving a sigh and shaking his head. "Fine."

"Good. Let's go."

"Sirius?"

"Hm?" Sirius asks as he grabs his bag to put on.

"I'm sorry, too. Genuinely," Regulus murmurs, his voice weighted with sincerity now, and simple remorse.

Sirius goes still for a moment, then lifts his head and looks at Regulus, lips pursed. "For what?"

"For trying to get you to kill me," Regulus admits, looking appropriately sheepish about the whole thing, as if saying it out loud makes him aware of how fucking insane that was for him to do. "And also, um, saying…all the things I said."

"Did you mean any of it?"

"Did you?"

They stare at each other. Unstoppable force, immovable object. Scorpion, frog. Yes, Sirius thinks. No, not a fucking word, Sirius thinks. The horrible, hideous truth is—he doesn't know. What he does know is that he loves his little brother to death, literally, and his little brother loves him, too.

Maybe that's all he needs to know.

"I don't want you to feel responsible for anything that I've gone through, or anything that happens to me," Sirius says.

Regulus holds his gaze and whispers, "I don't want you to feel responsible for me."

"I—" Sirius opens and closes his mouth, because he does, and he always has, and maybe he always will. He can't change that. It's in his fucking blood, circulating from his heart with every stubborn clench and release. He can see how it's damaging, how it gets them stuck in a loop neither of them can escape, but he can't do a damn thing to break them free other than let his heart stop. So, in the end, he just rasps, "I'm sorry."

"Yeah," Regulus says. "Yeah, Sirius, me too."

"Already?" James asks, perhaps in a bit of a panic.

Frank is gripping his arm tight. "We're starting off strong on day three, apparently."

"Fucking hell," Rodolphus hisses as he watches Rabastan swing his mace at the strange creature chasing after him and Asher. The creature is very big, has red leather-like skin, hooves, and claws. It doesn't have eyes, and the nose is just slitted like a snake, while the lipless mouth is wide with spiky teeth spilling out all over. There's at least three more running behind the one that Rabastan hits, which sails to the side with the head dented in and busted open like a rotted peach.

James does a double-take when he realizes that Lestrange and Dolohov are standing next to him and Frank to watch the screens, leaving Malfoy alone with a few sponsors. Okay, so clearly they're very pissed at him. Fair enough.

"Mum, don't you dare," Frank chokes out, and James' gaze snaps back to the screen to see Augusta stumble through the corridor of the maze that closes in on her and Alice from either side. Alice dives out, but Augusta doesn't make it, other than her hand, and the maze closes up around the rest of her.

Helplessly, James can only reach out and grab Frank's wrist, listening to him muffle a weak sound of pure panic. On the screen, Alice curses harshly and reaches out to grasp Augusta's hand, using their machete to hack at the hedges to create an opening as they desperately yank Augusta through.

Augusta comes falling out, gasping for air, shaky and dazed as she leans on Alice, who steadies her and snatches them both back into a desperate run.

Frank's hand eases on James' arm as he exhales.

The camera cuts to show Marlene and Eli taking a corner and slamming directly into each other, both running from different things. Marlene cries out when she falls on her arm, and Eli stutters out helpless apologies as he grabs her with shaking hands and tugs her back to her feet. I'm sorry, girl, I'm so sorry, but we have to run, he keeps saying, and Marlene grits her teeth through the pain to follow him.

Emmeline was separated from Eli and is standing at the very end of a closed passage in the maze, shooting bolt after bolt as creatures crawl on the ground and on the walls of the hedges towards her. They're spider-like in the way they seem to just scuttle along and defy gravity, but they look like fucking mannequins. Their cheeks are high, arcing inwards, and when they blink, it's exactly like a mannequin coming to life, confused as to why it's awake. The whites of their eyes are a little too visible. They hold their faces like those dolls with no eyelids, and their eyelashes look like stitches against skin.

It's creepy. How Emmeline is so stoic as a whole mass of them come barreling towards her all at once, James doesn't know. A bolt to the face does seem to stop them, but there's more of them than she has bolts to shoot them with. She will run out, and then she'll be overtaken, because she's at the end of the passage with nowhere to run.

Everyone else is alone, running in their own parts of the maze, running from hands or creatures or the green fog. Some of them are closer to others, from what James can see on the map of their positions. Bellatrix is quite close to Alice and Augusta, and there's a good chance she might run into them. Narcissa and Dixon aren't too far from Sirius and Regulus, which is rather nerve-wracking for James.

At the moment, Sirius and Regulus are—fine. They're alert and moving through the maze with no issue. Sirius is currently complaining about the fact that he can't see the moon at night, tipping his head back and boldly requesting McGonagall personally to hang it in the sky just for him. Regulus rolls his eyes but ultimately leaves Sirius to his whining.

James is…not pleased with either of them, at the moment. Having to watch them quite literally beat the shit out of each other had been very distressing. Not once throughout did James doubt Regulus, though. Not for a second. He knew Regulus wouldn't kill Sirius, and he also knew Sirius wouldn't kill Regulus. They may have been angry enough in the moment to want to, but James didn't believe for a second that either of them could actually see through any attempt of what they were doing in that moment. So, to him, they were essentially just hurting each other for no fucking reason in the middle of the death arena where everyone else, in some way or another, wants them dead. And yeah, he's not pleased that they're both so fucking desperate to die for each other while using him as an excuse to mix in with the truth, which is that, deep down, they're both utterly terrified to lose the other.

It was purposeful not to send them a message after their fight, because he was angry and he knew his silence would convey that. Angry for them both, angry for himself, angry for every single person in that arena and all their families and the people who will have to go in the following year and just—just angry at so many things. He regrets it now, not taking that opportunity to send some kind of message to let them know, despite everything, he still loves them both. But yesterday? The fighting and the attempted sacrifice? He doesn't want it.

What James wants is for them both to fight to live, not just for other people, but for themselves. And he wants them both to live. Both of them. He'd do quite literally anything if there was some way they could both make it out, because as of now, his brain just can't accept that only one can. He still hasn't come to terms with it. He's not sure he ever will.

Dolohov grunts, and they all turn their attention to Alecto on the screen, who just so happens to be running right past the opening to the passage where Emmeline is stuck and under attack. The sight of the creatures seem to stun Alecto enough that she actually stops and stares at them in what seems to be pure disbelief. It's obvious that she sees Emmeline at the end, but she doesn't assist. She just turns and keeps running.

"Well, she's down," Dolohov mutters, jerking his chin at Emmeline, who releases her last bolt with a sharp curse.

Frank clenches his jaw, gritting out, "I wouldn't be too sure of that, Dolohov. Just wait."

They wait.

Emmeline grips her crossbow, eyes narrowing, and then she starts marching right down the passage without a stutter in her stride, meeting the creatures halfway. They immediately begin to swarm her, and she—

James blinks rapidly, watching her bust in the heads of the creatures with her crossbow, always moving, never staying still long enough for them to actually get ahold of her. She just keeps going, not seeming scared in the slightest, and the creatures begin to thin out, laying broken and discarded at her feet. She had to have gone into a swarm of at least ten, and yet she walks right back out with a trail of twitching, dismembered creatures behind her.

"Okay," Dolohov grumbles, "I stand corrected."

"Damn right you do," Frank says, smirking.

James huffs out a slightly hysterical laugh and shakes his head in amazement as he watches each and every single one of these people strive to survive, some just stubbornly refusing to die.

Helplessly, James' eyes crawl to two of the most stubborn people he knows, staring at Regulus and Sirius and selfishly hoping that they're more stubborn than the rest.

"You know," Sirius muses, "if James were here, he'd be beat-boxing right now."

Regulus sighs. Looking back, he did perhaps take for granted the levity James brought to the first arena, especially in the beginning. Somehow, James found ways to make even that whole situation better, and Regulus knows this, because he's in it again and, comparatively, Sirius is shit at it.

To put it simply, Sirius is an idiot who never shuts up, and there isn't even the benefit of him having a voice Regulus actually enjoys hearing. James has such a lovely voice. Regulus misses it. But nooo, he's stuck listening to his brother's inane chatter and his stupid, smug voice that generally always seems to have a grin in it, somehow.

Regulus kind of wants to punch him again.

Regulus kind of wants to hug him again.

Regulus does neither of these things and, instead, feels a surge of guilt and distress tangle like knots in his chest when he realizes there's a good chance that, in a few days, he'll never hear Sirius speak again. Suddenly, Regulus wants to listen to every word he says and beg him to never, ever shut up.

"James," Sirius says, addressing the sky, "I want you to know that, unlike some people, I would appreciate you beat-boxing in stressful situations, and I would gladly provide backup vocals to bring it all together."

"Oh, excuse me for being normal," Regulus mutters defensively, and then almost instantly realizes what he's just said and what's about to happen, because Sirius is going to—

That. He's going to do that. Sirius busts out laughing at him, wheezing, "Normal? You think you're normal?"

"Compared to you and James? Yes, by far," Regulus insists, because he has to see it through now. "Just—when it comes to heavy, dangerous situations, I mean. Because I'm not cracking jokes and laughing at things."

"Reggie, you never crack jokes or laugh at things."

"I—yes, I do. I…do. I have before."

"Name one time," Sirius says, lips twitching.

Regulus opens his mouth, then closes it, then frowns. He sits on that for a second, then says, "James thinks I'm funny."

"James is blinded by love, is what he is," Sirius tells him, clearly exasperated. "He is not an unbiased opinion."

"Before you volunteered," Regulus states finally, and Sirius blinks at him. "The first time, I mean. I know you don't really remember a lot of things from back then, but I—I would occasionally make jokes, and I did laugh a lot more."

Sirius clicks his tongue. "Well, that's tragic."

"Isn't it just?" Regulus agrees dryly.

"I bet you were shit at it even then."

"I wasn't. James laughed, and he didn't even like me before my fifteenth birthday."

"Mm, no, I don't believe you," Sirius says. "I will simply always see you as not funny. You've never told a good joke in your life, I just know this. James." He looks up at the sky again, his eyes dancing with amusement. "If you happen to send us anything again, do let me know if I'm right. Well, you'll side with me even if I'm wrong, but still."

"Why would he side with you over me?" Regulus asks in disbelief, eyes narrowing slightly.

"He's my best friend," Sirius announces slowly, like Regulus is an idiot who can't understand basic concepts.

Regulus arches an eyebrow. "He's my fiancé."

"He's—" Sirius stops. He comes to a screeching halt, which makes Regulus stop and turn to blink at him. "Wait. Wait, no, because you weren't lying just then. Your fiancé?"

"Yes," Regulus says, his lips curling up at the corners rather against his will, and he can't help it. He can't stifle the warmth of pride in his voice, or how he goes a little breathless with giddy joy and excitement. It'd probably embarrass him if he had any space in him to be anything other than delighted.

Sirius gasps. Legitimately gasps. It's very dramatic. "Oh, shit, you're getting married? Reggie!"

"What?"

"When was this?! When did he ask? I mean, you know, properly. Not just, um, talking about the wedding in the Hallow or whatever. I mean, when did he really ask?"

Regulus can see that Sirius is walking a fine line here, talking in half-truths to get the message across. He gets what Sirius is saying well enough. "Why do you assume he asked?"

"Because he's James." Sirius stares at him, waiting with some sort of eager, earnest patience for more details, and then his eyes widen. "You asked? You?!"

"Yes," Regulus admits.

Sirius gapes at him. "Oh, fuck. He cried, didn't he? I bet he cried. Why didn't you tell me?! Why didn't he tell me?!"

"There wasn't really time," Regulus explains. "It was the last night before we came into the arena. Properly, I mean."

"Oh. Wait, you asked then? Wait…" Sirius squints at him, lips pursing like he's trying to fight a smile. "Did you—did you actually, properly ask him?"

"Yes! I just said so, Sirius."

"What did you say? What exactly did you say?"

Regulus huffs and rolls his eyes to the sky, literally begging for patience. "I said: would you marry me? He said: yes. Very simple. Asked, answered, engaged."

"You—" Sirius abruptly starts giggling, and Regulus stares at him blankly. "Oh, Regulus. Regulus. That's not—it's—okay, so you do realize that agreeing that you would get married is not the same as agreeing to get married, yeah?"

"No, I'm pretty sure they're the same," Regulus replies.

Sirius wheezes with laughter, tucking his lips in as he leans on his spear like he might fall over if he doesn't. When he calms, he breathes out, "It's…not at all the same. The intent really matters. Did either of you even talk about how the wedding would happen? Start making plans?"

"Well, no, obviously we couldn't," Regulus snaps, gesturing pointedly around them. "Seeing as there would be no point."

"You…" Sirius is no longer laughing. His eyebrows tug together as he regards Regulus in confusion. "Wait, why would you do that if you planned to die?"

"I wanted him to have that. I—I couldn't give him anything else, because of all this." Regulus once again gestures around them, this time with dejection. "But I could give him that. And—well, selfishly, I wanted it, too. It made me happy. It still makes me happy. I wanted to have that all the way up to the end. And he gave it to me."

"Right," Sirius says quietly, and then he swallows and gives Regulus a tight smile. "I know I said we wouldn't talk about it, but you do realize that this only makes me more determined to get you home, yeah? I—I mean, come on, Reggie, you could get married! You—you could —"

Regulus shakes his head. "We wouldn't. Not without you there. It wouldn't feel right to either of us, I don't think."

"While I'd genuinely kill to be there, and I do mean genuinely, it shouldn't stop just because I won't be there. I—I want you to. And, really, I will be there. Just, you know, not physically. But I'll be there. I wouldn't miss it." Sirius tilts his head back to address the sky again. "James, I mean it. I'm not joking. Convince him however you have to, but do it. You both want to, and so you will. Please."

"I won't go. I'll leave him at the altar."

"No you won't."

"It's not happening, Sirius," Regulus bites out, a harsh clench in his chest. "We'll just be engaged forever, I guess, because we're not getting married if you can't physically be there."

"Don't put that on me. Don't make me responsible for holding you back," Sirius murmurs.

"Well, now you know how I feel," Regulus declares sharply.

Sirius sighs. "You're so spiteful."

"Yes, I'm fucking spiteful, because I don't want you to die! I don't want you to be dead!" Regulus bursts out. "I want you to keep being an idiot until you're old and ugly, and I want you to come to my fucking wedding!"

"First of all, I would be old and beautiful," Sirius states firmly, holding up a finger. "I am going to be sexy until the day I die, even if I could live until a hundred. Second of all, I will be at the wedding. In spirit. Have it at night under my star. Or just—I don't know, slap a picture of me on a chair and—"

"You're so stupid," Regulus interrupts, then swivels on the spot and stomps off, scowling as he goes.

"James, how do you put up with him?" Sirius groans from behind him. "The chair idea is a good idea, isn't it? You get it. See, now you have to. It's funny! It would be—"

"Stop talking to my fiancé!" Regulus snaps as he continues on, and Sirius doesn't, but he does lower his voice as he follows along, which will just have to do.

"Congratulations, by the way," Frank says.

Despite everything, James breaks out into a goofy grin. Did he know he was engaged prior to Regulus announcing it when he sent the bagel? No. Is he going to protest it? Also no.

James beams over at Frank and chirps, "Thanks!"

Things are fine, until they aren't.

Regulus is walking ahead in a clear tiff, and Sirius leaves him to it, grumbling to James under his breath. He doesn't get why they can't just get married without him. Yes, the idea of them having a wedding without him there wants to make him curl up in a ball and cry, but that doesn't mean they shouldn't.

He wants them to be happy, even when he's gone. He needs them to be. And Remus. He needs Remus to be okay. Ideally, he would be free, but Sirius knows this isn't an ideal world. He'd die willingly if it meant Remus could be free, though. When he said he would live for Remus, he meant it, but he would also give his life in a heartbeat if that's all it would take to give Remus a chance at a better one.

Sirius is finding this whole dying business a chore, honestly. You'd think it would be easier; you're here one day, then gone the next. Simple enough, right? As it turns out, no, not so simple, because it affects more than just you.

Yeah, well, Sirius would love to live, actually. Has everyone forgotten that part? Obviously he doesn't want to die and never see Remus again, and never go to his brother and best friend's wedding, and never get to keep going in life and see what comes next. He'd do anything to keep living, anything except let his little brother die to make it possible.

So, grumpy as he is about the whole ordeal, Sirius glares at Regulus' back up ahead and thinks rude thoughts at him as he mumbles to James that he'd be his best man, not Regulus', because Regulus is currently being a little shit, so James is very ahead in the race of who would get him. Sirius finds the thought of them fighting over him as a best man mildly amusing and wonders, idly, who would win.

Before he can think of a proper answer, the sound of the shuddering hedges gets louder, and Sirius' face falls slack as the walls of the maze in between him and Regulus start to grow together, closing in between them.

Regulus whips around, eyes wide, and they look at each other through the gap for a beat before Sirius immediately takes off running, trying to catch up and jump through.

He doesn't make it.

"Regulus? Regulus!" Sirius calls through the hedge, his heart beating hard as he shoves one hand into the wall of leaves and sticks that jab at him and don't let him get through. It's so thick that he doesn't think he reaches in even halfway.

"Sirius?" Regulus calls back, his voice faint and muffled.

"Hey, are you okay?" Sirius asks, voice raised.

"Yeah, I'm—" Regulus cuts himself off, and Sirius ducks his head to listen better, but he can't hear much of anything through the barrier. And then, suddenly, Regulus' voice gets louder, tinged with panic. "Sirius! Sirius!"

Sirius' breath catches at the sheer fucking distress and audible terror in Regulus' voice. Immediately, Sirius' heart kicks into overdrive as he starts frantically yanking at the hedges, trying to cut a path with his spear, but it's no use. "Reggie? What is it? Regulus? Hey! I need you to talk to me! Regulus!"

There's no reply.

Regulus is frozen, his back to the hedge where Sirius is trapped on the other side, still yelling, though Regulus has no idea what's being said past the loud ringing in his ears.

The passage has been split in half, blocked right down the middle with Regulus on one side and Sirius on the other, a barrier too thick to break through in between them. At the end of the passage Regulus is facing, it's blocked off, nowhere to run forward, no turns to take.

He can only stand there, every muscle in his body locked up as he watches the steady trickle of blood pour down the length of the passage. It's a crimson river, making its way right for him.

Regulus doesn't move, doesn't even breathe, because he can't, at least not until the river reaches the tread of his boots, blood lapping against the soles. He instinctively heaves out a harsh breath and stumbles back as far as he can go, until he's pressed right up against the wall of greenery behind him, pushing himself backwards steadily, desperately and fitfully trying to outrun the blood. He gets nowhere.

There's nowhere to go.

"Please," Regulus chokes out. "Not this. Not like this. Anything else. Anything, please, just—just—"

The river of blood rushes at him faster, rapids and red foam, the sound of it sending a surge of panic through him. It starts to rise, splattering up against the hedges and rocking over the top of his boots, almost reaching his ankles just that quickly.

"No, no, no," Regulus chants, his breath stuttering out of him as he twists around and ducks his head, squeezing his eyes shut tight just so he won't have to see it. He trembles and traps a whimper behind his clenched teeth, tears pricking at his eyes as he feels the river wrap around his calves. "Okay, okay, I'm sorry, okay? I'm sorry. I'm—I won't—I shouldn't have said anything. I shouldn't have—I—I'm sorry. Please. You want to kill me? Fine, fine, but not—please not this way."

Sirius is still shouting, muffled and frantic. "Regulus? Regulus, what's happening? Regulus, what's—"

The crimson river clings to the back of Regulus' knees.

"Sirius," Regulus weeps, because he is weeping now, fully just sobbing—a hoarse, teary mess that he knows Sirius likely can't even hear, but Regulus can't catch his breath to raise his voice over the rushing blood. "Sirius, I'm going to die."

He is. He knows he is.

And the insane thing is, he doesn't want to.

It hits him now, like this, that he doesn't want to die, and more than that, he doesn't deserve to. Not now. Not like this. Not here. He doesn't, and Sirius doesn't, and none of them do.

It's on the edge of death that it becomes clear how desperate one is to live. No one wants to die, not really. It's one thing to say it, to think it, to feel it—but humans are creatures of endurance. They endure, and endure, and endure. It's instinct. It's the fear of the unknown and the desire for more.

People are born to live, and destined to die.

Regulus doesn't care about destiny. What he cares about is Sirius, and James, and so many others who are watching him in this moment, so many people he's realizing that he impacts just by living, and being who he is. People he doesn't want to leave yet. People he wants more time with. People he means something to. People who love him. He doesn't want to waste a second he could spend with his brother; he doesn't want to waste a moment he could spend knowing James is his, and alive, and loves him with every breath he takes.

Regulus wants to live for so many people, and deep down, he wants to live for himself. Because he was growing. Because he was learning to turn a house into a home. Because he was ready to let love in, and let love out. Because he was trying, and it doesn't matter that he's tired, and it doesn't matter that trying seems pointless, because he wants to keep trying.

The crimson river ensnares his waist.

Gasping out a harsh breath, Regulus' eyes flutter open as he stares at the hedge in front of him, barely hearing Sirius call out to him over the buzzing in his ears. His eyes are full, vision blurred from the tears constantly spilling over. The blood that laps at him makes him rock, but he can feel himself trembling so hard that his teeth are chattering. The river is so cold. So fucking cold, just like before, and Regulus—

The last time Regulus was lost in a crimson river, he tipped himself into it for James, and for Sirius. He chose to do it for them. A sacrifice.

This time, when Regulus is lost in yet another crimson river, he chooses to find his way out for himself. A rebirth.

Slowly, Regulus looks at the hedge in front of him, and carefully, he tilts his head back, because what drifts through his head is no one thinks to look up.

Regulus does.

He always thinks to look up now.

"Sirius," Regulus croaks, then clears his throat violently and blinks tears out of his eyes. He raises his voice to shout over Sirius, who is also shouting. "Sirius! Sirius, shut up and listen to me, okay? I need you to listen!"

"Don't you fucking dare give some sort of goodbye speech, Regulus, or I swear I'll—"

"I'm not giving a goodbye speech! I need help!"

There's a beat of a silence, and then Sirius blurts out a strained and muffled, "Anything. Anything you need. What is it?"

"I need you to climb to the top of the hedge and drop down the rope from your bag!" Regulus calls out, then whines helplessly as the river knocks against his ribs.

Sirius doesn't respond, and Regulus' panic and distress starts spreading to everything, to worrying about Sirius, too. Why hasn't he replied? Why hasn't he said okay? Why hasn't he—

A choked wheeze from up above catches Regulus' attention, his head falling back so he can stare wide-eyed at Sirius, who apparently scaled the hedge in record time and is now perched on the very top, staring down at him in horror, very pale.

"Oh, what the fuck, Reggie?" Sirius hisses, his hands flying around as he rushes to unravel the rope and drop it down. It doesn't reach where Regulus is, still too high. "Come on. You have to move right now. You have to climb."

That's the thing. Regulus can't climb. Every time he has tried since leaving the arena, he has failed. Every time, he freezes up and can't make himself move. Every time, he stays right there on the ground, never making it to the top.

If I cannot climb, I will grow. And he did. He has. He still is, even now. Growing doesn't stop. But, the thing is, to live right now, he's going to have to do both.

"Regulus!" Sirius bursts out, eyes wild, his voice tinged with panic and pure desperation. He has leaned forward as far as he can go, holding the rope down as far as it will reach. "Just keep going and don't look down!"

The crimson river drapes over Regulus' shoulders.

To grow is to climb, to climb is to grow. Either way, he's going up. Slowly but surely, he's making his way to the top.

Regulus gasps out a deep, shaky breath and reaches up as high as he can, fisting his hand into the hedge until he has a sure grip. Underneath, he swings his foot forward through the thick blood to embed his boot into the foothold he creates, and then he feels the river wrap around his neck like a noose just before he clenches his jaw and climbs.

His other hand flies up to bury in the wall of leaves and vines, clinging as he muffles a weak sound in the back of his throat and pulls, and keeps pulling, and yanks himself out of the river one handful at a time. The blood cascades off of him, inch by fucking inch, weighing him down, trying to drag him down. He thinks he's sobbing, but he isn't stopping. Despite the strain, the effort, the fear—he keeps climbing.

Regulus' chest heaves as he feels the river still lapping at his legs, still rising as he does the same, but he doesn't look down. He doesn't look at anything. He keeps going, feeling his arms shake, feeling the world shift around him and fall apart and somehow, inexplicably, build anew again.

To some, this would be simple. To some, climbing to escape a river of blood would seem like the sane course of action. To some, this wouldn't be very much of a feat at all.

But to Regulus? It's the fight of his life.

It's the fight for his life.

And he wins.

He fucking wins.

Regulus hears it when Sirius shouts to grab the rope, finally getting high enough to reach it, and so Regulus clamps down on it and starts yanking himself up almost desperately at the same time that Sirius starts frantically pulling, his hands flying along the rope, palms eating the length of it as he puts all his strength behind helping Regulus reach the top.

Regulus does. He folds over the top of the hedge and feels Sirius' hand ball into the back of his shirt tight, clenching and yanking so hard that the stitches make ripping noises. Regulus scrambles up until he's there, until he's gasping and shivering and immediately being tugged right into Sirius' arms.

"Okay, okay, you're okay," Sirius chokes out, clinging to Regulus as hard as Regulus clings to him, blood and all.

"I know," Regulus wheezes. "I know I am."

"You're okay, right? You're okay," Sirius chants, hands flying up to grasp Regulus' shoulders and push him back, shaking fingers patting him down, checking him over. "Yeah, you're okay. You're fine. You're—"

"Sirius," Regulus rasps.

"You're fine," Sirius insists, gasping for air more than Regulus is, at this point.

"Sirius," Regulus says firmly, shockingly steady as he darts his hands out to grip Sirius' wrists, stilling his hands. Sirius stares at him, wide-eyed, all the color drained from his face. "I'm okay. I'm really okay."

"Okay," Sirius whispers, his fingers still trembling.

"No more trying to die," Regulus states, holding Sirius' gaze, his racing heart slowly starting to calm. "No more. Not me, not you, not anyone. We try to live, okay? We have so much to live for, even just ourselves, so we try to live. Me and you."

Sirius stares at him for a long moment, then blows out a deep breath. "Fucking hell, Reggie, did you just have some sort of revelation or something?"

"Yeah," Regulus says with a mildly hysterical laugh, blinking rapidly. "Yeah, I think I did."

"Oh, well, fair enough," Sirius replies, equally hysterical.

Regulus swallows. "Did you hear me? We try to live. We—"

"You know we can't both—"

"I don't care. I don't care what we aren't supposed to be able to do, Sirius. Fuck them. Fuck them all. We can do anything. We can do whatever we decide to, and so let's live. Let's try to live, okay? Whatever it takes. Me and you."

Sirius holds his gaze, and he seems to hold his breath, and he's better than Regulus—he always has been—so it makes sense that he's better at hoping, too. A spark enters his eyes, and he laughs, choked up and carefree simultaneously, utterly exhilarated as he nods and breathes out, "Me and you."

A helpless, hysterical laugh spills out of Regulus' mouth, and he tips himself backwards out of Sirius' grip to lay back against the top of the hedge, gazing hazily up at the burnt orange and soft pink of the sun dancing across the sky, and he laughs softly, quietly, relaxing into the rush of adrenaline and finding the view to be entirely worth the climb.

"You hear that?!" Sirius shouts at the audience. "Me and him! Both of us! Fuck you! Fuck all of you! We're going to live!"

Regulus wheezes out another laugh and lifts his head to see Sirius grinning like a madman as he flips off the sky with both hands. Regulus drops his head back and lifts his hands to lazily join Sirius in flipping the sky off, too.

Slowly, the rush fades, and Regulus eases his arms down, letting them land over his stomach and chest with a wet smack, still shivering, still dripping blood. He hangs his hand over the side of the hedge and turns his head to look at it, watching the tiny crimson river run down his arm, over his scars, and slip through his fingers.

Regulus' gaze crawls past it to stare at the river of blood below. It's receding, calming, draining away to nowhere. It wanted him again. It wanted to keep him this time.

You can't have me, I'm not yours, Regulus thinks, and then he turns his face back towards the sun and smiles.

Chapter End Notes

this was, in my opinion, a...lighter chapter? especially compared to the last one. it's also one of my favorites (as was the last one), just because it's such a huge, huge turning point for regulus—and not only regulus, but also sirius!!!

so, starting from the top.

remus and james' friendship is so special to me 😭 ahhh, i adore them so much. just like, that whole conversation they had was really important for a variety of reasons, and just them taking care of each other (and pandora) as much as they can. also this hit me unexpectedly: "we can't make people love themselves just by loving them enough" ITS A ROUGH DAY FOR THOSE WHO RELATE TO JAMES, ISN'T IT?

also that moment with pandora. oh pandora my beloved ☹️☹️☹️ she is so special to me. I NEED TO HUG HER RIGHT NOW and then the plot twist that is lestrange and dolohov being petty and staying near james and frank because they're mad at lucius 😭 HELP JAMES REALLY RUINED THAT MAN'S WHOLE REPUTATION GOODBYE. james baby i love you mwah sirius and regulus. ☹️ no because regulus actually getting a whole night of rest bc he felt safe. but also lmaoooo sirius is so funny. that whole sibling thing of making them apologize over and over PLS. sirius thinking about remus through the night 😭 AHHH HE'S SO IN LOVE WITH THAT MAN and just like, the whole complexities of sirius and regulus' relationship as brothers really hits so hard every time. because they both apologized, and yet, neither of them ever got anywhere (until the end). nothing changed and they can't change anything or themselves and it's just gut-wrenching.

meanwhile, the rest of the maze is in a fucking DISASTER. not gonna lie, making up creatures out of my brain was fun! the creepy doll things, personally, seems scariest to me. mannequins freak me out, though. they have no business being Like That, so i just decided to make it worse! emmeline is so badass!

what's that tt sound where it's like that chaotic sound and then it switches to the upbeat sound? do you know what im talking about? well, if you do, then that's what it was like. literally just: everyone in the maze fighting for their lives cut to: sirius and regulus strolling around and talking about a wedding lmaoooo sirius literally losing his shit the second he realizes regulus misinterpreted the whole engagement thing HELP 😭 and then there's james who's just like: year we're engaged 🥰 did i know this before? no, but we are! and no one can take that from me!!! HES SO VALID. he claimed that energy and MATCHED it.

but sirius just being like "have your wedding under my star, slap a picture of me somewhere" GOODBYE WHY IS HE LIKE THIS IM CRYING 😭 however, if this was mcd and sirius died, james and regulus would indeed get married under sirius' star so he could be there with them ☹️ oh. i just hurt my own feelings.

anyway, this whole chapter was like this push-and-pull of regulus and sirius not being able to find common ground between them, and the source was the both of them trying to die for each other. being stubborn. and like, the solution is right there—it's literally so obvious, but it's like. well, it's not as if it's a solution that can actually work, but it is one that would make them coexist easier and work together in the arena. that being, the whole agreeing to fight to live thing. BOTH of them.

agreeing to fight to live—not an endgame solution, even if they'd like to believe it, and even if they're letting themselves. but fortunately for them, they won't have to get to that endgame! so this is good, a very good development for both of them.

oh, the river scene... yes, the second crimson river has arrived. is it the last? could be. we shall see. it was a huge breakthrough for regulus tho, and no, his aquaphobia and issues with blood isn't just cured btw, like this was just adrenaline and him having an "oh my life has meaning" revelation.

and the climbing!!! CRYING HE ALWAYS THINKS TO LOOK UP!!! evan just technically saved his life. i was so proud of regulus in that moment, that's insane, but i was just genuinely thinking of like, evan watching from somewhere like GO LITTLE ROCKSTAR 😭😭😭

"My brother. Louie," Huey says, looking skittish. "I need to know that he's going to be okay. Will he be okay?"

"Does he have anywhere he can go?" Dorcas murmurs, keeping her voice quiet. "Anyone he can lie low with?"

Huey hesitates, then mumbles, "He has an old flame who would take him in and keep him safe in a heartbeat. It's a little complicated, but…"

"Call him, tell him to go there, and he should be fine," Dorcas says. "It's—I do want you to be aware of the risk, though. For him and for you. I'm not going to lie to you, Huey. This is going to be a war. No one is going to be okay."

"Right," Huey whispers. "Right, okay, and if I refuse?"

Dorcas stares at him. "Whether you are here, or elsewhere, you won't be safe from the war, nor will anyone else. And, let me be very fucking clear, if you intend to in any way jeopardize what I'm doing, I will kill you before you ever get the chance."

Huey swallows thickly. "Right. Yeah, okay. I'll go call him."

"Good," Dorcas tells him.

Huey nods and walks off, his hand slipping into his pocket to pull out his phone. Dorcas sighs quietly and feels the tight clench of anticipation and worry gnaw on the inside of her chest some more. She'd been so eager to get to what's coming, and yet, the closer she gets, the less prepared she feels.

There's still more time, but Dorcas has a lot to do, on top of balancing her desperate need to keep an eye on Marlene in the arena. She's so distracted worrying about her that it's very difficult to manage much of anything else.

"Ms. Meadowes, I find myself curious about why you, of all people, would be talking to a sponsor."

Lips thinning out, Dorcas swings around to see Lucius Malfoy standing in front of her, his gaze trailing after Huey before settling back on her. He arches an eyebrow.

"You're aware, I'm sure, that only mentors are meant to network on the behalf of their tributes," Lucius continues, and Dorcas finds his voice very, very grating. "Not handlers. Not stylists. To interfere on the behalf of—"

"Malfoy, I literally do not have time for this, or you," Dorcas cuts in, and then can't even be bothered to stick around and listen to him sputter in offense. Dorcas doesn't waste her time on people who aren't worth it.

Dorcas sweeps off without a word, surveying the room to find either James or Frank. She locates James first, who is leaning against a wall. He seems to be recovering after Regulus nearly died, pressing one his hand flat to his chest as he breathes in and out. It's his first year as a mentor—hopefully his last—and he doesn't know how to save face yet. Other people are attempting to fawn over him and offer comfort, except James is not having it. He keeps sweeping out his cane to force people to give him a wide berth, not trying to hit anyone, but being sure that they won't come too close.

Alright, Dorcas can respect that. She swivels on her heel and decides to come back to him later. He's practically a sure thing anyway. Frank, however, is not.

"Dorcas," Frank greets in mild, distracted surprise when she comes to a stop next to him. He's Marlene's friend, and Dorcas wonders if Marlene ever talked about her to him. He seems quite caught up in watching Alice and Augusta to fully focus on her at the moment, which is fair.

"Hey, Frank, how are you holding up?" Dorcas murmurs.

Frank sighs. "Managing, mostly. You?"

"Oh, I'm—fine," Dorcas says haltingly, and Frank does turn his head to raise his eyebrows at her then, and yeah, okay, he knows she's involved with Marlene. Right, well, this should be a little easier, in that case. "Actually, not that fine."

"Yes, well, when someone you care about is in the arena, it's always harder," Frank announces, holding her gaze. He seems to be searching her eyes. "You love her, don't you?"

"I do, yeah," Dorcas admits quietly, and Frank's face softens immediately. "You have no idea just how far I'll go for her."

"Unfortunately, there's not very much you can do from your position," Frank says softly.

Dorcas clears her throat. "Yeah, uh, about that…"

"What?" Frank asks, eyebrows wrinkling together.

"What if I said—" Dorcas cuts herself off when multiple people gasp throughout the room, drawing her attention, as well as Frank's, who sucks in a sharp breath and goes still.

Rita is on one screen, leaning forward in clear interest as she shows the scene of Augusta and Alice taking a corner and both coming to a screeching halt at the sight of Frank laying in the middle of a passage, a hole in his head from a bullet wound, clearly dead. Dorcas blinks and glances over at Frank, then back to his dead body on the screen.

"Ah, yes, this is exciting," Rita states. "A new creation by Head Gamemaker Minerva McGonagall herself, something called a boggart. It's a creature that takes the form of the tributes' greatest fear, and it's interactive. It can and will attack, and as we can see here, it seems Augusta and Alice share the same fear. Of course, they have no way of knowing it's not real…"

Frank makes a quiet sound, staring at the screen with wide eyes, and Dorcas swallows thickly, her stomach churning to think that Minerva created this. Of course she did. Minerva is brilliant, even to a terrifying point, and she knows as well as everyone within the Order that Riddle has an odd obsession with fears and such. He finds it fascinating, especially since he's essentially immune, seeing as it's rumored he fears nothing and doesn't experience fear at all. That's why he loves Horcrux Hornets so much, or so Slughorn has said.

On the screen, Frank's corpse turns its head and stares at Alice and Augusta with dead eyes. "Why, Mum? Why did you take my place when it doesn't even matter?" The corpse drags itself up on creaking limbs. "Alice, how could you let me die the same way your parents did? How could you—"

Alice whimpers and stumbles back into Augusta, who exhales harshly and steadies them before rasping, "It's not real. Alice, it's not real. That's not Frank. He's not—my son isn't dead. It's a trick. Come on. Come on!"

Augusta turns away from the corpse and yanks on Alice, who seems to be hyperventilating through tears, but they dutifully start running away when Augusta forces them to. As they go, Augusta just keeps chanting it's not real, it's not real, it's not real.

Once Alice and Augusta take a corner, out of sight, the boggart dissolves into mist and drifts along like wisps of smoke, traveling through the maze.

"Sorry," Frank croaks, blinking rapidly. "Um, you were—you were saying something before."

"Right," Dorcas whispers, swallowing past the lump in her throat. "Yeah, I was. Frank, I need you to hear me out, okay?"

Frank turns and looks at her, and then he does.

When blood dries in cloth, it makes it stiff. Regulus feels like he's wearing boards, which is very uncomfortable, but there is literally nowhere to clean his clothes. Sirius helped him wring out what he could, making sure to keep the dripping portions of Regulus' shirt away from his skin so he wouldn't have to feel it, which Regulus appreciates. It was damp for a while, wet and sticky against his skin, which he hated, but now it's dry and rough. It's still an improvement, in his opinion.

Either way, it's a small price to pay to not be dead.

"You don't have to walk so close, you know," Regulus mutters, exasperated because Sirius is walking beside him, right beside him in perfect step, their elbows bumping over and over.

Sirius grunts. "No, but I do, though. Apparently—" He shoots a glare up at the sky, "—they feel the need to separate us."

"Sirius, we probably will be separated, realistically speaking," Regulus tells him, and Sirius purses his lips in visible distaste at this notion. "This maze is a fucking mess, so there's a good chance we will be. And, if we are, then we just—we keep going and try to find each other again. Stay alive until we do."

"Yeah, I know, but I'm not going to make it easy for them," Sirius declares firmly.

Regulus hums. "Fair enough. Me neither."

Abruptly, Sirius snaps his hand out to clamp down on Regulus' arm, and Regulus instantly stops, tensing up as he looks over to see how serious Sirius is. He cocks his head a little, eyes narrowing, and Regulus strains his ears and darts his gaze around, trying to hear what Sirius is hearing and see what Sirius is seeing. It takes a moment, and then Regulus picks up the faint sound of footsteps pounding against the ground.

"You hear that, right?"

"I hear that."

"Someone's com—"

Sirius never finishes before a form bursts through the opening up ahead, tripping a little as they take the corner. Regulus gets to make out that it's Lester only seconds before he's coming right for them, raising his spear.

Before Regulus even thinks about it, he shoves Sirius to the side forcefully and stumbles back, watching the spear fly through the air where Sirius just was.

"Don't you fucking dare!" Regulus bursts out, utterly furious in just a split second, and Sirius ducks yet again when Lester attempts to wrap hands around his throat.

"It's not going to stop!" Lester roars, panting, utterly wild-eyed and frantic. "Don't you get it?! The maze isn't going to stop throwing shit at us until we're all dead! We have to kill! I have to kill you! I have to!"

In seconds, Regulus is whirling behind Lester to grab him by the back of his hair, slamming his boot into the back of Lester's knee and shoving him forward at the same time that Sirius swings out with his spear. It's so precise, so quick, that Lester barely even gurgles when the spear slits his throat, open and uncovered where Regulus wrenches his head back.

Regulus sees the blood immediately begin to pour down Lester's front, but he doesn't let go until Lester's hands go slack, no longer trying to reach Sirius, who is perfectly fine. He's already cleaning off his spear lazily, watching dispassionately as Lester falls forward in a puddle of his own blood and continues to bleed out.

"Are you alright?" Sirius asks, swiping the spearhead off and eyeing Regulus carefully.

Regulus is doing his level best not to gag, honestly. None of the blood got on him, but he can smell it, and he saw it, and after the crimson river, he's so fucking queasy that death is genuinely just making him feel in danger of being sick.

"Yep, fine," Regulus manages to say, and then ruins it by flinching slightly when the cannon sounds. Sirius raises his eyebrows at him, and Regulus huffs. "Oh, shut up. It's the blood, alright? It fucking stinks. How are you so—so—"

"Calm?" Sirius asks.

"Yeah, that," Regulus mutters grudgingly.

Sirius sighs and twirls his spear over his wrist. "Reggie, I'm not exactly—I mean, I've… I've had my moments, alright? But it's the arena. In here, this can't—I can't think about it. I can't focus on what I'm doing, or what I have to do. I just do it."

"Don't you think I'm trying to do the same?" Regulus snaps, taking another step back from Lester, breathing through his mouth. The blood-stiff clothes he's wearing is making his skin itch. "Fucking hell, Sirius, you've killed four people without even hesitating. Didn't even blink. And Camilla—I mean, you seemed to be alright with her, and then—"

"And then she tried to kill you," Sirius cuts in bluntly. He holds Regulus' gaze. "Look, I knew exactly what I was getting into by coming back here. I've already murdered twelve people. What's sixteen, especially to keep me and you alive? If I live, I'll live with it. If I don't, well, I guess I won't have to. Either way, I do what I have to do, same as you. It's not easy, but I don't have the same issues with blood that you do, for one thing. And I wasn't just here last year, for another."

"What if I fuck it up? Or I'm too late to help you? Or I'm not fast enough?" Regulus whispers, and his stomach churns even worse at the mere thought.

"Is that what you're worrying about now?" Sirius asks wearily, heaving a sigh. "Honestly, you have some major anxiety issues going on, you know that? Listen to me, okay? Me and you, whatever it takes. We agreed to that, didn't we?"

"Yes," Regulus mumbles.

"So, that's that," Sirius says simply. "That means we're both trying our best, and that is enough, Reggie. No matter what happens, it's enough. We're doing enough."

Regulus swallows harshly, then nods. "Okay."

"Okay, good," Sirius murmurs. "Now, let's go."

They take one corner, and Sirius immediately sees what Lester was running from in the first place, and why he was so frantic by the time he reached them.

Frankly, if Sirius had been chased relentlessly by these creatures, he'd be a fucking mess, too.

"Sirius," Regulus whispers, reaching out slowly and tapping Sirius against the chest with the back of his hand, never taking his eyes off the creatures in front of them. "Dagger. Give me my dagger. Now is the time to give me my dagger."

Sirius wordlessly passes him his dagger.

The creatures are about half the size of an average human, but the massive amount of them is what's off-putting. Their arms are longer than their bodies, branching off into sharp points that dig into the grounds like life-size needles. From what Sirius can tell, there's no feet on them at all, just a humanoid chest that stops into an open ribcage, no organs on display. Where the head is, there's a slick, bulbous mouth with tentacles splitting free, except the tentacles seem to have teeth. Not human teeth, no. Sharp, curved teeth that look like fucking hooks made of bone.

Naturally, the opening behind them that they just turned down has already shuddered closed, so they're trapped with nowhere to go. There has to be at least twenty creatures waiting at the other end of the passage. They're very silent and very still.

"Okay," Sirius says. "Okay, so."

"So?" Regulus asks.

"So," Sirius repeats, and has no idea what comes next.

Regulus clears his throat. "Sirius, what's the plan here?"

"Climb again?" Sirius suggests weakly.

"Ah," Regulus replies, releasing a punched-out breath, his head swiveling to look at the hedge beside them. Sirius glances at him to see him looking wary, but he seems to set his shoulders. "Right. Right, okay. Climb again. I can—I mean, I already did it once. I can probably do it again."

The second they edge closer to the wall of greenery beside them, the rustling gets louder and hands burst free from it, swiping for them. Sirius snatches Regulus back and watches the hands slowly recede back again. "Okay, so that's…not going to happen, apparently. Um. Shit."

"No climbing," Regulus mumbles, sounding both relieved and upset about this, somehow.

"Guess not." Sirius flexes his fingers around his spear and squints at the creatures ahead. "So, it looks like the only way to go is through. Fighting it is."

"For fuck's sake," Regulus grumbles, his face dropping into a scowl, but he gives a swift little twirl of his dagger and puts one foot back, standing at the ready.

"Hey, Reggie?"

"Yeah?"

"I bet I can take down more than you can," Sirius teases, broadening his stance and letting a grin grow on his face.

There's a pause, then Regulus snorts and says, "You're on," before promptly tearing off down the passage, running right for the creatures without a beat of hesitation.

"Hey!" Sirius blurts out. "That's cheating, you little shit!"

He thinks he hears Regulus laugh, but if he does, it's lost among the rush that fills Sirius' head as he takes off running, too. The moment they get halfway down the passage, the crowd of creatures at the end are a sudden burst of motion, quite fast on their needle-arms as they rush to meet them.

Sirius and Regulus are severely outnumbered, and there's also a lot of appendages to contend with between the pointy arms and the ridiculous amount of tentacles flying at them. Sirius finds out very quickly that the ribcage on the creatures break open and tries to ensnare whatever comes too close, so that's yet another thing to worry about.

And yet, they blitz through like they were made for it.

If Sirius and Regulus are weapons in their own right, then they're dual blades, easily working in tandem like extensions of each other. Dangerous on their own, even more dangerous together. They never have to speak, never have to even look at one another; they flow as if they're in the middle of a dance they've known the steps to since birth.

Sirius skewers one creature through the face and slams it into another, sweeping out with his spear to knock at least four to the ground at once. Regulus stomps on the heads as he goes by, like they practiced it. Just the same, when Regulus slams his dagger into the head of one, Sirius kicks it through the spine to make it easier for Regulus to snatch his dagger back out, flip it, and slam it into the head of the next.

It's fluid the way they shift and move around one another, focused and intent, dropping one creature right after the next. Sirius finds his whole world narrowing down to the fight, the thrill of it, not thinking of it as a competition, but rather something they're handling together. He's bolder than Regulus is, unafraid to reach out and grip the creatures by the outside of their tentacles, where their teeth aren't, just to raise them up and slam them to the ground. At some point, Sirius quite literally has a creature-kebab lined up along his spear, dangling where he pierced them through their faces.

The mass of creatures thin out, and then the last does down when Sirius shoves his spear up through the cracked open ribcage so hard that the spearhead bursts through top of the creature's head. The tentacles instantly fall slack, no longer trying to wrap around his face.

Panting, Sirius tips his spear down and puts his boot against the ribs to kick the creature off. There's a squelch, then a very gross splat, and that's it.

"Well," Sirius wheezes, "I definitely won."

"What? No you didn't. You can't prove it," Regulus sputters instantly, which tells Sirius he did, in fact, win.

"Don't be a sore loser," Sirius teases, wrinkling his nose as he inspects his spear. It's covered in gunk. The creatures didn't seem to bleed, but they were very…goopy.

"What are you doing?" Regulus asks.

Sirius continues to pull off his bag, reaching inside to find the cloth he needs. "Cleaning my spear. It's disgusting."

"You have a bit of…" Regulus coughs and gestures to his own hair, then Sirius'.

"What?!" Sirius chokes out, instantly dropping his spear and cloth, hands flying up to his hair in horror.

Regulus' shoulders start shaking, and then Sirius realizes he's laughing, because he's fucking awful, is what he is. Sirius glares at him, but can't stop himself from patting at his hair, running his fingers through it as Regulus continues to laugh at him.

"Ah, you're too easy," Regulus sighs out, sounding rather pleased with himself as he moves over to smugly scoop up the cloth and clean off his dagger.

Sirius huffs at him. "Clean my spear, why don't you?"

"No," Regulus says blandly, then drops the cloth back on the ground once he's done with it.

"Prick," Sirius grumbles, but gives in and leaves his hair alone once he's sure that it's clean. He grabs his spear and cloth to turn his attention to that instead. "So much for loving me."

Regulus frowns. "I do lo—" He stops, then squints when Sirius grins triumphantly at him.

"You're too easy," Sirius corrects, cackling when Regulus scoffs and looks away. After Sirius finishes with his spear, he stands again and puts his bag back on. "You know, that wasn't so bad, actually. I mean, whatever those things were, they were disgusting, but we did alright. We're really—"

"Sirius," Regulus interrupts, his tone making Sirius' spine snap up straight as he whips around to see what Regulus is staring at with such intensity. All of Sirius' pride drains away to be replaced by intense fear the moment he sees the green fog spilling out up ahead. "That's not good, is it?"

"Nope," Sirius confirms. "Time to go."

Dorcas watches Eli go down and knows, somehow, that he's not going to get back up.

Marlene doesn't seem to know this.

"Come on , old man, keep moving!" Marlene orders harshly, stabbing her sword into the ground to go back and hook her uninjured hand under Eli's arm.

Eli is wheezing, and though he tries to stumble back to his feet, he hits his knees and is promptly sick on the ground. He groans and shakes his head, gasping out, "Can't. I can't."

"Yes, you can," Marlene insists, snatching him around his own sick and dragging him along, but again, he tumbles right back down and coughs as he clutches his chest, hacking so hard that it sounds painful. "If you stay here, Eli, you will die."

"Girl, if I keep running, I will die," Eli manages to say, his voice wry. He tips his head back to stare at her. "My heart's going to give out. I—I can't outrun this shit, but you can."

Marlene throws a desperate look towards the green fog that's steadily drawing closer to them. "Look, throw a pity party to someone who cares. I don't have time for this. Get up!"

"You remind me of my Alphard," Eli rasps, giving her a sad smile. "He cared so much it killed him."

"Eli, now is not the time to—"

"You need to leave me now, girl. I know what I can take, and I can't take any more. I'm tired. So tired."

"Well, too bad, because I'm not leaving you here," Marlene declares in clear distress. She tries to help him, but she can barely manage it with only one arm, especially with how tired she is. She does manage to get him back to his feet, crying out as she ducks under his arm and takes his weight, only for his legs to give out almost instantly and jostle her shoulder. "Eli, please. Please, please just get up. Please—"

"Go," Eli whispers hoarsely, and then he reaches out to shove at her hard enough that she stumbles back a few steps. The fog has almost reached them. "I said go!"

"Eli," Marlene croaks, her eyes shimmering on the screen as she stares at him in horror.

"You made me proud," Eli tells her. "Really proud. And I didn't do right by you, didn't do a damn thing for you, didn't even try. But you didn't need me, and you still don't, so go."

"I'm sorry," Marlene chokes out, the tears spilling out of her eyes and trailing down her cheeks. Dorcas feels her chest clench, her palms itching with the desire to reach out and gently brush those tears away.

"What're you sorry for, Marlene McKinnon? I'm gonna see my Alphard again." Eli gives her a toothy grin, one that shows a glimpse of how charming his smile must have been when he was younger. Still charming now, even like this. "I'd do anything for Alphard. Even live. And I did, as best as I could. I hope you find that someday."

She already has, Dorcas thinks. Anything, anything, anything.

Dorcas' eyes burn as she watches Marlene's shoulders heave, still frozen in place as the fog reaches Eli's feet. It travels up the length of his body, and Marlene doesn't move, can't seem to. Eli curls up on the ground and closes his eyes with a serene smile, but the moment the fog reaches his head and he breathes it in, he starts screaming.

It's absolutely devastating. The entire room goes silent just listening to it, utterly horrified by the raw scream of agony that escapes the man who could run no longer and go no further. Dorcas feels the very tips of her fingers prickle, her eyes wide and her mouth dry. The green fog. Biological warfare. Horcrux Hornet venom turned into this.

She knew there was a chance it could be used in the games, but she never saw it, and she didn't connect it all together until this moment. This is what most of district six experienced, and this is a weapon Riddle has at his disposal to use against those that defy him. Eli is screaming like he's suffering the worst torment any human could ever feel. It's the peak of torture, gripped in death throes, simply suffering.

Dorcas' skin crawls. All that she has seen, all that she knows of, and nothing could have prepared her for this.

There are no good people in war, but there are terrified ones, and as Dorcas watches this, she's strangled by such an intense fear that she can barely breathe.

That? she thinks. We have to beat that? No one can beat that.

As if to prove her point, Eli's screams cut out, and only seconds later, the cannon sounds.

Marlene hasn't moved. She's frozen, eyes wide and teary, lips parted as if she's breathless, utterly stunned and horrified by what she just witnessed. The fog hasn't stopped moving, still crawling right towards her, so close now she'd only have to take a step forward and reach out to touch it.

"Go," Dorcas breathes out, gaze fixed on the screen. Her whole body is trembling. "Come on, Marlene. Come on, come on, come on. Go. Please go. You have to—"

Choking out a harsh breath, Marlene proceeds to go, as if maybe she's heard Dorcas, or just felt the utter desperation winding around Dorcas' bones, her very blood, where her love flows and cements into her; surely Marlene can feel it, as big and relentless as it is, even while trapped there. Can't she?

Whether she feels it or not, Marlene snatches up her sword and runs, and Dorcas thinks she's crying as she goes, but she's still going. Still here. Still surviving.

On the screen, Marlene sprints down one passage and whips around the corner of the next, not even slowing down as she leaves the fog behind. It stops advancing, and Dorcas is at first confused why, but then her heart drops when the camera pans to the white mist at the end of the passage Marlene is running down. She doesn't seem to see it, even as she looks right at it, and the moment she glances away, it begins to take shape.

Dorcas' heart drops, the blood in her veins turning to ice when she sees…Marlene. Another one. A different one. She looks so different from what Dorcas is used to. Long hair in perfect, delicate curls down her back and over her shoulders; eyes bright and warm, a spark of innocence in them that Dorcas has never seen before; wearing a pale cream-colored dress that shows her arms and legs, completely scar-free. She looks young; no, she looks youthful, something sweet and shy draped over her, all the way down to her bare feet. There's something innocent about bare feet, and the way she walks like she's not scared of one step she takes, unafraid of the world around her.

This is a Marlene no one has ever seen before. She didn't even look like this in her first games. To the Hallows, even then, Marlene was rather plain and unremarkable. But this Marlene? She's the flutter of fairy wings and wisps of cotton candy, and Dorcas knows—she just knows in her heart—that if this is how Marlene was presented to the Hallow, they would have cared for her so much more than they ever have.

The Marlene that Dorcas does know, the one that's real, the one that she's deeply, unapologetically in love with, the one that is ripped nails and bloody teeth and scars that reach farther than just skin deep—that Marlene stumbles to a stop the moment the other one comes closer.

"Who are you?" the boggart asks softly.

Marlene stares, seeming genuinely startled out of her own grief by the sight of—herself. Or no, that's not her. It's not, and Dorcas doubts it ever was. So…what is Marlene afraid of? Why is this her biggest fear?

"What the hell is this?" Marlene croaks, her fingers flexing around her sword. She only has one hand to grip her weapon, but her gaze is hard like she isn't afraid to fucking use it.

"What are you?" the boggart whispers, face contorting with horror and—and fear. Dorcas swallows harshly, her gaze darting back and forth between them. "You're a monster."

Marlene goes still, then repeats through clenched teeth, "What the hell is this?"

"You're the monster that got our parents killed," the boggart chokes out, seeming genuinely frightened. "You killed them, and what? You—you take comfort by the fact that they got to see you as you are before they died? They never wanted you as you are. They wanted this! They wanted me!"

"Shut up. Shut up, shut up, shut up," Marlene chants, her chest stuttering on a sharp inhale. "What the fuck are you? What—"

"It should have been me, not you, not the monster that you are, that you became," the boggart insists. It steps forward, and Marlene immediately swings her sword up, her breathing erratic. "Look at what you became."

"Shut up!" Marlene bursts out.

The mist swirls off the boggart, down by bare feet, and in the next second, Hodge and Vanity are stepping out of the darkness to walk up beside the Marlene that's not real. The sight of them steals Dorcas' breath, only more so because they're dead. Corpses. Empty-eyed, the both of them; Vanity's throat slit; Hodge soaking wet, dripping red. As they walk forward, they're holding hands between them.

From somewhere in the room, someone releases a choked noise, and Dorcas recognizes it. James.

"We needed her," Vanity murmurs, "but we got stuck with a monster. Fancy that, a monster trying to save children for once, and all you succeeded in was failing to."

"If you were her," Hodge gurgles, a stream of red spilling out of his mouth as he speaks, "you could have done more. But you're not. You're just you, and that's all you can ever be. All you'll ever be is this, a monster who can't save anyone."

"This is what they all needed," the boggart hisses, suddenly not seeming as innocent as before as it starts advancing on Marlene, who's clearly struggling to breathe. "Our mother. Our father. Every tribute we've ever had. Our family. Eli. They all need me, and they got stuck with you, and look where it got them. And what about your lover? What about her?"

Dorcas sucks in a deep breath and holds it, her heart hammering hard in her chest. Marlene shakes her head and backs up, eyes wide and wet.

"How could she ever love you?" the boggart spits out.

"Shut up," Marlene says weakly.

"Do you think she looks at you and sees anything other than the monster you are?" the boggart demands, continuously moving forward, getting too close. "All you're fighting for, trying so hard to survive, and for what? To get back to her? She doesn't want you. She never wanted you, and you knew it, and then she felt sorry for you. What she really wants is me, and you can't give that to her, can you? Can you?!"

Marlene heaves out a deep breath that seems to turn into a scream and a sob all in one, and she swings out with her sword with what seems to be all her might, the blade slashing right through the boggart. There's a moment, just one, and then Marlene and everyone else watches as the distorted mirror of Marlene is split in two, decapitated. The boggart's head rolls right off its neck, hitting the ground first before the rest of the body falls. Marlene stares, her chest rising and falling rapidly.

"Why didn't you do more?" Vanity asks, because she's still there. It's still the boggart, still advancing, not yet defeated. Marlene's head snaps up. "My family needed me. They needed you to do better for me, and you couldn't."

"My mum's all alone now," Hodge says through a mouthful of crimson river. "I didn't want to leave her alone. You were supposed to help me so I wouldn't leave her alone."

"I'm—I'm sorry. Please, I'm so sorry," Marlene weeps, a whimper falling out of her mouth as they walk towards her steadily, hand-in-hand.

"You're a monster," they tell her, chanting it as they continue to draw closer. "You're a monster. You're a monster."

Dorcas reaches up to cover her mouth, trying to muffle the sound crawling up the walls of her constricted throat. Marlene doesn't raise her sword against them, and she won't. Dorcas knows she won't. Knows she can't.

All Marlene does is stumble back when they reach for her with small hands. She keeps backing up, hyperventilating and seeming unable to tear her eyes away from them as she goes.

She moves swiftly in her panic, backing up all the way out of the passage to the opposite hedge wall before the opening. She stops there, frozen in place, not running left or right, no longer going anywhere. Her sword clatters to the ground.

"Go," Dorcas pleads through her fingers. "Please, Marlene, just—just go. You have to go."

This time, Marlene doesn't seem to feel the love crying out from every cell in Dorcas' body, and she doesn't move.

Sirius found Regulus, kept him for a day, then lost him again.

He hates this fucking maze.

It's not either of their fault, really, because it seems the gamemakers are bound and determined to separate them, and with all the shit they have at their disposal in the maze, it wasn't impossible for them to do. Between the hands, the fog, even the fucking twists and turns and the hedges that open and close, somewhere along the way, they got split up.

Sirius wants to rip his fucking hair out, or maybe rip the whole damn world in half, but all he can do is run. He's still running.

Did he ever stop?

What's worse is that the unexpected sound of a distant scream triggered him, and he slipped away without even knowing it, so he has no idea where he lost Regulus. He just came back to himself, still fucking running, to find Regulus gone.

So, as you can guess, he is not in a good mood at the moment, quite literally cursing up a storm as he tears down one passage after the next, and that means he outright snarls when he takes a corner and slams into someone who isn't Regulus, or any of his allies, or anyone he could be pleased to see.

Sirius perhaps shoves Dixon away roughly, and between that and the snarl, it's no surprise that a fight instantly breaks out between them. Dixon, predictably, is very strong. He's also older and wiser, so he stays out of range as they clash, sword to spear. Even still, Sirius isn't too worried until Dixon somehow manages to disarm him, the spear rolling away.

There's sort of these levels to Sirius, when it comes to the threat he poses. Most of the time, he does the bare minimum, just what he has to so he can win and win quickly. But, every now and again, he'll get into a fight with someone he has to dig deep into himself to get the upper hand against.

Like the person he fought in his last games where he quite literally bit their finger off. A whole finger. Blood and muscle and bone. He bit right through and spit it out. Didn't choke, didn't gag, didn't even slow down.

So, yes, he's no stranger to going the lengths it takes to survive, and oh, Sirius is fixated on survival now. Especially now. As long as he can. Whatever it takes.

Generally, what it takes to activate this need to dig deep is a very hard opponent to beat, or having someone to protect, or noticing that he's losing the advantage he has just by being as good as he is. He knows he's good, but he also knows he's not indestructible, or infallible. Perhaps the reminder of his own fragile mortality in a place it can so easily be crushed drives him over the edge. Perhaps he's just insane.

Either way, when Dixon comes at him fast, Sirius fights back dirty. He digs his nails into Dixon's wrist and twists, whirling back and slamming his boot forward into the side of his knee so hard that he cries out and goes down. The sword tumbles to the ground, but Dixon still lashes out hard enough that Sirius has to let him go and back out of the way.

Dixon does little hops to get back on his feet—well, his foot. He's very carefully staying off the leg that Sirius just kicked, so Sirius naturally kicks it again, ruthlessly, even harder. This time, there's a sickening crunch, and Dixon's leg bends in at the knee in a way it absolutely should not. He starts to crumble again, shouting and cursing, and Sirius has all intentions of stomping his knee into dust and then, possibly, his skull, but Dixon is not faint-hearted. He's a resilient, hardy bastard, clearly, which Sirius can't help but respect.

Somehow, Dixon balances on one leg and brings his hands up, breathing hard before promptly swinging out at Sirius, quick enough that Sirius has to dodge. As he goes back, Dixon tips forward to scoop up his sword, and Sirius is still in range, unable to move in time, so he quite literally sees his life flash before his eyes in the glint of the blade.

And then, without warning, there's a sharp zing through the air, and Sirius feels his hair rustle by his face, as well as a stinging sensation across his cheek seconds before he watches an arrow bury itself right in Dixon's eye. It lands so hard that his head snaps back as he falls, and the cannon sounds before his body ever hits the ground.

Slowly, Sirius reaches up to touch the slice on his cheek, fingers meeting the blood that bubbles up. It's not deep, or a genuine issue, but it burns a little. He turns around to find Narcissa standing at the other end of the passage behind him, lowering her bow as she meets his eyes.

Her aim is deadly. Sirius has never known her to miss, which means she killed Dixon on purpose, her own ally, and it also means she gave him a little cut for funsies.

Narcissa's lips twitch as he breaks out into a helpless grin, and she winks at him before turning and darting off without looking back, without a word spoken between them.

"This fucking family," Sirius mutters wryly, shaking his head as he dips to pick up his spear and back up steadily. An incredulous huff of laughter escapes him before he turns and takes off at a light jog, his chest oddly, inexplicably warm.

Just for a moment.

Regulus is not at all pleased with how this is going, but really, he never is. If it's not one thing, it's another. This whole arena is shit, even in ways he could have never expected.

He thought that it would be similar to all the arenas before, in that at least allies would be given the chance to stay with each other, but that's clearly not the case. As far as he knows, the death eaters are all broken up, and Sirius' allies are, too. It's like the arena is taking every bit of anything anyone has ever relied on away. No resources, no solidarity, no way to ground themselves or find a sense of security. It's all a mess.

The sound of a cannon nearly causes him to trip, and he curses sharply under his breath as he rounds a corner, glancing frantically over his shoulder as he outruns those fucking hands. He swears if he never sees a clawed, corpse-like disembodied hand again in his life, it'll be too soon.

There are no hands in the passage he turns down, though, which he takes as a vast improvement until he sees what is in the passageway. He comes to a halt so hard that he skids, his eyes bulging at the sight of—Vanity? Hodge?

It takes a second for Regulus' brain to make out what he's actually seeing. Vanity and Hodge, clearly dead, wrapping their hands around Marlene's throat and squeezing. She's fighting, weakly, but mostly just wheezing and sinking down to the ground, slowly going limp.

Regulus' stomach drops out from under him, and before he even thinks about it, he snaps his hand out and watches his dagger fly through the air. It embeds itself into the side of Hodge's head, which surprisingly does seem to help Marlene a little. The boy is dead already, and yet his hands go slack as he drops to the ground like a stone. Little rivers of red trickle out of the corners of his mouth, his gaze unseeing and glassy.

Vanity doesn't stop, though. Marlene's eyes flutter shut.

"Shit," Regulus whispers, and he's not thinking past anything other than the fact that Marlene is Sirius' friend, and according to James, Dorcas'...lover, possibly?

Not only that, but just Marlene herself. Regulus respects her, and he's only just realizing it right now. He thought he didn't care about Sirius' allies, planned to kill them if he could so Sirius didn't have to, even, but the thing is. Well, what Marlene did in her interview was moving. She's just—she is someone to respect, and no one deserves to die like this.

Not like this.

It's as repellent and horrid as being trapped in a crimson river, in Regulus' mind. For fuck's sake, Vanity and Hodge's families could be watching right now. James surely is.

Oh, James. There's no doubt in Regulus' mind that seeing this, seeing these two again, has hurt him. Regulus instinctively wants to stop James from hurting further, and Marlene dying at the hands of the corpses of these two would be worse.

Regulus quite literally slams into Vanity's corpse to rip it away from Marlene, who releases a choked, hoarse noise before slumping to the side, her breathing worryingly shallow. Vanity's corpse is in his arms one second, then gone the next. Just poof. Mist. She dissolves, gone, and when Regulus turns, Hodge's body is also gone. Regulus exhales in relief.

The dagger was left behind, thankfully. Regulus scoops it up as he moves over to crouch down at Marlene's side. The arm she's laying on is fine, but the other one… Regulus grimaces just looking at it, swollen and visibly broken as it is. He doesn't touch it, but reaches out to press his fingers to the side of her throat, checking her pulse.

She has one. It's faint and a little slow, but it's there. Marks are already forming on her neck from where she was strangled, shaped like four hands. Regulus draws his hand back and stares down at her, considering her.

As horrible as it is, a part of Regulus wishes he had let her die. It would have been easier, wouldn't it? Because she's going to have to die at some point anyway, and putting off the inevitable isn't going to change much in the end.

Yet, Regulus just—can't. He can't bring himself to regret it, giving her more time, because it was—that was good, wasn't it? Even here, even in this rot-infested fucking maze where the sun doesn't even really reach them, there's the warm glow of humanity to be found. Even in him. Even after everything.

Regulus blows out a deep breath, then reaches out with his free hand and begins gently tapping Marlene on her cheek with the back of his hand, trying to rouse her. She's alive, just seems to have passed out. He'd give her water if he had any, but Sirius has all the fucking supplies.

Marlene's face twitches, just a little, and so he pulls his hand back with the intention of tapping her a little harder, except he goes still when he hears footsteps behind him.

Swiftly, Regulus twists and whirls to his feet as he flips his dagger and has it against the throat of the person behind him in mere seconds. He freezes the moment he sees who it is.

"Hey, love," James greets softly.

The moment James sees himself on the screen, he feels his heart sink right to his feet. He moves forward as swiftly as he can with his cane, his breathing erratic as he comes to a halt in between Dorcas and Frank, staring at the boggart version of himself and Regulus frozen in place, eyes wide.

"No," James chokes out, and he jolts when Dorcas reaches out to take his hand, gently squeezing it. She looks queasy, her whole body threaded through with tension, face twisted with strain. "Not me. Fuck. He won't—he won't kill me. He always hesitates. He'll hesitate. He—"

"James," Frank says firmly, "breathe. Just breathe. We don't—we have no way of knowing what will happen, and he just has to hold on for a little longer, okay?"

"What?" James rasps, glancing over to see Dorcas and Frank trade a quick look. "What does that mean?"

"James?" Regulus whispers on the screen, and so Dorcas and Frank do not elaborate. James wouldn't hear if they did. He focuses back on the scene in front of him. "You're—how are you here? Why are you—"

"All you did to keep me out, and here I am anyway," the boggart says lightly, making it seem like a joke.

Regulus doesn't seem to find that funny. "How the fuck—"

"Oh, come off it, Reg," the boggart teases, and James instantly hates anyone else, anything else, calling him that. He doesn't care if it's his mouth shaping around the nickname; it's not him speaking it, which James finds out very quickly he does not like, especially in these circumstances. "Don't act like you're not pleased, even secretly. I know you want me here. It's selfish, but you're glad I'm here, aren't you?"

"What?" Regulus croaks, all the color draining out of his face at once. "No, James, I—I don't want—"

"Yes, you do. Don't lie. You're always lying," the boggart mutters, frowning at him. "You're a liar. All you do is—"

"No, that's not—I—I mean, I do want you here, but not—not in danger, James. Just—just—" Regulus swallows harshly, his fingers trembling around his dagger. He seems to become aware of it then, where it is, still pressed to the boggart's throat. He instantly snatches it back, looking horrified, and James almost whines in pure distress. "Sorry. Fuck, I'm sorry. It's—yes, okay? Yes, I want you around, always, but I don't want you to be hurt, and this—you can't be here. How—"

"Well, you fucked that up, too," the boggart says, and Regulus flinches back, visibly stung. "Why do you think I'm here, hm? Because of you. Who else?"

"They—what? I don't understand. I don't—"

"This is what you do, you know. You drag everyone you love down. You fail, and fail, and fail. Why do you even bother to try? Sacrifice yourself for your brother, which was better for everyone—nope, you couldn't even do that. Keep me safe and out of the arena—well, you fucked that up, too. And what? You want to live now? You think you deserve to as much as anyone else? After all that you've done, all the pain you've caused, all the ways you've ruined everyone's life?"

"What?" Regulus says, staring at him with wide eyes, his voice wobbling precariously. "You—what? You're… This isn't—this isn't you. It's not. You would never say that to me."

The boggart scoffs and takes a step forward. "Are you fucking delusional? I have every right to say that to you! Think about everything you've put me through! And not just me, but Sirius, too. And Evan—he's dead because of you. What about your parents, Regulus? I did everything right, but you? It's like you malfunction every time you dare to try. Did you honestly not expect this to happen someday? You thought I'd never wake up and see you for who you really are? You're everything I hate in this world, aren't you? We're complete opposites. I try, try, try—and you never do, because every time, all you do is fail. I care about the world and the people in it, but you don't, not really. I'm honest, and you're a liar. I do as much as I can for everyone, and you're selfish. I know how to heal, and you're just broken, fucking irreparable. Why should I have to be stuck with that, with you? Do you know how exhausting you are? Do you know how much you drain me?"

"No," Regulus chokes out, stumbling back like a reflex as the boggart starts advancing, steadily backing him away from Marlene. "James, just—just wait, okay? I know I'm—I know, but I—I—"

"What? You what?!" the boggart roars, and Regulus heaves out a harsh breath that hitches on a sob. James clamps down on Dorcas' hand, his eyes stinging. "You love me? No you don't! You call this love?! You wouldn't know how to love right if you had a step-by-step guide. What you do is rot. You're the epitome of rot, Regulus. You take everything good in this world and invent ways to deteriorate it, because you're so fucking scared of being alone that you'll cling until there's nothing left to cling to. Everything you selfishly touch comes away with claw marks on it. You're no different than the corpses in the crimson river you should have died in!"

Regulus makes a quiet, whimpering noise that pierces James right in the fucking heart, and this—honestly, James thinks this is his biggest fear, too. Seeing himself like this. Becoming a person who hurts those he loves. He wants to dive through the screen and snap the neck of his mirror image, then wrap his arms around Regulus and take back everything that was just said with his mouth. Hold him. Kiss him. Promise him that it's not true, that James already sees him as he is, and it's not any of that, none of it, and James loves him so much. He loves him so fucking much. With everything in him.

"I know you've thought about it, because I sure have," the boggart hisses. "I've thought about how much better off I would be without you, how much better off Sirius would be, how much better off the whole fucking world would be. So, you know what? Let me do it."

"Don't!" Regulus bursts out, sounding nearly hysterical, his hand striking out quickly like a snake, tucking the dagger up under the boggart's chin.

Everything stops.

Do it, James thinks, internally begging, holding his breath. Kill it. Just kill it. Come on, love, it's not real. It's not me. You have to know that, deep down. Please, please, please, please, please—

"Oh, what's the matter?" the boggart mocks, James' eyes glinting cruelly, a grin of pure malice on his face that James is sickened by. "Look at you. You're hesitating, love."

Regulus swallows harshly, visibly, and he's shaking. James can see him trembling like he's about to fall apart. Tears aren't falling, but they're there, glimmering.

"We both know you're not going to do anything to me. Does that scare you, Reg? Hm? Knowing that you're completely defenseless to someone else. Weak for someone else." The boggart reaches up and wraps fingers around Regulus', peeling them off the handle of his dagger. Regulus watches it happen, lips trembling, and then the tears fall at the same time that his hand does. The boggart smiles. "See? There you go, failing again. And the pathetic part is—some part of you is actually grateful that at least I'll be the last thing you see. But I want you to know, you're not looking at someone who still thinks you're beautiful. You're not dying at the hands of a man who loves you, Regulus. Just a man who isn't yours."

With that, the boggart raises the dagger and places the point right over Regulus' heart, resting it there. James knows it. He knows that spot, that scar, after all the times he's pressed his mouth to it reverently, cherishing the continued beat beneath the bone. Regulus stands there, and he does nothing.

"No," James whispers. "No, no, no. Please wait. Please—"

"James!" Dorcas bursts out, strangling his hand as she points to the map, and he glances at it desperately, choking on a harsh breath at the quick approach of Marlene.

"Come on, come on, come on," James chants, genuinely clinging to the last hope he has, because she knows it's not real.

Sure enough, the camera pans out to show Marlene sprinting down the length of the passage as fast as she can go, and she doesn't hesitate at all. The moment she makes it, Marlene shoves her sword right through the boggart's back, piercing all the way through the front, the tip nearly reaching Regulus.

The dagger drops to the ground.

Regulus chokes, staring at the sword with wide eyes, and then his gaze flicks back up to look at the boggart's face. In an awful, grief-stricken croak, he whispers, "James?"

"See?" the boggart gasps out. "This is what you do."

Marlene flexes her fingers around the handle of her sword and rips it right back out with a harsh breath, eyes bright and blazing, chest heaving. The boggart goes to its knees, and in a split second, Regulus joins it. His hands fly up to the boggart's face, and his expression—James' heart clenches violently in his chest just looking at it.

James doesn't think he's ever before seen someone look as shattered as Regulus does in this moment. Regulus doesn't very often emote strongly through his expression; generally, it's all in the eyes with him. But this? It's like the floodgates have been opened. There's no hiding the pure, all-consuming wash of pain and fear that crashes down over Regulus' features. James has never seen him look like this before.

He's devastated. Utterly, completely wrecked. The moment the boggart slumps into his arms, in the form of a dead James, a raw noise spills out of Regulus' mouth. He tries desperately to lift the boggart's head back up, a weak whimper escaping him, not like a wounded animal but a dying one.

"No, no, James, no," Regulus whines, sounding so young, so terrified, so fucking heartbroken that James' vision blurs with the building tears that burn his eyes. "Don't—please don't do this to me, baby. Please, please, please. Come on, don't—"

"Regulus," Marlene croaks, her voice shredded, barely able to raise her voice past a breath. From her wince, James would guess that it hurts to talk, which is fair, considering she was just nearly strangled to death.

Regulus doesn't acknowledge her. Doesn't do anything other than cling to James' dead body and weep. He's tender, so very tender, when brushing hair back from the boggart's forehead and straightening the glasses with trembling fingers.

This sort of destructive, cataclysmic event is usually reserved for leveling cities, or natural disasters, or unspeakable horrors that no one can bear to stomach, let alone witness. It's not something people see every day, and yet, there it is. Laid out on the screen for everyone to look at. A great, big tragedy.

James swears that he has, in this moment, swallowed Regulus' heart. Somehow, inexplicably and wondrously and horribly, it throws itself against the walls of his teeth, and James has bitten into it like the first taste of knowledge, swallowing down free-will and choking on it. Fruitlessly, it tries to crawl free, but James doesn't simply have it; he doesn't just own it, and hold it in warm hands; no, he has consumed it and made it a part of himself, a drumbeat echo from chest-to-chest and blood-to-blood and breath-to-breath.

It's not just touching Regulus, it's digging his hands inside and cupping all that Regulus is into palms that only wish to cradle, and yet, here James is, crushing. He doesn't choose to. This is not his choice. He wanted to keep Regulus' heart, not eat it, but it has been shoved down his throat against his will.

He wishes he didn't like the taste.

James is chewing, chewing, chewing. Watching Regulus wrap around his corpse like he'll never let it go and feeling something from within keen with want, a selfish want that, perhaps, has been festering for years of wishing to be loved so wholly, so violently, that no one can come out of it unscathed. He wants to be ripped apart, and he aches, oh how he aches, with how good it feels, in this moment, to be torn to pieces from the depth that Regulus loves him.

A love like that, a love like this, a love so undeniable and unending and unstoppable; James swallows blood for it, and muscle, and life. He swallows and feels full, sated, and hungry for more immediately after. Hedonistic in his desire to blaze as bright as the sun, bright enough to scorch, and have someone burn for him anyway. Regulus does. Regulus is.

And it's horrible, hideous, so very human—not good, deep down, he doesn't think—but there is a part of him watching the man he loves fall apart over his dead body that feels it wash over him like a soft kiss to his forehead, tender and sweet with proof, just how loved, loved, loved he is.

Just the same, a war wages on in which he burns with Regulus, gagging on the heart he never wanted in his mouth, never once wanting to rip it from the chest it should safely reside in. It's scary, almost, to face it. To see it. To witness how easily, how effortlessly, he could bring ruin to someone he loves. To be loved like this is his greatest shame and his guiltiest pleasure.

Love is supposed to be simple. Love is supposed to be safe.

It's not.

And yet, and yet, James would not, could not, give it up for anything in this world. He will take it, and take it, and take it. He will let Regulus cling and cling just as hard, and he will wear whatever marks that are left with pride. And, when there is nothing left to hold onto, he will reach for more.

He can be gentle. They can be. James wants, one day, to live in a world where they'll get the chance.

But, for now, there's just this.

Regulus has seen unimaginable horrors and felt indescribable pain, but nothing will ever compare to this. Nothing, ever, could compare to this.

It's here, like this, that Regulus feels the deep, burning desire to scream at the sky, at the world, at the universe and any force listening, because this cannot be happening to him. Because it is happening to him, because James is his, his, his; mine, mine, mine, he thinks desperately, my James, my baby, my love, mine and not yours, he is not yours to take, give him back.

"Regulus."

He's mine.

"Regulus."

He's not yours.

"Regulus."

Please give him back to me.

There is a pressure on his shoulder, a hand, and Regulus realizes that he is rocking, and speaking out loud, begging and pleading to anything that will listen, except nothing does.

James remains dead in his arms.

Marlene is staring down at him, and he looks at her, and their eyes only meet for a second before Regulus is a burst of motion. He comes off the ground fast, and Marlene skips back like she was anticipating it, like it makes complete sense that his whole world has narrowed down to slitting her throat.

She killed him. She killed him, and Regulus is going to kill her. He is going to drag his dagger across her bruised neck and relish in the blood that flows out, until every drop is gone, and he will not flinch. He will wash his hands in her blood and carry the stains with him like a badge of honor.

The only issue is that Marlene—well, she's not easy to kill, even one-handed. She has a sword, and she can fight, and she does. It's messy and ugly between them. Regulus hits her broken arm. Marlene knees him between his legs. They kick, and punch, and snarl at each other with enough feral energy that neither of them seem to have much humanity left in them at the moment. It's just violence. They're just violence.

Regulus doesn't stop, and then he does when Marlene makes him, when she slams the hilt of her sword into his face and kicks out with her foot to knock him flat on his back. Without even hesitating, she drives her sword down through the top of his shirt, over his shoulder, slicing fabric pin him there so he can't get up. She could have put it through his chest.

He wishes she did.

It would have hurt less than losing James.

"It's…not…real," Marlene croaks, pressing her boot down on his wrist to keep him from raising his dagger. "James…is…fine. That…wasn't…him. He's alive."

Regulus freezes, staring up at her, waiting. He waits, and waits, and waits for that to be true, needing it to be true, wanting it to be true so badly that he can't breathe.

Marlene swallows with effort, grimacing as she does it, clearly in pain. She jerks her chin forward to where Regulus left James' body. "Look. An…illusion. Not…real."

Slowly, Regulus cranes his head back to find James' corpse dissolving into mist the same way Vanity's did. He watches, fixated, until the form of James fades away. The mist swirls up and drifts off, fading into the darkness.

An illusion.

Not real.

Like—okay, so. Okay, so not James. That wasn't James. It's not James. He's fine. He's alive. Regulus is just insane.

Okay.

Yeah, okay.

Regulus slumps back against the ground and makes some sort of noise that could be labeled as a the lead into a fucking mental breakdown, because he is both laughing and crying and falling apart and mending, all at once.

And, the thing is, Regulus knew deep down that whatever that was couldn't have been James, not really, because James—he would never say those things to Regulus, not for any reason, not even if he actually believed it. Even when he did think he hated Regulus, he never took it that far.

James isn't the kind of man who does things like that. Who says things like that. Who destroys people, just because he can, just because he has the power to. He can destroy Regulus, easy, no problem; it was just proven, and it wasn't even him.

It's possibly crazy, but after all of that, Regulus just wants to curl up in James' arms and go to sleep. He wants oblivion and safety. He wants to go home.

Marlene's boot lifts away from his wrist, and she tugs her sword from his shirt, which now has a hole in it and slips over his shoulder a bit. He doesn't care. He doesn't lift his dagger, doesn't stop crying or laughing, doesn't do anything other than lay there on the ground and try to cling to all the personal progress he's made recently, which was very nearly yanked right out from under him yet again.

Yet, somehow, he manages to keep it. It's either just him being too stubborn for his own good, or maybe his revelation was one worth believing in, because he keeps it close to his chest, warm and secure like James would be, if he were here.

I do deserve to live, Regulus thinks. I deserve to try.

"James," Regulus mumbles once he somehow manages to calm down. His eyes drift shut. "You better be okay. You better be perfectly fucking alright, because if you have so much as a bruise from bumping into a wall, I am going to lose my mind."

James, of course, cannot respond to him. Not because he's dead, though. He's not. He isn't. He isn't, he isn't, he isn't.

Perhaps James will send him something. That would be nice, simply to know that he's alive, that's all. But, really, here on the other side of it, Regulus feels deeply sure that he is, and he tells himself it's not denial. That—that thing was just another nightmare concocted by the maze, and Regulus refuses to fall for it again. James would—if he did somehow find his way into the arena, then he'd definitely kiss Regulus first, speak second.

Regulus knows James. He knows his fiancé, and whatever the fuck that thing was wasn't him. So, okay, it just looked like him, and it got into Regulus' head, and it played with Regulus' emotions. Kind of embarrassing now, really.

However, there's no space or time for embarrassment, because there's a forceful nudge of a boot against his arm that has him peeling open his eyes to glare at Marlene, but she's not even looking at him. She's already backing up, making a quiet, muffled noise of urgency that has him quickly getting to his feet. When he swivels, he outright groans at the sight of green fog spilling out down the passageway.

That's another thing, there's barely any time to rest in this arena. People aren't meant to be pushed to limits like these; yes, humans are creatures of endurance, but they can only endure for so long before they give out.

For fuck's sake, Regulus is exhausted. By the looks of things, so is Marlene, and yet they both share a brief look before they turn and take off running. Marlene is ahead of him, and she takes a corner into an open passageway, but by the time he reaches it, the opening has closed.

And, just like that, Regulus is alone again.

The way the camera cuts sharply brings James a mounting sense of discomfort. It fixes itself very abruptly on Bellatrix, who darts past a corner that just so happens to lead into a passage where Alice and Augusta are running down.

Ideally, Bellatrix would not stop.

Ideally, she would keep running.

Ideally, she would leave them be.

This is not an ideal world, and Bellatrix does stop. She doesn't keep running. She stands in place for a moment, breathing heavily, and then she starts backing up.

"Shit," Frank rasps. "Shit, shit, shit. Wait—"

There is no waiting. The moment Bellatrix reaches the opening again, she turns to see the other two outrunning the green fog. Augusta and Alice are quite busy trying to survive, and neither of them see Bellatrix until it's too late, until she's lifting her dagger with a grin spreading across her face.

It's Alice. That's all James can think. The dagger whips through the air quickly, but Alice is clearly the target, the one Bellatrix has chosen to kill, so James only has one second to tense himself in preparation for—

Augusta blocks it.

With herself.

It happens so fast that James hardly even makes sense of it at first, but Frank… Oh, Frank seems to get it immediately. A low, punched-out noise escapes him, breathless, something that hooks in James' chest and drags out a deep swell of sympathy from him. That's his mother. It's Frank's mother standing there, a dagger sticking out of her chest where she stumbled in front of it, in front of Alice, on purpose.

Bellatrix laughs. She laughs and wiggles her fingers in a mocking wave when Alice skids to a stop and sucks in a sharp breath, their gaze flicking from Augusta, then to Bellatrix.

Still laughing, Bellatrix skips off, carrying on like she never even stopped, still on the run from hands that burst free from the hedges behind her.

"Ah," Augusta chokes out, trying to take a step forward, even managing to make it a little further, and then she crumbles to her knees, wheezing. She cups her hand around the dagger and falls back on her hip, blinking rapidly, looking dazed.

"Augusta," Alice whispers, tripping a little in their haste to crouch down beside Augusta, reaching out with a shaking hand to touch her shoulder. "Let me see. Just—hold on, let me look, okay? Don't—don't pull it out."

"Fatal," Frank croaks. James looks over to see him staring at his mum blankly, his face slack with shock. "It's—it's fatal. The wound—she's not—she can't survive that. It's—"

"Frank," James says very carefully, tugging his hand free from Dorcas' to reach out and gently put it on Frank's arm. He means to say something else, but his mouth hangs open, because he doesn't know what to say. Not about this.

Augusta coughs and immediately spits up blood. She shakes her head, squeezing her eyes shut tight for a moment, then looks up to meet Alice's gaze. Wheezing, she says, "Kid, it's nothing to look at. You—you need to go."

"Frank," Alice declares, their voice rising in pitch. "Frank can send a—something. He can—he'll be able to—"

"Nothing is going to help, and it'd be a waste on me, especially so early. He knows that," Augusta tells them firmly, heaving out a harsh breath and flexing her fingers around the handle of the dagger. "The fog—is it still…?"

Alice glances quickly behind them, then grimaces. "Yeah, it's still coming. Augusta, we have to go."

"We can't. You—"

"Shut up. Don't even try it."

"Kid," Augusta starts.

"I'm not a kid, certainly not yours!" Alice bursts out, seeming quite hysterical. "But you know who is? Frank. And I'll be damned if I let you die here, because it'll break his fucking heart, so we are going. Now."

Augusta coughs again, hanging her head forward to spit blood on the ground. It seems to take effort to lift her head and focus on Alice once more. "No. No, we're not."

"Augusta—" Alice cuts themselves off with a harsh noise low in their throat when Augusta proceeds to yank the dagger out of her chest, crying out and crumbling forward. "No! No, what are you doing?! Why would you—"

"No use in dragging it out," Augusta gasps out, still stern and no-nonsense even now, like this. "Only one of us could make it back to him anyway, and it was always going to be you. He loves you, you know. Can't imagine why, but he does."

"Oh, you—you stupid old bitty," Alice hisses, their face twisting as they slump down next to Augusta and try to cover her wound with their hand. "How many times have Frank and I told you? It's not like that. We're not—"

"It doesn't have to be," Augusta whispers, her gaze latching onto Alice. "You think loving someone like that is the only thing that matters? It doesn't matter how my son loves you; the point is that he loves you."

"He loves you, too," Alice says.

"I'm his mother. He's the only person in this world I love, but I'm not the only person in this world he loves," Augusta confesses hoarsely. "I'm not the only person who loves him. You do, too, so you've got to go now. For him."

"I won't," Alice announces with a harsh sniffle, blinking rapidly. "I'm—I'm not your child. You can't just tell me what the fuck to do, and I'm not leaving you like this."

"I know that losing your parents in the riot hurt you, Alice, but staying with me now won't make it hurt less."

"Shut up. Don't talk about my parents."

"Defiant, insolent child," Augusta scolds, her eyes fluttering shut. "You want to know why I never liked you?"

"Because I took your son away from you."

"Mm, no. Because he was better off with you. I couldn't treat him right. I tried, but I didn't know how to let go. To do right by him, I had to let him go, and I couldn't figure out how."

Alice is silent for a second, and then they reach down with their free hand to grab Augusta's bloodstained one, and they both hold on tight as Augusta rattles out another cough, blood on her teeth. "I'm—I'm sorry I said you were a bad mother."

"I wasn't always," Augusta rasps, "but that's what I became."

"Mum," Frank breathes out, stepping forward, tears shining in his eyes. All eyes are on him, and James can't help but watch him with a pang in his chest. Frank lifts his hand to reach towards the screen like he can reach out and touch his mother one last time, and it's quite possibly some of the most heartbreaking shit James has ever seen.

"It's okay," Alice whispers, and when they blink, the tears spill out of their eyes. "It's okay, Augusta. He forgives you for it, for all of it. You did your best. You can—you can let go now."

"You've got him?" Augusta slurs out.

Alice's expression collapses as they draw Augusta's limp hand to their chest, whimpering, "I've got him."

Augusta doesn't respond. She lays there, bleeding out slowly, inching closer to death by the second as the fog inches closer to them both, and Alice doesn't move. Alice cradles Augusta's hand in their own and sits there with her, quietly weeping over her while, right here, Frank does, too.

Sirius hears her before he sees her. The maniacal laughter is his warning, and then Bellatrix is darting out of an opening up ahead in the passage in front of him, dancing on light feet to skip out of range of the hands reaching from the hedges.

When she pops out, the hedge shudders closed, and Bellatrix turns with another breathless laugh, only for her breath to hitch when her eyes land on him. She's empty-handed, but Sirius tenses up at the sight of her anyway, because he knows that she—out of everyone—poses a proper threat, weapon or no weapon. Her eyes positively gleam.

"There you are," Bellatrix declares gleefully, as if genuinely delighted to see him. "I've been looking for you for ages."

"Have you?" Sirius asks flatly, holding still as he tracks every move she makes with his gaze. She's coming closer leisurely, hand lazily draped over her belt, a wicked smile on her face.

"You would not believe the troubles I've had to face on my journey to you," Bellatrix complains. "First, I lost Narcissa, which—can you believe that shit? You wouldn't have happened to run into her lately, would you?"

"Nope," Sirius lies cheerfully. "Hey, maybe she's dead."

Bellatrix stills briefly, and then she laughs. "Well, that'd make things simpler, wouldn't it? All these cannons today—hey, maybe Regulus is dead. Poor little munchkin, all alone, only a year out from his arena and facing the physical manifestation of all the ugliest little reminders. I mean, the hands? Can't imagine he'd handle that well. What do you think?"

"I think you better shut your fucking mouth before I feed you this spear," Sirius snaps.

"Well, that's no way to talk to family, Sirius," Bellatrix chides, easing closer to him. "But, well, our family has never been particularly proper, has it? Why break the tradition?"

"My thoughts exactly," Sirius agrees, and then she's flinging herself at him with a snarl while he meets her halfway.

Now, this—oh, this is fucking brutal, and Sirius relishes in it. He's at full-throttle, giving it his all, no concern for holding himself back or maintaining some inner measurement of sanity he can hold onto when the shame creeps in. She is in many ways his equal; the eldest sibling, the one with the most kills under her belt, the biggest threat; ruthless and willing to do whatever it takes to survive. She's one to lose her collective shit more easily than most, like him, the both of them always one little push away from going too far to come back from; the only difference is that Sirius does everything he can to keep his balance, and Bellatrix laughs before she leaps.

Bellatrix is fast. She's so quick it's hard to keep up with her, but Sirius does. She has him disarmed in seconds, kicking his spear away as she digs her nails into the side of his throat and spits right in his face. He grabs her by the back of her hair and yanks, slamming his knee up into her pelvis and making her stumble back with a gasp.

Sirius doesn't give her time to recover. He tackles her right to the ground, then instantly gets shoved onto his back with a thud. Bellatrix punches him, full-on decks him in the face so hard that his head snaps to the side. Her nails dig into his scalp when she grabs him by the hair and slams his head back into the ground. Cursing sharply, Sirius swings out with his elbow to clip her in the side of the head, shoving her to the side. She uses the momentum to scramble forward, trying to get to his discarded spear on the ground.

Hand darting out, Sirius grabs her by the ankle and drags her back, hissing, "Oh, no you don't."

"You selfish little brat!" Bellatrix shrieks, the rest of her words muffled as he braces his hands against the back of her head to grind her face in the ground. She spits out dirt and grass when her head comes back up, and he slams it forward again, satisfied by the crunch he hears.

Sirius slams her face into the ground again, quite smug by the whole thing until she jerks her foot up behind him and kicks him with the heel of her boot hard, right on his spine. His back bows on as he lurches forward with a groan, and the moment Bellatrix is free, she's crawling frantically for the spear.

Well, great. Just great. There she goes, and—yep, she has it. Lovely. Sirius grumbles under his breath as he pushes to his feet at the same time that she hops to hers and swivels towards him. Her nose is visibly broken, blood gushing, staining her teeth as she grins at him, wide and malicious.

Huffing out a laugh, Sirius shakes his head and lazily holds his arms out only a bit and lets them clap back to his sides. He dips his head at her, arching an eyebrow as he gives her a half-grin and says, "Well? Come on."

"This isn't the first time I tried to kill you," Bellatrix informs him, tossing the spear from hand-to-hand, eyes bright.

"What happened last time?" Sirius coos. "Did you miss?"

Bellatrix instantly scowls. "No. I pushed you down the stairs. You just got back up."

"Yeah," Sirius says with a hum. "I tend to do that."

"Not this time," Bellatrix hisses, then proceeds to launch the spear at him with a grunt.

The thing is, Sirius has spent over a decade being prepared for situations just like this, and whether he remembers it all or not, most of it is motion-memory. Bellatrix is fast, and she's strong, but Sirius sees it coming. He anticipates it, so he's already leaning to the side as the spear hurdles through the air at him, and it's insane even to him as he does it, the quick snap of his hand as he reaches out and catches it.

Sirius catches it.

Bellatrix hisses like a cat being dunked in water. Sirius of course takes this opportunity to smirk at her and straighten up, giving the spear a lazy twirl. It's not her weapon, not one she knows the way she knows daggers. While it's not exactly difficult to use, there is a difference between the way a novice handles one and the way an expert does. Sirius is the expert.

To prove so, he doesn't throw it, and he keeps it close to his body as she runs right for him. He's steady, waiting, watching her come closer, closer, too close—

Sirius dips and hooks the handle of the spear at her ankles, then sweeps her right off her feet. She hits her back with a thud, gasping, and he brings the spear up, preparing to drive it right back down. Bellatrix gives a truly animalistic shriek and flings herself back, scrambling up against the hedge.

Hands immediately burst free to grab onto her, which only makes her screech more. She rips herself free, still screaming, and Sirius blinks—

Sirius blinks—

Regulus knows the instant that he hears Bellatrix screaming that he has to get to her, because there's only one person in this arena who can make her sound like that. Utterly furious, seething with rage, pushed completely over the edge. Only Sirius has ever been able to get her to that point.

So, Regulus runs, because he—well, honestly, he doesn't think Bellatrix could beat Sirius, not really. In his mind, no one can beat Sirius, because Sirius is—he's the best. At everything. Maybe he thinks that way because he's the little brother, or maybe because it fills him with this safe, bittersweet nostalgia for when he was a child trailing after Sirius with wide eyes full of wonder at absolutely anything he did, no matter how simple or how foolish. Sirius did a cartwheel when he was nine, and Regulus thought he was the coolest person in the whole world.

Maybe he thinks that way because it's true, because Sirius has always been capable of doing absolutely anything he puts his mind to. Regulus' admiration for that had soured when they drifted apart, and then it just infuriated him, but he always believed it. He still believes it after all this time.

So, you can imagine how it feels for him to take a corner and jerk to a breathless halt as he watches Bellatrix shove an unmoving Sirius in the chest, and then he does move. He does. He tips right back into the hedge behind him, into the hands reaching, and Regulus watches them wrap around him and drag him back into it. Sirius is yanked into the hedge by the hands, disappearing, and then the cannon sounds.

Regulus' whole body goes cold instantly.

Bellatrix crows with delight, throwing her hands up in the air and cackling as she does a little dance, hopping up and down in a sure sign of victory.

"I killed Sirius Black! I killed Sirius Black!" Bellatrix chants, sing-song, and then she swivels to see him. Her face absolutely lights up. "Munchkin! Did you see? I killed Sirius Black!"

She comes skipping right towards him, utterly triumphant, bloodied and bruised and glowing despite it all. Regulus stares at her blankly, not moving, not doing anything as she reaches him and immediately snatches him close with a laugh. She jostles him and ruffles his hair, beaming.

"I said—" Regulus' mouth is dry, and he swallows, feeling cold. He feels so—he feels—he doesn't feel anything. He can't feel anything. "I said only I could. I said—"

"Oh, I know, but you weren't around," Bellatrix tells him, clicking her tongue. "Oh well. All's well that ends well, I say. That's done now, yeah? He had it coming."

"I said," Regulus repeats in a rasp, and he can't—he isn't sure what comes next. What does he do now? His tongue feels too big in his mouth, and his chest feels too tight for his lungs, and suddenly, inexplicably, he doesn't know who he is.

"Hey, have you seen Cissy? I lost her yesterday, so I'm still looking for—" Bellatrix stops, her mouth hanging open. A strangled exhale escapes her, and she blinks violently before slowly looking down. Regulus does, too, staring at where he has buried his dagger between the high point of her ribs, angled up to drive into her heart. Her head lifts, and their eyes meet. Confused, she whispers, "Munchkin?"

Regulus' vision blurs, and he's not entirely sure why. A choked noise falls from Bellatrix's mouth as he shoves his dagger forward and twists, repeating, "I said," and then snatching the dagger back out, only to drive it in again while falling into the pattern of, "I said," stab, "I said," stab, "I said—"

Bellatrix eventually falls.

Another cannon sounds.

Regulus' ears ring.

It's like gravity, yeah? Because, your whole life, gravity is a constant. You depend on it. You can't really exist in this world without it, because what happens without it? No gravity, nothing to tie you to this world, and then you're gone. You float away, up and up and up, weightless and lonely and lost amongst the stars, but the brightest has gone out, and the sky is dark, and there's no gravity, and where are you, how do you get back down, who are you, how do you get back home?

Slowly, Regulus sits down. Well, he just sort of finds his legs folding beneath him, and then he's there on the ground, staring impassively at his blood-covered dagger in his bloodstained hands. He doesn't feel sick.

He doesn't feel anything.

What about me and you? What about that? What about the fact that Regulus doesn't know who he is, all of a sudden? He's never lived in a world that didn't have Sirius in it. He's always been Sirius' little brother. Always his little brother. Always that. And now, now what, he—he doesn't get to be that? He can't be that? Does he stop being that if Sirius—if Sirius is —

Then who the fuck is he? What is he? Regulus' very sense of identity is stamped with Sirius' signature. He is who he is because of Sirius, and he can never be anything else, and he doesn't even really want to be. Whatever this is—whatever it is—whatever it may be, it's an alien concept to him. It's like trying to visualize nothing. You can't. He can't. He is that now, just nothing, a blank canvas. Empty.

There's a rustle, the sound of boots hitting the ground, then a warm hand pressing into Regulus' shoulder.

Regulus looks up, blinks, is dead probably. Has to be. Surely the saccharine flood of relief in his clementine-brittle bones is just the fluff-cloud security of the afterlife taking the shape of his brother peering down at him almost curiously. Regulus doesn't even remember dying. It didn't even hurt.

"Hey," Sirius says, and no, the heat is still sticky and thick, and the underbelly of the maze is getting dimmer as the echo of the sun asks them to say their goodbyes; it has a journey to go on, and will return tomorrow. Hey, like hello; Hey, like the instinctive greeting from one human to another; Hey, like life, still alive, still here and breathing and—

"Hey? Hey?!" Regulus bursts out, sounding quite shrill, and Sirius jolts in place, rearing back, visibly startled by Regulus scrambling off the ground to slam his hands against his chest. His own chest heaves, and he can't breathe, and he feels—he feels—he can feel again, somehow, inexplicably, and he is little brother and alive and the world makes sense now. "I thought you fucking died, and all you say is hey?!"

"You did? What? Wait, what happened?" Sirius asks, looking supremely confused.

"You—you fucking idiot," Regulus chokes out, shoving him again, and then immediately and helplessly reeling him into a hug that likely does nothing to clear up his confusion.

Sirius has always been more readily affectionate than Regulus, even when they were just kids. But, when they were just kids, Regulus would hug Sirius, and hang off his arm, and slam into his back until he fell over, just to climb all over him and wrestle on the ground, then fall silent and go still and hold their breaths when they heard the creak of weight on the stairs, knowing and dreading the approach of their parents; either one, both, the shadow that befell them and frowned upon any sign of two brothers daring to have fun.

Regulus doesn't think he's stepped up to hug Sirius first since he was fourteen years old, maybe even before that, maybe it's been fourteen years since the last, fourteen years and fourteen seconds and countless deaths. It doesn't matter when he found the place to stop for whatever reason; it matters that, despite that and after all this time with every single fucked up thing in between, he finds himself crossing the distance to do it again.

"Oh, you really thought I died," Sirius notes with a weary sort of chuckle. His voice gets smaller. "Sorry about that. Didn't mean to scare you."

"I'm not scared of anything," Regulus croaks, because he is scared of too many things to even count, because is scared of everything and everything itself.

Sirius ruffles the back of his hair, releasing a fond sort of noise, and then he grabs the lobe of Regulus' ear and twists it, gently tugging on it like he used to when they were kids and he wanted to make Regulus groan and swat at him. "Sure you're not. Come on, get it together, Reggie. You're giving me all sorts of blackmail material right now, literally as we speak. I'll tell you to do something, and you won't, and I'll say, oh, but don't you remember that time we were in the hunger games, and you thought I died, and then you hugged me and refused to let me go, and you'll say, that didn't happen, and so then I will have no choice but to pull up the live footage, because just to remind you, this will exist as video evidence, which I am not afraid to resort to pulling out to win arguments, despite the—"

"And I'm over it," Regulus cuts in gruffly, finally, though he isn't entirely sure it's true. He is sure that Sirius would have rambled as long as Regulus needed him to, just to stay like that, but that's not feasible for either of them now, not here.

"There he is," Sirius says, voice warm with amusement, and he claps Regulus on the shoulder, squeezing briefly before shifting aside to tilt his head down at Bellatrix. She's slumped over on her front. "What happened to her? Did I do that?"

"Um," Regulus mumbles, clearing his throat.

"I—I had a bit of a moment. I think really loud screams sort of… Well, anyway, I'm noticing a pattern." Sirius clicks his tongue in disapproval, then reaches out with his boot to nudge Bellatrix over. He goes still, then looks at Regulus, gaze trailing down to where he dropped the bloody dagger as he frantically stood up before. "Oh. You, um."

Regulus coughs. "I…also had a bit of a moment."

"Right."

"I wasn't—"

"No, no, it's—fine. Really, Reggie, it's…" Sirius trails off, gaze flicking to Bellatrix again.

"I didn't mean to," Regulus whispers.

Sirius' gaze snaps back to him. "I know. You were—I mean, you thought I was dead. Trust me, I wouldn't be any better. I probably would have been…much worse. I just—I guess I—"

"It's not your fault," Regulus offers, because Sirius seems to be struggling to articulate what he's feeling at the moment, but the thing is, Regulus has been feeling like that since he was fifteen. He knows the burden of being someone's reason to fight. To kill. He knows. And now, on the other side of it, he knows it's not that simple.

"How many times did you…?" Sirius falters yet again.

Regulus can't bear to look at Bellatrix, and he can't remember how many times he stabbed her. All he knows is that, in the moment, he wasn't sure how to stop. But, here and now, he's suddenly struck with this deep sense of—grief. For Bella. For his cousin, his favorite, his past where he could have never imagined that he would actually, sincerely kill her. Or anyone.

Maybe she was insane. Maybe she was in a fucked up world just like the rest of them. Either way, regardless of motives or mental facilities, she was family.

Oh. Oh no.

"Cissa," Regulus croaks, his eyes going wide.

"Regulus," Sirius says very carefully.

"Oh, fucking hell, Andy," Regulus chokes out, taking a sharp step back and pressing a shaking hand to his stomach. He just killed his own cousin, and it hurts him, because in the same way he will always, always carry the harsh sting of loving his parents, he has love for her, too. But he didn't just kill his favorite cousin. He killed their sister. Narcissa's. Andromeda's. While Narcissa may not know now, may never know, there's a good chance that Andromeda just watched it happen.

And it was brutal. It was bloody. It was betrayal.

"Don't. Don't do that, okay?" Sirius tells him, his voice strained. "This is—it's the fucking hunger games, Regulus. I was going to kill her. I was. I would have. Can you blame me?"

"It wasn't you. It was me."

"I don't blame you."

"But they might," Regulus whispers.

Sirius sits on that for a second, and then says, "Well, okay. Fine. They can blame you, and blame me too, but they're blaming the wrong people. Maybe it was your dagger and my influence, but who put her here in the first place? Who put her here, and put us here, and put the dagger in your hand?"

"It was still my dagger, and my hand, and that—I can never change that," Regulus murmurs. "We can blame the world's problems on the beat of a butterfly's wings, but that doesn't help make the world a better place, Sirius. Maybe I'm not the beginning of what got her here, but I was the end of her."

"She was trying to kill me. She nearly did. She would have tried to kill you, too, if she knew you weren't her ally." Sirius sighs wearily. "Look, I know what you're saying, okay? I do, and it's good—it's really good to do the sort of self-reflection that seeks out your own sense of morality, but here? Regulus, here? Things like that don't exist here. You can't find it, and trying is only going to tear you apart, and there's no time for that. You have to keep going, and then you can fall apart after. Just like me. Just like all of us. We worry about all of that when we have the time and the space for it, but here and now? We don't."

Regulus swallows harshly and drops his hand, staring at Sirius with this growing pit in his stomach, the insides of himself feeling cavernous. Slowly, his gaze crawls to Bellatrix, and the mere sight of her makes his eyes sting immediately.

He remembers burying his face into her hair when he was young and laughing, laughing, laughing as she whispered rude things about Sirius in his ear, making Sirius pout and huff and go to Narcissa for attention. He remembers the way she rolled her eyes, the effortless way she swung her own dagger between her fingers, the tiny snarl at the corner of her mouth when Andromeda talked about Ted. He remembers the way she danced in the rain, arms held out, face tilted to the sky.

Sirius doesn't have the benefit of remembering, and Regulus is burdened with the memories. What a difference the curse of recollection can make.

"Regulus," Sirius insists. When Regulus glances back at him, he looks sad. Slowly, he shakes his head. "Now isn't the time. We have to go. We have to keep going. Me and you, remember?"

Regulus breathes in, then out, then gives a sharp nod before reaching down to pick up his dagger. When he stands back up, he meets Sirius' eyes steadily. "Me and you."

With that, Sirius goes to pick up his spear, and together, they walk away, falling into perfect step as they go, leaving the body of their eldest cousin behind.

As they go, Regulus can't resist glancing back, feeling a sharp pulse in his chest.

Bellatrix died with tears on her cheeks.

"I'm sorry," James whispers, squeezing Frank's shoulder as he and Dorcas crowd him in a secluded corner, having saved him from sympathetic sponsors and hollow condolences.

Augusta died the same moment Sirius was snatched into the hedge. There wasn't even a second of confusion for anyone here, because it was displayed on the screen, and they saw it happen. Alice had continuously dragged her back away from the fog as she bled out, crying and screaming through clenched teeth, but when the cannon sounded, they collapsed on the ground next to her body and wept.

It was devastating to witness. It was even more devastating seeing Frank's expression crumble as he inhaled a choked breath and exhaled a sob, reaching up to cover his mouth as his shoulders shook. The sound of him crying had seemed to fill the whole room and everyone—every single person—had been silent with sympathy or discomfort. No one thrived on it. Not one damn person found it the least bit entertaining.

In the end, Alice had no choice but to get up and run, and that's what they're doing now. As they go, they just repeatedly chant, "I'm sorry, Frank, I'm so sorry."

It's a chilling moment for all, but for Frank, it's something beyond that. It's the loss of his mother, and regardless of the relationship, that's never easy. Saying sorry can't fix it. Saying sorry can't bring her back. Saying sorry can't do anything.

Yet, that's all they can do.

But, apparently not, because Dorcas swivels to cup Frank's cheek in her hand and tilt his face up, making him look her in the eyes as she whispers, "Alice. They're still in this, Frank. Alice is still there, okay? I—I know it's unfair, and I know it's fucked up, but you can't do this now. Not here."

"You said—" James swallows and ducks his head forward as he lowers his voice, dragging his hand down to rub soothing circles on Frank's back. "You said this is an arena for us just as much as it is for them, remember? The day is almost over now. Just a few more hours and then night will fall, and I'll—I'll go back to your suite with you, yeah? I'll stay with you, whatever you need, I promise. Can I do that?"

"No," Dorcas answers, and James blinks at her. "I haven't had the chance to talk to you yet, but you'll be busy tonight, and so will Frank. Right, Frank?"

There's a pause, and then Frank heaves out a harsh breath, squeezing his eyes shut. His face twitches through multiple expressions before he reaches up to swipe his tears away. When his hands drop, his eyes are open, locked onto Dorcas, and his jaw is set. "Yeah," he rasps. "Yeah, I will."

"Er," James says, "what exactly are we doing tonight?"

Dorcas glances around, then leans in so close their noses are almost touching before she whispers, "Starting a war."

Chapter End Notes

let's get into it!

sirius and regulus... they are Everything to me. no, you don't understand, i would die for them. just!!! ahhh their little fight in the beginning, and them fighting TOGETHER. it's so. it's literally insane. they!!!

anyway, regulus and sirius being playful with each other is so special to me. regulus actually laughing and smiling, despite everything! that's what we call growth, people!!! he's come so far 😭 and then cut to marlene. oooooh, marlene my beloved. yall have no IDEA just how much i love her, okay? no, shhh, don't look at all those close calls to death she has, look at me, look into my eyes, believe me when i say i love her so, so much.

let's talk about boggarts:

alice and augusta very much Not Liking Each Other, and yet they share the same fear. well, mostly. it blended together. augusta just feared her son dead; alice feared frank dead by being shot in the head, due to losing their parents the same way.

marlene's boggart was very interesting imo, bc it's her facing vastly 2 different fears that mix very, very well. her fear of being a "monster" who can't save the people she sets out to, a "monster" she became after her first games, versus seeing a version of herself she was terrified to become—not who she was before her first games, but who the hallows would have wanted her to be, who they would have loved, and the person she COULDN'T be, but the person who could have done better than her; a better mentor, more beloved by the hallows, less of a strain on her family, who struggled with who she DID become. so like, her greatest fear is who she is and also who she thinks everyone wanted/needed her to become. she fears being herself and being anyone else. its—yeah, that kind of introspection makes me FERAL.

and then regulus' boggart being james. less so james himself (though, a little bit james, because james makes him weak/defenseless, and that's a scary thing) and more so that whole journey james as the boggart went on. showing up and being in danger -> calling out regulus on all his insecurities/fears -> wanting to kill regulus -> dying in front of regulus. like, that was literally regulus' worst nightmare, so this poor man can't catch a break 😭 rip eli, you're gone but never forgotten. lester and dixon messed with the wrong family; not narcissa sliding in and betraying her own allies to save sirius, she's an icon!!! and augusta... oh, that one was ROUGH. augusta and alice lowkey being a distorted version of mags and finnick 😭 poor frank :(

now let's talk about deaths:

be honest, how many of you thought for a second that sirius died when he went into the hedge? well, if you weren't fooled, regulus sure was. like i said, this man can't catch a break. that whole moment of like, how regulus just Loses It. like sirius has been his whole world since he was a little baby, and then he thinks sirius is dead and it's like his world just. Ends. 😭 that whole bit with bellatrix. rough stuff. because like, bellatrix was taken by surprise. she didn't see that coming. and like, regulus being so upset about it... VERY ROUGH STUFF!!!

did i cover everything? idek bc there's so much. i know that next chapter, things get—wild, that's for sure. it's the last you'll ever see of the arena, so get ready to say your goodbyes now!!!

anyway we've reached the point where it's easier for me to list who is alive than who's dead, so... tributes remaining: 10

majesty

narcissa alecto emmeline alice rabastan asher regulus
sirius

right, yeah, that about covers it, ig.

"You don't have to stay, you know," Pandora murmurs.

Remus swallows harshly and tears his eyes away from the screen. Sirius and Regulus have gotten separated again. Everyone else has been mixed up and twisted all around, so now Emmeline is with Alice, Marlene is still alone, Narcissa and Alecto have found each other, Rabastan and Asher have not lost each other because they've refused to let each other's hands go while not fighting (rather genius if you ask Remus; everyone should be operating under the laws of the buddy system), and Majesty literally won't stop moving, even though it's growing dark inside the maze.

Poor Asher is suffering some rather gruesome wounds from the creatures she and Rabastan were fighting, and now it doesn't look like she's going to make it through the night, but Rabastan has food and water for them, so there's that. Alice had a complete breakdown when telling Emmeline what happened to Augusta, and they apologized to Frank over and over while hyperventilating until Emmeline cupped their face firmly and made them stop, and breathe, and settle down; Alice is silent now, not speaking or doing anything at all, but they both came across a cache in the maze with water and food, so they also got to eat and stock up a little.

Narcissa did not inform Alecto that she killed Dixon, but the tribute banners have played in the sky, so they all know who is dead. Narcissa knows her sister is dead; she didn't cry, didn't speak, just swallowed harshly and stepped away from Alecto, who actually seemed to reach for her as if to comfort her. She didn't try after that. Like Rabastan, Narcissa has food and water in her bag, so she and Alecto also get to eat tonight. Majesty has come across a cache as well, the third and last according to Rita. Remus thinks it's just a set up for the next few days of the tributes being pushed to the limit.

The only person who hasn't gotten food or water after all that transpired throughout the day is Marlene. It's night three, and she's only had water from rain both nights, but no food otherwise. She's… Well, Remus doesn't know her very well, but he watched the highlights of her games just like everyone else, and she's clearly being pushed to that point of survival again, starving and thirsty and in pain. Her arm is really bad, her throat is swollen and bruised, and she looks fucking exhausted. Out of everyone, she didn't get one moment of peace today.

Regulus also has no supplies and hasn't been led to a cache, but he had breakfast with Sirius, at least. Sirius, of course, has his bag of supplies, so he's fine in that regard.

They are, however, separated once more, and Remus is not comforted by how far away they are from one another. They've been led to opposite sides of the maze, and Sirius, worryingly, has been isolated far from everyone else. He's okay, as far as physical means. He has food and water and isn't in danger.

He was, though. For a second, for a moment, he was…he…

It's been a long fucking day full of hit after hit after hit. First, there was the crimson river that nearly took Regulus a second time, and it had been really fucked up to watch. Remus' chest had been tight, his breath held as he watched Regulus and Sirius call for each other. He thought then and there that Regulus was going to die, and honestly, no part of him had wanted it, even as a guilty thought. He'd been repulsed by what he saw, sitting there clinging to Pandora's hand as she wept.

But Regulus—oh, it was amazing, like James said. Because it was like watching something shift. Remus could see it on his face, not just survival, but the desire to live. To try. To hope. And Sirius, too. It was messy and beautiful, watching them decide to try, together, both of them. No more of that nonsense of who deserves to live more, who is needed more, because they both deserve to live and they're both needed.

Now, obviously, Remus has no fucking clue how it would be possible for both of them to manage that, and it was blatant defiance, so some part of him had waited for them both to be struck down immediately. But they weren't. They're still here, still trying, even now. Remus doesn't know what will come, but he does know, if anyone can pull it off, it'll be them.

The hits didn't stop after that, however. Eli. The green fog that doesn't just hurt, but kills, so how the fuck is Remus here right now? What was the point of the experimentation? He doesn't have the answers and didn't have the time to figure it out, because there was more. Boggarts. Augusta. Bellatrix. Sirius…

Oh, Sirius fighting Bellatrix. That was—Remus didn't enjoy it, exactly. He was on edge the entire time, but there was a moment. Just that fucking moment where Sirius caught the spear. He caught it. Remus nearly folded in half, then hated himself a little for the reaction. But then—but then Sirius went away. Bellatrix screamed, and Sirius slipped away.

Remus is pretty sure he died for a second. It felt like… He doesn't even know how to describe it. The world stopped. Sirius slipped away, was yanked into the wall of the maze, there was a cannon, and the world stopped.

It had lasted only a second, only one where Remus didn't even get to fully grasp what he was feeling, and he's still sure that it was the worst second of his life.

Immediately after, the camera cut away, and Rita showed up on the screen to reveal that it was Augusta who died. When it did cut back to Bellatrix, it was to show Regulus killing her.

And then Sirius was there. Remus has no idea how. He suspects Sirius doesn't even know, due to his memory issues. Was he spit out the other side of the maze? Did he climb over? Was he held inside the hedge, then just pushed back out again? There wasn't one scratch on him, other than the few bruises and tiny cuts from previous fights, but not from the hands. It's—well, obviously Remus doesn't want Sirius to get hurt or die, but it didn't make sense.

There was no time to think about it, and really, Remus doesn't even care. He genuinely doesn't care, because Sirius is still here, still alive, still surviving. That's what matters.

It is growing darker in the maze now, as well as in the Hallow. Usually, James would be back by this point, but he hasn't returned, and Remus… Remus is so fucking tired. It's not long before he has no choice but to go back to his cell, and he sort of just wants to go now, so he can curl up and cry in peace and deal with all of this alone, because it's weighing on him really fucking heavy, and he's stuck in this habitual need to keep it together in front of everyone else and break apart alone.

Pandora must know this, because she's giving him the out he needs. You don't have to stay, you know. Doesn't he? Shouldn't he? Just to check on James, at least.

"I can—I should wait for James," Remus mumbles.

"Remus, you don't have to do that if it's better for you to go. I can check on James. You can check on him in the morning. If you need to just—be done tonight, and get some rest, and recover alone, that's fine. I'm here, too."

"I know that, but I promised Sirius—"

"Sirius wouldn't want you to tear yourself apart trying to take care of everyone else," Pandora murmurs with a tired smile. She's been crying a lot, and she looks weary, sounds weary, clearly feels as weary as all of them. "You've been helping me so much, even just tonight, and it's okay to need to be alone. It's okay. I'll check in with James when he comes in, then send him off to bed; you can get a hold of him in the morning. It's one night. Honestly, what difference can one night make?"

Remus hesitates, because he knows things can change in a blink, in less than one night even, but in the end, he relents. He relents because it's all the same, it's one day full of nightmares after the next, and they have to choke on it over and over with no reprieve, just like Sirius said to him once. We swallow it. We choke on it, year after year after year, because what else can we do? That's all we can do.

What else can Remus do?

"Thanks, Pandora," Remus whispers, reaching out to squeeze her hand, then eases away to grab his mask, put it on, and leave as he grants himself the space he needs to choke alone.

"Wait, so it's—it's just empty?" James blurts out, sitting on the edge of his seat in Dorcas' small suite, his hands buried into his hair as he stares at her incredulously. "Where did—what happened to everyone else?"

Dorcas gives him a pained look as she drops off a black crate on the coffee table in between them. "James…"

"No," James whispers. "They—my whole district? My home?"

"Some people got out," Dorcas murmurs. "I don't know all the numbers, but Lily did say your parents are safe."

"Fuck," James chokes out, reaching up to cover his face with both hands, his shoulders hunched.

District six. People he's known his whole life. A fucking ghost town now, because of Riddle. What about Mary? Bingley? Their family. What about Sirius and Regulus' family, too? Andromeda, Ted, little Dora. What about Barty and his family? What about Mayor Aberforth, and Dotty from down the street, and Quiverlee who sold muffins at the market for as long as James can remember? What about—

"Uh, what—why—why do you have those?" Huey speaks up, his voice strained enough that James lifts his head.

Oh.

Guns.

Dorcas has guns.

"Well, what did you think?" Dorcas snaps, holding out a gun to Frank, who takes it with his jaw clenched. "Did you think we'd just break people out of the arena without any trouble? Don't be naive, Huey. It doesn't help."

"You said we wouldn't be breaking them out!"

"No, I said we wouldn't be going to the arena. We are absolutely helping break them out. Now, take a fucking gun."

Huey bites his lip, then awkwardly reaches out to grab the gun, eyebrows furrowed. "I have no idea how to use this."

"Point, shoot, hope you don't miss," Dorcas informs him, her voice clipped. She holds the next gun out to James, who takes it with a frown. It feels—odd. He's never held a gun before. It's cold. Heavy. "Now, we will obviously be doing our best to get through this as quietly as possible, but I can't promise that we won't have to fight at some point. And, well, the guns are necessary for an intimidation tactic, too."

"When we get to the gamemaker room," Frank says, and Dorcas nods. "Just one thing. McGonagall."

Dorcas snorts. "Let me handle Minerva."

"Sirius said she's not easily intimidated," James mumbles.

"I know Minerva," Dorcas tells him, taking her own gun and holding it much more comfortably than they all do. James can't help but stare at her, not entirely sure he's not looking at a stranger. She's a part of a secret, underground organization for rebels and a revolution; yesterday, she was just his stylist and friend. "She's in the Order, too, believe it or not."

Frank hisses between his teeth and spits out, "What?! So, what the fuck is she doing with the arena?! She—"

"Frank," Dorcas cuts in, "I know it's hard for you to see it, but what has happened in the arena isn't something separate from the war. You don't even realize, but the state of the world right now is…very precarious, and Minerva is just—" She swallows, then sighs. "Look, I obviously don't like it any more than you do, but it's something that—that—"

"Would work," James says softly, and everyone turns to stare at him. "It would work. It is working. She's dismantling the games from the inside. Making them all hate it. She's—she's using this to bring war here, where Riddle is."

Dorcas hesitates, then nods tentatively. "Yes. It's not her. She's not—she's just following orders, doing what needs to be done, doing what it'll take to get to a better world. Sometimes, we have to go through war to get there. And we're about to, so now is the time to set aside morals and personal feelings, because—because there are no good people in war."

"That's statistically impossible," Huey argues.

"Actually, it's not," Dorcas corrects, sweeping her gaze over them as she shoves her bullets into the gun handle with a sharp click. "All the good people die. If you live long enough to see the end of the war, trust me, you're not coming back out the other side with your hands clean."

"Like, literally?" Huey asks, eyes wide.

"Well, probably, but also figuratively. Hands, souls, whatever. The point is, you may as well accept it now," Dorcas says.

James turns the gun over in his hand, his stomach sort of falling out from underneath him. The thing is, he'll do anything to get Sirius and Regulus out of the arena. Anything. Whatever it takes. He's so—he can barely stop shaking from how eager he is to do this, all of it, any of it. He doesn't need any further motivation than getting them out, but especially now that he knows his parents aren't home, he's more than willing. The Phoenix sounds like a whole other world. A safer world than this. They need to get there. All of them.

Abruptly, James' head snaps up with a sharp inhale that has everyone looking at him. "Shit. Pandora. R—"

"We'll go by and get her on the way," Dorcas interrupts.

"And Remus," James states firmly.

Dorcas blinks. "Who?"

"Remus," James repeats. "He's, ah, Sirius' moon? He's my friend. He's—he's coming with us."

"Is he a Hallow? A sponsor? A—"

"A servant."

"A—sorry, what?" Dorcas says, so startled that it's almost comical. Huey's eyes bulge. Even Frank's eyebrows fly up his forehead. "Sirius is in love with a servant?"

James scowls. "Sirius is in love with Remus. He's a person. You fucking Hallows, you do this, you know. You never—"

"Okay, sorry," Dorcas murmurs, lifting one hand in a placating gesture. "That's—yes, you make a good point. Remus, then. I assume he's the servant assigned to your suite?"

"Yes."

"So, he'll be there."

"Should be," James says, flicking his gaze towards the clock, his lips tipping down. "Well, it's getting late now. We don't have much time. Dorcas, I'm not joking, I won't leave him."

Dorcas bites her lip, then clears her throat. "It's just… James, servants have trackers in their thighs. If we bring him with us, they'll be able to find us. All of us."

"Then I'll cut it out," James declares simply, and Dorcas blinks at him again. "What? You said it's war, right? Life or death. Well, no time for anything other than what it takes, so get me a knife, and I'll cut it out and carry him out on my back if I have to, because I'm not leaving him."

"Oh, his poor leg," Huey mutters.

James cuts him a glare and pointedly taps the cane resting in between his spread legs. "He'll survive. Trust me, an injured leg isn't a death sentence."

"Shouldn't he get to make that choice, though?" Huey insists, his eyebrows furrowed. "Like, sorry, but it's going to hurt. I don't mean anything about future complications. I literally mean the pain of having the tracker sliced from his body."

"You are so not cut out for war, or the arena, or—basically any harsh realities in life," Frank tells him with a sigh. He reaches out and claps Huey on the shoulder. "You'll learn."

"Remus would probably cut it out himself, honestly," James admits, lips twitching fondly. "Either way, it's his thigh, and if the tracker isn't too deep and I keep a steady hand, his leg should heal up just fine. It will be his choice, I promise, but I already know what he'll choose, so Dorcas… Knife?"

"Coming right up," Dorcas states, "and then we go."

James blows out a deep breath. Right, because that's what's next—and then they'll go, and then they're off to start a war.

Euphemia smooths her hand over the letter in her pocket, still in her pocket even now, her heart thumping hard in her chest as she walks beside Lily Evans, who is funny and kind to her outside of a warzone, but also unafraid to ask for help from those she knows will readily give it.

"Now, remember, the patrol switches over on the hour, so you two have a ten minute window to get those doors open manually and get out," Lily explains, her voice low as she swings her head between Fleamont and Euphemia both. "I have taken out the eyes in the sky, thanks to Wren, who fixed a loop for the surveillance cameras. Ember broke the back exit open that hasn't been used in ages, so if you're looking for a quick place to hide, go there. If you get caught out of bounds on your way back to your room, claim you got lost since you're new, or just let them catch you making out."

"You're fun. I like you." Fleamont leans forward to grin at Euphemia. "I like her."

"Yes, dear, I have ears," Euphemia says, amused.

"Thanks, Monty," Lily murmurs, an undercurrent of warmth in her tone and something sort of sad underneath at the same time that Euphemia doesn't think she realizes is there.

It makes her wonder what happened to Lily's family. She's all alone and seems to wear that like armor. Young as she is, she's often seen chasing women and just one more cigarette, but there's this sort of shadow that sits in her eyes at all times, only noticeable when she thinks no one is looking. Like one of those chocolates shaped into something, but it's just a shell; it seems structurally sound, and then you press, and the chocolate breaks open to reveal nothing inside at all.

"Lily, there's something…" Euphemia hesitates, flicking her thumb over the corner of the letter in her pocket, a nervous habit by now. She never had nervous habits before she saw her home destroyed, along with most of the people in it. These days, her hands shake more often than they don't. It scares her, being so scared. "Well, I have a request to make."

Lily's face twitches as she slows down, her eyebrows furrowed. The thing is, with Lily, she's an entirely different person when not in the middle of a mission. It had surprised Euphemia a bit to see her tease and crack jokes and respond kindly seemingly by instinct, especially when she was so harsh and efficient on the mission to retrieve them, and then acted unaffected by the whole ordeal entirely. But, outside of the mission, she checked on Euphemia personally, as well as all the other people who were injured that she helped along the way. She assisted people in anything they needed without having to be asked, one of the few who actually got some of the kids saved from the district to laugh and smile for the very first time.

On the mission, though? Lily is tenacious. She doesn't slow down, and she doesn't stop, and she doesn't flinch. She acts like a machine, honestly, and it is both admirable and quite worrying. Euphemia herself knows what it is to do what needs to be done, but she also knows the importance of letting yourself feel in the aftermath. She has spent days mourning with her people, leaning on Fleamont, letting Fleamont lean on her, talking to him in the safety of their shared room about how scared she is about all of this, and for their children, and for everyone they love. She doesn't let these things fester in her and build up with no release, and perhaps she has the benefit of age to grant her the wisdom of knowing how necessary it is to give yourself that, but Lily? She doesn't.

So, Euphemia knows that this is a rather far-fetched request to make, and yet, she can't stop herself. Sirius… She has to try, at least for him. She has to.

Euphemia takes a deep breath. "I understand that this is a very daunting undertaking already, as well as rather time-sensitive, but I wouldn't ask if it wasn't important."

Lily clears her throat. "You can ask, but—"

"There's a servant," Effie says, and Lily raises her eyebrows in clear disbelief. "He's really important to Sirius, to James, to Regulus, to all of them. He's—I know that's not really the point to all of this, but if there's any way you could—"

"Effie," Lily interrupts firmly, "I'm sorry, I really am, but this isn't my mission. I'm not the one running things, okay? It's Dorcas, and I have one priority target, Marlene McKinnon. Not Sirius, not Regulus, but her. It's her first, and then I can worry about saving the rest of those in the arena. Besides, I won't even be on that side of things. Dorcas is worrying about getting people out of there, not me."

Euphemia struggles not to grit her teeth, and Fleamont reaches out to rub her back, making her take a deep breath in and a deep breath out. "Fine. Can you pass the message along for me then, at least?"

"I can," Lily tells her. "The servant Sirius loves. Got it." She starts backing up, grimacing. "Just don't expect anything, yeah? It's cruel, but saving some servant Sirius just so happens to love isn't going to be high on the list of priorities."

"James will insist on it," Fleamont says, and Euphemia doesn't doubt it either. They know their son. Of course he will.

"Then let's hope James works to make sure no one gets left behind," Lily replies simply. "Unfortunately, I have other work to do, and so do the both of you. Be careful, yeah?"

Euphemia and Fleamont call after her to do the same, but she's already gone, as tenacious as ever. Sighing, Euphemia glances over at Fleamont, who gifts her with a tiny, reassuring smile.

"Less than a week, and we're already breaking all the rules," Fleamont says lightly. "Probably best we don't mention this to the kids. They'll never let us live it down."

"Our secret," Euphemia murmurs, giving him a playful nose-scrunch before grabbing his hand and tugging him along, the both of them off to do whatever they can to help bring the rest of their family home to them, and anyone else who may be fortunate enough to be picked up along the way.

Euphemia passes her thumb over the letter in her pocket and really, really hopes that Remus is included in that.

Lily takes a corner and runs directly into Mary, who has her arms crossed and her eyebrows raised. Oh, great, just what Lily needs. Now is not the time to be distracted, so Lily is going to need Mary to get out of her immediate vicinity.

"Ah, Mary, what are you—" Hm, no. Not important. Lily needs her to go away. "Doesn't matter. Lovely to see you, as always. The brightest part of my day, really. A true gift. Now, if you don't mind too terribly much, I'll just slide by you and—"

"What are you doing?" Mary interrupts, eyes narrowing with suspicion already.

"Walking. You know, as humans tend to do when they're trying to go from one place to the next. You take one foot—"

"No, don't play with me. I'm not joking. I saw you earlier, you know, talking to Effie and Monty in the Big Hall—"

"Great Hall," Lily mumbles.

Mary waves a hand carelessly. "Whatever. You were talking to them, and whatever you said got them to stop watching the games early, so you're obviously doing something."

"Look, Mary, I would love to stand around and have this lovely little verbal spar we always do," Lily says wearily, because it's true; their rooms are next to each other, so they see each other quite a bit, and Lily doesn't think they've had one genuinely civil conversation in the last week. "It breaks my heart, truly, but I'm a little busy at the moment so, if you could—"

"Don't even try it," Mary says flatly. "Seriously, what are you up to, and what does it have to do with Effie and Monty? I can't find them. Where are they?"

Lily resists the urge to huff. Anyone else, and she could probably talk her way out of this, but Lily has noticed Mary is a force to be reckoned with, especially when it comes to people she cares about. In the aftermath of what happened in district six, Mary has taken to checking on Effie and Monty a lot, along with Andromeda and Barty, if she can actually find him. People who matter to Sirius, and James, and Regulus. And there's Bingley, of course, who she barely let out of her sight to start with and is still wary to do so.

The fact that Mary is here now, rather than in her room with her little brother lets Lily know she's not budging, and if she thinks Lily is getting Effie and Monty caught up in something, she's absolutely not going to let it go.

Lily gets it, and she respects it, and she even likes it. Just…not so much when it's fucking with her plans. Lily honestly does not have time for this shit.

"Okay, I really need you to move," Lily says shortly, in no mood to keep messing around. She pushes past Mary, who immediately catches her arm, and Lily whips around to glare at her, nostrils flaring. "I don't have time for this, Macdonald."

"Well, that solidifies it," Mary declares decisively, following behind her when she marches off. "You're definitely doing something, and somehow this involves Effie and Monty."

Lily ignores her. Or, well, she pretends to. Ignoring Mary is pretty impossible. She's tall with bouncy, black curls framing her face, and her eyes are quite possibly the most piercing Lily has ever seen in her life. At times, Lily is almost genuinely uneasy by the thought that Mary can see right through her. Also, she's frustratingly brilliant, which is doing Lily absolutely no favors currently.

Seeing as Lily has no idea how the fuck to make Mary leave, she just keeps going, because she genuinely doesn't have the time to stop. Thankfully, Sybill is already waiting for her in the place she promised she would, so things are coming together.

"Oh, there you are," Sybill whispers when Lily moves over to her. She flicks her gaze from Lily to Mary. "One more?"

"No, she's not involved. Ignore her, and maybe she'll go away," Lily grumbles.

"Not likely," Mary replies with a scoff.

"Right, well, are you ready?" Sybill asks Lily, twisting her fingers together. "Because I want to point out, yet again, that I am not. This—it doesn't feel like a good idea, Lily, and—and I hate lying to Kingsley. It makes my stomach all squirmy."

"You're not lying to him…exactly," Lily soothes. "You're just, you know, waiting to tell him until it's already done."

"Wait," Mary says, "is this—oh, for fuck's sake, is this a sex thing? This is a sex thing, isn't it?"

"What?" Sybill asks, blinking. "Who's having sex?"

"You two. You're sneaking around to have sex," Mary blurts out, staring between them in disbelief.

Sybill frowns. "No, we're not. We're sneaking around so we can abduct the tributes out of the hunger games."

"Sybill!" Lily hisses, eyes bulging.

"What? We are," Sybill sputters.

Mary exhales sharply, her eyes lighting up, and then she's stepping forward to announce, "Oh, absolutely. Yes. This is so much better than a sex thing, and fuck you, Lily, I'm definitely involved. I'm coming with you."

"No." Lily clenches her jaw. "No, you're not."

"Sirius is in there. Yes the fuck I am."

"And what about Bingley, hm? Because this isn't going to be safe, Mary. It's dangerous. You could actually die."

"You know I'm a person, right? Not just a sister. I can make my own decisions, and Bingley is safe," Mary retorts. "I'm not going to just stand by and do nothing if I could help my friends. So, you're not getting rid of me that easily. Look at that, you have an extra pair of hands."

"I mean…that would be helpful, Lily," Sybill points out.

Lily groans. "You're not going to let this go, are you?"

"No," Mary confirms.

"Fine. Fine, but if you're in this, then you're listening to me. No taking guns and shooting people and running off to do your own thing. You do not get off the heli-carrier for anything or anyone, alright?" Lily states, holding her gaze.

Mary doesn't look pleased, but she holds up her hands and dips her head. "Fair enough. Put me in, coach. What can I do?"

"Follow us. Or, follow Sybill." Lily swivels her head to look at the woman in question. "You picked, right?"

"Yeah, come on," Sybill says, leading them off further down the hall, then easing the entrance to the hangar bay open so they can slip inside. It's fairly deserted as always, large and cavernous and dim with only six different types of heli-carriers inside. Lily doesn't think any of them have ever actually been flown before. "I picked the one that closest resembles the simulation lessons I took in class to become a pilot, so that should help. It's right here down at the end."

"Wait, should help what?" Mary asks cautiously, her voice low as they move quietly through the room.

"Help me fly," Sybill whispers.

Mary makes an odd noise and wheezes, "You—you haven't flown anything before? I thought you were a pilot."

"I am," Sybill informs her. "Certified and everything. I've just never, um, had the opportunity to put it to the test."

"How long ago were your classes?"

"Seven years ago? Eight? Somewhere in there."

"Oh," Mary says solemnly, "we're going to die."

Lily sighs. "Don't listen to her, Sybill, you're going to do perfectly fine. Just like riding a bike, I'm sure."

"Bikes don't have buttons. Or wings. Or—"

"Sybill, really, I believe in you, okay? You can do this."

Grimacing, Sybill stops by the heli-carrier. "Let's hope you're right, because otherwise, we are going to die, and then Kingsley will be so upset."

"Kingsley's your boyfriend, right?" Mary asks.

"Yeah," Lily answers at the same time that Sybill shakes her head. They stop, blink, and stare at each other. "Sybill, you and Kingsley have been dating for months. You were literally just with him earlier. Did you two break up, or…?"

"We're dating?" Sybill blurts out. "Why didn't he tell me?!"

Lily struggles not to laugh. "What? How could you not know? You practically live together, Sybill! Everyone knows you've basically moved into his room."

"I just keep falling asleep there after we have sex, and he likes to cuddle, which is nice. He's really nice, honestly. Got me a toothbrush and let me bring some of my clothes over. Oh, and he lets me hide the blanket I'm knitting under his mattress because they never check his room anymore." Sybill pauses, her lips tipping down. "He never told me we were dating. I mean, I'm fine with it. More than fine, but he didn't say!"

"Oh, you two are so well-suited," Lily chokes out, her shoulders shaking with her laughter. "It's—yeah, you're dating. You should probably talk to him about it, but…well, he called you his girlfriend last week, so I'm pretty sure he's under the impression that you're together."

Sybill looks delighted. "Oh, lovely. Then yes, Mary, he's my boyfriend. I can't wait to tell him."

Clearly pleased by this news, Sybill is a bit bouncy as she moves over to yank open the side door on the heli-carrier with a sharp clang. She's swift when leaning in to pull out the ramp, then beams the entire way inside. Lily's lips curl up, and she shakes her head fondly as she follows Sybill inside with Mary right behind her, only for them to all bump into each other back-to-back like a line of dominoes that don't fall.

"Oh, what the fuck?" Lily blurts out incredulously, a headache forming so quickly that she has the strong impulse to take her skull between her hands and squeeze.

Amos and Barty are in the midst of separating and trying to straighten their clothes, but it's doing exactly nothing to hide what they were just doing. Amos at least has the decency to look sheepish, but Barty does not. In fact, Barty looks faintly amused about being caught with the buttons on his shirt all undone. Well, he looks amused if you ignore that his smile doesn't reach his eyes and his gaze is rather flat and empty.

"Lily," Amos says, fumbling for his glasses to slip them on and blink at her, red in the face. "Uh, hi. Hey. I—" He opens and closes his mouth, looking at Barty, then back at them. He coughs. "I don't have a good explanation."

"Fuck's sake, Amos, the poor man is grieving," Lily scolds, tossing her hands up. Not that she really has much room to talk about how one copes with losing people. Still, it hasn't even been a week, and Amos perhaps should not be enabling the use of sex as problem avoidance, which Lily is aware makes her a bit of a hypocrite, but just because she does something doesn't mean she thinks others should, and Barty looks like hell. He looks like he hasn't slept in days. Amos should have been taking him to bed to rest, not—"To be fair, it's not his fault. I'm very persuasive when I want to be," Barty says, "and trust me, I was not complaining."

"I—I was trying to comfort him," Amos stutters out, looking frazzled. "I wasn't going to do anything, but then he—I—I don't even know what happened. I don't even like men!"

"You do now, darling," Barty informs him, grinning.

"It's okay not to know things, Amos. Finding out can be fun," Sybill says. "I just found out Kinglsey is my boyfriend. Did you know that? Isn't that fun?"

Amos blinks at her. "Wait, you're just finding that out now? Sybill, you two have been dating for months."

"See? You learn something new every day," Sybill muses, smiling at him. "Congrats on your fun little discovery of the day, and while I support you wholeheartedly, I'm afraid I'm going to have to interrupt. We kind of need this."

"The heli-carrier?" Amos asks, his eyebrows rising as Sybill circles her finger to show what she means. Sybill nods, and he tilts his head. "Why do you need the heli-carrier?"

"We're taking it so we can abduct the tributes out of the hunger games," Sybill answers.

Lily wishes for the sweet release of death. "Sybill!"

"What? It's true," Sybill replies.

"Secret mission! Se-cret!" Lily declares, smacking the back of one hand to her other palm for emphasis. "That means we do not tell people about it."

"Wait, sorry, what? You're doing what?" Amos hisses, his eyes wide. "Lily, are you fucking mental?! What—who—does Dumbledore know about this?"

"Obviously Dumbledore doesn't know about it," Lily snaps, her shoulders tense. "It's secret for a reason, Amos, and you better choose your next words wisely, because if you even think of fucking this up, I'll do what I must to make sure you don't."

Barty steps forward. "I'm coming."

"No," Lily grits out.

"Okay, let me rephrase. You can't stop me from coming," Barty corrects, and he looks dead serious. "Regulus is in there."

Lily rubs her temples, squeezing her eyes shut as she lowers her voice and chants, "Don't punch him, don't punch him, don't punch him, don't—"

"Why don't we all go?" Sybill asks. Everyone stops and stares at her. She shrugs. "What? We're all already here, and it's not like more help is a bad thing, really."

"Where's Kingsley?" Amos asks, glancing around like he expects Kingsley to pop out and start giving orders.

"Lily said we can't tell him until it's over," Sybill mutters, twisting the bottom of her shirt between her fingers. "She thinks he'd tell Dumbledore and stop it."

At this, Lily winces. Kingsley is a very good man, and he's damn good at missions, but he's in a high position, and Lily can't be sure that he wouldn't have ruined the plan in the endeavor to do what he feels is right. He's been Dumbledore's go-to for everything involving missions for years now, even when Lily came to the Phoenix, and he may not be willing to go against that. Lily has no way of knowing if Kingsley would go along with this, and she couldn't risk it.

Amos clears his throat. "Lily, this is not a cleared mission. I can't just stand by and—"

"Mm, can't you?" Barty asks, reaching over to touch Amos' shoulder, light, staring at him. His eyebrows raise slowly, and he tilts his head. "I think you can."

"I—" Amos opens and closes his mouth, looking lost, still seeming frazzled by Barty, or possibly what he was just doing with Barty. He likely saw Barty darting off as he always does these days and decided to follow, to give him some comfort, because after all, Amos was on the mission, too. And then, before he knew it, he was tucked away in an abandoned heli-carrier doing something he'd never done before. Lily almost pities the poor man, but in the end, Amos just deflates a little and nods. "Suppose I can, because it's not like I have much of a choice. I'm in this shit now."

"Good answer," Lily says. "Otherwise, I would have had to knock you out and tie you up to hide you somewhere until I got back, if I did at all."

"Charming as always, Evans," Amos replies flatly.

Lily smiles, all teeth. "I aim to please, Diggory."

"Look at us," Sybill declares warmly. She waves around at all five of them. "The rescue team. I decree we are called the Thunderbird Thieves."

"Why?" Mary asks, eyebrows raised.

"Well, we're stealing, technically," Sybill points out, then moves over to tap the inner panel of the heli-carrier, looking fond. "Besides, we'll be birds in the sky, and this baby was built to withstand any thunderstorm."

No one objects. For some reason, this is a unifying sort of moment for them. Alright, then.

Thunderbird Thieves it is.

"Shit, shit, shit," James chants.

Dorcas watches James hang his head, then glances back at Pandora, who is just—staring at her. Staring like she's never seen her before. There's been a lot of that as of late.

It puts a tangle of knots in her stomach, even though she saw this coming. She gets it. She's known these people for a year now, a friend to them, and she lied to their faces more than once, all of them. While they're not entitled to every facet of her life, this reveal is shocking by a large margin. Not just a simple stylist who is a little too bold, not by a long shot.

Dorcas understands that it's an adjustment. She also gets that this is a lot of information being thrown at them at once. No, not just that she's more than a stylist, but also that there's a secret, underground bunker home to a brewing rebellion for her to be a part of at all, and also that she has decided to take it upon herself to kickstart the revolution by breaking into the arena within the hour to save everyone inside, and oh, they all have to leave the Hallow tonight.

Unfortunately for them, they're all on a time-crunch here, and there's no time to waste.

Dorcas stands up. "James, breathe. We have to go down to the basement level to get to the garage anyway for our great escape, so we'll just grab Remus on the go. Less of a smooth transition for him, but it's all we got. We need to go. Now."

"My dad," Pandora says softly.

Everyone stops and stares at her.

"He's dying," Pandora continues. She's staring at Dorcas blankly. "He's going to die, and I won't be here."

There's something fucking tragic about the way she says it, already knowing it, not even protesting it. She knows she's coming. She knows she has to, because if she stays, they will kill her just because she's their handler, because it would hurt them, because she apologized at the reaping and cried while reading off the names. She can't stay, and her father is dying, and it doesn't matter if he's not dead yet; he may as well be in this moment, for her, because she'll never see him again.

"Pandora," James whispers, stricken.

Blinking, Pandora gives a jerky shake of her head, and she meets Dorcas' eyes. "Well? Let's go."

They go.

It's a silent wait at the lift, a steady pulse of anticipation between the five of them. James is flexing his fingers around the handle of his cane, Frank is as blank-faced as Pandora, and Huey is chewing on his lip anxiously. They all have their guns hidden, put away. Pandora doesn't have one.

When the lift dings, the doors open to reveal that it's not empty. Rodolphus Lestrange blinks out at them, looking suitably startled by the eclectic group before him.

"Coming from a party?" Rodolphus asks, raising his eyebrows as he reaches out to hold the doors for everyone, though no one moves. "And I wasn't invited? Rude."

Dorcas realizes belatedly that everyone is stealing glances at her, waiting for her to lead. Here she stands, waiting for the person in charge to step up and take control of the situation, only to remember that it's her. She's in charge. She's leading.

Exhaling slowly, Dorcas enters the lift with the others filing in after her, because it would be more suspicious if they didn't. Dorcas doesn't know very much about Rodolphus, other than the fact that his little brother is still in the arena, alive, and yet another person Dorcas hopes to save.

"A bit of an odd group," Rodolphus comments.

He's fishing, Dorcas can tell. He sounds curious. Not exactly suspicious, but he knows something is up.

"It's been a rough day," James replies, looking over to offer Rodolphus a tight smile. "Huey here is planning on taking us out for drinks to, ah, unwind a bit."

James is smart. Very smart. Dorcas knows that, but it's moments like this when he really shines. He's socially smart as well, and that's a weapon in its own right. Huey, the sponsor, footing the bill. Frank, in mourning, likely desperate to get so drunk he blacks out. James, aching in the aftermath of all he witnessed today. Pandora, the handler. Dorcas, the friend.

It works. Rodolphus nods, because it does work, and it's easy to believe. "Yeah, that it has. Suspect tomorrow won't be much better, so a word to the wise, don't get too sloshed tonight."

"Thanks," James mumbles.

Things are quiet for a bit as the lift continues to rise. Dorcas watches the buttons light up slowly, one at a time, with each floor they pass. Closer. Closer. So close. Almost there.

"Oh," Rodolphus says softly.

Dorcas flicks her gaze over to see him staring down at Huey's hip, at the line of the gun under his shirt, revealed by how he shifts his arm. For a second, no one moves. No one breathes.

And then, swiftly, Dorcas has her gun out and pressed up under Rodolphus' chin as she backs him up against the wall of the lift. Huey yelps, and James curses under his breath. Rodolphus tilts his head up, holding very still.

"You see what's on the end of my gun, Lestrange?" Dorcas asks coldly. "That's a silencer. That means, if I happen to blow your fucking head open, it'll be much quieter than a normal gunshot, and I'll be free to dump your body in the first supply closet I come across. By the time they find you, I'll be gone."

The column of Rodolphus' throat rises, then falls. His voice is a hoarse rasp when says, "Yeah, yup, got it."

"Dorcas," James warns, sounding wary. She doesn't look away from Rodolphus, her mind running a mile a minute with so many possibilities. She's never killed anyone before, but she's too close now. Too close to have this fucked up. Not now. She won't let anyone ruin this. "Dorcas, hey, just—just wait, okay? He's—he might… He could help us."

"He's a liability, James," Dorcas snaps.

"No, no, he's—a brother. An older brother, who loves his little brother," James argues carefully. "Think about it, okay? He hasn't hidden how much he cares about Rabastan. It's his brother, yeah? Look at Sirius and Regulus. You see how they are, especially when it comes to the games. You saw how Sirius was last year; he was willing to do anything for me, and also for Regulus. Just—give him the chance, at least."

"If it was Louie, I'd do it," Huey agrees, his voice shaking.

Dorcas exhales sharply through her nose and pulls her gun away, but she keeps her free hand against Rodolphus' shoulder to hold him there, holding his gaze. "We're breaking into the arena to get the tributes out and get them somewhere safe, and that includes your little brother, if we can."

"How the fuck are you going to do that?" Rodolphus blurts out, his eyes bulging.

"Doesn't matter," Dorcas says shortly. "Are you in or not?"

"Oh, I'm in. It's my brother," Rodolphus replies simply, blinking at her. "Hell yeah I'm in. Do I get a gun, too?"

"If you make any sudden moves, the only part of the gun you'll get is a bullet," Dorcas informs him, clipped. She slides her gun away, eyeing him with distrust. "Now, shut up, I have to make a call. Everyone stay quiet."

When Lily answers the phone, she sounds like she's in a vacuum, and she's already talking. "—totally have this, I promise. You're doing great."

"WE ARE TILTING!" someone shrieks in the background. Dorcas doesn't recognize the voice.

"I'm sorry, I'm sorry, I'm trying," Sybill sobs, voice muffled.

"It's—no, it's fine. You've got this. I—I don't think that was the right button, though, but—"

"WE HAVE A FUCKING GATLING GUN?!"

"Ah, that's—that'll be the weapons, I think, Sybill," Lily calls out, sounding strained.

"WHY CAN I SEE THE GROUND?! PULL UP! PULL UP!"

Dorcas coughs and winces as someone screams in the background, and then it's just pure chaos over the line. Everyone in the lift is staring. They can all hear it.

"Lily?" Dorcas asks tentatively, cringing at the background sound of something clattering, like metal on metal.

"Hi, Dorcas, a little busy here," Lily pants out. "We're, um."

"Problem?"

"What? No. Everything's f—hey! No, step away from the gatling gun! Barty, don't make me leave this cockpit!"

James straightens up. "Barty? Did—sorry, did she just say Barty? Is Barty there? He's alive?"

"Lily?" Dorcas tries again.

"We have this under control," Lily replies, and then there's a choked sob and the distant shout of we're all gonna die!

Dorcas sighs. "Right. Clearly."

"Just—oh, shut up, we are fine! Barty! Stop fucking with the gun!" Lily shouts. There's a pause, then, calmer, "Thank you. Okay, Sybill, talk to me. Well, no, breathe first. See? Look at that. We're all straightened out now, flying easy and smooth. You did that. You did great. You're doing great."

"Yeah," comes Sybill's muffled, shaky reply. "Y-Yeah, I've got it. I've got this. It's—it's all coming back to me. Okay."

The lift dings, the doors peeling open, and Dorcas waves everyone else out, keeping a sharp eye on Rodolphus. He doesn't do anything. Like everyone else, he seems rather invested in her phone at the moment. She holds up a finger to get them all to wait, and they do.

"You're on the way?" Dorcas asks.

Lily blows out a deep breath. "Yeah, uh, we're on the way. Sybill, do we have an ETA?"

"T-minus twelve minutes," Sybill replies.

Dorcas' heart jumps. "Okay, well, we're moving in. I'll have everything ready for when you get there, and you—you've got the tracker, right?"

"Yes. It'll pick up Marlene as soon as we're in range. We're going right for her first, Dorcas, I promise."

"Okay, good. Remember, as soon as you drop in, you'll have opposition incoming, so you'll have to be quick. I'll do what I can to get everyone as close as I can, but you won't have a lot of time. Lily, if—if you have to go, you go, do you hear me?"

"Alright," Lily murmurs. "Hey, um, Effie sort of—well, she asked about you maybe getting someone else out of the Hallow if it's at all possible. A servant. Uh, Sirius' moon?"

"Oh, yeah, that's already in the works," Dorcas assures her.

"Who is—" Lily cuts herself off with a groan. "Barty, for fuck's sake, it's not a toy! What did I say?!"

"Lily, I have to go," Dorcas tells her. "Be careful, okay?"

"Yeah, we'll do our best. You, too."

"See you soon, Evans."

"Real soon, Meadowes. Real soon," Lily replies, soft, and then she starts yelling again, and the line goes dead.

"Barty?" James asks immediately. "Is Barty alive?"

"I—James, I don't know if it was him for sure. She did say the name Barty, so maybe?" Dorcas offers cautiously. "I've never met another Barty at the Phoenix, so…it's a good chance. But, whoever it was, they wouldn't leave the gatling gun alone."

James huffs a weak laugh. "Yeah, that's Barty." He looks relieved, shaking his head as he exhales. "Okay, well, that's good. That's—yeah, that's good. Right, what next?"

"Alright, so right now, the Aurors on rotation won't reach this floor for another fifteen minutes, so that's all the time we've got to get in and get the hell out," Dorcas explains. "There will be a shift change after, which means when we leave, we should be bypassing the usual amount of Aurors."

"You timed this?" Frank asks.

"Of course I did." Dorcas slips her phone away. "Just the same, the gamemakers on the nightshift are already in place, so it's a lot less to deal with when we go in."

"You timed that, too?" Huey asks in disbelief.

Dorcas arches an eyebrow. "I timed everything. I memorized the patrol schedules. I know each route. I have the getaway vehicle already stashed in the garage. This isn't a thrown together plan by any means, no matter how little time I had to prepare, and as long as you all listen, we'll be fine."

"Well," Frank mutters, "that's enough for me."

"Now, when we go in," Dorcas explains, "I'm going right to Minerva. I need everyone else to round up the rest of the gamemakers. Use your guns. You don't have to shoot unless it's necessary. Situations in which it's necessary include if you have to defend yourself, if they try to run, or if you need to so no one disrupts the mission. Otherwise, it's your choice, you're the one who will have to live with it either way, but do not, under any circumstances, fail to shoot if it is necessary."

"Still don't have a gun, by the way," Rodolphus says.

"You'll be standing by the door, making sure no one gets out," Dorcas tells him. "If that door opens before it's time, I'm shooting whoever is at it. Keep in mind, that includes you."

"You're crazy," Rodolphus states. "I like crazy."

"I like women," Dorcas replies. "Only."

"Oh. Good for you, sad for me, but the next bit of crazy will come along, I suppose," Rodolphus says wistfully.

Dorcas rolls her eyes, then focuses on Pandora when she quietly announces, "I also don't have a gun."

"That's because you're going to be at the main control board, Pandora," Dorcas murmurs, more gentle with her. "To bring the protective perimeter down around the arena so the others can get in requires a password set by the Head Gamemaker."

Frank inhales sharply. "So, if—if we don't get the password…"

"We will," Dorcas assures him. "Now, everyone knows what they're doing and where they'll be, right?" She gets nods and low murmurs of agreement. "Okay, then let's go."

They go.

The gamemaker room isn't that heavily guarded at night, and with the Aurors on rotation, there's only one waiting by the door, no gun in hand. The Auror looks bored, and why wouldn't this be boring? Literally nothing ever goes wrong here. Dorcas scoped this entire building yesterday, and it's lax in an arrogant way, so comfortable in the years upon years of luxury and lack of pushback. This will be a rude awakening.

"What about that one?" Frank whispers as they approach.

"James," Dorcas murmurs, "can you knock him out with your cane and make it quick and quiet?"

There's a heartbeat of silence, and then James clears his throat. "Yeah. Frank, come catch the body?"

"Mhm," Frank hums.

They split off together, walking ahead. Dorcas watches the Auror turn his head, blinking, and then his head whips back to the side when met with the harsh impact of James' cane. There's a dangerous amount of force behind it, so much so that the Auror instantly knocks the fuck out, going slack as his body drops like a puppet with no strings. Frank catches him and eases him carefully to the floor.

"No gun," James comments softly as he rubs his hand over the handle of his cane, then plants it on the floor, leaning on it.

"You have to have a certain level of clearance to have a gun in this building," Dorcas explains. "Or just sneak them in like me, but—well, why would anyone want to?"

Frank side-eyes her. "You wanted to."

"I'm the exception," Dorcas says, "not the rule."

"So, do we just…go in?" Huey whispers, staring at the door.

Dorcas steps up to it and pulls out her gun, then raises her other hand. "Well, it'd be rude not to knock first."

She knocks.

"Can I help—" The person who opened the door cuts themselves off the moment Dorcas presses the gun to their head. They freeze, eyes wide.

"Yes, actually, you can." Dorcas presses her gun to their head harder, pushing them back. "Walk. I said walk."

They walk. Well, they stumble, making a quiet, whimpering noise as they go. The room is large, but very sparse. There are circular control boards around the room and various screens, as well as holograms and monitors. There's a large screen showing the vitals of all the tributes, and none have died since Dorcas last saw them, which is relieving. In the center is a smaller hologram of the whole layout of the arena and tagged positions of each tribute.

Slughorn didn't lie. Slughorn gave her absolutely every bit of information she could have needed, and had seemed eager to, and for the first time, Dorcas doesn't want to kill him when he happens to cross her mind. She can give credit where it's due.

In the room, there's only about twelve people, and the others file in and split off to immediately round them up. Before anyone even notices they're coming in, Dorcas shoves aside the person in front of her and steps up behind Minerva just as she turns. Dorcas' gun settles against Minerva's forehead.

For a moment, nothing else matters outside of this. Just the sharp collision of their gazes, Minerva's shrewd eyes, and Dorcas' cold ones. A part of her wants to cry. No part of her wants to pull the trigger. She knows she will do the latter if she needs to, then give into the former if she has to.

She does neither, for now.

Minerva only looks surprised for a second, just one, and she never looks away from Dorcas' gaze, so Dorcas sees the way she wrangles her own feelings down and shutters them. She's good at that. You get good at that, in war.

But there are some things you can't hide. When you're being torn apart inside, the outside reflects it. That takes a toll on your body. Minerva has always been a very put-together woman. Now, she stands before Dorcas and looks every inch of her age and then some. She looks tired.

Yet, her gaze is sharp, and her mouth is set as stern as ever. Still the same Minerva. Dorcas knows her. Dorcas insists that she knows her, in her own mind, because her heart is sure and her anxiety is arguing. Who are you? Dorcas thinks, helplessly. No, no, I know you, Dorcas' heart thuds. A war within. She has no idea which will win, or which victory would be easier to rejoice in, or which loss would be easier to handle.

Dorcas looks at her, Minerva, and she thinks. She wonders. Has this changed her? Has she enjoyed the power? Has she given one thought, any thought, to how this might be affecting Dorcas, or anyone else? Has it affected her?

"What are you doing?" Minerva asks softly.

"What you should have," Dorcas whispers.

"Dorcas," Pandora calls out.

"What is it, Pandora?" Dorcas asks, never taking her eyes off of Minerva or her finger off the trigger. She can't look away. One split second of split attention, and Minerva could split her fucking skull open. Would she strike?

Dorcas doesn't know anymore.

"I'm at the control board," Pandora says, strained. Frank can be heard making the gamemakers lay on the ground, hands behind their head; many of them are weeping. Rodolphus remains by the door. Dorcas can make him out in her peripheral vision. "We have a problem."

"What's that?" Dorcas asks.

"The—the password is set to between five or seven letters, and there's only three attempts before it locks and sends out an alert," Pandora explains.

For a beat, there's just silence. Minerva doesn't move. She doesn't do anything. She just stares at Dorcas.

I know you, Dorcas thinks.

"Try Order," Dorcas replies stiffly.

A beat.

Keyboard noises.

Pandora inhales sharply. "Wrong. Two attempts left."

"What are you doing, Dorcas?" Minerva repeats.

I know you. I do know you, Dorcas thinks, staring at her. She knows her. She's known her for years now. Someone she has always, always, always looked up to and admired. Does she still? She doesn't know that. She can't know that, now.

"Try Phoenix," Dorcas says, her mouth dry.

Another beat.

More keyboard noises.

Pandora makes a high noise of distress. "One attempt left, Dorcas. You have to get this right, or that's it. We're fucked."

I know you. I know this, Dorcas thinks, holding her gaze. Something only Minerva would know. A secret, but not her biggest. No, no, something personal. Something she has to type in every day. Something that could never slip her mind.

A reminder. A reason. Her reason behind it all, and Dorcas knows her. Knows she wants to defeat Riddle.

Riddle—six letters. It's genius, really. A name. One that would display faux loyalty to anyone who saw it. A password floating in a server somewhere, easy to pick out if someone really tried, and it would make whoever found it think one thing while the truth of it would be something else entirely. Brilliant.

"Try—" Dorcas stops, and she looks at Minerva, and the war within pauses. Because she is not looking at Minerva and seeing anything other than a mirror of what she could have become. Me, Dorcas thinks. You're me, if things were just slightly different, if I'd stayed on the path I set out on at the start.

"Dorcas?" Pandora asks.

"Poppy," Dorcas declares. "Try Poppy."

Five letters. A name. A reminder and a reason. Untraceable in the same exact way as Riddle would be, because Poppy is a flower, and Poppy is a person Minerva loves, and so few people know both. Poppy, because Dorcas would have chosen Marlene. Poppy, because Dorcas does know Minerva. There are no good people in war, but there is love.

That last beat.

Those final keyboard noises.

Pandora exhales a soft laugh and breathes out, "That's it."

And there, right there, that shift in Minerva's eyes. Not defeat, but pride, but benediction. There's praise there, unspoken, and a warmth unfiltered. Me, you, us. The student surpasses the teacher; teaching this old cat new tricks; wisdom passed down, then wielded like a weapon. All that Minerva ever hid from her, and she never hid this. The heart of her.

"What are you doing?" Minerva asks once more. There's the faint impression of a smile there at the corner of her wrinkled mouth, soft, motherly almost. She knows Dorcas, and surely she knows this, and she's just waiting. Simply waiting.

Dorcas swallows. "I'm getting her out. I'm getting them all out, Minerva. I'm starting the war a little early, and you—you aren't going to stop me."

"No," Minerva agrees, "I'm not."

"You're not?" Dorcas chokes out, and she nearly does cry then. She sounds small. Young. Fucking terrified. She is, really.

"It seems that I couldn't even if I wanted to, but I—don't want to," Minerva tells her rather simply.

And, the thing is, Dorcas did know this, deep down. She knew that Minerva was just following orders, and that it was about the war, and that she only didn't do this because she had no idea that she could. It's only through love that Dorcas knew that, and Minerva's love is waiting for her at home. Minerva's love stands before her with a gun pressed to her head, and now she has the idea that she can.

She does love Dorcas, and Dorcas knows that. She doesn't love Albus. She follows his orders and believes he will help bring upon the world Minerva wants for the people she loves, and herself, and he is the lesser of two evils. But it's love, at the core of everyone, that people turn to and follow. Minerva loves her like a mother, a mentor, and a friend. She loves her like a reflection. She loves her the way one loves their past self, just one that has a long way to go and different mistakes to make.

Dorcas lowers her gun. Minerva will not strike. Minerva, now that she knows her options, will help. All Dorcas has to do is ask. So she does. "Help me."

"How?" Minerva murmurs.

"I need to get the tributes closer to Marlene," Dorcas tells her on an exhale of relief. "As close as we can get."

Minerva hums, then turns and sweeps off without hesitation, stopping next to Pandora, who jolts and stares at her with wide eyes. "You, stay here. Press the buttons I point out when I tell you. Dorcas, watch the layout."

Dorcas swivels her head to check on the others. Rodolphus remains at the door, watchful, waiting. James, Huey, and Frank are handling all the gamemakers, keeping them down and quiet. Their sobs have softened. Some of them are peeking at Minerva in disbelief, or fury, or betrayal.

Exhaling, Dorcas steps up to survey the layout. Marlene is fairly secluded, farthest from Sirius and Regulus equally, who are on opposite ends of the maze from each other. Narcissa, Alecto, Rabastan, and Asher are closest to Marlene. Majesty next, and then Emmeline and Alice.

It's raining, and they're all stuck out in it. Each tribute is awake. Marlene is poking at the ground with her sword, her gaze blank and empty, swollen arm tucked close to her body. Sirius is—oh, he's talking to the moon. Not the real moon, but Remus, except not by name. I miss the moon, he says, and I miss my moon. I miss you. I love you. Meanwhile, Regulus is once again struggling with his aquaphobia, this time with no bag to cover himself with. He's alone, hunched in over on himself, clearly doing his best to breathe, to survive.

"That button there, the one that just lit up," Minera orders.

The rain in the arena cuts out very abruptly. It's pouring one second, then stopping the next. Regulus chokes out a harsh breath and dares to raise his head, looking up at the sky like a fucking miracle just happened. Sirius falls silent. Marlene blinks, then frowns. The other tributes look up as well, taking note, startled and unsure. It's a break in routine. Every other night, it has rained all the way until morning.

The change is enough to get the tributes up, and then Minerva is making Pandora press another button, which starts shifting the layout of the maze. Naturally, the movement gets the tributes to run, and then it's a game of getting each of them as close to Marlene as possible, guiding them like rats with hands and fog and whatever will get them to go.

"Wait, Minerva, keep Marlene in place," Dorcas says, watching as Marlene gets wary enough to start moving, which is only going to make it harder for people to get closer to her.

A few moments later, Minerva has Pandora pressing all sorts of buttons, and the hedges box Marlene in, keeping her trapped. Dorcas' heart clenches seeing her respond to it, paranoid and panicked, so fucking exhausted that her arm trembles as she holds up her sword.

"How do I make sure the hands won't harm them?" Pandora asks, and then she's directed to press another button. They all watch as Rabastan scoops Asher up in his arms and carries her as fast as he can, cursing under his breath the entire way.

"Minerva," Dorcas croaks, feeling her phone buzz in her pocket, the set alarm going off. It's time. There's no more waiting. It's now or never. "The protective perimeter has to come down. It needs to come down now."

Minerva lifts her gaze to meet Dorcas' eyes. "As soon as I do that, Hallow heli-carriers will be dispatched."

"I know," Dorcas says, "but we don't have much time. They're there, do you understand? Lily's there to get them out, and we're on a tight schedule. Bring it all down."

When the arena breaks open, it's on Dorcas' orders, but it's Minerva's hands that make it happen. The creator digs her claws in and rips, and destroys, and has no regrets about it.

Five letters. A name. The word that starts the war.

Poppy.

Lily clips the harness around her waist and gives a sharp tug, glancing one more time at screen to make sure they've got the right spot. It's simple enough, Lily supposes. A tracker in a ring to get to the starting point. Marlene first.

"Ready?" Amos asks, bracing his hand on the latch on the side door, staring at her and waiting for the cue.

"Ready," Lily confirms, and she doesn't wait one second the moment the door opens.

It's a slow descent where they hover over the top of the maze, and she dips down at a pace that makes her impatient. She wants to sinks down rapidly and hit the ground running.

Instead, she lands lightly on her feet in a cube of hedges, finding a ragged Marlene McKinnon glaring at her with her sword raised, looking damn near feral. Lily realizes, belatedly, that simply grabbing her and going won't be so simple.

"Who the hell are you?" Marlene spits out.

"My name is Lily," says Lily, carefully holding her hands up to show she's no threat. "I'm a friend of Dorcas'."

For some reason, this does not soothe Marlene like Lily had expected it to. Instead, it makes her snarl and come running right at her with her sword. Lily yelps and skips to the side, clunky and slow in the harness, and she curses under her breath as the sword slices against her arm.

Well, great. That's just great. Huffing, Lily throws up a mental apology to Dorcas before she kicks out with her foot to slow Marlene down, then wraps the rope around her wrist and snatches on it. Marlene cries out, and the sword clatters to the ground. There, perfect. No weapon.

"Listen to me, I'm here to help," Lily hisses, inching closer and fully just dragging Marlene in. They collide into each other, and Marlene gasps, struggling to push away and not really managing it with the state of her broken arm and Lily's unrelenting grip to contend with. "I don't have time for this! I'm getting you out of here. Hold on!"

With that, Lily wraps the hanging clip on the harness around Marlene and secures it, then grabs onto her and gives a sharp tug on the rope, bellowing into her headset to be brought up. As soon as their feet leave the ground, Lily wraps her legs around Marlene and holds her, and holds her, and holds her through each bite and hiss and claw of fingers.

Marlene is still fighting and lashing out as much as she can all the way through the air and into the heli-carrier. Barty, Mary, and Amos are there to hastily help them inside, all chattering and trying to peel Marlene away from Lily at once.

It's not until Marlene really registers that there are other people that she calms down enough to pause, her head swinging around, eyes flashing. She's defensive, panting, unaware that she's saved. Lily leaves Mary to offer her water, soothing her with the promise that she's okay now, she's not in the arena anymore, and she'll never have to go back.

"Barty, get that tracker out of her arm," Lily orders, sweeping past him to head to the cockpit. She ignores the stinging in her arm from the sword and the ache from Marlene quite literally beating the shit out of her to stoop down in the cockpit and stare at the radar. "Has she got it yet?"

"No, still waiting," Sybill says nervously. "It should be possible to pick up the pings of the trackers in the tributes' arms so we know where to go, but…"

"Shit," Lily curses. "Shit, shit, shit."

Sybill glances at her with wide eyes. "What do we do?"

"We do nothing," Lily mutters. "I have to go into the maze."

"Lily—"

"We don't have time, Sybill."

"But," Sybill starts, only to cut herself off as Lily drops her phone in Sybill's lap, displaying Marlene's position. Sybill blinks. "What is this?"

"This is going to be me, here in a moment," Lily declares, pointing at the screen. "You'll be able to follow me through the maze and send Barty or Amos down to bring whoever I find back up. We'll communicate through the headset, but you'll have eyes on me the whole time, so stay close."

"Okay," Sybill says. "Just—be careful."

Lily nods and steps back out of the cockpit to find Marlene absolutely sobbing her eyes out as Barty digs the tracker out of her arm. Her broken arm. Oh, that's—well, that's horrible, but it is necessary. She's allowing it, though, and Mary is right there, holding her other hand and soothing her through it.

"Got it!" Barty announces the moment he does, in fact, have it. He holds it up like a trophy, blood on his fingers.

"Toss it," Lily orders, and Barty does, fully just flicking it out of the open door. Lily drops down next to Marlene and Mary, reaching out to peel their hands apart. She doesn't hesitate, just slips the ring off her finger, and looks up to find Marlene staring at her. "Sorry, I need this. I'll give it back."

"I—" Marlene's breath catches, her voice hoarse, throat still bruised and arm still broken and bleeding. She's a fucking mess, and yet, she holds Lily's gaze and says, "If you lose that, I'm going to fucking kill you."

Lily just huffs a laugh and darts away, stopping only long enough to explain what she's doing and making it very clear that Mary is not to drop down into the maze. Barty is tasked with removing trackers, Sybill has to fly, and that leaves Amos to come down for retrieval. Mary catches this, and the last thing Lily hears as she drops out the heli-carrier is Mary Macdonald telling her to go fuck herself.

"Why isn't the radar picking up the signal of the tributes' trackers?" Dorcas hisses.

Minerva presses her lips into a thin line and shakes her head sharply. "It's tied into Hallow technology only, Dorcas. No other radar can pick it up."

"Shit," Dorcas chokes out, staring at the screen as she watches Lily hit the ground in the maze, unclip from the heli-carrier and take off running. Dorcas swallows. "Okay, well, that's going to make this a little harder."

"What can we do?" Pandora asks.

Dorcas bites her lip. "Help guide her until we have to go. Who is she closest to from her position?"

"As of now…Majesty, who moves fast," Minerva says.

"Okay," Dorcas replies firmly, "so get her to them."

Lily could do without the hands that burst free from the hedges behind her, thank you. She does not at all appreciate them, and she can't stop herself from sending a look of sheer disbelief up to the sky as she tears down the passage, a ring on her finger and a heli-carrier flying above.

Lily is pretty sure that the hands are just guiding her along, but it's not exactly a comfort to feel chased by them. They're fucking creepy, and it's genuinely terrifying. She ignores them as much as possible and weaves through the maze as fast as she can, taking turns when hands burst free in front of her and the hedges part for her to dive into.

It's not long before she finds someone. Majesty, Lily recalls, and they only get one moment of staring at each other before the hedges close up around them, nowhere to go, and Lily looks up to see someone sinking down. Immediately, she's pissed, because she'd know that hair anywhere.

"What the fuck did I say?!" Lily bursts out incredulously.

"Amos actually has a history with patching up wounds, so he needs to help Marlene," Mary snaps.

"Then they could have sent Barty!"

"He's helping Sybill!"

"Oh, for fuck's sake," Lily hisses, shooting her a glare before focusing on Majesty, who is staring at them like they might be some new alien lifeforms coming to abduct them.

Not too far off, actually.

"Hey," Mary says gently, addressing Majesty. How she can be gentle now, here, Lily does not know. "Majesty, right? My name is Mary. I understand this might be confusing for you, but we're here to get you out, alright? We've already rescued Marlene McKinnon, and we have to help the others after you. I know this is a lot to ask, but I need you to trust me, okay?"

"Out?" Majesty asks, cautious. "You're getting me out?"

"We are. I promise," Mary murmurs. "We're not with the Hallow. I swear we're not. Hallow is hollow."

Majesty stares at her, and then they swallow and look up at the heli-carrier, and then, tentatively, they take a step forward. Drawn in by the promise of freedom. Drawn in by the chance to finally rest. Drawn in by Mary's calm words and defiant declaration. Hallow is hollow.

And so, Majesty goes up without a fight, and Lily checks in through the headset, getting the updates. The tracker is taken out of their arm. Amos is doing what he can to help. Barty is keeping an eye on Lily's position, removing trackers, and steadily giving out water. Mary plans to keep dropping in, and Lily gives in, because she's better at it than Lily was.

The next people Lily comes across are Narcissa and Alecto. They're all running from hands and crash into each other, and Lily's head nearly gets taken off by Alecto's sword. Narcissa has her bow up and pointed at Mary in seconds as she comes down, and Lily moves fast, striking out while she's distracted and nearly getting a sword to the stomach for her troubles, if not for the hands that dart out to grab Alecto and hold her.

Narcissa and Lily fight, and they're still fighting when Mary makes it to the ground. She rushes over to pull Narcissa off Lily, the both of them wrestling her bow away from her. Alecto snarls and fights against hands that don't harm her, just hold her, and then Mary is talking. Not soft, not soothing, but firm. Listen to me. Now. That's what her words mean, and it's what these two need, apparently, because they do.

Narcissa goes up first. Alecto follows.

It's the same thing, over and over, the same fight and then the same spiel. Lily locating, Mary coming down, Barty taking out the trackers, and then doing it all over again. Rabastan and Asher. Emmeline and Alice. All that's left is—

"Lily!" Sybill shrieks as Lily runs, guided along by more hands and an ever-shifting maze. "Lily, they're here! The Hallows are here! We need to go!"

"Not yet!" Lily shouts back, because not yet. Not yet. Not yet." They can do this. They can get them all out. There's still Regulus, there's still Sirius, there's still more of the mission.

So, Lily doesn't stop, and she doesn't slow down.

The whole building wails. The loud alarm that blares through the building makes Dorcas suck in a sharp breath, her eyes wide and her hands shaking.

"Dorcas, we have to go," Minerva declares.

"But—" Dorcas traps a whine behind her teeth and glances at the screen where Lily is still running, still running, still running from their guiding hands. If they leave now, they can't help her. They won't know she and everyone else made it out, not until it's over, not until Dorcas can make the call.

"Dorcas!" Minerva shouts.

"Wait," James chokes out. "Please wait. Regulus and—"

"We have to. James, I'm sorry, we have to," Dorcas tells him, utterly devastated. "We don't have time. If we don't go now, we'll die. James, I know, okay? I know, but—but Lily is still in this, and as soon as we're in the garage, I'll make the call. She'll do everything she can to get them out. She will."

"There's still a chance, James," Frank says. "You just have to hope, okay? But she's right. We have to go now."

"Come on! Come on," Dorcas orders. "Go, go, go!"

With no other options, that's what they all do.

Regulus is wet from rain and running for his life. Always the hands. He's so fucking tired of the hands. The rustling of the hedges are loud, then louder, then too loud. There's a heavy thwap-thwap-thwap noise from above that has him looking up as he takes a corner, managing to catch sight of a hulking shadow passing over in the sky for only a second before he collides into someone hard enough to hit the ground.

He rolls, then comes back up with his dagger at the ready, only to falter in surprise at the sight of a woman that should most definitely not be in the maze. Not a tribute. An illusion?

"Regulus," she says, hands help up, not moving—she speaks like she knows him, "my name is Lily. I'm not here to—"

"Regulus!"

A jolt travels through Regulus' body at the familiar sound of Mary's voice, and his heart hammers as she drops to the ground from a line she's clipped to. She moves towards him, fast, and he steps back sharply, swiveling his blade up.

Mary stops, blinks, then looks so fucking sad. "Hey, Regulus, it's me. I promise it's me, okay? I—I know this is confusing, but we really don't have much time now. We're getting you out of here. I need you to come with me."

"Where?" Regulus asks shortly, eyes narrowed.

"Away. Somewhere safe," Mary tells him. "I—I know you're scared and on edge, but the sooner we get you out, the sooner we can find Sirius and get him out, too."

It's like she says the magic words. Regulus' heart jumps, and he lowers his dagger. "You're getting him out?"

"As soon as we have you," Mary vows. She holds out her hand to him. "Come on. Barty is waiting in the heli-carrier."

"Barty?" Regulus asks, and his voice cracks, tears filling his eyes as a harsh pressure builds in his chest. Here is Mary, not quite a friend, but Sirius and James' friend. Someone kind. Someone who reminds him of home. And there is Barty, somewhere, waiting. Barty. A constant. He's here? Home is here, and home has come for him, and Regulus wants so badly to go home now. James is home. Where is he?

Mary steps forward and touches him gently, easing her hand around his elbow to pull him closer. She tugs his dagger away and murmurs to him, explaining that they have to go up, up, up. Regulus is not okay with this, really, because he does not like heights, but she bargains with him; as soon as you're in the heli-carrier, we'll find Sirius.

There's not a lot of time, and Regulus wants to go home, and he'll do anything to make sure that Sirius can come home, too. So, he tucks his face into Mary's hair, closes his eyes, and holds onto her as they rise.

It's chaos in the heli-carrier. Utter fucking chaos. People are shouting, moving around, full of activity. There are faces he doesn't recognize and faces he does from the maze. There's Barty there, suddenly, who practically peels him away from Mary and chokes out a harsh breath as he snatches him into a hug. Regulus sinks into him all at once.

"Fucking hell, fucking—" Barty cuts himself off and pushes Regulus back, guiding him to a seat built into the closed side of the heli-carrier, next to a very large gun. "Okay, look, I have to get the tracker out of your arm, Regulus. I have to cut it out and dig it out. It's going to hurt. Hey, are you listening?"

Regulus is dazed, overwhelmed, and can barely hear himself think over the sounds of everyone else. Barty smacks him. Just slaps him hard enough to make him jolt and focus. Barty raises a scalpel and raises his eyebrows, too.

"Okay," Regulus says, nodding. "Okay."

Regulus barely even gets to feel it or make sense of anything, because someone starts shouting from the cockpit, and a man in glasses starts barking orders at Mary, and it's utter chaos. The heli-carrier tilts, and everyone rocks with the motion.

"Sybill!" Barty roars. "Keep the fucking thing steady!"

There's blood on Regulus' arm.

"They're fucking shooting at us!" someone shrieks.

"Regulus? Regulus?" Narcissa demands, suddenly at his side, staring at him with wide eyes. Her arm is wrapped in white cloth. There's blood on it.

I killed your sister, Regulus thinks. He does not say it, but he feels it, and he feels nothing.

"Got it!" Barty declares. "Okay, time to toss!"

"Barty, no!" The man in the glasses dives forward to yank Barty out of the way just as he tosses the tracker out the opening, and everyone starts screaming and ducking as gunfire sprays through the heli-carrier.

"We have to get Lily!" the person from the cockpit yells. "Mary, get Lily! Bring Lily up now!"

"Fuck!" Mary shouts, and then she's running right for the open door and swinging out, the rope catching and spinning on the mechanism as she sails down.

Regulus watches it slow.

Regulus' ears are ringing.

Regulus is holding Narcissa's hand.

"Amos, can you—" Barty cuts himself off and hits the ground just as more gunfire rips through the opening. Everyone goes to the ground, diving out of the way.

The heli-carrier tilts again, and they all slide and sway, rocking with the motion of it. Regulus is on the ground, tucked under Narcissa, and he doesn't know how he got here.

"No! No!" Lily shouts, swinging back inside with Mary and clearly not pleased to be here at all. "Not yet! There's still—"

"We have to go, Lily! We've done all we can!" the person from the cockpit shouts back. "They're already here!"

Lily marches off to the cockpit, and Regulus shoves Narcissa aside, woozy and shaking. He crawls to his feet and watches Mary, with tears on her cheeks, slam the side door on the heli-carrier closed and lock the latch.

"Fuck! Fuck!" Lily snarls, stomping back out of the cockpit, and everyone stares at her. She stands in place, her chest heaving, and she squeezes her eyes shut. "Alright, listen up! Everyone hold onto something. We're leaving, and it's not going to be a graceful exit!"

"Wait," Regulus croaks, stumbling forward. "Wait, you haven't got everyone. You haven't—"

"We got everyone we could," Lily says.

"Regulus," Barty whispers, there suddenly, catching him by the chest and halting him. Regulus is still trying to move forward, and he can see. He can see through the front window of the heli-carrier, and so can Barty, and Barty shifts to block him, to block his view. Regulus' eyes sting.

"Sirius," Regulus chokes out, slumping into Barty's arms and trying fruitlessly to reach past him, trying to pluck the Hallow heli-carrier ahead out of the sky. "Sirius. Barty, please. Sirius —"

"I know, I know," Barty says, and he looks over his shoulder, grimaces, and then lets them both sink to the ground.

"Sirius," Regulus repeats, weeping. "Sirius. We have to get Sirius. Barty, we can't leave him. We can't—"

"Stop. Regulus, stop." Barty clutches him closer and holds onto him, staring into his eyes. "Just stop."

"We can't leave," Regulus whimpers. "Please. Please, Barty, we can't leave him. We can't, we have to go and get him, it's supposed to be me and him. Where is he?"

"They got him, Regulus," Barty says softly, his voice laden with pity. "The Hallows got him."

Regulus gasps out a hoarse sob and shakes his head, the whole fucking world ripping apart around him. He curls up. He lays there and bleeds, lays there and weeps, lays there and screams.

They got him. The Hallows got his brother.

His big brother.

Always his big brother.

Chapter End Notes

guess what song i was listening to when i wrote that last scene? two birds by regina spektor. "two birds on a wire, one says come on, the other says im tired" YEAH THAT ONE 😃 DID I CRY? YES, MAYBE, BUT YOU CANT PROVE IT.

starting from the top, pandora and remus. giggling while writing "what difference can one night make?" because REALLY, JUST WAIT 😭 remus just. well, he's clearly struggling rn, and so he dipped. needed a little break. terrible timing on his part. shaking my head at him as if i didn't write it.

moving on, because i will talk more about remus in a minute. cut to poor james, who is having one hell of a night, huh?

and then effie my beloved <3 her also asking about remus, except she never quite says his name, does she? how frustrating. lily is literally so, so close. like, the sheer irony of her to be like "sorry some servant isn't the priority right now" when, if she knew who that servant was, she would go and get him Immediately.

and then lily herself! and mary!!! ah, there's some Tension there. hm. just know that i love these two so, so much. and sybill pls 😭 she really can't keep a secret to save her life GOODBYE. but ofc mary and barty are like hey! we want to come! district six, the district of the loyal. i do love themes, clearly.

also the whole amos and barty thing—don't look too closely into that. barty just likes sex, this is established, and he's going through a lot.

like, okay, so that moment where james is like, shit remus is already gone, and dorcas says they have to go down to the basement level—yeah, so there's still hope! remember that; james always works to make sure people never get left behind, right? and they haven't left the hallow yet... 👀 anyway, that moment between dorcas and minerva was so. i think it's honestly one of my favorite dorcas scenes ever written, im not even gonna lie. it just felt really, intense? because it's established that dorcas and minerva have a bond, and this whole time dorcas —and us, following the story—have had this love for minerva called into question. because hey, it's Minnie, we love Minnie, right? but then she's doing all of this, and it's like, oh god we actually hate her—and then you reach this moment and realize. She's Not The Bad Guy.

like ive been saying it, to just wait and really think about what minerva is doing, because the thing is—she literally didn't know she had other options and had no motivations to find other options when this was a plan that would work, and WAS working. but the moment dorcas gives her that option, and extends that branch to make this choice, minerva instantly does it. she throws it all aside and renders everything she has done useless. do you know how heavy that is? do you know how hard that is? she tortured people and had people killed, and then she stepped up and did the right thing, even when doing so made all the wrong things she did before be for...nothing. LIKE PUT SOME RESPECT ON HER NAME PLEASE.

but on the bright side, lily got marlene, then nabbed her ring (told you the ring was important) to get the rest. they're not quite out of the woods yet, because they still have to make it back to the phoenix, so... more to come on that.

and also they got everyone except one...

oh, sirius 😔 my baby, i love him, i truly do. there's still more of this mission in the next chapter, so i can't really speak about what's coming, but just know that what you're thinking is gonna happen likely isn't, or at least not in the way you're expecting.

alright, let's do honorable mentions again, because i really missed them:

-dorcas "walk, i said WALK" meadowes 😩
-rodolphus "you're crazy, i like crazy" vs dorcas "i like women, only"
-james just casually being like "well alright ill just cut the tracker out of remus' thigh" like HELLO??? he's a mad lad, i love him so much
-narcissa being there for regulus, and still not knowing he killed bella, Big Yikes
-pandora my love 😭 her having to leave her dad who is dying. ITS SO UPSETTING!!!!
-on a higher note, that whole scene where lily and everyone is yelling over the phone lmaoooo. very entertaining to write
-remus also liked it when sirius caught the spear

yeah, that about covers it, i think. the next 2 chapters are kinda extensions of this one? like they all happen in the same time frame, over one long mission. so, it stays intense for the next chapter for sure.

It's a long way down to the basement, and the lift has been shut down, because—unbeknownst to everyone—when things go terribly, terribly wrong within the arena, things proceed to go terribly, terribly wrong within the building that controls said arena. Dorcas probably should have anticipated that.

It's smart, Dorcas can bitterly acknowledge, because once that alert was sent out and there was confirmation that someone or something was breaking into the arena, the mothership put out the alarm and responded accordingly.

"Come on, come on, stairwell," Dorcas directs, holding the door open so everyone can file past her. Best to stay out of sight on the way out, if they can.

Dorcas' planning around patrols and routes has granted them quite the headstart they need, though. The seven of them make their way down the stairwell quickly, or as quickly as they can. James falls behind, but Frank stays with him. As they bypass the sixth floor towards the fifth, the door bursts open down below and a flood of Aurors come in.

There should be a moment of hesitation, because Dorcas has never killed anyone before, and yet she points and shoots without even blinking. Headshot. Huey gasps. James and Frank lean over the rail from further up and shoot, too. Not necessarily headshots, but Aurors do go down.

Gunfire ricochets off the walls, spraying crumbling concrete and making them all duck. Minerva pushes forward, hits one Auror, grabs the next and ruthlessly slams them back against the rail, and then tilts them right over the side. They scream as they fall, sailing down and landing in a crumpled heap at the bottom. Rodolphus, who is closer than Frank and James, sees this and gets inspired, clearly, because he darts into the fray and starts tossing Aurors, too.

The moment the Aurors are cleared, they continue swiftly on the way. They made it down to floor three when the doors up ahead, back at the sixth floor, burst open yet again. More Aurors come into the stairwell, shooting down at them and following them down. Dorcas carelessly raises her gun over the railing and starts pulling the trigger, mildly satisfied when she hears the yelp and groan of people being hit.

Some make it down and reach them at the second floor, meeting James and Frank first since they're at the back. Frank slams one Auror against the wall, then fully drags them by the front of their vest to quite literally toss them over the rail. They don't have as far to fall, so they might get back up. Minerva must think so, too, because she snatches Huey's gun and points it down over the railing to shoot.

Another one goes sailing past, launched aside from where James smacked the shit out of them with his cane, his other hand up as he shoots at the Aurors still coming down with Frank's help. Some drop. Some shoot back, and Pandora gasps when she ducks out of the way, her shoulder slamming back into the wall. Rodolphus grabs her by the back of her neck and pushes her down, then braces one hand against the wall and the other to the railing as he swings himself up and kicks at an Auror that pushes past Frank and James. The Auror lands on their back, and Dorcas looks away before Frank brings his raised foot down against their head with force.

By the time they all reach the first floor, the Aurors close are thinning out, but more are steadily flooding the stairwell from higher up, shooting down at them with little success. At one point, James runs out of bullets, looks at his gun, then just throws it at the Auror in front of him, whacking them in the face with it so hard that they stumble back.

Minerva makes it to the basement level first with Huey and Pandora right behind. There are a few Aurors that fell that are alive and well enough to stand back up, and Minerva puts them right back down with bullets between their eyes. One Auror lunges at Huey, who yelps and stumbles back, and Rodolphus heaves a sigh like he's babysitting as he starts to assist.

Pandora is closer. She punches the Auror in the face, then almost instantly bursts into tears. Just starts crying, and the Auror looks so genuinely alarmed by this for a second that they don't even move or do anything. This turns out to be a mistake, because while still crying, Pandora throws herself at the Auror like a wild, untamed cat trying to claw their face off.

It's dreadful, honestly. She's just flailing and screaming and crying all at the same time, leaving bloody scratches on their face but not doing any real damage. Rodolphus is the one who has to sweep in and shove the Auror's head into a wall, making them go limp and slump to the ground, knocked out.

Rodolphus blinks at Pandora. "You, uh, good?"

"No," Pandora says with a sniffle.

"Come on!" Minvera calls out, holding the door open and waving them all through. The floor is littered with bodies and blood, some dead and some not and some too injured to move.

Dorcas makes it through the door but waits for James and Frank, and then Minerva slams the door once everyone is out. More Aurors are still chasing them, but Minerva steps back and proceeds to shoot the lock until she empties her clip. She tries the handle and presses against the door, seemingly satisfied when it won't give.

"Tell me you have a way out of here," Minerva grits out, swinging around to face Dorcas as she tosses aside her gun with a dull clatter. Frank does the same, and when Dorcas checks, she repeats the motion. Great, so they're all out.

The good news is that it'll take the Aurors a while to catch up. If they make it to the garage quickly, then they'll be able to get out and get to the train, and then they're all in the clear.

"Yes, there's a van in the garage," Dorcas tells her.

"Who's waiting to let us in the station?" Minerva asks.

Dorcas shrugs. "I don't know. Whoever Lily sent. They'll let us in the moment we set off the censors."

"Good," Minerva says. "Let's go."

"Wait," Dorcas mutters. "We have to take one tiny detour."

Minerva raises her eyebrows in disbelief, but Dorcas sets her shoulders and tilts her chin up, because she's in charge here, and she made a promise. James beams at her.

"Do you hear that? Fucking gunshots! And the building is on lockdown now. Lift won't work. Potter and his lot, no doubt."

Remus crosses his arms tighter around his ribcage, feeling the frantic thump of his heart as he paces back and forth in his cell. The muffled sound of gunshots has faded, but the faint sound of an alarm blaring through the building has not.

Something has happened, obviously.

Remus doesn't know what has happened, but by the dread turning the blood in his veins to ice, he just knows it somehow involves James, and probably Pandora. Oh, what did they do? He's freaking the fuck out wondering if they're okay, if they're even alive, and fucking Malfoy isn't helping.

Yet again, Lucius must have gone out with someone for drinks or something, because he got trapped down on this level when the building shut down unexpectedly. Remus doesn't know how many people he's with, but he has heard at least one person grunt in response to the things he has said.

At first, Lucius was prattling on about James apparently having some sort of secret plot going on to help Regulus or Sirius win the hunger games. He was going on and on about how James has his district stylist doing dirty work, which is against the rules, and Remus has been resisting the urge to claw his own ears off or snatch his mask away and scream down the corridor for Lucius to shut his stupid fucking mouth. Remus wants to fucking kill him. Itches with the urge. Hungry for it.

Once the gunshots started, Lucius fell silent. He's just now picking up his complaints and ranting, and Remus can hear him pacing at the end of the hall, likely waiting for the lift to come back on so he and his companion can leave.

There's the distant sound of a door slam and feet pounding against the ground. Remus freezes, his eyes going wide, and he can't stop himself from whipping around to face the bars on his cell, staring wide-eyed at nothing and straining his ears. Lucius has fallen silent. The footsteps have stopped.

And then, Lucius flatly says, "Potter, how did I know it was you? Of course it was you and…"

The silence is thick.

"Yes, me," comes the dry voice of Minerva McGonagall. "Do finish your sentence, Mr. Malfoy, please."

"What is the meaning of this?" Lucius hisses.

"Look," James says, his voice ringing out sharp, "I'm only going to make this offer once. You and Dolohov can come with us, or we can go through you. The arena has fallen. We're getting the tributes out. Either come with us, or get the hell out of the way, and if you don't—well, I told you what would happen if you got in my way again."

Remus is pretty sure his heart fucking stops. The arena has fallen. We're getting the tributes out. Sirius. That's the first thing Remus thinks. Just Sirius.

What the hell is happening? James never mentioned this, and surely he would have, if he knew. Damn. What a difference one night can make, indeed.

"You—" Lucius makes a low snarl of fury. "What did I say, Dolohov? I told you Potter would fuck this up somehow. I knew you were planning something. I knew it."

"Oh, come off it, Lucius," snaps someone else, someone that Remus doesn't know. "Fuck the glory of winning. Who cares about any of that? They're getting my brother out. Your wife as well. Winning the games isn't important—"

"To you," Lucius grits out. "It's not important to you, but to some people, the integrity behind these games matter. If you think I'm going to just stand by and let you ruin this—"

"Well," James cuts in, "I did my part. I tried."

There's the following sound of a grunt, and then people are yelling, and Remus holds very still as he listens to the clear sounds of a brawl. Possibly more than one. He can hear Pandora shouting, and Frank cursing, and someone else slamming into a hard surface.

The fight doesn't get further away. It gets closer. Remus takes a step forward, drawn to it like a moth to a flame, his palms itching. It has been years since he's done anything, absolutely anything at all, that could release the built-up pressure always fluttering under his skin, like he's eager to rip out of himself and let go. His heart flutters rapidly at the base of his throat, his temples throbbing, struggling to breathe behind his mask in a strange sense of anticipation he can't really understand. There's the sound of violence, bodies taking hits, and Remus steps forward again. Again. Again.

The moment Lucius Malfoy stumbles into view outside of his cell, Remus' hands are darting out between the bars of their own accord. His fingers curl into silky hair, and he fists it before yanking hard. Lucius barely gets one second to gasp, and then Remus is slamming his head into the steel bar once, twice, a third time. Lucius stares at him dazedly, bloody and bruised already, eyes unfocused.

Remus yanks on his head with all his strength and hears the snap at the same time as he registers the feeling of blood pooling over his fingers in Lucius' hair where his head was split open. Remus knows what a dead man's eyes look like, and Lucius is indeed a dead man before he ever hits the ground when Remus finally relinquishes his grip.

It's eerily quiet.

James steps over Lucius' splayed legs slowly and comes into view, his eyes wide, and yet they still light up the moment he sees Remus. Despite the dead man at his feet, James grins.

Remus reaches up and hesitates for a moment, feeling briefly suspended in this one second, trapped in amber and trapped in a cell he's never removed his mask in.

But it's just James here. Just James. His friend. If Remus can trust anyone, it's him. And, well, Remus just murdered a man, so taking off the mask isn't going to make much of a difference at this point. Either way, he'd be executed for it. So, exhaling in relief as he does it, Remus removes the mask.

"Remus," James greets warmly, "I was handling that."

"I was faster," is all Remus can think to say, and James releases a high-pitched, hysterical sort of laugh, staring at him in pure disbelief. He shakes his head like he's amazed.

"You just—you killed someone. Are you alright?"

"He's not the first, James."

James blinks. He blinks again. "Oh, so you—you—"

"It's a long story, but let's just say I didn't end up becoming a servant in the Hallow on a petty crime," Remus says dryly. "I can, uh, tell you all about it later the next time I feel like opening up a bit more, but after you explain to me what the fuck is happening right now."

"Oh. Right. Yeah, so I'm here to break you out," James informs him, and then he pulls out a knife.

Remus stares at him. "James, this isn't the sort of cell you can break into with a knife, and I—I can't come with you. My—"

"Listen to me, there's not much time," James interrupts. "The arena is—well, some people broke in. There's this whole secret revolution my stylist is a part of. It's insane, and we—we hope they managed to get Sirius and Regulus out. Do you hear what I'm saying, Remus? You can be free. You can come with us and be somewhere safe, and Sirius will be there, and—and—" He stops, then swallows. His voice drops to a whisper. "Please. Just please come, because—because Sirius would want you to, and because you're my friend, and because you deserve to be free, and because I won't leave you behind."

James sounds—and looks—desperate. Hoping. Pleading. All Remus wants to do is agree, just agree so fucking badly, because he is who he is and would give anything to go.

Anything except his father's life.

"They'll kill my dad, James," Remus whispers, his voice small.

"Believe me, Riddle will be a little busy with many other matters to focus on the loss of one servant," says McGonagall, who sweeps into view. "I cannot promise you that your father will live, but I can promise you that whether you stay here or go with us, his chances of dying are the same. War is here, and that goes for everyone, including Riddle himself. Furthermore, the spread of rebellion will surely lead to liberation missions across the districts and already has; your father could be safe already, or may one day become so."

Remus stares at her, his mouth running dry. He hesitates, his heart pounding in his chest. Dad, he thinks. Dad, please don't die. Please don't be dead. I want to be free. Can I be free?

"Remus," James croaks, "do you think your dad would want you to give up your freedom and chance at safety just for him? Don't you think he'd give his life for you to have all of that?"

Remus thinks about it, that letter, those words he read so many times that he memorized them, words he has thought of day in and day out. Days of thinking of our last fight has taught me many things about regret, and I want to tell you now that the only regret I truly have is not assuring you, even in our differences, that I would always love you and support you through anything. If you doubt anything else, do not doubt that, because I will always love you, no matter what; I will always be proud to call you my son.

After all the fighting, and the struggles to communicate, all the push and pull and pain, all the distance and years spent apart, and every time Remus never really listened to his father—after all of that, here Remus is, deciding to listen this time.

"Okay," Remus chokes out. "Okay, I'll come, but—but you really can't break into the cell with a knife."

James exhales in visible relief, then clears his throat. "Um, well, actually the knife is to cut the tracker out of your thigh."

"Oh," Remus says.

"Er, if you're alright with that, I mean," James mumbles awkwardly, looking a little unsure.

"I—no, I mean yes, that's—well, it's sort of necessary, isn't it?" Remus asks, coughing. "Right, just—uh, do you have a plan to get into the cell, though? Because it's on a timer. It won't open again until morning, unless it's manually opened."

"Okay, how do I manually open it?"

"At the end of the hall, you take a left and go down to the second office. That's the control room. It's practically never used or monitored. It does take three different people to do it, though, sort of as a failsafe. The three keys have to be turned at the same time, and they're all at separate parts of the room, but once they're turned, you can open any cell you want."

James nods and turns to the side to, presumably, look at everyone else he's with. "Okay, I'll go. I need two more."

"Frank, Rodolphus, go with James," says Dorcas, the stylist, who is also apparently a part of a revolution? "If the Aurors make it through, they'll reach you three first, and you're all strong enough to fight. Huey, you and I will go bring the van out into the garage. Minerva, get that tracker out of his thigh, and Pandora… Darling, what would you like to do?"

Pandora steps into view and looks through the bars at Remus with a trembling smile. "I think I'll hold Remus' hand."

Remus' face softens. Pandora looks a fright. Her hair is a mess, face swollen from tears, and she's all banged up. He reaches through the bars, and she moves closer, not looking at Lucius' body as she reaches out to tangle their fingers together. He gently squeezes, and she squeezes back.

James passes Minerva the knife, and then he's gone, moving quickly away with his cane thunking against the ground as he goes. The others depart as well, except for Minerva, who eases close to the bars. Remus presses up against them and turns, holding his thigh in place in the open space in between.

"Remus, wasn't it?" Minerva asks quietly.

"Yes," Remus murmurs.

"I'm Minerva," she replies, kneeling down. "I'm going to cut the seam of your trousers to reveal the injection site. You should have a small scar there. I'll do my best to be as quick as I can, but I'm afraid it's going to hurt either way."

Remus blows out a deep breath and closes his eyes, letting his forehead rest against the cold bars and feeling Pandora once again squeeze his hand. Exhaling, Remus gives a jerky nod and grits out, "Do what you need to do."

~•~

"We got them all," Lily whispers through the phone. "We got all of them, Dorcas, all except Sirius. The Hallows got him."

Dorcas' eyes sink shut. She leans forward and presses her face against the wheel, locked away in a quiet van, the only sound to accompany her being Huey's quiet breathing.

"Okay," Dorcas rasps. She blinks open her eyes and straightens up. "Okay, but—but you are out, yeah? Marlene? Is she safe? You're all headed back to the Phoenix?"

There's a beat of silence, and then Lily mumbles, "We, um, made it out of the arena, but we've run into a bit of trouble. Marlene is fine, and we're all fine, and we'll handle it."

"Lily—"

"Just—just worry about you and your lot, Dorcas. You all get the hell out of there, okay? We'll see you soon."

Dorcas doesn't get to respond before Lily hangs up. With a harsh swallow, Dorcas rolls down her window and tosses her phone, clenching her jaw, then she reaches out for the side of the steering wheel and turns the key.

James sees what Remus meant about the office when he steps inside. It's deserted and untouched, so unused that the air is stale and there are abandoned cobwebs in the corners. There are also three separate panels in the room, enough distance between them that one person wouldn't be able to reach them all at once. James isn't sure anyone ever comes in here.

With an exchanged look between all of them, James splits off as Rodolphus and Frank do the same. Frank goes to the far corner, Rodolphus goes to the back, and James goes to the main panel at the front.

"Alright, I'll count us down, and then we turn," Frank declares as he reaches out to grasp his key. James and Rodolphus do the same. "Three…two…one…"

James turns his key and watches the panel light up in front of him, a small screen flashing Manual Override Optional, and a row of numbers between one and twelve flashing. Only twelve servants stay overnight, and the rest are brought in for parties or by request, then escorted out after their duties are done. But these are the ones that stay, one servant per district, and James looks at the number six. That's Remus.

For some reason, James' hand hovers over the button, and his gaze slowly crawls to the number twelve. Yeah, Remus is assigned to district six, but he's from district twelve. Slowly, James' eyes flick across each glowing number, his chest pinching when he thinks about how these people, all of them, are reduced to numbers and the services they provide, but they all have homes they come from and lives they should get to live. It's not just Remus. He's not the only one.

"James?" Frank asks. "Did it work?"

"The numbers are lit up," Rodolphus comments, moving over to glance between said numbers and James. "Are you waiting for an invitation or something? Hello? Let your friend out."

James ignores him and presses the number one. There's a buzzing noise, and the key on the panel flicks back in place as the numbers go dim. Okay.

Okay, so one at a time, then.

"Get back to your panel," James orders. "We have to turn these keys eleven more times."

Rodolphus heaves a sigh and turns around to shuffle back to his panel, muttering, "Oh, for fuck's sake. Great, I'm stuck with a bleeding heart."

"Frank," James says, "count us down."

So, Frank does. And again. And he keeps doing it. Over and over, they repeat the process, one cell at a time. They almost certainly don't really have time for this, and that's eleven other people who will have trackers cut out of their thighs, but… Well, James can't not. What is he going to do? Not save everyone if he can? Do you even know him at all?

By the eleventh turn, they've fallen into a rhythm, quick with it and used to the pattern. They only falter when there's a clatter in the distance, making them all freeze. James swivels his head to look at Frank, who is very still.

"Shit," Frank whispers. "Three, two, one."

They all flick the keys one last time, and James quickly presses the number twelve, wincing at the loud buzzer. It's quiet out there otherwise, though, and they all look at each other and wait. When nothing happens, they shrug.

There's no pounding footsteps, no sounds of movement, no cracks of gunshots. With nothing else to do, they move for the door cautiously. It's closed, and Frank reaches it, grabbing the handle and holding his free hand up at them. They wait and listen, but there's nothing. The door creaks open, and still nothing. Frank presses his back against the door and pokes his head around the doorway, and still nothing.

"See anything?" James breathes out.

"No, we're clear, come on," Frank mumbles with a heavy sigh of relief, straightening up and stepping out and getting shot in the head only seconds later.

It's quick, sudden, an abrupt crack! that has Frank's head jerking and blood splattering back against the doorway and James' front. He flinches when it hits his face, small dots and smudges of red filming over the front of his glasses.

Frank is there one second, alive and standing, and then he's dropping to the floor in the next.

James doesn't really understand it. He sees it, and it doesn't make sense to him. He stares, and he isn't sure what the fuck he's looking at. He thinks maybe Frank is hurt real bad.

"Frank?" James asks, starting to take a step forward, and then he's yanked sharply back by the collar and slammed up against the wall by Rodolphus, who presses him there and claps a hand over his mouth, his eyes wide.

James thinks Rodolphus is shaking, and then he realizes it's him, but he isn't entirely sure why. He doesn't feel cold. There's something warm and wet on his face. Blood.

How'd that get there?

Rodolphus stands there for a long moment. One heartbeat, two, five, ten. By the fifteenth, it hits James that Frank's heart isn't beating anymore. He's not—he can't really put it all together, the sound of a gunshot and blood on his face and Frank hurt on the ground and Frank standing and Frank's heart not beating and Frank and Frank and Frank—

His mother died today.

A strange noise crawls up James' throat, muffled into the palm against his mouth, Rodolphus shoving him harder back when he tries to move, to struggle, to get Frank and stop him before he steps out of the room, but there's blood on his face, and Rodolphus is whispering to him fervently, begging.

"Shh, shh, please, you have to be quiet, man," Rodolphus hisses under his breath. "I know, okay? I know, but he's dead. He's dead, James. Shut up, they're coming."

James goes still, because the urgency in Rodolphus' voice is enough to scare him, and he is afraid. He can't see very well. There's something on his glasses, obscuring his vision.

Blood.

Frank's blood.

There's the sound of a tread of a boot lifting sticky away from the floor, and then a gun swings into the open doorway barrel-first, only getting in an inch before Rodolphus whips away from James to slam it up and lash out at the Auror that's starting to come in. James watches Rodolphus knock the gun into the Auror's face, can't really see all of it, but then the Auror cries out and Rodolphus has the gun.

The air fills with gunfire, Rodolphus using the Auror as a shield as he swings out the doorway to shoot at those that are shooting at them. James reaches up shakily and pulls his glasses off, staring blankly at the floor, vision blurry and dry as he cleans his glasses off before putting them back on.

"James!" Rodolphus bellows. "A little fucking help here!"

Blinking rapidly, James swivels and leans on his cane as he eases out the doorway. His first instinct is to help Frank get up, but Rodolphus seems to be in a worse predicament right now, so that's who James focuses on.

James snatches up his cane and whacks the closest Auror in the face with it, grunting from the force and following them as they crash into the wall. He brings his aching leg up to knee them in the stomach and snatch away their gun. It's not a pistol, but something with a wide spray and rapid fire. Aim, shoot, and hope you don't miss is easier like this.

Rodolphus and James duck in and out of the room for cover, shooting when they can, mostly tearing into the walls. The group of Aurors are down at the other end of the hall near the lift, around the corners. A few trickle down at a time, so James and Rodolphus pick them off and do their best to not get shot. The entire time, Frank remains on the floor.

James and Rodolphus have the better cover, admittedly, and they don't waste bullets when Aurors get in close range. They just drag them into the room and beat them there, and at some point, things go very quiet.

Carefully, James peeks around the corner. There are bodies bleeding out all down the hall, and it's so silent that it's utterly chilling. Rodolphus reaches out and touches his shoulder, then gestures for him to stay, so James does.

It takes only a minute for Rodolphus to creep down the hall, gun at the ready, then straighten up and head back when he finds that they're fine. James braces against his cane and grunts as he steps out into the hall.

"That's not the last of them," Rodolphus mutters. "We need to get the hell out of here."

"Yeah, okay, let's go," James agrees, and so they do. On the way, James stops by Frank and leans down to nudge him on the shoulder. "Hey, come on. Frank, we need to leave."

Rodolphus stops and stares at him.

"Time to go, Frank, come on," James insists, plucking at his sleeve and tugging a little, trying to get him to move.

"James," Rodolphus says softly.

"You can go," James offers. "We'll catch up."

"James," Rodolphus repeats, his face twisting into a grimace as he nods towards Frank, "look at him."

James isn't looking at him.

James doesn't want to look at him.

James is scared to look at him, for some reason.

Swallowing, James' hand goes slack on Frank's arm, and he squeezes his eyes shut. There's the sound of breathing. Two people. Just two people. There's blood on James' face, but not on his glasses, and he can see. He opens his eyes and looks.

He'll always wish he didn't.

Frank landed awkwardly, so half of his face is lying in his own ever-growing pool of blood. His eyes are wide and glassy, his mouth still open slightly on his last exhale of relief.

James feels his mouth twitch and tremble, his eyes burning, and he doesn't even know why, but at this moment, all he can think about is the way Alice had weeped I've got him as a last promise to Augusta, and it was a lie.

There's nothing for Alice to have anymore.

With trembling fingers, James reaches out and brings Frank's eyelids down, as if he's sleeping. James isn't sure why he does it, because Frank isn't sleeping. Frank is dead.

"James," Rodolphus says, "we have to go."

Every single cell in James' body protests leaving, and yet, he knows he doesn't have a choice. He blinks rapidly against his stinging eyes, trying to breathe around the harsh ache in his chest, and he forces himself to stand up. His leg hurts.

Rodolphus starts moving when James does, and they don't speak. Unlike Frank, Rodolphus doesn't quite match James' pace, but he keeps a gun at the ready as they move towards the cells again. They're stopped rather quickly by Pandora helping a limping woman towards the garage.

"James," Pandora breathes out in relief as he moves forward to come help her. "We heard gunshots. Are you—" She falters as she looks at him. "There's blood on you."

"Frank's," is what falls out of his mouth.

Pandora's eyes go wide. "Frank? Is he—where is he?"

"Dead," is what falls out of James' mouth next, which is odd, he thinks, because his voice sounds blank, devoid of emotion as if he feels nothing, but he feels everything.

"Dead?" Pandora chokes out. "He's—"

"He was shot," James explains flatly, and then he doesn't want to talk about it anymore. "Did —did Remus get out? Is this the last from the cells?"

"No, he's—I mean, he's fine. The tracker is out, and he's helping bring the last few servants with Minerva. He, um, had to coax a few into agreeing to leave, but we've got most of them to the van now. Remus and Minerva should be following with the last two here shortly," Pandora tells him.

"Good." James nods and says nothing else all the way to the garage with Rodolphus bringing up the rear, keeping his gun up. Pandora has started crying. The woman in between them is shaking and sipping in air like it's a miracle.

Out in the garage, there's a lot of activity at the van at the center. Dorcas and Huey are bustling around, helping the people they've broken out inside. Already it looks like a tight fit, but it's not an impossible one. Some of the freed people are crying silently, but none of them are speaking. They all look fucking terrified, and each of them have injured thighs, which Dorcas and Huey are wrapping up as gently as possible.

"We got one more," Pandora calls out, and Dorcas hops out the back of the van to help the woman in. Pandora crawls in after her, taking over helping Huey with the rest.

"Are you okay?" Dorcas asks James and Rodolphus, swinging her gaze between them. She eyes the gun in Rodolphus' hands, but doesn't comment on it, apparently trusting him enough by this point. "We heard gunshots. Where's Frank?"

"Have you called Lily yet?" James mutters.

Dorcas hesitates, then murmurs, "James, where's Frank?"

"Dead," James says irritably. "Have you called Lily yet?"

Rodolphus moves forward to plant one foot in the back of the van, giving the stunned Dorcas a pained look. "Frank was shot in the head. There was—we couldn't do anything. Take it easy on him, okay? I think he's in shock."

James isn't in shock. James feels fine. James has blood on his face, and his leg hurts, and he needs to know if Dorcas has called Lily yet, so he asks again. "Have you called Lily yet?"

"Oh, James," Dorcas croaks, her face seeming to just sag, her eyes getting brighter and shoulders slumping like a new weight has dropped on them. The leader. She's the leader, and she made the call to send Frank along, and James is the one who saved eleven extra people just to lose one friend.

"Have you called Lily yet?" James snaps.

"Y-Yeah, I—I—" Dorcas rolls her jaw, stuttering to a stop and raising her gaze up like she can fight the gravity of the tears building in her eyes. She blows out a slow breath, gives a harsh sniffle, then jerks a nod. "Yeah, I called her. She—"

"What?" James whispers, breathless, so fucking desperate.

Dorcas swallows. "They got Regulus out. He's out, James. He's out and on the way to the Phoenix."

James feels like his chest cracks in half. A quiet whimper falls out of him, and his hand flies up to his mouth as his eyes begin to burn, and there it is. The overflow. Instant. He's just here now, breaking down in sheer relief and wanting so badly to get to Regulus right now, and hold him, and slump into his arms and cry until he has no more tears to give.

Soon. So soon. Very soon, James will be able to go to him, and bury his face into Regulus' hair, and maybe never let him go again. He wants—oh, fuck, oh he wants Regulus' hands in his hair and Regulus' eyes meeting his and Regulus promising him that he's good, he's still good, and that it's not bad to be good even when being doing good leads to bad things happening. He can explain it to Regulus, tell him that he never meant to Frank to die, because be only wanted to save everyone he could, and Regulus will be able to explain it to him that it's not his fault, and he tried his best, and it's okay, it's okay, it's all okay when they're all together, safe and secure.

And Sirius. He'll forgive him, won't he? James knows, deep down, that Sirius won't even blame him. Sirius will hug him, and they'll hold on, and they'll mourn Frank together. They'll breathe together. They'll all finally, finally, finally be together.

"Okay," James chokes out. "Okay, so—so Regulus and Sirius are safe? They'll be there when we get there?"

Dorcas doesn't respond.

Dorcas drops her gaze.

They got Regulus out, she said. Regulus. They got Regulus out. Why didn't she say Sirius, too? Why didn't she just say that they got everyone out? Didn't they get everyone out?

"Dorcas?" James whispers.

"I'm sorry," Dorcas whispers back, looking up with tears in her eyes, and James feels his lungs seize. "I'm so sorry, James. They—they couldn't get Sirius. I'm—"

"No," James moans, shaking his head and stepping back. "No, no, don't say—don't tell me that. Don't—"

"I'm sorry," Dorcas says, her voice hoarse. "James, they did all that they could, but they just —they couldn't get him. I'm so sorry, James. The Hallows got Sirius before we could."

James turns away from her, dropping his head forward and strangling the handle of his cane as he tries to breathe and only manages to sob. There's a tentative hand pressed in between his shoulders, and he whines helplessly, feeling Dorcas wrap her arms around his front as she leans against his back, hugging him from behind, holding him together.

"James," Dorcas murmurs, "James, Regulus will be there. He'll be there, and he'll—he needs you, okay? I know. I know it's hard, and I'm sorry, but Regulus will be there."

Regulus. Oh, Regulus. They took his brother away. He's never going to be okay again, not without Sirius. James doesn't know if he will either. And, for a moment, James can only stand in place and hate everyone else, all those other tributes that got picked up before Regulus and Sirius. Why couldn't someone else get left behind? Why couldn't Sirius and Regulus make it out?

It's a selfish, harsh thought that burns through him like a blazing fire, the sun warm until you get too close, and James would incinerate them all if it meant Sirius could have made it along with Regulus. Just them, if it could only be two. James doesn't care that it makes him selfish. He doesn't care that he thinks it and feels it, here and now, that he'd sacrifice all the others if that's what it took. Here, James thinks. Have them. Have any of them, except for mine. Those two are mine. Please, please, please don't take them away from me.

James can't do this, not to Sirius, or Regulus, or himself. How could he? He has to try. He has to do something. He has to—

"James?"

The sound of Remus' voice makes James look up, and oh no. Oh no, no, no please no, not this. Not Remus. He told Remus that Sirius would be waiting. He said—he promised that—

"What's wrong?" Remus blurts out, limping along faster with a woman limping along beside him. His leg is already wrapped, and Minerva follows behind with a man who is touching his face like he forgot what it felt like without a mask.

"Frank," Rodolphus calls out from the van, and James inhales sharply as Dorcas peels away from him to go help the others get in the van. Rodolphus clearly thinks that James is breaking down about Frank dying, and maybe he feels that it's on him to be the one to say it so James doesn't have to, because it's him that gives Remus an answer. Not the full answer, but an answer nonetheless. "Frank didn't make it. We—we watched him go down, and James isn't… taking it well."

"Oh, James, I'm—I'm sorry," Remus whispers, shuffling forward, and then he's there, pulling James into his arms.

James is limp in his grip for a few beats, and then he lifts his arms and hugs him tight, clutching at him, not letting him go as Minerva and the other man go by. There's more bustling at the van, and James grips Remus as hard as he can, blinking the tears from his eyes, breathing in and out.

"It's going to be okay," James croaks, swallowing thickly before he pulls away and fails to meet Remus' gaze. "Are you okay? How's the leg?"

"I'll live," Remus says, then winces. "Shit. Ah, sorry."

"Shit!" Huey bursts out. "Hey, uh, we have company!"

"Dammit!" Dorcas hisses, and James whirls around to see her waving her hand at Minerva. "You're driving. Go! James, Remus, get in. Time to go."

There's frantic shuffling inside the back of the van. Huey runs up front with Minerva, Pandora yelps as she falls directly into Rodolphus' lap, who hastily moves his gun aside with wide eyes full of alarm. The van rocks as everyone shifts around, piling on each other and huddling together.

Past the van, at the exit of the garage, a sleek black car has pulled inside, facing the van head-on. Out on the street, two other cars are stopped right across from each other, blocking the exit. Aurors trying to trap them in.

Remus and James move for the back of the van, and James grabs Remus' elbow to help him climb up into it. Pandora shifts in Rodolphus' lap, earning a grunt as she leans forward to reach out and help pull Remus in.

"Come on!" Minerva calls from the front.

"What's the plan here, Dorcas?!" Huey shrieks shrilly.

"I—fuck, I don't know!" Dorcas shouts. "Minerva?!"

Silence.

James grabs his cane and tucks it underneath one arm while reaching out to grab one of the van doors with the other. He swings it shut with a slam and, instead of swinging himself inside next, he grasps the other door and slams that, too.

Remus swivels around and blinks. "James?"

James grabs his cane and stares through the steel-mesh on the back of the van, then swiftly runs the line of his cane through the two door handles on the back of the van. Remus' hand flies up against the steel net, fingers peeking out. His eyes are wide as he rattles the doors, unable to open them from the inside.

"James?" Remus repeats, more frantic this time. "James, what the hell are you doing? What are you—"

"Remus, it's okay. It's okay."

"James, open the fucking door! Open the—"

"Remus!" James bursts out, and Remus snaps his mouth shut, face hovering through the other side like pixels. "It's okay. I promise it's okay. I'm just—I have to try."

"Try what? Get in here. Open the fucking door, James, and get in," Remus spits out. James steps back, and Remus smacks his hand against the barrier. "James, where the fuck are you going? What are you doing? Don't, James. James!"

There are others, too, calling for him, Pandora and Dorcas and even Rodolphus demanding he get inside the van. James raises his voice and calls, "As soon as you've got the opening to go, Minerva, you drive! You go, do you hear me?!"

"James, stop!" Dorcas shouts. "Don't do this! Get in the fucking van. That's an order!"

"James!" Remus bangs his hands against the only thing that separates them, wild-eyed. "James!"

Turning, James moves around the van and heads right for the car blocking their path, hearing everyone shouting at him to come back. James' leg is on fire, and he feels off without his cane, but he grits his teeth and takes off at a run. His leg has been through hell today, so he's sure it's the adrenaline that gets him to that car, and sheer force of will.

The Auror is already opening the door and getting out with a gun in hand when James reaches them. They raise it and pull the trigger, but the shot fires wide as James shoves their hand up and slams them up against the side of the car. The gun clatters to the ground, and it's kicked away, skittering across concrete and disappearing beneath a different car.

With a curse, the Auror lashes out at him, and James ducks, then throws his elbow into the side of their head. The Auror cries out and curls forward, slipping and hitting their knees. James grabs the car door and yanks. He does it a second time and then a third, slamming their head into the car door until they slump on the ground, knocked out.

James breathes out harshly before he shoves his way into the car behind the wheel, reaching out to slam the door shut behind him. He grips the wheel and looks around, a little lost for a moment. He's never driven a car before.

Right, well, it's already on, so that helps. He looks down at the lever with the little letters next to it. R for reverse, right? He tries to pull it down, but it's stuck. Okay, not that. Shit.

James tries pressing a pedal and jolts when the engine snarls at him, though the car remains idle. A noise of frustration slips from James' lips, his eyes stinging, because he has to do this. He has to save his best friend, like he couldn't save Frank, for himself and for Regulus and for Remus. He can't just leave Sirius here. The Hallows got him, so James will get him back, but he can't fucking do that if he can't even move.

There's still blood on his face.

People scream his name in the distance.

"Come on, come on, come on!" James shouts, banging his hand on the wheel as he kicks at a pedal and yanks on the lever at the same time. He chokes out a harsh breath when the lever comes down, finally, slotting into place.

Oh. Oh, okay. There.

Sniffling, James exhales shakily and puts both hands on the wheel, then moves his foot off one of the pedals. R is indeed for reverse, because the car slowly starts easing back. Too slow. James needs to go faster.

So, James slams his foot down on the other pedal and almost instantly starts screaming as the car jolts and flies backwards. His eyes bulge as he shouts his head off, staring out the front windshield to see the faces of his friends from the van in front of them. They all look fucking horrified. All except for Minerva, who flexes her fingers on the wheel.

The car jolts and rocks up on the incline as it goes backwards, and then James hears the crash of metal on metal before he feels the collision of the back end of his car slam in between the other two cars blocking the exit.

James is still pressing the pedal all the way to the floor, his body jerking and teeth clacking at the loud shriek of the other cars being shoved back from the force. It leaves a wide opening, and James frantically jerks at the wheel, full of panic as the car jerks from side to side, and he can't think, can't figure out what to do or how to do it, but still trying so fucking hard to get it done. All he can see is the world flying past the windows, the van screeching as it comes flying through the opening, and then there's a deafening crash.

James feels this collision travel through the entire car and all the way through his body, hearing the loud shatter of glass all around him, and then everything jerks to a halt so suddenly his whole frame rattles. His head whips forward on his neck, and the last thing he sees is an explosion of white, and then everything proceeds to go black.

"James!" Remus shouts, utterly frantic as he throws himself at the back doors, staring out the small mesh-holes as the van speeds down the street. The car James took—the back half of it is tucked inside a window display behind him, the front half hanging out. Remus can't see James from this far.

"Go back!" Pandora screeches. "You have to go back!"

"Minerva, turn this fucking van around right now!" Dorcas bellows, rocking with the harsh motion of the vehicle as Minerva takes a sharp turn.

"We can't!" Minerva says harshly. "If we stop now, none of us will make it out, Dorcas! And, in case it escaped your notice, we are currently being chased!"

"Then lose them and go back!" Dorcas snarls.

"I'm trying to lose them!" Minerva snaps. "By the time we do, there won't be anything to go back to. You know that! We have to go, Dorcas. I'm sorry, but we can't go back!"

"We can't leave James!" Remus whirls around and looks at Dorcas. He doesn't know her very well, but she's in charge here, from what he's seen, and she's close to James. He stares at her, and his breathing goes thin when he sees her face twitch before her expression collapses altogether. Her shoulders heave. "No! No, we—we can't leave him. We—"

"We don't have a choice!" Dorcas explodes, her voice cracking, her tone so harsh that many of the servants around her flinch back. "Don't you think I want to go back?! I do, okay? I wanted everyone to make it out, but—but—" Her shoulders jerk again, and the tears in her eyes spill over. "But not everyone could."

Remus wants to snarl at her, and maybe he would, but screams ring out when there's a ping against metal. Everyone instantly ducks down, covering their heads. The van careens around yet another corner, tires screeching, and the gunshots stop.

"They're shooting at us," Pandora wheezes, practically clinging to Rodolphus for dear life.

"Minerva, you need to lose them!" Dorcas calls out.

"Doing my best," Minerva snaps, and then she jerks the wheel again so sharply that everyone in the back goes tumbling over each other, multiple people groaning.

Remus props up to peer out the back to see two cars taking the corner behind them, and he stares for a beat before he lays back. He ends up sprawled out against Dorcas' lap, and she blinks down at him in bemusement. He ignores her and reaches out to grab Rodolphus' leg for leverage, bracing his other hand against the wall of the van. Then, with a huff, he raises his uninjured leg and slams his boot into the steel mesh in the doorframe. It doesn't give, so he kicks it harder.

"What are you doing?" Dorcas asks, audibly alarmed.

"Helping. Us. Lose. Them," Remus grits out, slamming his boot forward on each word, and on the last, the mesh pops out in one corner. He kicks it one more time and watches it fly out.

There's a loud shatter, and Remus jerks up to watch one of the cars take the steel through the window, and the car swerves hard before hitting the side of a building. The other car whips around it, still coming and not slowing down.

Remus rocks with the motion of the van as Minerva takes them off-road rather unexpectedly, but even still, the car continues to follow. With a growl of frustration, Remus reaches out to snatch the gun out of Rodolphus' hands and crawls towards the back window.

This isn't a gun he's ever held before, but he has held one gun at least, so he has a general idea of how this needs to go. He points the gun out the opening and starts shooting.

The car behind them jerks, the glass shattering. Remus can hear the faint scream of the driver inside, but he keeps shooting until the car swerves too hard to one side, the front end dipping and then hitting too fast. The car tilts, gets some air, then flips and skids in a horrible screech of metal.

"There!" Remus spits out furiously, shoving the gun at Rodolphus as everyone gapes at him. He glares at Dorcas and hisses, "We fucking lost them."

"Minerva," Dorcas croaks, "how far out are we?"

"Two minutes," Minerva replies, and Dorcas' eyes sink shut as she slumps down, not saying another word.

The van is quiet. Pandora is crying. Dorcas looks like she's about to fall apart. Huey is gripping the handle up front like his life depends on it. No freed servants speak, and Rodolphus holds onto Pandora and his gun, and Minerva drives. James is not with them. James is left behind.

Remus wants to rip the world apart. As hard as he thinks, he has absolutely no fucking idea how he's going to manage to explain this to Sirius when he sees him again.

"We have to lose them now, Lily!" Sybill shrieks, and the heli-carrier dips low into a dive that makes Lily's stomach lurch. She feels sick. Oh, she feels so fucking sick.

Lily swallows harshly and pushes to her feet, leaning forward to peer at the radar. Still one Hallow Heli-carrier tailing them. Two had come into the arena, one that got Sirius and one that follows them. Too close. It's too close to the Phoenix. Sybill is right; they have to lose it. Now.

Lily stumbles out of the cockpit, chest heaving as she sweeps her gaze over everyone. A lot of the previous tributes look like they're in shock, too fucking stunned by what has happened and what's happening still to really be involved at all. There's Mary still passing out water, Amos helping with injuries, and then Barty. Oh, that's… The mere sight of Barty holding onto Regulus Black makes her heart clench.

Regulus is limp like a rag-doll, staring blankly at nothing. He's not crying anymore. He's not screaming his brother's name, though the sound of that had ripped at Lily, especially as a younger sibling herself. His pain—she felt that.

Now, he's just lying there. Barty has wrapped his arm and simply sits there with him, looking fucking exhausted. Narcissa sits next to Regulus, and she's stroking his hair, murmuring to him, but he doesn't seem to hear her. She seems to understand. She would, wouldn't she? Her older sister is dead. They got them out after the banners played in the sky, so she has to know. Lily just doesn't think she realizes that she's holding the hand of her older sister's murderer.

There's a now-familiar pinging of metal as gunfire rains across the side of their heli-carrier. They're still being shot at, and it's so expected now that no one even flinches. Everyone remains low to the ground and away from the door, just to be safe.

Lily swallows. "Barty."

"Yeah?" Barty mumbles, swiveling his head to stare at her.

"I need you to use the gun," Lily tells him, and then she waits for him to follow her gaze towards the gatling gun. When he does, she looks back at him, waiting.

Slowly, Barty looks at her, and then he grins. "Thought you'd never ask."

"Everyone, stay away from the door!" Lily calls, just as a precaution, and she moves over to grip the handle, waiting for Barty to step up to the gatling gun. It's very big with two large handles to swing it around with. Barty grunts as he swivels it towards the door. "Ready?"

"Ready," Barty assures her, eyes wide with delight, smiling with all teeth and looking young like this, a young boy who likes destruction and has a new toy that will destroy.

Lily gives a nod of warning before she releases the latch and runs the door back, pressing flat against the wall.

The gatling gun makes a whirring noise, the thick barrel starting to turn, and then Barty is doing some odd mixture of a warcry and a cackle as the bullets start ripping free. It's loud. The sheer noise of it makes Lily's ears ring and her teeth ache. Bullets tear through their heli-carrier, and Sybill screams from the cockpit in distress.

The heli-carrier tilts, and people go stumbling and sliding across the floor, including Regulus, who looks like a lifeless puppet as he legitimately just drifts by without even twitching.

Narcissa crawls after him. Someone cries out, and someone else shouts, and Barty is laughing like a madman.

Lily has no idea how long it takes, but whatever arsenal the other heli-carrier has, it doesn't hold a candle to this gun here, because there's eventually an explosion that rocks the very air around them. Sybill shrieks again, and Lily's stomach lurches as the heli-carrier starts to climb. The smell of burnt iron and leaking fuel fills Lily's nose, smoke and heat so heavy from the other heli-carrier that she swears it's strangling her.

The gatling gun whirs to a stop, and Barty stumbles back, quite literally falling to the ground, just sitting there, panting and looking dazed. Lily grips the rail over the doorway and swivels to peer out. She watches, utterly mesmerized, as the Hallow heli-carrier swivels through the sky, a hunk of burning metal that finally crashes to the ground and explodes again.

A hysterical laugh spills out of Lily's mouth, and she slams the door shut, locking the latch. It seems unbearably quiet in the aftermath, and Lily just stands there and shakes until she finds her voice and calls out, "Hey, Sybill, I think we lost them!"

"Yeah, looks like," Sybill chokes out, laughing hysterically along with her.

"ETA?" Lily asks as she heads towards the cockpit.

"Three and a half minutes," Sybill tells her.

"Marlene. Marlene!"

Lily halts and whirls around immediately. Emmeline is kneeling down next to Marlene, who is staring up at her in visible distress. She's trying to speak, but she can't seem to breathe. There's blood on her chest.

"Help! Help, she's been shot!" Emmeline calls out, and Lily rushes over with her heart in her throat. Emmeline's hands are shaking. "I—I don't know what happened. She was—she—"

"Move. Move, I'm a medic!" Lily orders, and Emmeline goes scrambling back until she bumps into Alice, who wraps their arms around her and holds on. Lily reaches for Marlene, her heart thumping hard as she watches Marlene gasp for air, her eyes wide and panicked, blood spilling out over the fingers she has pressed to her chest. "Let me see, let me—"

Marlene is stiff, flat on her back, and she jerks in visible pain every time she tries to move her broken arm. Her own body is fighting against her, instinctively trying to do everything she can to get air into her lungs, but something has gone wrong.

Lily is a flurry of activity around her, barking orders and making demands for what she needs. Amos and Mary run around to get whatever she asks for. Without finesse, Lily rips Marlene's shirt open and pushes the torn fabric aside, her stomach dropping from under her in distress at the sheer amount of blood. It's not through-and-through, Lily can tell that just from the damage. It's internal. She's going to need surgery, and she's going to need it fast.

"Sybill!" Lily shouts. "ETA?!"

"Two minutes!"

"Get us there now!"

"What can I do?" Mary asks, sounding fretful.

"Go to the cockpit and get the phone there. I stole it from Poppy's office, but she has a contact list. Call Kingsley and tell him to tell Poppy to start prepping for emergency surgery," Lily orders, snatching the cloth that Amos brings her and packing it in on Marlene's chest. Mary stands up and darts away. "Amos, get the first aid kit."

"Lily," Amos says, his voice strained as he nods at Marlene.

Lily glances down, and at a minute away from safety, Marlene breathes out and does not breathe back in again. Lily freezes. Marlene has fallen slack. She's. She.

"No," Lily whispers. In seconds, she's swinging her leg over Marlene's hips and straddling her, looking for a pulse and not finding it and then immediately beginning chest compressions with her teeth gritted. "Amos, find me an AED."

"I don't know if we have—"

"Find me a fucking AED!"

At Lily's shriek, Amos scrambles up hastily, and Lily stays with Marlene. She chants it, desperate, come on, Marlene, come on, come on. A steady press of hands to chest, enough force to crack ribs, making her heart continue to beat, circulating the blood that's trying to escape her gunshot wound, and filling her lungs with mouth-to-mouth. Head tilted back, airway cleared, nose plugged and breathe, come on, fucking breathe!

Amos does miraculously procure an AED, and he's there, working around her, because she can't stop. AEDs aren't very hard to use, really. They come with instructions, usually, even if there's never a situation where AEDs are necessary that gives you time to calmly read said instructions, but Amos has enough training to know this.

Lily leans in to cover Marlene's lips with her own, breathing one, two, and then going back to chest compressions. Amos places the defibrillator pads on Marlene's chest, having to shift her bra up on one side for one of them, and then he's making Lily clear, and Lily lifts her hands.

"Nothing," Amos says.

"Again," Lily orders.

Amos lets the AED analyze, then does it again. A beat. Lily's ears are ringing, but she hears him say, "Nothing."

"Again," Lily repeats.

"Lily," Amos murmurs, his voice gentle.

"I said do it again!" Lily shouts, and she doesn't care that with each shock, a person's chances of revival decreases. She doesn't care what this looks like, or seems like. Marlene is not fucking dying here, not like this, not now, not so close, not—

"Nothing," Amos repeats softly.

"Come on, Marlene!" Lily snarls, her eyes hot and sharp with something that burns, and she's angry, so fucking angry. She braces her hands against Marlene's chest and goes right back to compressions, speaking through clenched teeth. "Fuck you, McKinnon. You don't get to do this to her, do you hear me? I can't—I can't love her like she deserves, so you have to. You have to be here! Come on, please!"

"Lily," Amos mutters, "she's dead."

"Shock her again," Lily grits out.

"She's dead," Amos whispers, reaching out to lay his hands over hers. "Stop it, Lily, she's gone."

"No," Lily chokes out, vision blurring. "Shock her again, Amos! Do it! Don't just fucking sit there!"

Amos sighs, watching her with pity, but he dutifully draws his hands back. Lily dips in and breathes for her again, internally pleading that this time, this time, it'll be enough. When she comes back up, Amos shocks her again.

"Holy shit," Amos breathes out a moment later.

"What? What? Is she—"

"She's back."

Lily gasps out a deep breath and a sob all in one, melting forward like all of her strings have been cut at once, and she finds her forehead resting against Marlene's. It's clammy, and Lily is dripping tears on her, but she doesn't care.

"Thank you," Lily whispers. "Thank you, thank you, thank you."

"Come on, Lily, we need to get her on a backboard to carry her out with," Amos urges, bursting into motion.

Lily peels back with shaking hands and fumbles for the ring on her finger. It's slick with blood and slips back onto Marlene's finger with ease, where it belongs.

"Alright, everyone!" Sybill calls out from the cockpit, her voice warm with triumph. "I'm bringing us home!"

Severus puts his car in park and eases the door open. When he steps out, glass and gravel crackles under his shoe, and it continues to do so with each step as he shuts his car door.

"Sir?"

"Let me see," Severus murmurs, moving past the group of Aurors surrounding the car hanging out the shop window.

The back half looks like a crumpled can, warped metal and glass shards everywhere. The front half is practically untouched, and Severus can't help but think that some deity or higher force that exists out there—if it does—is very partial to James Potter. Something is certainly looking out for him.

Well, mostly. Severus walks around the front of the car and peers through the window. Inside, Potter is slumped against a deflated airbag, body slack against the wheel. There's a tiny cut on his head, above his eyebrow, and his glasses are smashed in his lap. He looks fine otherwise.

He could be dead. Severus can't tell if he's breathing. For Potter's sake, Severus hopes he is dead.

Sighing, Severus reaches out and grabs the door handle. He has to yank on it a little to get it to open, and then it does. Potter does not stir. Severus reaches in and feels for a pulse.

Alive.

Severus almost pities the poor bastard.

"Sir?" is asked yet again.

For a long moment, Severus doesn't respond. He stares at Potter and rather hates him. Everything started falling apart because of him, really. Because he threatened to drink some venom for love. After that, it was utter chaos. Severus hasn't really had a moment of rest since.

Severus can't resist sneering at him. The last thing this war needs is an incompetent fool ruining everything without even trying. Potter simply exists, and he causes problems. He speaks when he shouldn't and acts without thinking. A fool. The worst kind of fool. One who has influence.

Tonight has been… Severus doesn't even have a word for it. He was notified early about the dispatch of Aurors to the arena in the endeavor to retrieve tributes before the opposition could. The Order, Severus presumes, but Albus never notified him of this. Albus doesn't notify him of everything as a man caught in the middle of two sides, because he won't risk it, so it is entirely possible that this was planned.

Severus doesn't think so, however. He looks at Potter like this and thinks that, somehow, he was behind this. Severus can give credit where it's due. If Potter was behind it, he did very well. All tributes liberated except for one. Mm, that one, though. Sirius Black. Another wrench in this war, and Riddle will be utilizing him, of course. Severus doesn't doubt it.

If Riddle is going to use Black, he will surely find some way to turn Potter into his weapon, too. After tonight, there is no possible way Riddle will be ignorant to the brewing war, and not only that, but also the fact that there is opposition. The Order was a secret organization, but it won't be any longer. Riddle may not know all the details yet, but he will surely do what it takes to learn them, and regardless, he will know that the Order is out there. He will be prepared for it now.

You fool, Severus thinks as he stares at Potter in disdain.

What does Potter know? Does he know anything? That's not a risk Severus is willing to take. Black most certainly doesn't, but Potter just might. Riddle will want to get information from him, or he'll figure out how to use him, or both. Either way, Severus doesn't plan to let that happen, if he can help it.

This is a liability that needs to be dealt with now. So, Severus pulls out his gun and puts it against Potter's head. Still, Potter does not stir. This is a kindness, really. He is a fool, but a dead fool can do no further damage.

Just as Severus goes to pull the trigger, there's the sound of a car door opening, and Riddle says, "Do not shoot him."

Severus closes his eyes, only for a second, and then he pulls his gun down and turns around. Riddle does not drive. He has his own personal driver, a man who holds open his door and shuts it after him as he gets out and walks closer. Glass and debris crunches under his shiny shoes.

Riddle comes to a halt next to Severus, cold eyes surveying Potter thoughtfully. All the other Aurors on scene shift nervously, just from Riddle's mere presence. Severus remains still, just waiting, not saying a word.

"Though he has caused quite the mess, James Potter is more useful to me alive than dead," Riddle declares, and Severus finds that he can hate Potter more, after all. "Get him out and have him escorted to my castle."

"Not Azkaban, sir?" Severus asks.

"No," Riddle murmurs. "Not Azkaban. Sirius Black is being held there for now. James Potter will remain close to me."

"Yes, sir," Severus says.

Riddle is silent for a beat, and then he reaches out and cups his hand to Potter's forehead, pushing his head back to peer at him. Potter does stir, then. Only a bit. His face twitches, lips moving, and he whispers, "Reg."

Riddle's lip curls in distaste, and he drops Potter's head, letting it hang forward again. He steps back. "Severus."

"Yes, sir?" Severus murmurs.

"Clean this up," Riddle orders, swiveling a finger to gesture to the street; as he walks away, he adds, "and prepare for war."

Chapter End Notes

for those of you coming to the end notes for a more in depth warning, SPOILERS AHEAD: there's a couple of really heavy moments in this chapter, and ill go in order. the first person who dies in this chapter is lucius, killed by remus from within his cell. after that, frank is killed by a gunshot to the head, and james does not handle it well. in the moment, it's so sudden, and he can't really make sense of it, so he sort of jumps back and forth between understanding that frank is dead and not really understanding it at all. he also goes into shock, which leads him to respond a little strangely to the whole situation (he doesn't really process it, honestly), and it also leads him to make some...questionable decisions. he learns that sirius is left behind in the hallow and fixates on saving him, stealing a car and resulting in a car crash after. following this, lily and the others are still being followed by a hallow heli-carrier, and they have to lose it, so they shoot it out of the sky. in the midst of this, marlene is shot, and she (BRIEFLY!!!) dies, but lily and amos manage to revive her right before they make it back to the phoenix, meaning she'll be able to get emergency surgery.

yeah, that about sums up the heavier parts of this one as concisely as possible.

to everyone else:

well...at least remus made it out, right? 😃

ooooh, i know yall are mad at me. i KNOW it. i can just feel it through the screen already. oof, yall are gonna rip me to shreds for this one 😭 but, ya know, just a gentle reminder, if you're not enjoying the fic, or you just need to tap out, then definitely don't hesitate to drop the story! thats okay! that's valid!!!

anyway, let's get into it.

the fun little stairwell montage where everyone was being badasses. dorcas has killed people now! heh, she's killing it out there :D

okay, bad joke, sorry.

remus is ALSO killing it out there (and i made the joke again, someone shoot ME). no, but him literally just itching to murder that man. like, if you recall, lucius was the one bribing gamemakers to focus on hurting sirius (and regulus) in the arena, so yeah remus busted his head open and snapped his neck, especially since he had to listen to lucius bitching. like he was annoying. i don't blame remus, and i better not see one person being shocked by remus just killing him either; ive been TELLING yall from day one that his motto is be gay, do crime. murder is a crime. but anyway, i support remus' rights and also his wrongs!

cut to james. oh, baby. this poor man. it's so... god, how fucking awful is that? like that line about "he saved eleven extra people just to lose one friend" is so ROUGH, because it's true. realistically, had he only saved remus and not all the other servants, they would have all made it out to the garage faster, and frank would have lived... also rip frank—alice and augusta's boggart was foreshadowing btw.

but like, james couldn't NOT try to save anyone. and how he was so ready to see regulus again, but then he heard about sirius... gut-wrenching. like, if it wasn't clear, he was in a state of shock and very fucking overwhelmed, already struggling with frank, and the need to get sirius (or simply try, he's always trying, isn't he?) wasn't something he could escape. and the worst part is that he wasn't just doing it for himself or sirius, but regulus and remus too. like he was trying for ALL of them, because in that moment, he genuinely couldn't look at it through the lens of leaving anyone. :(

that scene of remus pleading with him to get in the van, and then the car crash and everyone pleading to go back, and dorcas breaking down bc she was the leader and had to make the calls and knew they couldn't go back? just. devastating.

oh, and marlene. well, that was rough, huh? it was a close call, but lily is all of us refusing to give up on marlene. like she MEANT marlene wasn't dying 😭 she's so valid for that actually. sorry if it scared you, marlene is still alive and kicking!

severus. not him looking at james and just instantly hating him and deciding to kill him because he's a menace 😭 but well. james is in the hallow, too. big yikes 😬 yeah, so that peeta storyline? it's about to get reallyyyy complex.

HONORABLE MENTIONS:

-pandora punching someone, crying, then trying to claw their face off. she's going through a lot 😔
-james trying to get frank to move 😭
-rodolphus carried, sorry its just the facts
-remus being hot and sexy during the whole time, but especially the car chase
-barty getting to use the gun!
-regulus sliding across the floor like a ragdoll and narcissa crawling after him 😭
-sirius being in azkaban (i couldn't NOT)
-someone looking out for james (hi, its me, im the problem)
-james whispering "reg" 😭

There's a welcoming committee at the Phoenix when they arrive. Mary barely gets to kick out the ramp while Lily, Amos, Emmeline, and Alice carry out Marlene before there's a flurry of people rushing forward to meet them, a stretcher waiting.

Everyone is talking all at once, and the transition to get Marlene on the stretcher is quick. Poppy climbs on the side and immediately starts working over her as people roll them away. Lily starts to go with them, as do a lot of people, but they're all halted and blocked.

Lily's stopped by Kingsley, his hand against her shoulder. Their eyes meet, and she still feels sick, a sensation that only grows worse when she sees how he's looking at her.

"Kingsley," Lily rasps, "you have to let me go. I need to—"

"What you need to do is stop," Kingsley declares sharply, his voice loud enough that everything sort of just—does stop. Well, central to here. Off to the side, a very injured Asher is being carted off towards the infirmary, and there are a few other people lingering that bustle around to check on the remaining tributes. But, right here, close to them, everything falls silent. "What the hell were you thinking?"

"Look, I know you're upset—"

"I'm not just upset, Evans! You—"

"This wasn't me!" Lily bursts out, shaking his hand off her shoulder as she glares at him. "Dorcas was the one who—"

"Oh, don't feed me that bullshit," Kingsley snaps. "You may not have come up with the idea to break into the arena, but you threw this mission together. You rounded everyone up and gave them something to do. You decided to carry out a mission not cleared or approved. You led them through it."

"Kingsley—"

"We gathered everyone involved, and do you know what they all had in common? Hm? You. It was you. So, don't stand there and tell it wasn't when it was. You broke every rule and put multiple people in danger, including Sybill!"

"I'm—I'm fine. Kingsley, I'm fine, see?" Sybill stutters out as she stumbles forward, but he doesn't even look at her.

"Do you have any idea what you've done?" Kingsley hisses, never taking his gaze off of Lily. "You think your mission was a success? You just helped bring upon war, and you didn't just put yourself in the middle of it. No, you dragged them into it, too. Sybill could have died."

"But I didn't. I'm fine. Kingsley, I'm—I'm really fine, and I did good. I'm actually really proud. You should have seen—"

"Stop talking, Sybill."

"Really, King," Sybill insists, "I'm an amazing pilot. I was—"

"Stop talking, Sybill!" Kingsley bellows, and Sybill snaps her mouth shut, her eyes instantly getting bright. Kingsley focuses on Lily again. "Don't you get it? She's in this now, because of you. They'll use her now that they know what she can do. That's how it works here. She'll be in the sky when war comes, do you realize that? A war pilot. You made her into a fucking war pilot, and if she dies, if she gets hurt, that's on you."

"That's enough," Mary bursts out, moving forward abruptly and getting right in Kingsley's face with no warning whatsoever and not an ounce of fear. "You don't know what the fuck you're talking about. You weren't there."

"No, I wasn't," Kingsley agrees coldly, not reacting to Mary at all, his gaze still locked on Lily.

"Kingsley," Lily whispers, a lump in her throat, "I'm sorry. I needed a pilot, and—and I could trust Sybill. I—"

"But you couldn't trust me?!" Kingsley bursts out, flinging both arms to the side. "You asked nearly every other fucking person in this bunker for help and didn't think to come to me?"

"Would you have helped?" Lily croaks helplessly, raising her hands and letting them drop to her sides. Her eyes are stinging and it shouldn't hurt, this shouldn't hurt so much, because Kingsley wasn't supposed to matter to her. No one was. "I mean it, King. Be honest. If I had come to you, would you have helped me with this, or got in my way?"

Kingsley drops his arms and stares at her, exhaling a huff of air like she just punched him in the chest. "All you had to do was ask. Because I'm your friend. Maybe you don't care about things like that, but I do. And, if not for you, then for her. I took the same piloting courses, and I would have done it for her, so she could be safe. Because I love her. But you don't know anything about that either, do you?"

Lily feels that like a punch to the chest. Again, it shouldn't hurt as much as it does, because it's true, right? This is who she is. This is who she'll always be now. She tries so fucking hard to shut it down, to not care, but she's so tired and she's shaking and her face is hot and her eyes are stinging—

"You're a fucking fool if you think she doesn't care about people," Mary says sharply, reaching out and jabbing Kingsley in the chest. "She nearly fucking died to save people she doesn't even know. She refused to give up on someone just because her friend loves that person. She kept Sybill as calm as she could and was there for her every single step of the way. No one—and I mean no one, not one of us—would have made it back here alive if it wasn't for her."

"No one would have been at risk of dying if it wasn't for her," Kingsley bites out, and Lily flinches.

"Kingsley, stop it," Sybill says urgently, moving towards him and reaching out to grab his arm, tears in her eyes. "You're just—you're scared, that's all. And we all are, but—but today was a win. We saved lives, King. I helped save lives. I did something amazing. I flew."

Kingsley looks at her, finally, and his jaw clenches as he eases his arm out of her grip. "Why didn't you come to me? Lily is one thing, Sybill, but you—what? You didn't trust me?"

"No. I mean yes! Yes, of course I trust you, but—but Lily said… She said…" Sybill swallows. "I just wanted to help, and I—I did help. I know you're worried, but it's okay. It's really okay, because I'm good at it, Kingsley. I'm a good pilot, and I know that you like that I wasn't involved in missions, and that I was safe here, but why shouldn't I do this if I can? And I can."

"Yeah, you proved that," Kingsley whispers, his expression twisting. "He'll use that. He'll use you."

Sybill reaches for him again, but he takes a step back. She looks close to tears. "I'm sorry I didn't tell you, okay? I wanted to. I felt horrible that I didn't, but you—you don't have to be alone in this. I'm with you, yeah? I—I learned that today, that we're dating. We're a team, right?"

"You just learned that today?" Kingsley breathes out, looking utterly astonished. "What—Sybill—"

"You never said it, and I—I didn't know, but it's okay, because I know now," Sybill says in a rush. "I know now, and I'm sorry I didn't tell you. I'm sorry I didn't know. But I know this now, that I love you too, and so I'm telling you because we learn something new every day, and I want you to learn this today. I want you to know I love you."

"What I learned today is that, evidently, we're not a team," Kingsley tells her. His voice is usually so smooth, even, steady and calm. Now, it cracks. "You proved that today, too. And I can't, Sybill. I can't do this with you. Not like this. Not when you don't—not when you're going to—I just can't—"

"Are you breaking up with me?" Sybill chokes out, staring at him with wide, wet eyes. Lily's heart clenches, because she looks fucking pitiful.

"Yeah. Yeah, I uh—I am." Kingsley reaches up to swipe a hand over his mouth, shaking his head, eyes squeezing shut as he takes another step away. Lily's heart gives a second harsh clench, because he looks just as pitiful as Sybill does. His hand drops and his eyes open. He looks at Sybill and shakes his head again. "Shouldn't be too much of an adjustment for you, should it? You didn't even know we were dating."

"Kingsley," Sybill whispers.

"I have to go," Kingsley says. "Thanks to all of you, I have a lot of fucking work to do."

With that and nothing else, Kingsley turns around and marches away, and he doesn't look back. Lily moves the moment she sees Sybill's shoulders hitch, wrapping her up in a hug and holding her as she releases a gut-wrenching, audibly heartbroken sob into Lily's shoulder.

"I'm sorry," Lily rasps. She raises her gaze and looks around at everyone before, finally, her eyes meet Mary's. And, really, that's all she can say. "I'm sorry."

Euphemia rushes as quickly as she can through the bustling crowds, breathing heavily as she pushes past multiple people with Andromeda hot on her heels. Nymphadora is with Bingley and a few of the older kids that made it out of the district, all of them eager to see those coming in, but staying put when the adults tell them to.

Fleamont is gripping Euphemia's hand tight, and she knows he must feel as desperate as she does to get where they're going. It feels like they've been barreling down corridors for years since being told they can go to the infirmary to check on their loved ones. So far, only those from the arena have made it back, but that means Sirius and Regulus are here.

It's mayhem throughout the compound, people rushing about, everyone chattering and shouting and speculating. It's even more chaotic near the infirmary. Apparently, there were a couple of tributes who needed severe medical attention, and Euphemia selfishly hopes it's not Sirius or Regulus.

Getting through the crowd is a difficult task, but they do, and then it's hard to pick out everyone lined up in chairs outside of the infirmary. Tributes, clearly. People are bustling around them, tending to their cut arms, giving water and food and blankets. A lot of them look tense and overwhelmed, and Euphemia has to resist the urge to tell everyone to back off.

These people are well-meaning, but they don't know what it's like. They don't understand how the arena affects someone; these people are still in survival mode, likely in shock from being rescued as well, and Euphemia thinks it's a miracle no one has lashed out yet.

Helplessly, Euphemia pushes forward, scanning the rows of people to locate who she's looking for. Sirius and Regulus, Sirius and Regulus, Sirius and—Regulus. Just Regulus. He's sitting at the end next to his older cousin, Narcissa Malfoy, who is fussing with the person who is invading their space, trying to force them to drink water. Regulus isn't acknowledging them. The poor boy is quite blatantly in a state of shock, his hands sitting limp in his lap, gaze blank as he stares straight ahead.

No Sirius. Euphemia looks around for him, even though she doesn't doubt Sirius would stay with Regulus if he could, so maybe he's one of the tributes that arrived in critical condition? Euphemia's heart drops at the thought.

Andromeda pushes forward and halts in front of them, her breath audibly catching in her throat. She's looking at her sister. Euphemia knows through Sirius, and just from being around for all the drama, that Andromeda has a very strained relationship with her sisters. But does that matter in situations such as this? Does that matter when she has lost her husband, and watched her older sister be killed by her youngest cousin, and spent years surely missing her sisters regardless of the strife that existed from them all falling apart in the first place? Does it matter, here, when stakes are so high, and years have passed, and war is splitting the world apart?

"Cissy," Andromeda croaks.

Narcissa's head snaps up, and Euphemia doesn't think it matters at all, not right now. "Andy?"

There's a moment where everything seems to freeze for both of them, and then Narcissa pushes to her feet, takes one very frantic step forward, and halts just as abruptly as she moved. Euphemia knows Narcissa only as her mentor, a young woman who never spoke out of turn, who observed everything with calculating eyes, who found the best ways to make fools out of everyone who believed she wouldn't, and believed she couldn't. To Euphemia, Narcissa was more dangerous than Bellatrix; far past Bellatrix, who simply had no reservations about slaughter, there was Narcissa, who wasn't just in the hunger games; no, she played the game, and she played it well, so well that Euphemia never doubted she would win.

Standing across from one another, it's just Narcissa and Andromeda now, and Narcissa left home. It's been years. They stand apart from each other like those years have cleaved their sisterhood in two, as if they will never find it again.

Euphemia doesn't believe that. She has seen the way Regulus and Sirius have put so much effort into getting back what they lost, and they did. It can happen, and it always seems to start with a simple need outweighing resentment and pride.

Sometimes, really, the one thing you need is your flesh and blood. Not everyone is fortunate enough to have that, like those who will never be able to have family again, even when they need them. Not everyone has flesh and blood that will reach back like the instinct it should be when you reach for them. Not everyone has flesh and blood that needs you, too.

But Andromeda is a mother to a child who will never see her father again. Andromeda is a sister to a woman who tried to kill her cousin, and was killed by her other cousin in front of her eyes, on screen. Andromeda is a sister to another woman who stands before her now, tentative and waiting, years upon years of flesh and blood and family echoing across the space between them. Andromeda is a human who is surrounded by other humans, and the world is on fire, and it doesn't surprise Euphemia at all that she is the one who opens her arms first.

Narcissa practically flies into them. She exhales sharply and moves forward swiftly, a tight embrace that they both fall into. Simple sisterhood. Because, at the end of the day, sometimes people need each other, and that's what matters, and they're very fortunate to have flesh and blood they can hold onto.

"Bella," Narcissa chokes out. "Andy, she—she's gone. She's—"

"I know," Andromeda says, voice heavy. "I know. I'm here, Cissy, I'm here."

Euphemia tugs on Fleamont's hand, easing them past the pair, leaving them to their reunion. Regulus hasn't moved or even looked anywhere. He's just sitting there and staring.

"Regulus," Euphemia says softly, carefully kneeling down in front of him while Fleamont takes the open space next to him that Narcissa just vacated. Regulus doesn't acknowledge either of them, likely doesn't even know that they're there, or where he is. His gaze is unfocused. Gently, cautiously, Euphemia reaches out to cover Regulus' hands in his lap. "Regulus, dear, it's Effie. Can you hear me?"

The light touch does make his hands twitch, and then Regulus blinks and looks at her. She can see his eyes actually focus on her. "Oh," he rasps. "Hello, Effie."

"Hi, honey," Euphemia whispers, unable to stop her voice from shaking, or keep the sting from building in her eyes. She wants to wrap him in her arms and shield him from this world, all the horrible, cruel edges of it.

"You're here," Regulus states, sounding startled, and then he blinks again and exhales in relief. "You're safe."

"Yes, and so are you," Euphemia murmurs.

Regulus swallows. "Monty? Where's—"

"I'm right here," Fleamont murmurs, and Regulus jolts a little, swiveling to stare at him right beside him. It's clear he has no spatial awareness at the moment, yet he releases another sigh of relief when he sees Fleamont.

"I know you're very confused right now, and a lot is going on, but is—do you know if Sirius is in the infirmary?" Euphemia asks, not wanting to overwhelm him further, but needing to get an understanding of the whole situation so she knows how to suitably reassure him—and herself.

"No," Regulus says. "Sirius is—" His voice catches, and he blinks again, and then he's whipping his head back and forth between Fleamont and Euphemia with pure horror painted on his face. Euphemia's heart immediately drops. "Oh no. No, I—I didn't—where is James? I want to see him. Can I see him? Please let me see him. Is he here? Tell me he's—"

"Not yet," Euphemia croaks. "Not yet, but he—he should be arriving soon, Regulus. He'll be here soon. You said—is Sirius not—Regulus, where is—where—"

Euphemia is trying so, so very hard. She truly is. Because she can feel it, somehow, in her weary bones that rattle like she's about to malfunction and fall apart. It's there, lodged in her throat like a knife, where is my son? Where are my children? All my children, all those that I have fed, and loved, and watched grow? Regulus is right here, and where, where, where is Sirius?

She can see it there, in the collapse of his expression, the awful tremble of his lips and building tears in his eyes. He's clinging to her hands suddenly, as if he's afraid she will pull away from him, but she won't. She never would have in all the years she has known him, but he was always the one to shy away from her grip. She wanted to hold him as any mother would wish to hold a child that needed it, but he only ever wanted that from Sirius. It's like this, that he turns to her, and Euphemia knows immediately, just that simply, that Sirius isn't here.

He isn't, because if he was, that's who Regulus would cling to; that's the only person he ever wanted to cling to.

"No," Euphemia chokes out reflexively, because no. No, not this, not Sirius, not that lovely boy with the grin that could light up the world, not her lovely boy who clung to her after he left the arena at sixteen years old, so young and so upset to have ever raised a hand against her, crying in her arms and chanting the apology mindlessly; I'm sorry, Mum, I'm sorry. That was the first time he called her that, and the last was with an apology, too, always with an apology when he addresses her this way, like he has to apologize for the imposition of being her son, when it's one of the things she's most proud of.

"I'm sorry, Effie," Regulus says, shaking, and he will never address her as anything else, certainly not as Mother. He could be married to James for fifty years and still never say it, because the only mothers he's ever known or allowed himself to accept are Walburga and Sirius, and Euphemia has known that as long as she has known him. She loves him, regardless, and knows, in his own way, Regulus loves her, too. "I'm so sorry. I—I tried to—I begged them to wait, to go back, but they couldn't. They—they couldn't, because the—the Hallows got him. The Hallows got Sirius. I—I'm sorry. I didn't—"

Euphemia's whole body is numb, and she can't—she can't even separate herself from the shock of it, from how hard it hits her. Sirius. Oh, Sirius. She did everything, absolutely everything she could, to save him. To help him. To love him. He is not flesh and blood—doesn't even look like her, pale boy that he is—but she did not have to birth him for him to have a home in her heart. She doesn't mean to, but the shock of it slackens her grip, and she doesn't want to let go of Regulus, not even for a moment, but she can't feel anything. Can't breathe. Can't—

"I'm sorry," Regulus gasps out, fretful, almost frantic in the way he winds his fingers around her hands and squeezes, desperate and wide-eyed. It's like he thinks it's his fault. Like she is blaming him, and he doesn't want her to. She is not and never would. "If it could have been me, if they just—if they picked him up before me, if the Hallows got me instead—"

"No," Fleamont cuts in fiercely, so sharply that both Regulus and Euphemia jolt. Euphemia is so thankful for him, because he is picking up her slack, because he can step in when she fails to and be strong when she can't. It's an exchange, an unspoken partnership that requires nothing but instinct. She has done it for him, and he can do it for her now, because she needs him to. "No, Regulus, don't think that way. No one wishes it had been you instead."

"I wish it had been me instead," Regulus confesses, his chest stuttering. "Not him. Not my—he's my brother. He's—"

The moment Regulus breaks down sobbing, Fleamont eases an arm around him and pulls him close, a big man with big feelings and a big need to nurture. Euphemia has always been maternal like a bear, dangerous about it, claws and teeth and ready to swing for those she loves, still fighting all these decades on the other side of the arena. Fleamont, though?

He's more gentle than she is, always has been, very rarely one to lash out about anything. Over the years, Euphemia has learned how to be soft; over the years, Fleamont has been forced into being harsh—a remote shattering against the wall, tossed with the strength of a man who is strong enough to be her rock, but not strong enough to remain steady when trapped with the guaranteed loss of someone he loves. Trapped even now, because they knew, didn't they?

They all knew only one could make it out, and Sirius wasn't going to be the one who did, except more than one has, and Sirius is the only one who didn't.

How does someone accept that? How do they live with that? How are they meant to continue on in the aftermath of that?

There's a reason, here, in the form of Regulus Black, who sinks into Fleamont while weeping, a man he has never considered a father and never will, because that was Sirius for him, too. Sirius and Orion, and he has now lost both.

Euphemia's eyes itch, and she squeezes them shut, forcing her trembling fingers to wrap around Regulus' once more and cling to him as he clings to her. She dips her head and presses her face against their tangled hands, shoulders heaving. A warm hand settles into her hair; Fleamont, she would know him anywhere, through anything.

He strokes her hair, and they cry.

They all cry.

Remus is quiet on the train.

Well, they're all quiet on the train, honestly. He has somehow collected a flock of recently freed servants, all of which hover close to him and look to him for what to do. Maybe that's fair, considering he was the one who coaxed each of them into fleeing in the first place, so fucking grateful that James is the kind of man he is to think of them all. Not just Remus.

The thing is, Remus knows these people. Adjacently. Sort of. He knows their eyes, knows part of their faces from seeing them each morning and each night when entering and exiting their cells. He knows that look in their eyes, that guarded sort of fear for every move they make. He knows how they feel right now, sort of lost and overwhelmed by an unburdening none of them were prepared for. They all have the same injury on their thighs, all suffered the same pain to take the freedom each of them were utterly terrified to claim for themselves.

Some of them are older than him. Some are younger. Each of them linger close by like he's the only comfort they have in all of this, like he's the only thing that makes sense, like they trust him before they trust anyone else.

Pandora sits next to Dorcas and Huey, staring down at her shoes without really seeming present at all. She has James' cane draped across her lap, trembling hands wrapped around it; she refused to leave it behind with the van. Dorcas is next to Minerva, her jaw clenched and one leg jumping up and down restlessly. Minerva is calm, watchful, sweeping her gaze over everyone like she's checking that they're all there. Rodolphus won't stop fidgeting, his hands seeming empty now that he dumped his gun on Dorcas' orders when they all left the van and boarded the train.

All Remus can think about is James. Is he alive? Did he die in that car wreck? If he didn't, has he been captured? What will happen to him? What is Remus supposed to say to Sirius? How is he supposed to explain that he tried, he really did, but James was left behind anyway? What about—

The train abruptly comes to a creaking halt, and everyone looks up at the same time. No one moves for a moment, but then Dorcas shoves to her feet, eyes bright.

"Alright, everyone, listen up," Dorcas says, and her voice carries, draws all the attention to her. "We've arrived at the Phoenix, but we aren't the first today. A large group coming out of the arena are already here, and I don't doubt they'll all need medical attention of some sort, along with the rush-job of having to get them unexpectedly settled in. It's the same situation with all of you."

She looks around with a grimace of apology, and Remus tries not to grind his teeth. He finds it very difficult not to resent her, or Minerva, for leaving James behind. Maybe Remus will just field all of Sirius' questions straight to her. She's his friend, right? Remus will let her explain what happened, because even now, he still doesn't have the answers.

"I know that many of you are confused, and scared, and in pain," Dorcas continues, her voice softening. "I would like to tell you that you'll have immediate comforts and ready accommodations waiting on you, but that would be a lie. This was not a planned mission, and the Phoenix is not ready for you, so those things will take a little time. I don't know how long, but you will have someone to help you at some point, if you'll just be patient. It's going to be very, very busy inside, and loud, and chaotic. We will all be heading towards the infirmary together, so stay close. Anyone who approaches or offers help—they will not hurt you. I promise you, you're safe here. All of you are safe now."

Dorcas and Minerva lead the group inside, and saying it would be busy was an understatement. The place is crawling with activity, people rushing around, loud shouts and orders flying about in all directions. It's utter mayhem.

The Phoenix is massive. They come out in an underground train port that leads further into a large wing for the bunker, and Remus is immediately overwhelmed by the sheer amount of everything. So many people, so many levels, so many halls. So much movement, so much noise, so much space. It's a lot, and it's stifling. The air is stale, and either Remus is just going crazy, or there really is less oxygen in the metal hub beneath the earth. It's artificial light and the low background whir of generators, and all Remus can think is that it's another prison.

"Meadowes!" a loud voice booms.

"Not now, Kingsley," Dorcas retorts, still marching along as she leads the charge through the crowded hall.

The man—Kingsley—looks absolutely furious. He falls into step beside Dorcas and starts hissing at her in low tones. Remus watches, eyebrows furrowed, but Dorcas doesn't let anything slow her down. They're a large group of people hobbling along, all helping each other continue on. Everyone is following her, following the leader, and anyone else who would dare to try and take over wouldn't get very far.

Regardless of Remus' issues with James being left behind, he has to admit that he feels a sense of gratitude, possibly, for Dorcas. Because it's very clear to him now that this mission was hers all the way around, and not one that came from someone in charge here. She's—in trouble? She risked a lot, then, to do this? Remus can admire that, if nothing else.

"I don't care, King!" Dorcas bursts out as they take a corner, yet again running right into more chaos. "Dumbledore is just going to have to wait, or he can fucking meet me here!"

"Dorcas," Minerva says carefully.

"No," Dorcas grits out. "Marlene first. Fuck anything else."

Remus raises his eyebrows. Clearly Dorcas is not fucking around, which everyone else seems to pick up on as well, because Kingsley stops berating her and Minerva quietly sighs and looks away. Remus also looks away, surveying the current activity around him, distracted by it.

Some people watch as they come by, mouths hanging open, eyes wide. Other people don't even seem to notice them, far too wrapped up in rushing to do whatever it is they're doing. People go by in blurs of faces, none that Remus can really look at, all of his senses flooded at once.

They take another corner, and Remus hears her before he sees her. That's what registers first. The sound of her voice. He knows her voice, even without hearing it for so long.

Lily.

Remus comes to a very abrupt halt, his heart seeming to stop in his chest for a second, because he wasn't—he didn't even think to prepare himself for this. He can hear her in the distance, up ahead somewhere. Whatever she's saying is indistinct, but harsh, and his heart thumps with I know you, I know it's you, I know it is, I know, I know, I know—

Breath punching out of him, Remus surges forward without finesse, shoving forward and pushing people mindlessly, carelessly aside. Someone calls after him. He does not care. Nothing matters. Nothing else matters, not the ache in his thigh, or the pressure in his lungs. Nothing, nothing, nothing matters but getting to her now, immediately. It's Lily. It's—

"—don't give a shit what he wants!" Lily is saying, the words catching above the crowd and reaching Remus' ears, coated in fury and still the sweetest thing he's ever heard. Remus shoves his way forward desperately, choking on air, and there she is. Oh, there she is. It's her. It is, she's right there, glaring with flushed cheeks and looking—she looks—it's been six years, and she looks different, but she's Lily. She's his best friend, right there, so close. "I already told you—"

"You can't just bypass this, Evans," says the man she's currently yelling at. "You don't get to decide what the priority is after breaking countless rules to—"

"Oh, get fucked, Bones," Lily snarls, and Remus tries to say her name, tries to call for her, but he can't breathe, so all that escapes him is a choked wheeze. "I'll cooperate when I've spoken to Poppy and checked on—"

"You'll cooperate now," comes the sharp reply, and oh, they don't know her at all, do they? Remus could laugh. He thinks he does, a bit, and maybe he cries as well as he squirms between bodies and edges towards the front, so fucking close to breaking free and entering her line of sight. "Even an unsanctioned mission needs a debrief!"

"You want a fucking debrief?" Lily scoffs, and Remus stumbles out of the crowd just as she harshly announces, "I went in and got all the tributes out that I could, and the only one I didn't get is Sirius Black. The Hallows got him, so he's likely dead."

Remus jolts to a stop, frozen in place, and any chance of him getting to breathe again is promptly snatched from him.

The whole world proceeds to stop.

There is a sound, a noise like a wounded animal, raw and gutted. Lily tears her eyes away from Edgar to instinctively locate it, not recognizing it, and curiosity is human nature.

So, she looks.

Lily looks and then has to do a sharp double-take, because the illusion before her in the form of her long-dead best friend is so fucking clear that the rest of the world drains away in an instant. Her mind goes blank. It just—empties out, all at once.

Remus. Remus? It's—that's Remus. That's him standing there, right here at the mouth of the corridor leading towards the infirmary, crowded with people too nosy for their own good, everyone eager to help and get information about what has happened. Nothing ever happens here, not like this.

Lily has no idea what's happening here, not anymore. Nothing makes sense, all of a sudden, because that's Remus. That's her best friend, alive and breathing. That's him, dressed in washed out grey with a scar across his face she has never seen before in her life, tall yet hunched a little like he's taking a blunt object directly to the chest. He looks alive, and the look on his face says that, inexplicably, he does not wish to be.

He's in clear distress. That much is obvious. The last time Lily saw Remus, he was pushing a gun into her hands and telling her to run, everything falling apart around them both. The way he looks now, it's as if they're right back there, as if the world as they know it is coming crumbling down again.

But he's alive. He has to be, because other people are looking at him, too. Other people see him, and so he can't be an illusion. That's Remus. It's Remus, right there, and Lily does not know what is wrong, but she doesn't need to.

"Remus?" Lily breathes out, and nothing else matters except for the fact that he moves. He reaches up to press a hand over his mouth, an awful noise muffled against his palm, and that's it. That's all it takes.

Nothing makes sense, and nothing matters, and Lily is running. She breaks away from everyone else without a care in the world, flying across the open space between them to close it, to cut it down and never let it form again. It feels like years and only seconds before she slams into him with a choked noise, wheezing as they collide.

Six years it's been since she's wrapped her arms around her best friend, and yet they still fit.

Lily can't even describe the feeling that travels through her body. The sensation of it. Shock and fear and relief. Joy. There is so much joy in this moment for her. She is crying, one hand coming up to cup the back of his head, arms locked around him tight—and he does not hug her back.

He's slack against her, heaving for breath, and Lily chokes around a sob as she tightens her grip. She wants to shake him a little, make him hold onto her and never let her go again, make him understand the miracle that this moment is. He has to know. How can he not know?

"No," Remus croaks, and his hands brace on her arms, pushing her back. His fingers tremble on her skin, and he's searching her face desperately, something there in his expression that's pleading with her, but Lily doesn't know what it means. She has never not known what he was saying when he looked at her until now. So much they could share in an exchanged look, long ago, and now she can't follow the conversation. "No, that's not—that isn't possible. Sirius? He's—you said you didn't get him out. Tell me—Lily, please—"

Lily stares at him, shell-shocked, confused. She doesn't understand. "Sirius Black? No, we—we didn't manage to get him before the Hallows. Why? Did you know him?"

Whatever response Lily was expecting from Remus, it's not for his legs to buckle as a low moan of pure pain slips from his mouth. He goes down to his knees right in front of everyone, right there in front of her, and his hands slip down to her sides, fists clenching her shirt and tugging on her fretfully as he ducks his head into her stomach and breaks down crying.

Alarm threads through Lily, turning the blood in her veins to ice, her heart thudding painfully in her chest as she stares down at Remus with wide eyes. She doesn't have the answers, but she doesn't need them, not for this. She does what her love for him demands her to, dropping down right there with him and dragging him close, trying to breathe past the harsh pinch in her chest. He's releasing the most devastating, heartbroken sobs she has ever heard, more pain-filled even than the gasps and sobs that were ripped from him when he was whipped and beaten down time-and-time again.

Nothing ever really broke him, but this does.

Remus curls up against her, clinging and crying, revived six years later just to disintegrate before her very eyes. Lily does not know much, she doesn't know what Sirius was to Remus, but she does know for sure now that he was something.

Maybe, as much as she dreads to think it, he was everything.

Dorcas pushes through the crowd, struck by the odd silence and stillness, then sucked into it herself from the shock of finding the last thing she ever expected to. Lily slumped on the floor, cradling Remus half in her lap, holding him close like she will protect him as he sobs against her.

"Woah," Kingsley breathes out, and Dorcas gets it.

She's never seen Lily look like that. She's never seen Lily at all, as it turns out, because this is achingly real, like she's been stripped down to blood and bone for the whole world to see and does not care one bit about who dares to look. All her defenses dismantled, and Dorcas doesn't understand why or how or what it has to do with Sirius' moon.

"What's happening?" Dorcas asks.

"Some guy just showed up," Edgar mumbles, edging closer to them, eyebrows furrowed. He gestures to Remus. "He sort of just—broke down when he found out Sirius Black wasn't saved from the arena. Then—that."

"Oh," Dorcas says. "It's—yeah, he's Sirius' lover."

"Who is he?" Kingsley mutters, his voice faint.

"His name is Remus," Dorcas admits.

Kingsley sucks in a sharp breath and whispers, "Oh, shit."

"What?" Dorcas blurts out. "What is it?"

"That's—oh, fuck," Kingsley murmurs, his face softening more than Dorcas has seen since she arrived. "They know each other. That's Lily's best friend from—from before. She thought he was—we all thought—we were all told he was dead."

Dorcas' head whips towards him, and their eyes meet. She watches his eyes go cold, jaw clenching, and she feels her nostrils flare as fury floods through her. "Dumbledore?"

"Yes," Kingsley confirms, his voice clipped.

Oh, that man. Dorcas could just—she could really just—

"Bas?" Rodolphus pushes forward, his voice strained as he stumbles past them, not seeming to care about the two on the floor or the other crowds of people. "Bas! Rabastan!"

Dorcas watches the group further ahead, Rabastan Lestrange pushing people aside, moving in a rush at the same time that Rodolphus does. Dorcas can make out Sybill and Amos, as well as two other people she doesn't know, who are all crowded together. They're the only people really standing between everyone else and the tributes all waiting by the infirmary.

Rodolphus and Rabastan meet in the middle, slamming into each other and both laughing, exhilarated by the reunion. It's heartwarming, truly, but Dorcas does not have it in her to care about that right now. She's already on the move, too.

Marlene. She needs to find Marlene.

As she rushes forward, Pandora is the one who bites the bullet to gently usher Lily and Remus to their feet, so careful as she coaxes them to empty chairs off to the side, snapping at others around them to back off and find other shit to do. The rest that Dorcas brought in all follow her, including Minerva, and that's just as well. These people need to wait for help anyway.

This is the destination, and it just so happens to coincide with where she needs to be. As she draws closer, scanning everyone desperately, she can see most of the other tributes. Emmeline is near Alice, Alecto was sitting with Rabastan and now has been abandoned, Majesty is shying away from people trying to get them to drink water, Narcissa seems to be talking to a woman who bears a startling resemblance to Bellatrix, and Regulus is with—oh, he's in between Effie and Monty.

Asher is nowhere to be found.

Marlene isn't either.

There's so much going on around that those at the end of the hall—Regulus, Narcissa, the Potters—don't even focus on what's happening. Dorcas is tempted to go to them for answers, but honestly, Amos and Sybill are closest. She'd ask Lily, but she's currently occupied.

"Dorcas!" Sybill bursts out in delight as she moves closer.

"Hi, Sybill, Amos," Dorcas says breathlessly.

"Barty, Mary, this is Dorcas," Sybill introduces with a watery smile. "She's the woman who came up with the plan. Dorcas, this is Barty and Mary. They're from district six, friends with Sirius and Regulus. They came with us to help save—"

"Lovely, thank you, nice to meet you," Dorcas interrupts in a rush, aware that it's rude but having no capacity to care at this particular moment. "Sorry, just—where's Marlene?"

Everyone falls silent immediately.

They all exchange looks.

Dorcas stops and flicks her gaze between them, a strange twinge taking place in her chest that she's ignoring. She waits, and no one speaks. Firmly, she repeats, "Where's Marlene?"

"Shit," Amos mumbles, grimacing before he clears his throat. She is inexplicably angry about this. Angry about how they're all looking at her, and how they're not, not really. Angry about the implication that—that— "Okay, um. Dorcas, listen to me, yeah? It's—I want to say she's fine, but—"

"Amos," Dorcas says coldly, "where is Marlene?"

Swallowing, Amos rasps, "She's—she was shot—"

This does something very odd to Dorcas' chemical makeup. Something in her sort of just—shifts, and she is more rage than she is woman, more vengeance than she is person. It is here, right now, that she learns what it means to put the weight of purpose, her purpose and drive, on one person. The weight of that is held on the very foundation of Marlene McKinnon's beating heart, and that's such a fragile organ; it can so easily stop and bring the foundation crumbling down.

Dorcas gets it, suddenly, the process of loss into revenge into war. She gets how motivations can lead to destruction. The chaotic force of loving someone so much that you will burn the world for them and dance around the flames. It had a guide before that sentence left Amos' mouth, contained to one part of the world, one group of people who were to blame for Marlene's lack of safety in the first place.

But she was shot slips past Amos' lips, and the direction of this force splays wide, no longer aimed, just unleashed on anyone and anything that dares to stand before it. In seconds, Dorcas has Amos by the throat, slamming him up against the wall and holding him there. Amos wheezes, his glasses lopsided on his face, but he still lifts his hands to halt the others who hiss and start to move forward to peel her away.

"Don't say that to me," Dorcas tells him, and her voice doesn't seem to match the feelings within her. She feels like she is blazing, like she is a white-hot blade that can slice cleanly through anything that gets in her way. But her voice—it is not steady, and it trembles, and it cracks. "Say something else. For your sake, say anything else."

"She was shot," Amos repeats hoarsely, "and we lost her on the heli-carrier," and Dorcas is going to kill him, "and then we got her back," and Dorcas might not kill him, "so she's in surgery right now," and Dorcas doesn't know what she's going to do to him, or to anyone, or at all, "but we don't know what state she's in now, okay? We're all waiting on the update. Dorcas, she was alive when we got here, and you know Poppy will do everything she can for her. You know how good Poppy is."

"Dorcas," Sybill whispers, careful and tentative as she reaches out to wrap her hand around Dorcas' raised arm. She tugs gently. "Come on, let him go. That's it."

Dorcas exhales shakily and blinks hard, taking a stiff step back, her hands trembling. Amos stares at her, not moving, and so many people are staring at her like she's a bomb about to go off—and that's exactly how she feels. The timer is ticking down, and only Marlene can clip her wires.

These people are her friends. People she has known for years. People who know this part of her, this secret she had to carry with everyone else. Kingsley, Lily, Sybill, Amos, and many more here—they all know her, or this part of her, but not all of her. Not who she is as a stylist. Not as a Hallow. She has so many faces, and it's no wonder there are moments where people can't seem to recognize her.

Sometimes, she can't even recognize herself.

Aberforth perhaps should not find any of this funny, but it is taking genuine effort not to laugh right now.

Albus looks so stressed.

Oh, you can hardly tell with him, really, especially these days, but Aberforth knows. It's all in the pacing with him. He used to do it a lot back when they were all just kids. Pace and pace when Ariana was sickly; pace and pace when Aberforth fought Charles Lemmings for trying to steal his goat; pace and pace before every single reaping, until that last one, until all the reasons he had to stress came true.

He paces slower now, but it is pacing nonetheless.

Again, Aberforth should possibly not find his brother's distress a source of entertainment, but—well, karma is so much more amusing when it's not applied to you. Especially when it's applied to someone who very much deserves it.

"Doesn't feel so good, does it?" Aberforth can't help but ask, watching Albus pace from one end of his office to the other. He has a long beard. It looks stupid on him, which is a childish thought, but Aberforth is not above those these days, as it turns out. Truly, Albus brings out the worst in him. Siblings do that, and Aberforth is no better, because Albus is seventy-five and still pauses long enough to make a face at him, wrinkles and all. "What? It's true. You have to admit, there is a lot of irony in all of this, isn't there?"

Albus heaves a very weary sigh and lifts a withered hand to squeeze the bridge of his crooked nose, broken by Aberforth's hand and never healed straight again. Albus thought it was funny after the fact. Even my nose isn't straight, he'd said, grinning, and Ariana had giggled while Aberforth rolled his eyes. The memory is faint. Distant. A mere wisp now.

Lately, Albus has been far too pleased with himself, if you ask Aberforth. Sweeping around his less-than-humble abode with that ever-present twinkle in his eyes. Delighted because Aberforth arrived with the last remainders of his district. Not deterred by any harsh word or sharp accusation Aberforth has thrown at him. He tells Aberforth everything, every choice he has made, every detail of this brewing war—and he tells him just to have the excuse to spend time with him, to talk to him again. He has aged, but his eyes are the same, and the light of relief and joy and love in them has not changed. That is how he looks at Aberforth, nearly always.

Aberforth does not like it, obviously. He and Albus have over five decades worth of strife between them, not long-lost or forgotten. Aberforth is not the boy he once was; he is now a man who survived without his brother and no longer needs him. Being near him—well, it chafes his soul.

So, seeing Albus like this, a man in the midst of watching all his plans burn down around him…

Needless to say, it's satisfying.

"You are—irritating," Albus mutters, finally, yet again sighing as he swivels to brace both hands on his desk and peer at Aberforth over his glasses. "Explain to me in what world any of this could ever be labeled as ironic."

"Well, it's just history repeating itself," Aberforth points out, amused. "Except it's happening to you this time. Is this not what you did, Albus? Did you not go against all order, all rule, to act as you saw fit in a form of defiance? Was it not you who called for war in the first place?"

Albus doesn't look pleased anymore. "What Ms. Meadowes has just done is not even remotely similar to what I have done. I built this resistance from the ground up, Aberforth, and I have guided our position in this war into the path of a sure victory. She has just ruined all of that."

"Perhaps if you had not brought down war upon us all, this would not be happening," Aberforth suggests lightly, mockingly. "Perhaps if you had considered the impact of the lives you planned to shape into martyrs, you would have realized that this could happen, and would be no one's fault but your own. You put those people in the arena this year, Albus, didn't you tell me that? All the ready opposition to Riddle, and you couldn't foresee this? Opposition to you?"

"What are you implying?" Albus asks softly.

Aberforth holds his gaze. "Oh, it's not an implication. I am more than happy to state it. Considering recent moves you've chosen to make, there hardly seems to be much difference between you and Riddle at all."

"You speak foolishness led by personal resentment—"

"I don't. Ask yourself, Albus. Ask yourself and answer honestly what Grindelwald would—"

"Do not," Albus cuts in sharply, standing to full height, every part of him going tense. Aberforth does not back down. He will not. Albus shakes his head. "Do not speak of Gellert."

"He would be proud of you," Aberforth says coldly.

Albus' beard twitches, and Aberforth can hear his throat click on a harsh swallow. There's a beat, another, and then Albus' expression wipes clean, turns mild, impenetrable. "That, I'm afraid, is impossible to prove. Because he is dead. Because I killed him. Have you so easily forgotten that?"

"No," Aberforth admits, "but I won't so easily forget that you loved him once, either."

"That—" Albus opens his mouth, closes it, then shuts his eyes and releases yet another weary sigh.

Aberforth freezes, staring at him in disbelief. "Still, Albus? Even after—even all these years later, you still—"

"That," Albus repeats forcefully, eyes snapping open, "has absolutely nothing to do with any of this."

"Oh, it's becoming ever so clearer that it does," Aberforth counters with a scoff. "Your love for a dead man—"

"For our sister, if you recall," Albus corrects. "It is for—"

"Do not put this on her!" Aberforth bellows, slamming a hand down to the desk and jolting to his feet as he points his finger in Albus' face. "You don't get to do that, you don't get to lay your mistakes at the mantle of Ariana, you don't get to beg for forgiveness through revenge. She would never want this. She would be disappointed in you for what you've done."

Albus leans back, regarding him in thick silence. Neither of them speak for a long moment, and then Albus steps back and shakes his head. "This is a pointless discussion. You can't even grasp the shift in the state of the world that took place tonight. You cling to the past, Aberforth, but I do not have that luxury when our present impacts the future of the whole world."

"I thought you would have been pleased," Aberforth says derisively. "It's war now, yes? Isn't that exactly what you wanted, Albus? Don't tell me you're not prepared."

"All of the advantages carefully built have been torn to pieces."

"In what way? So, the games are off. That will surely bring about positive change, if nothing else."

"Possibly," Albus allows, "but at what cost? So few think of the cost. That is my burden, weighing the costs and bearing the weight of those costs."

"What cost?" Aberforth hisses. "How is saving lives a cost?"

"If you believe I'm so incapable of compassion that I am not relieved lives have been saved, you are as foolish now as you were in your youth," Albus murmurs, staring at him with his eyebrows furrowed. "Do you truly think so little of me?"

Aberforth clenches his jaw. "I think nothing of you, Albus. I haven't for many, many years, and I won't start now."

"Ah, of course." Albus gives a faint, flickering smile as his gaze slides to the side, pained. He's silent for a few beats, then slowly resumes pacing. "I've gotten in contact with a secret informant within the Hallow, who informed me that Riddle has captured both Sirius Black and James Potter."

"Captured…" Despite himself, Aberforth feels his heart give a small pang when thinking of Euphemia and Fleamont. That boy as well, Regulus Black. None of them are going to take the news well. "Are they to be killed, then?"

"No," Albus says, gaze trained on the portrait of their sister hanging on the wall, Ariana in her songbird blue dress to match her eyes, delicate white ribbon in her hair. The picture of innocence. "They're far more useful alive than dead, if not for information then for how they can be weaponized."

"Weaponized? Will they be altered?"

"Elaborate."

Aberforth arches an eyebrow at him. "You are forgetting the nature of people again, Albus. Do you know where they come from, what family they were born into, who they were raised by and who they are? You do not, and you don't consider such things any longer. People are just bodies to you now, so they can more easily be disposed of. But I do know. Sirius is a Black, and not just any Black, but one brought up under the Potters' guidance. Defiance is in his very blood, nature and nurture. And James? He is a good boy, to his core. Loyal with a very strong moral compass. Not just optimistic, but earnest and eager to put effort into the things that matter."

Albus regards him thoughtfully, inclining his head in a gesture to continue, showing that he is listening.

Well, there's a first for everything.

"The very nature of themselves will need to be altered for them to be weaponized," Aberforth explains. "Whatever you may think, they will not simply play into Riddle's hands. That is not who they are. So, I ask you, can they be altered?"

Albus considers that for a moment, then hums. "That is not technology or weaponry Riddle possesses. He has nothing, as far as I know, that could erase who they are."

"He cannot alter their thoughts?"

"No."

"He cannot alter their memories?"

"No."

"He cannot alter their feelings?"

"No."

Aberforth spreads his hands. "And so, in short, he cannot alter them, and as such, he cannot control them."

"There is something you do not think about, Aberforth, and I don't fault you for it. You have not had the power of love and loyalty leveraged against you," Albus murmurs. "You have never wielded that power yourself. You do not know it from each side as I do. Control is—hm." He pauses, swiveling on spot and pacing in the other direction. "You do not have to change the nature of someone to control them. All you have to do is find the source of what's important in their thoughts, memories, and feelings, and then exert power over that. What you do know, or should, is how far people will go for those that they are loyal to, and for those that they love."

Yes, Aberforth does know that. He knows that better than most, by example and not by experience. He is watching the twisted result of that pace in front of him, gazing upon his older brother, gazing upon a stranger.

"The very nature of those boys cannot be changed," Albus continues, "but it can be manipulated."

"Pain manipulates us all, and yet we find ways daily to overcome it," Aberforth counters. He is not a very optimistic man himself, as Albus once was in his youth, and so it feels strange to be the one arguing on the side of hope now.

"It's not through their own pain that they will be manipulated, Aberforth," Albus says softly, "but through each other's."

At that, Aberforth fails to form a rebuttal, because he does know the detriment of loyalty and love. In all his years, Aberforth has never seen a loyalty and love exist as the loyalty and love between those two boys do. He has seen an uncomfortable amount of Albus in Sirius, and himself as well as Ariana in Regulus Black, but the bond between Sirius and James is something entirely other. He has never before seen anything that could compare to it.

What James and Sirius have doesn't exist in history and may never exist again—not just once in a lifetime, but once in any lifetime. This is not history repeating itself, and therefore it is unprecedented. They can't avoid mistakes or prepare for what may come through the lens of the past, not with them.

Loyalty and love is dangerous, not just because it can be twisted and turn violent, but also because it can be leveraged. Aberforth has no doubts in his mind that James and Sirius could undergo any form of torture and come out the other side entirely themselves, but he does doubt that they wouldn't toss aside everything that they are, and all that they stand for, if it could mean sparing one another any bit of pain.

Suddenly, none of this is funny to Aberforth anymore.

"James and Sirius are not where the issues end," Albus informs him. "Tonight, the anonymity of the Order was dissolved. Two groups, one with enough power and artillery to break into the arena and escape, and the other that escaped from the Hallow itself. Riddle has now learned that there is an organization against him with weapons and at least one heli-carrier, as well as the fact that there is a breach within the Hallow that the organization uses. That is the very least of what he has learned without any further follow up."

"And with further follow up?"

"He will learn the identities of everyone involved, because he will surely gather the footage from the arena to study it for any details he can. Depending on how the mission went, some of those who broke into the arena will now be on his radar, if not all of them. I don't know yet what was revealed."

"Will you find out? Surely Riddle will not release the footage of what took place," Aberforth murmurs.

"He will not," Albus replies mildly. "However, I have a very competent technological genius here by the name of Filius who is working to gain access to the footage as we speak."

Aberforth stares at him. "Albus, tell me you do not intend to release the footage and endanger those children?"

"They are not children," Albus says. "No more than we were. No more than we ever got to be. Them or any of us. They are adults, and they made their choices. I have little choice otherwise, because this is what I'm left with."

"No, you have a choice. You can choose not—"

"Yes, I could choose to put the few above the greater good and watch the world fall to further ruin because of that choice. Or I can release that footage and lean into the war they chose to start too early. We all have choices, and they made theirs. All choices come with consequences."

"You wish to punish them?" Aberforth hisses.

Albus looks weary. "You truly do think so little of me. No, I have no desire to punish them. Releasing the footage isn't to teach them a lesson. The state of the Hallow itself is already in shambles, which is what this war needs. To allow Riddle to put a patch over it and cover up what took place will take us further away from the growing rebellion across the world."

"I think you always find some way to justify your worst actions. What is this greater good you speak of? Who's greater good, Albus? Yours?"

"This is not a debate. I will review the footage and have Filius release it, because secrecy has been stripped from us. The war is here and hiding is no longer an option. People need to know our presence. People need to know we are here."

"Open recruitment, is it?" Aberforth scoffs.

"To those who wish to step up, yes, and refuge to those who need it. You paint me as an unreasonable man, but I'm not."

"So you say."

"So I do," Albus agrees, lips twitching slightly. Just as quickly, the brief amusement in his eyes fade. "A lack of secrecy lends itself to disadvantages in more ways than you can imagine. Riddle will find how we entered and exited the Hallow soon enough, and he will either have it monitored, or destroy it. That access is lost to us now."

"Will he know about the stations?"

"No. He won't be able to detect the station below."

"Alright, so take the districts," Aberforth states firmly.

"Take the districts," Albus repeats.

Aberforth grunts. "S'what I just said. No more secrecy, as I understand it, so come up from under the ground and spread out. Take each district, clear out all the Aurors, and cut off the Hallow. Do you even know how reliant the Hallow is on the districts, Albus? As a mayor, I do. We build for them. We run the transportation. We provide food and materials. Even close to the Hallow, the districts make the Hallow flourish. District two is the source of the Hallow's manpower, the Aurors, and all weaponry. District one is the source of all medical and—"

"Technological advancements," Albus finishes, his eyes brightening. "Yes, that I do know. Filius is from one."

"So," Aberforth repeats, "take the districts."

Albus laughs. It's soft, a bit croaky from age, but it's as warm as it was when they were children. Albus always laughed when Aberforth or Ariana did, even when he was trying to be stern, unable to help but join in with them. He loved to laugh then and sounds as if he barely remembers how to now.

"Perhaps you think too much of me," Albus declares finally, and again, his lips twitch, but this time with fondness, as if the thought warms him. "I am but a man, Aberforth."

"You have the power," Aberforth insists. "I've seen this place. I've looked. You can take the districts."

Albus sighs and shakes his head. "I can't. What you fail to realize is that Riddle has a power that, as of now, I have no idea how to beat. A power I can't beat, as far as I know. I lack what those in this genre like to call a deus ex machina."

"Something to solve an unsolvable problem."

"Ah, I never knew you would grow into a cultured man. Abby, have you been picking up books over the years?"

"One, don't call me that," Aberforth says gruffly. "Two, fuck off. Three, I found books appealing when you weren't around to gaze at them with such reverence that it seemed like you wanted to stick your prick between the pages and—"

"Now, there's no need for such filth," Albus cuts in, scolding almost, though Aberforth is not exaggerating in the least. There is nothing Albus looked at so hungrily, so wistfully, as he did a book. Knowledge—he's always had a taste for it. No surprise there, really. After all, knowledge is power.

Aberforth has always enjoyed getting a rise out of his puritan brother, but to fall back into very, very old habits now feels too much like—kinship. Yearning. Nostalgia. He looks away with a scowl. "What is the unsolvable problem, Albus?"

"You already know," Albus murmurs. "You've been exposed to it before, if you recall."

"I—" Aberforth stops. His paper-thin skin breaks out into a wave of goosebumps, and he looks at Albus again, tense in his chair. "The fog. Biological warfare, you said. That's—"

"Unbeatable," Albus confirms. "I cannot take the districts. To even try would be to… Well, Riddle would unleash that in the name of war, and whether you think so little of me or simply too much, I would not send so many people—my people, the people of the districts, or any people—to inescapable death."

"So, what are your options?" Aberforth croaks.

Albus hums and resumes his pacing, glancing at Ariana's portrait as he softly says, "Yes, that is the question, isn't it?"

Regulus has never given much thought to shock. Like, legitimate medical shock, or something close to it. A complete override of one's nervous system. A scrambled brain. A certain detachment from the body, floating like a ghost from beyond.

In a state of shock, time passes strangely, he thinks. Things occur, but from a distance. Everything is muffled, like it's all coming from underwater. Naturally, he hates the feeling.

There's nothing to be done about it. He sort of drifts in and out. There for a bit, crying, and then empty and numb as the world moves around him in a blur. Someone does something to his arm. He's treated to water and a muffin. Maybe it's supposed to wake him up a bit, but it doesn't work.

People come and they go. There's chaos at the end of the hall, invisible from this focal point, unreachable to him in this little bubble of nothing he's found himself in.

Effie and Monty stay with him.

And then Narcissa. The sharp, cutting edge of her voice from somewhere beyond. "He what?"

"Cissy," Andromeda protests.

Regulus looks up to find Narcissa heading right for him like an angel of death ready to give the final blow and break the news that his time has come. He doesn't move. He should, probably, and his brain is screeching at him. Remember, please remember, you deserve to live, too. Now is the time to fight. Get up. Get up!

Regulus doesn't get up.

Effie does, though. She springs out of her chair so fast that it's almost like the movement shifts the very temperature of the space around them. The tension is cold, harsh enough to burn, and Effie steps in front of him with a jerky movement, placing her body between Narcissa and his own.

"Don't," Effie warns, her voice sharp.

"Move," Narcissa hisses.

"Narcissa, if you make a move for this boy, I will put you down. You know I can. Don't make me," Effie says.

There's a heavy beat of silence. Regulus swallows and stares down at his fingers. They're shaking. Monty is rubbing his back ever so gently, but he's visibly tense, too. Finally, Regulus hears Narcissa gives a harsh exhale, one of acceptance, because Effie was her mentor, too. She knows how good Effie is, and she owes Effie her life, in a way.

"Regulus," Narcissa says, voice clipped. Regulus raises his head and peers over Effie's shoulder to find Narcissa's cold eyes—not delicate, not at all—pinned right on him. "You killed her. You killed my sister."

"Yes," Regulus replies quietly, holding her gaze. "She tried to kill my brother first. I told her not to. I said—"

"I don't care," Narcissa cuts in, and he shuts up. "I don't care what she nearly did, and I don't care what you said. You're dead to me, do you understand?"

"Yeah," Regulus murmurs, turning his head and staring across the hall without seeing anything. "I understand."

He does understand. He gets it, and he doesn't blame her. He thinks maybe that's—good. It feels good; it's the only thing he can feel. The relief of blame. He thinks over and over, don't let me get away with it, don't let me forget what it means, don't let me live easy; I deserve to live, but not a life of ease.

"Come on, Cissy," Andromeda mutters, and then she's there, carefully guiding her away. "I know, okay? I know, but he—"

"He killed her—"

"He never meant—"

"Our sister—"

As they get farther away, their blooming argument goes fuzzy and drops into distant hissing that Regulus closes his eyes and drowns out. He doesn't care either. He hopes Andromeda doesn't calm Narcissa down. He hopes Narcissa treats him with scorn, because she should. He hopes Narcissa hates him for what he did, because he doesn't want to do it alone.

Effie moves to stand beside him, hand on his shoulder. Monty is still rubbing his back. It's the closest to James he can get until James gets here, and maybe it's better than Regulus deserves. Did he move fast enough when Mary dropped down to get him? If he hadn't hesitated, would they have gotten to Sirius sooner? He wasn't fast enough, was he? What he was scared of, and then—and then—

Regulus breathes, and he drifts out for a while again. Drifts and drifts and drifts. People come and they go. Time passes. Regulus closes his eyes and waits for James.

Every now and again, his mind forgets that Sirius is gone, and he has to remember on repeat, and then the shock wades back in. He careens between acceptance of it like a fact and sheer denial like it could never, ever be true.

There's a lot of activity around them, and Regulus has cried, but he isn't doing that anymore. When does a defense mechanism become an unhealthy coping mechanism? When it's no longer a choice, Regulus thinks. He hadn't planned to shut down and retreat into himself; he'd thought, or hoped, that he would never have to do that again.

He doesn't decide to, now. It just sort of—happens.

Perhaps it's only fitting that what draws him out is Remus. He comes into Regulus' line of sight, almost fluttering on the sidelines, swollen eyes and a scarred face. The shock of seeing him hits Regulus square in the chest.

"Regulus," Remus says. There is a defeated air to him, a strain in his expression. Lily hovers beside him, close, her hand on his arm like she wishes to run away with him.

Regulus feels his heart sink just looking at him, because he does not look well. He looks worse than Regulus has ever seen him. Sirius would be so—he'd fret over him, concerned, and this is what spurs Regulus to his feet. He tugs his hands away from Effie and eases away from Monty, standing up.

"Regulus," Remus repeats, and his voice cracks.

"You—you know?" Regulus rasps. Remus nods, his eyes dull, and of course he knows. Regulus can't miss it, that look on his face and in his eyes. "I'm sorry."

"I'm—" Remus' voice catches, his chest stuttering on a harsh breath in and out, like he's struggling with it, like it hurts to do it. Regulus knows what that feels like.

There's a moment of a thread between them under great strain, threatening to snap, and everything feels so fragile in a way Regulus doesn't know how to handle. He doesn't—he has no idea how to be careful with anything anymore. He has no idea where to even start, and being comforting, taking care of people—that's something Remus is far more adept at.

The thing is, Regulus has always wanted to, though. Always wanted to take care of Sirius as Sirius took care of him. Always wanted to comfort James as James comforted him. Always wanted to be the person who could do such things, as those he is surrounded by are. He doesn't know what to do or how to do it, and he thinks he's in shock, but if he does not try now for Remus—for Sirius—then what was the point of it all? There has to be a point. There needs to be a point.

So, Regulus steps closer, opening and closing his mouth, trying to find words and knowing absolutely none. Lily tenses at his proximity, fingers clamping down on Remus tighter, more possessively, more protective overall.

Remus pulls away from her, jerky and abrupt, and Regulus is nearly fucking hyperventilating when Remus reaches for him. Touch. Of course. There's so much that can be translated through touch, so much comfort to be shared in contact, and it's always Regulus' last instinct. He never thinks of it. There is something else in touch, a deeper perception, closer to what feelings lay beneath the skin and form symptoms in the body.

Remus can likely feel him shaking. Regulus doesn't like it, that he can feel that, but he's not alone in it. Remus is rattling like he's about to fall apart. That's what Regulus appreciates about Remus, above all. He makes Regulus feel less alone; the first person to stay with him while he faced his fears, and the first person now who he willingly holds onto in the aftermath of his loss. Their loss. They've both lost, haven't they?

It's strange the way they don't fit well together, like two misshapen puzzle pieces trying to form a picture neither of them can see. They do it anyway, an embrace, a tight one where it's all wrong and they're both trembling and there's no comfort to be found here, just fear, just pain.

Regulus feels large hands drape over his shoulders, squeezing, and then he's being pushed back. There's an awkward moment of fumbling, because Regulus doesn't know how to do this with Remus, the whole touching thing. It's not really…their thing, he doesn't think. They are at their best together when they are showing their worst to one another and basking in the relief of being next to someone they know won't really care, or have an opinion on it, or judge them. They have no wish to change each other for the better, only help where they can and accept when they can't. It's relieving, really.

The awkwardness fades when Regulus meets Remus' eyes, and there's a wild gleam there, something that puts a tight knot in Regulus' stomach. "I have to—there's something—"

"No," whispers Regulus, who immediately feels dread slide in a spiral up his spine like a snake. He shakes his head. "No, it's not—that's not—don't you fucking dare."

"Regulus," Remus murmurs.

"Where is he?" Regulus asks, because he should be here. If Remus is here, he should be here. James should be here.

Remus swallows, his fingers clamping tight over the bend of Regulus' shoulders. "He didn't —not everyone made it out—"

And that's it. Regulus knocks Remus' hands off his shoulders and shoves Remus so hard in the chest that he stumbles back a few steps. Lily surges forward automatically, and Regulus is happy to meet her, and that does not go over well with anyone in the immediate vicinity.

Effie and Monty are calling for everyone to stop, Narcissa and Andromeda are trying to pull Regulus away from Lily, and Remus is trying to pull Lily away from Regulus. It's not really working well for anyone. Lily comes for Regulus like it's fucking personal, all pent-up aggression and flashing jealousy in her bright eyes, and Regulus could not care less about the very breath in her lungs or anything else, really.

Regulus lashes out like he's still in the arena, the first or the second or some sick amalgamation of both, and if he had his dagger, she would be dead. As he does not, she is not, and also she slaps the shit out of him so hard that his ears ring. He slams her back into the wall, the both of them tripping over their feet with hisses and grunts, the background sounds of people yelling and protesting fading to a dull buzz.

It's good, somehow, because Regulus can focus on Lily instead of James, and Lily can focus on Regulus instead of—whatever she doesn't want to focus on, he supposes.

He knows, distantly, that this is an exchange for them both that has very little to do with each other at all. Regulus has no ill will towards Lily. If he's honest, she's the first person he actually wants to grab the hand of and kiss in a Hallow gesture of admiration, and neither of them are even Hallows. But she's his savior. She saved him. She's saving him now, giving him a target to lock onto and giving him pain that isn't wrapped up in the agony of James' absence.

"That's enough!"

Dorcas' shout is sharp and loud enough to pierce through the violent fog in Regulus' brain, and possibly Lily's, and she's suddenly there to push in between them and shove them apart. She casts an imposing figure, and when she orders them to stop, they do. Because she orders it.

"There will be no in-fighting," Dorcas declares, her voice carrying, not raised but assertive enough that everyone looks to her and listens. "To place blame and turn on one another will help no one and does not honor those we lost tonight."

"Dorcas," Effie says, her eyes wide. "Dorcas, where is my—"

"Tonight, we—" Dorcas closes her eyes for a moment, then exhales and opens her eyes. "Tonight, there was a mission conducted in two separate parts, one to save those from the arena that we could. Unfortunately, we were not able to save everyone, and Sirius was captured by the Hallows. As of now, I don't know if he's alive or dead, or what happened to him."

Regulus slumps back against the wall, his eyes fluttering shut, a lump forming in his throat. This announcement gets mixed reactions from everyone. Remus makes a small sound. Effie and Monty seem equally hurt. Andromeda—ever stoic and unflinching Andromeda—has to swipe tears from her eyes.

But no one interrupts Dorcas.

They all listen.

"The other part was within the Hallow," Dorcas continues, taking in a deep breath and setting her shoulders. "An escape took place, but again, not everyone managed to make it out. Narcissa, your husband, Lucius, died tonight."

"Oh," Narcissa says softly, blinking rapidly. That's all she says. Regulus looks at her, his stomach churning. She looks rather startled, her eyebrows furrowed, and there's a distance in her eyes that he relates to. She's in shock, too. She lost one sister, gained the other, and became a widow all in one night, and none of these things were gently delivered to her.

None of this is gentle for anyone.

"Alice…" Dorcas swivels her head, looking for them, and they sit forward from where they're next to Emmeline. They look afraid already, knowing that to be singled out, there is very bad news waiting for them. "Alice, I'm sorry, but Frank was with us tonight. He—he also didn't make it."

"He—he was captured?" Alice chokes out, sounding almost desperate. "They captured him?"

Dorcas looks pained. "No, Alice."

"So, so what—so, if he wasn't—so what happened then? If he's not here and he wasn't captured, then—then—"

"He's dead."

Brutal. Utterly brutal. There is no way to properly deliver such news, and apologies will not make it hurt less, so Dorcas just speaks honestly, softly, her back straight and her throat bobbing harshly. Regulus doesn't understand what's going on. He doesn't understand why she's—why this is on her, or who she is right now. This is not his stylist. This is someone who knows all of this, inside and out. This is someone in charge, and that doesn't make sense to him. What's happening?

Alice collapses back into their chair, sagging into Emmeline, someone Regulus knows through Sirius that also adored Frank as yet another friend of his. Alice almost immediately breaks down, but Emmeline's face goes blank, her movements slow like moving through water when she wraps her arms around Alice. The sound of their muffled sobs echoes in the silence.

"Regulus, Effie, Monty," Dorcas presses on, and immediately it's impossible to breathe. Regulus feels his heart pulse painfully in his chest, and he grabs onto whatever is closest to him, bracing himself, bracing for it. Lily's arm is warm under his hand, and as if they were not just trying to claw each other's eyes out only moments before, she lifts a shaky hand and covers his fingers, holding him there. It's an absent gesture; her gaze is locked onto Dorcas. "James—"

"No," Effie chokes out instantly. "No, please, not my son. Not my boys. Dorcas—"

"James didn't make it," Dorcas continues, her jaw clenched, whole body tense like an unbearable pressure is working to crush her. Atlas, holding the whole world on a pair of aching shoulders. "We don't know if he died, or if he was captured. I'm sorry, but I don't have any more information than that."

Regulus' knees buckle, and though he doesn't know this, it's not the first time Lily catches someone in the last hour while learning they've lost the man they love.

Regulus can't do it. He can't do it. He's going to throw up—oh, fuck, he's going to heave everything out of him until he's empty, then feel the skin slide right off his bones, leaving him nothing but brittle marrow nicked by the claws of corpses he wishes he could join. Not this. Not this, not this, not this. Please, please, please not this.

Regulus is gagging, hand against his chest, feeling something invade him, under his skin, in his veins, in the pit of him. Swelling. Expanding. Ripping from the inside, ready to explode out. He'll be a smear. His scars won't be knitted together anymore, and he can't do this. He can't do it. Rewind life on a reel and take him to the day he turned fifteen; that liminal in between where he and James loved each other at the same time, and actually got to be happy with that. That's where he wants to be. Not here. Not now. Not this.

"Regulus, I'm sorry," Remus is saying, surging forward to try and hold him up, to hold him. Oh, they've lost. They've lost together, and they're lost together, looking for something to hold onto, and it's all gone. All they've ever clung to, ripped away from them. "I'm so sorry. I tried—I'm sorry. Lily, let him go. He doesn't—he doesn't like to be touched. Lily, just—"

"Fuck," Lily hisses, and Regulus digs his hands into her, shuddering and begging in every way except words for her to not let him go, because he can't figure out how to hold himself together now, and she saved him—tried so, so hard to save Sirius, too, even if she failed—and he whimpers with wanting her to save him again. Save him. Oh, please save him.

"Regulus, Regulus, shh," Pandora whines, hands on his face, standing before him with tears in her eyes and devastation curling her shoulders. She said his name. She called his name, and here they are. He wishes she never spoke. He wants her to keep talking, so he can hear her sweet croon, anything other than the possibility, the chance, the reality that—that—Regulus could kill them all, if he could breathe, if he could stop shaking, if the seams of himself weren't unraveling. They crowd him, and each other, pressing in from all sides, and it's good. Touch him. Hold him together. Feel where every inch of him translates pain. It hurts, it hurts, it hurts.

It was supposed to be me and you, but Sirius is gone. Come back to me, baby, Regulus thinks, but James is gone. And he's—oh, he can't. He will, he has to, he's going to burn it all down, if he can pick himself up off the floor.

There's someone behind him. Barty. The touch of him. Face pressed into the back of Regulus' hair, hand pushing into the curve of his spine. Doesn't let him fall. Won't let him fall.

Somewhere, somewhere, Effie and Monty aren't strong enough at the same time. A mother's tears; an angel weeping while the world ends. A father's tears; a natural disaster on a pipeline that carries them all along with it. They wash, and wash, and wash away. It's just rain.

When it rains, it pours. Regulus hates the rain. He hates the world and everyone in it. He'll blow it up. Set it on fire. Destroy every faction of every city more thoroughly than they destroyed Troy. There will be no rebuilding in the aftermath of what he will do.

"Breathe, breathe, breathe," someone is chanting, and Regulus tries and doesn't want to try and wants to stop and can't stop and has to try and can't and can't and can't can't can't—

"ENOUGH!" Dorcas bellows, and immediately the entire hall falls silent. All tears come to a halt. Everyone is so startled by the way her voice carries, shocked out of their own shock, and they stare at her with wide eyes.

No one even seems to breathe.

Regulus isn't breathing.

Dorcas exhales slowly and stands taller. "If—if they survived tonight, Riddle won't kill them. He's too smart for that. So, at the moment, there's a chance they're alive. We have a meeting with Dumbledore, and he will likely know one way or another if they're alive. We're all going to walk there in a calm and orderly fashion. Go. Move, now."

That's the thing that gets air back into Regulus' lungs.

Hope.

It feels like climbing to stand on his own two feet, and pull himself together, but he proved he could climb, didn't he? One of the hardest things he's ever had to do, and he still did it, and he does it again. He'll never really understand how, but he does. And he exhales. And he watches Remus and Lily look at each other, then look away all at once, and he watches as Effie and Monty move forward to stand with him. And they go.

They all depart as a group, the ones Dorcas selects. Regulus walks in between Effie and Monty, and Remus walks ahead with Lily, but he keeps turning back to glance at him. Pandora and Dorcas take the lead, and Pandora is holding Dorcas' hand.

Along the way, they pick up two others. Sybill—one of the ones from the heli-carrier, who surges forward to join them the moment a different man Regulus doesn't recognize swings to walk with them, his jaw clenched. They end up in a meeting room of some sort with a longtable and two men sitting at the far end. Regulus recognizes one—Mayor Aberforth—and finds that a different man he doesn't recognize at all is at the head of the table, resembling Mayor Aberforth a great deal, though his beard is less scraggly and his hair is more white, not the dark grey shade of Aberforth's. Dumbledore, Dorcas said. There's two of them? Brothers?

Regulus doesn't immediately get his answer, because things go awry the moment they walk inside.

"You lied," Lily says, her voice hoarse. She is staring at the man Regulus doesn't know at the head of the table. "You told me he was dead. You lied."

"Ms. Evans—"

It's fast. Scarily so, in fact. Clearly no one sees it coming, because there's nothing anyone can do to stop it. With no warning, Lily's hand darts out to yank the gun out of the holster of the man farthest from Sybill, and she has it trained right on the man at the head of the table before anyone can even draw a breath. Before anything can happen, the man she stole the gun from swivels swiftly and puts himself right in front of it, stepping forward so the barrel presses to his head.

"Lily," he says, his voice smooth and calm.

"Move, Kingsley. Now," Lily replies coldly, giving absolutely no indication that she won't shoot him if necessary.

"Lily," Sybill chokes out, and it escapes her as a whimper, her breathing thin and short. "Please don't. Please—"

"Lily," and that's Remus now, sounding uncertain and speaking with familiarity all at once. "What are you doing?"

"He lied to me," Lily states. Regulus doesn't know who she's talking to. She's looking at Kingsley. "He said—he told me—"

"I know."

"He told us, King—"

"I know," Kingsley repeats.

Lily inhales sharply and whispers, "Did you know?"

"No," is the immediate, steady answer.

"Six years," Lily announces. Her voice cracks. Her whole body is shaking, but the hand around the gun doesn't even tremble. She isn't crying. "I thought he was dead for six years."

"I know," Kingsley says softly, yet again.

"So, move," Lily grits out.

Kingsley doesn't. "I can't do that, because you'll shoot him."

"I'll shoot you."

"You won't."

Lily's lips twist. "Won't I?"

"Step aside," says the man, the other Dumbledore. "Mr. Shacklebolt, step aside, dear boy."

"I can't do that, sir," Kingsley says stiffly. "She will actually shoot you, and she will not miss."

"Kingsley, move aside," Dumbledore murmurs with an entirely new inflection in his tone. An order masked in geniality. "Go on, do not shield me with yourself. I don't ask that of you."

Everyone seems to hold their breath. Kingsley doesn't move. What he does instead is reach up and wrap his hand around Lily's on the gun. "Listen to me, Red, you are not at a place you can't come back from, but this? Don't go there. I'm not going to let you go there, because I care. You'll have to kill me, and you won't, because you care, too."

"I don't," Lily croaks. "I really fucking don't. I don't care about anything, Kingsley, not one damn thing."

"Okay, Lily. Okay," Kingsley murmurs, gentle almost, and he eases her hand down, taking the gun, and she lets him.

Lily makes a quiet noise that seems locked between defeat and frustration, and she pushes past Kingsley to glare at Dumbledore. "Why? Can you at least tell me why?"

"I did not lie to you intentionally, Ms. Evans," Dumbledore tells her quietly. "I simply assumed that Mr. Lupin was dead, and I felt that not providing you with that closure would __"

"Bullshit!" Lily snarls, slamming her hand down to the table, making it shake. "That's bullshit. How stupid do you think I am? You know I had no fucking closure, and you—you could have found out. You could have checked, but you didn't. You just assumed the answer you wanted it to be, because that was more convenient for you."

Dumbledore is silent for a long moment, and then he looks at Mayor Aberforth. They stare at each other, and Regulus can see something heavy there between them. Yes, they're definitely brothers. Regulus can feel it in his bones.

"Yes," Dumbledore admits, finally, and multiple people in the room inhale sharply. He's only looking at his brother, and Mayor Aberforth doesn't look surprised at all. He shakes his head and looks away, and Dumbledore sighs, sounding old and weary. "Yes, Ms. Evans, I provided you with the answer that was most convenient. You're correct, I could have checked, and I chose not to. He was either dead, or as good as. If he wasn't dead, then he was a servant, which…I presume…?"

He's looking at Remus now, and so does Lily. Everyone does, and Remus swallows. "Yeah. I'm—I—yeah."

"As such, there was nothing I or anyone or you could do for his fate either way," Dumbledore explains, focusing on Lily once again. "Do you understand, Ms. Evans? I couldn't follow up on Mr. Lupin, because if he wasn't dead, you would never have stayed. You said as much. For your own safety—and yes, for the benefit of this war—I told you what you needed to hear."

"You bastard," Dorcas whispers, her voice shaking with so much audible anger that it's palpable.

"What of my family?" Lily chokes out, sounding desperate now. "You said—you told me they killed—"

"As far as I know, they're all dead," Dumbledore informs her, and she takes that like he struck her. Regulus finds this to be unspeakably cruel, watching someone be strung along, given hope, and then have it all snatched away again. "There were orders given for your family to be killed as punishment for your crimes, as is Riddle's way. That only further fueled my belief that Mr. Lupin was killed as well. I could be wrong, and I hope—like with Mr. Lupin—that I am."

"You could be wrong?" Lily croaks.

"Yes," Dumbledore says softly. "I didn't check for them either."

"When this is all over," Lily whispers, "you better hope that someone kills you before I get my hands on you."

"I'll bear that in mind," Dumbledore murmurs. "I do want you to know, Ms. Evans, whether you wish to believe it or not, my intentions were not malicious."

"No, they never are, are they, Albus?" Aberforth scoffs under his breath, scowling off to the side, top lip curled in a snarl.

Dumbledore—Albus, apparently—does not acknowledge his brother. He gestures to the chairs. "Everyone, I ask that you take a seat. There is much to discuss."

"Fuck you," Dorcas spits out. "Why should we listen to a word you have to say? After everything you've done—"

"I am not the only person present who has done things, especially with tonight in mind," Dumbledore cuts in calmly, flicking his gaze to meet hers. "There's a lot to cover, Ms. Meadowes, including the status of Sirius Black and James Potter, as they were left behind in the Hallow."

Regulus' ears ring, just from the name. Sirius, he knew. James is still new, and Regulus hasn't processed it yet. Can't quite manage to.

Regulus can't hear anything past the name that chants in his head like a mantra, like a prayer. James.

James.

James.

James, baby, please be alive. Please, please, please. Because Regulus can do something with that. Regulus can do a lot of things with that, he thinks. If Sirius and James are alive, Regulus will get them back, somehow. Whatever it takes.

And then Albus' voice breaks through to announce, very clearly, "James and Sirius are alive."

And that.

Well, that inevitably saves the world.

It is here, in this room, that Regulus learns they are alive, and so it is here, in this room, that Regulus learns he can keep going, because they need him to.

But it's not the only thing he learns, here, in this room.

It is here, in this room, that Regulus learns what became of his home. Biological warfare and more death. So many losses. Adults and children, dead. Families, torn apart. The district he grew up in, empty and filled with ghosts. A hollow home.

It is here, in this room, that Regulus learns of a resistance that has been building for fifty odd years or so. Weapons and war. Safety under the ground. Missions. Secrecy.

It is here, in this room, that Regulus learns Dorcas has been a part of this resistance for years and has now formed herself into a leader, but doesn't seem ready to shoulder the burden of it, or the consequences. She wishes to leave, to be with Marlene, and Dumbledore explains to her that she does not have that luxury now, as she has made orders and must contend with the fallout of them. A trap of her own making.

It is here, in this room, that Regulus learns he will be given amenities and safety where Riddle cannot find them—as will everyone who was brought in tonight. The only catch is that they will have chores or jobs to do and rules to follow, and they are not allowed to leave. Apparently, the Hallows will now be scouring the area, since a Hallow heli-carrier went down not too far from here, and Riddle will be eager to locate this place. This means no visits to the surface, not even sneaking through the vents—a statement directed right at Lily—and it is made very clear that anyone who tries to go to the surface will be putting every life in this bunker in danger, and as such, those that do so will be confined to solitary lockup. This makes Remus laugh, harsh and brittle, and he sounds so fucking resentful when he says he has traded one prison for another.

It is here, in this room, that Regulus learns the footage within the arena that caught the near-perfect breakout will be released to the world tomorrow. With it, Lily and Mary's identities will be known, since they spoke their names in the arena. There is a good possibility that Barty, Sybill, and Amos will be in danger as well, as their names were mentioned and there is a chance that a clear shot of their faces might have been caught on camera. However, Riddle had this information already, so it's not as if not releasing the footage will keep any of them from being targets.

It is here, in this room, that Regulus learns the anonymity of this rising rebellion has gone up like smoke. Riddle knows of it, the presence if not the details, and he will be responding accordingly, as well as doing whatever it takes to get said details. The access to the Hallow granted before is now lost. War is here, and Regulus wasn't aware it was approaching.

It is here, in this room, that Regulus learns how things are going to proceed in the face of a war kicked ruthlessly and thoughtlessly in motion. Because this is not a war that can be completely won from this end yet, a different form of battle will take place, but it will essentially be a game of chess. Dorcas made the first move, and Riddle will surely take his turn after, and so it will continue. They can only go from there, gradually, and continue in a war of wits.

It is here, in this room, that Regulus learns he will do anything, anything, anything it takes—not to save the world, not to build a better one, but to make sure the sun keeps rising and the stars continue to shine.

It is here, in this room, that Regulus learns what it is to feel just how far he will go for his brother and the man he loves. He'll go as far as he needs to. He'll go until his last breath.

It is here, in this room, that Regulus learns he's still breathing.

For them, he's still breathing.

Chapter End Notes

okay!

so, let's get right into it.

kingsley, you prick. 😒 it's fine, you can be a little mad at him, but like. in his defense, from his pov, all of this is really fucked up. and he did, like, step forward despite his own feelings to be angry on lilys behalf and outright state that he cares about her. he does, and they have a whole thing later, it's fineee. but also giggling and kicking my feet because mary stood up for lily 🥰 she's so girlfriend then remus and lily.... you all do not KNOW the way i was on the sidelines watching the trainwreck of everyone being excited for the lily and remus reunion, literally looking like this: 😬 like??? come on, it's ME. 😭 yall seriously could not have expected this to go any other way. what did you think would happen? id make it easy and calm? pfft. come on, you're 55 chapters in, you should have known better than that 🙄 however, for those of you who need reassurances: lily and remus will...be okay. at some point. they just have some things to work on first, and there's a lot between them. six years worth. but! soon, very soon, we're about to enter a new era for lily, and it's gonna be fun. im very, very excited for it. to sum it up: remus can and will fix her 😭 dorcasssss!!! <3 she carried this chapter. not her about to lose her collective shit about marlene. poor amos, he's having a really rough night, huh? she just wanted to see marlene :(

and oh god, effie and monty. they were killing me. i know a lot of you were thinking of like, regulus sort of having no one, but the thing is—yes, he lost james and sirius, but he's fighting for his life to have a reason to keep going, and effie and monty (along with a few others) are a very big support system for him in the upcoming chapters. like, at this point, he's clinging to them, ya know? just like they're clinging to him. effie and monty and regulus are so special to me, yall dont even know.

then narcissa 😬 big yikes. well first, her getting to see andromeda again 😭 THEYRE SISTERS!!!! but yeah, narcissa did NOT handle regulus being bellatrix's murderer well, and like. okay, so, it's one of those things that's never really fully resolved. you'll see more about it later. taking a fucked up family and finding more ways to fuck them up... yeah, okay, that was foul.

then the remus and regulus reunion! look, ill be 100% honest. i rewrote that so many times in so many different ways, bc like, these 2 especially have all these contradictory feelings that combat each other, and i can see countless ways each emotion could rise to the surface and take the wheel, so to speak.

so, it was kind of special to me to see them, in their grief and all this chaos, try to be there for each other. i mean, they're kinda shit at it, considering the current circumstances and such, but they tried! and they did, in a way. like idk, despite everything, and even outside just james and sirius, these two really care about each other. we'll see more duality with them in the future. they will return to being supremely fucked up very shortly, i assure you.

also, just the way regulus broke down and everyone all was there and kinda breaking down with him, and it was just so painful for all of them, but like there was something so human about the way they all came together??? idk, just. as devastating as it is, it's kinda sweet too :(

DORCAS AGAIN!!! she was feeling the weight of that leadership, lemme tell ya. poor girl. she will continue to, for a bit, unfortunately. a trap of her own making indeed :/

lily lily lily my beloved <3 she really was about to blow albus' skull open, soooo sexy of her 🥰 also, if it wasn't obvious, she's dealing with a lot at the moment. we'll see more on that later, i promise.

another thing i wanted to address: the talk with albus and aberforth. that was a lot of information, i know, but all you need to remember to reassure yourself is that whole "can he alter their memories, thoughts, and feelings?" moment, where it's stated that riddle can't.

also, albus: i don't have a deus ex machina

oh, and yeah, like. everyone's like, omg remus and regulus are gonna break out and theyre gonna go on a rampage! yeah, no... they CAN'T. like, they're literally trapped 😭 but ofc that doesn't keep them down for long... they'll get there, just be patient.

HONORABLE MENTIONS:

-pandora saving james' cane!!!
-sybill and kingsley broke up :(
-rabastan and rodolphus reunited!
-aberforth getting to mock albus 😭
-effie protecting regulus!!!
-lily and dorcas being feral
-regulus and lily fighting!!! sorry, this was funny to me out of context. me in the background: FIGHT FIGHT FIGHT!
-poor alice just getting the news about frank like that :(
-regulus is still breathing <3

Chapter Notes

hello, everyone!

warnings for this chapter:

-depictions of violence
-descriptions of blood
-vague references to past child abuse
-very vague depictions of torture (not described in detail, essentially fade-to-black, but it does occur and is proven that it occurs)
-brief references to guns/gun violence
-references to past deaths/murder
-depictions of wounds/injuries
-brief references to death/murder (no one we know, but it's mentioned that people die, so)
-depictions of dissociative amnesia (brief, and nothing occurs during)
-a brief mention of a medical procedure done without permission, so it's forced on someone, and they are very much not okay with it. this is an attack on their bodily autonomy, and it makes them uncomfortable, because it IS uncomfortable and not okay, no matter how "minor" the procedure is. (for those of you who are very uncomfortable with this—which is valid—and need to know who and what procedure it is before reading, ill be putting spoilers in the end notes, so you're prepared for it going in) i...believe that's all! overall not as heavy as the previous chapters, though it...certainly has its moments. take care of yourselves, regardless!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Sirius has a new sympathy for Remus, because Azkaban?

A total shithole.

Oh, and do not get him started on the fucking mask. It was his very first present they gave him, a mask perfectly fitted to the lower half of his face, which means it's a gorgeous mask, but that doesn't mean he's ecstatic about wearing the damn thing. It's restricting and sort of itchy and also makes breathing deep basically impossible, so he feels perpetually out of breath.

He kept taking it off and yelling obscenities, so they locked it on his face. Do you have any idea how humiliating it is to have someone come inside your cell and have to unlock the mask on your face, because you've been muzzled like a fucking dog?

Sirius has killed three people, so now they tase him before they come inside. Pfft. Cowards.

In any case, Sirius doesn't know what the fuck is going on. He is supremely confused, honestly, but he has drawn his own conclusions. He thinks that he was extracted from the arena for the blatant defiance he and Regulus displayed, possibly, but that would mean Regulus was also taken for punishment and eternal servitude, except Sirius hasn't seen or heard a hint of anything about him. There's really no information on what's going on, but Sirius is smart enough to know it's…not good.

Obviously it's not good. He's in prison. Is it better than the arena? Eh, Sirius can't really say. He doesn't think he's going to die here, at least, because they would have already killed him, wouldn't they? But he can't move around here, can't talk, can't do…basically anything. It's—degrading. And boring.

Fuck, Sirius is so bored. This is torture. At least in the arena he had some fucking activity and interaction. Here, he's just stifled and confused and—lonely. It's very lonely here.

He is left, unfortunately, with his own thoughts—and this, believe it or not, is very shitty company to have. All he can do is think himself in circles, wondering about Regulus, James, Remus, everyone. Are they okay? Are they alive? Where are they? Has something happened to them? What's going on?

Sirius was not given the luxury of Hallow medicine to help heal his bumps, bruises, and cuts, so he's also still in pain on top of everything else. Being tased repeatedly doesn't help him either, though it's not damaging, as far as he can tell. Yeah, it hurts like a bitch, but it's only enough to put him down for a minute at most, just long enough for them to unlock the mask on his face so he can eat and have water.

Otherwise, they haven't done anything to him. Haven't beaten him. Haven't tortured him. Haven't answered his questions. Haven't even acknowledged him. They're all bastards, and they all seemed to learn from the three he killed to stay out of his range. Bastards they may be, stupid they are not.

(The food here is awful, by the way. Slop, basically, and barely enough to keep a damn bird alive. Oh, and it's cold here? Like, so fucking cold. He is perpetually shivering. Plus, the bed is like sleeping on a slat of wood, and there is no blanket at all. As for showers and hygiene, he's essentially taken to a stall, left alone with a bar of soap and a spout that shoots out cold water at a velocity so high that it hurts his skin. His hair is a wreck, which is absolutely killing him, just as an aside.)

Anyway, Sirius is very bored, so this means a change piques his interest. When he's handcuffed and taken out of his cell, he can't help but be intrigued and almost eager. Even actual torture would be a nice change of pace, at this point.

(Be careful what you wish for and all that.)

He's taken to a room with a table in the center of it, a steel ring on one side that he's cuffed to with absolutely no slack, so he can't even raise his hands more than a few inches. The chair he sits in is cold and uncomfortable, but he holds still as one of the guards removes his mask and sits it on the table, out of reach. Sirius rolls his jaw, craning his head back with a grin.

"Ah, what a relief," Sirius says on an exhale. "Thank you…hm. Billy? Bob? Stuart? You look like a Stuart."

Probably-not-Stuart doesn't acknowledge him.

"So, Stuart, you wouldn't happen to want to clue me in on what's going on here, would you?" Sirius asks lightly. "Just, you know, give me a hint. Or come closer."

Probably-not-Stuart doesn't come closer.

"Come on, Stuart, I won't bite," Sirius needles. "We're pals, aren't we? I mean, you've had me convulsing on the floor with your fun little taser more than once now. We're practically family, if I'm honest."

Probably-not-Stuart turns and leaves the room.

"Was it something I said?" Sirius mutters to an empty room. Naturally, he gets no response. Great, he's bored again. At least he gets the sound of his own voice, though, which is a huge improvement in his opinion.

Sirius is singing, loudly and out of tune, when the door opens again. Riddle comes inside, a briefcase in hand. As soon as Sirius sees that it's him, he starts singing louder, more off-key, and drumbeats his fingers on the tabletop, bobbing his head like he doesn't have a care in the world.

Riddle does not look impressed with him, which—yeah, that tracks. He sits down on the other side of the table and places his briefcase on top, off to the side, then threads his hands together loosely. He's out of reach, sadly. Sirius wonders how he's going to get Riddle to inch closer, just enough for Sirius to snap his hand out and break a finger or two.

For now, Sirius continues to sing. Riddle waits him out, or intends to, but what he doesn't know is that Sirius' ability to be a menace can outweigh anyone's patience. He has tested this many times over the years, particularly with his own parents. Even negative attention is still attention, blah blah blah. Sirius grew out of that, in the end, but he has retained the knack for irritating someone into responding to him.

Look at me, look at me, look at me. That's all Sirius wanted as a child, but as he grew up, he realized that's not what he wanted at all. See me, and love me as I am. That was the real desire he had, underneath it all. Still the same thing these days, he thinks, but he doesn't care to be seen or loved by the man before him now. Nah, he just wants to get on his nerves.

"I see it hasn't taken long for imprisonment to make you lose your mind," Riddle notes flatly.

Sirius' voice cuts out, and he grins, because whether or not Riddle knows it, he just won. Ha. "Oh, well, if you never had it to begin with and all that. Good afternoon, or is it evening? Morning, maybe? Can't really tell, you see. There's no window in the cells, or light. I'm assuming you could change that, and listen, I'd greatly appreciate it if you'd have a window installed in my cell. I'd like to look at the moon. Oh, and the food here? Abysmal. I don't know what the meal plan is here, but you should absolutely get someone on that. Also, there's __"

"James sends his regards," Riddle interrupts, and Sirius stops talking immediately. "Yes, I thought that would get you to pay attention. Come now, we have much to discuss and wasting time on your trivial, childish musings does nothing for us."

"Well, it does a whole lot for me," Sirius corrects, though his gaze is sharp on Riddle's face now. "It certainly entertains me more than you ever could. You're a bit like a dead fish, really."

Riddle smiles thinly and reaches out for his briefcase, popping it open. "Do you know what happened a week ago?"

"I was taken from the arena. Thanks for that, by the way."

"Do you know why you were taken from the arena?"

Sirius watches as Riddle draws out a jar and sits it on the table. Inside it, there's a Horcrux Hornet, pouch glowing green and sheer wings remaining still. If Riddle is surprised that Sirius isn't afraid, he doesn't show it. "No, not really."

"Hm." Riddle regards the jar thoughtfully, then looks up at Sirius. "You don't fear me, Sirius?"

"No," Sirius says.

"You should," Riddle informs him.

"I don't scare easily," Sirius replies, arching an eyebrow. "And you, regardless of how you act, are just a person."

Riddle hums. "I think that you don't fear me as a person, or what I can do, only in regards to yourself. You're not afraid to die, or suffer, are you?"

"No, I'm not," Sirius admits, tilting his chin up.

"But what about those you love?" Riddle asks softly. "Are you afraid of what I can do to them?" Almost instantly, the jar is filled with light, muffled thumps as the Horcrux Hornet tries to fly towards Sirius. Riddle hums again. "Ah, there it is."

Sirius finds that he can't speak, suddenly silent, abruptly at a disadvantage. Okay, so he lost that round. He can't help it, really. Riddle has mentioned James, Sirius has no idea where Regulus is, or if Remus is okay—and yes, it scares him. Nothing scares him more than the idea of something happening to those he cares about. That's what real fear is, to him.

"You think you're so clever," Sirius murmurs. "This is what you do, then? You find what people are afraid of and use it as leverage over them, to threaten them."

"Well, if it works," Riddle replies.

"It won't," Sirius tells him simply. "I won't be threatened by you. My pride won't allow it, or maybe I'm just too spiteful, but whatever you're looking to get from me, you won't find it."

"I'm simply looking for a discussion. Let's talk, Sirius," Riddle murmurs, threading his hands together again. The jar goes quiet, the Horcrux Hornet settling. Riddle glances at it, one eyebrow twitching up. "You have a strong grip on your emotions, it seems. Admirable."

Sirius nearly laughs, because that's absolutely the farthest thing from the truth about him he's ever heard. No, he doesn't have a strong grip on his emotions, or any grip at all. They're just all over the place, strange, sliding wildly on a scale. He's a walking mood swing, quick to fly off the handle, easily influenced by the things around him.

But, when it comes to survival, none of that matters. He knows how to lock his shit down and put on a mask. Build up a wall around who he needs to be. Live and breathe by a facade, just to make it through. This facade? This one, here and now, is someone who is as unfeeling as the man across from him, unafraid and unaffected. Sirius has always been good at this. The mask he so easily puts on has always been a mirror.

"A week ago, there was an attack on the arena," Riddle tells him. "A group of anarchists broke into the arena to abduct the tributes within."

It takes a lot of effort for Sirius to keep his face neutral, to not react, to not immediately make demands about Regulus, or all of his friends, or for what happened and why he's still…

He's still here.

"As you can see, they were clearly not entirely successful in their endeavor," Riddle continues, almost wry as he gestures lazily to Sirius. "Meanwhile, at the same time, a group of anarchists within the Hallow conducted an escape."

Again, Sirius is exercising a lot of self-restraint in not reacting in any way. He's learned over the years that, to gather any bit of information you might want, sometimes the best thing to do is to let the person talk. Don't attempt to guide them. Don't show your hand. Don't reveal how badly you want to know.

He so badly wants to know.

"This brought it to my attention that there is an organized group of anarchists that oppose me." Riddle flicks his gaze towards the jar, then back to Sirius. "Now, tell me, Sirius, what do you know about all of that?"

"Oh, everything," Sirius replies lightly, flapping a hand carelessly, as much as his cuffs will allow. "All the fun details. Where and how and who. In fact, I invented it. I am the group of anarchists. I definitely didn't mean to leave myself behind, but hey, we all make mistakes, right? Oops."

"As I thought," Riddle murmurs. "You know nothing."

"Obviously," Sirius declares.

Riddle holds his gaze. "Allow me to tell you what you're so very desperate to know. Your brother and every other tribute alive at the time managed to escape; you were the only one who didn't make it out. Within the Hallow, it was your stylist, your handler, your mentor and others that led an attack to break their way out of the Hallow—and, ironically, the head gamemaker herself. They broke into the servants' cells and abducted the criminals as well. Of course, not everyone made it out alive. Many Aurors were killed, as was your friend—ah, Frank Longbottom, if I remember correctly."

That's a lot of information all at once with no warning, a mixture of awful news and wonderful news and completely unexpected news. Sirius' brain suffers overload for a moment as he tries to process it, because Frank? Frank is dead? But the servants were freed? Remus? So Remus is safe? And James? And Regulus? They're all okay? But how—who—what—

It's not through sheer force of will that Sirius doesn't react this time. He doesn't react, because he can't, because he's not here. He flickers in and out like a light desperately clinging to its last bit of luminescence. Nothing around him changes; Riddle is not speaking, neither of them have moved, and Sirius can't get a grasp on when he's here and when he's not. It's quick, like little snapshots, his mind trying to shape around all this new information and make sense of it.

Riddle is once again attempting to wait him out, as if Sirius' silent treatment is a new form of mockery for the purpose of being an agitation. Truthfully, Sirius can't break his silence, too busy being yanked in and out of reality, barely able to wrestle with it. All of it's internal, and so it seems as if he's just sitting there, doing and saying nothing.

Sirius has no idea how long it takes before he's fully settled again. Throughout all of that, he hardly even blinked.

Riddle stares at him, just the slightest tilt to his head, brown eyes rusty like blood and sharp with probing demands. He's still waiting Sirius out, utterly oblivious to the fact that Sirius just slipped away. Sirius' mouth feels dry. Okay. Okay, so now what does Riddle know? Does he know about Remus? Does he not? Is everyone safe, or will Riddle kill them all? Can he?

Sirius doesn't allow himself to think of Frank. He doesn't allow himself to wonder how everyone got involved in all of this shit. He doesn't allow himself to ruminate on the apparent anarchy taking place. What he does think of, only, is that Regulus made it out of the arena, while James and Remus escaped from the Hallow. It's such an overwhelming sense of relief that he could curl up and cry from joy, because it's everything—it's absolutely everything he wanted, and if it meant he had to stay behind and suffer whatever Riddle would throw at him, then it was worth it. He was always willing to do that, and he still is. It's still fucking worth it.

"Sounds like you've had a shitty week," is what Sirius says, finally, when he can bring himself to speak.

"You cannot even begin to imagine," Riddle says shortly, sitting up a little taller. "I have gathered all the information I could pertaining to what has taken place over the previous week. Unfortunately, I still find myself in the dark about some things. I was rather hoping you could help with that."

Sirius snorts. "Yeah, ah, you should have seen this coming. I mean, even if I did know anything, I'd literally die before telling you any of it. Surely you know that."

"I did suspect, yes."

"So, in what world would I ever help you?"

Riddle taps his finger to the top of his briefcase, likely a motion meant to draw the eye, an intimidation tactic of some sort that Sirius refuses to fall for. He doesn't bother breaking Riddle's gaze. "There's many ways to get cooperation from someone, as I'm sure you know. Our methods are different, though closely related. You wield pleasure while I use pain."

"There is no amount of pain you could use that would ever make me cooperate," Sirius says simply. "Go on, give it a go, I dare you. Torture me out of my fucking head, leave me a smear across the wall, and still—watch—I won't break. I don't break."

"Yes, well, I hardly need your help if you don't know anything, do I?" Riddle keeps tapping his briefcase. "However, I do think I can guarantee it, simply because I have James."

That stupid fucking Horcrux Hornet. Sirius hates the stupid bugs, regardless of James' fondness for them. The one he kept sits in a jar in James' room back home. Sirius said they should set the damn thing on fire and secretly agreed with Regulus that it was better off being buried in the backyard, but James got testy about that if you suggested it to him. Either way, Sirius—like any sane person—doesn't enjoy the visible proof of his fear, such a weak and vulnerable emotion he's only ever willing to let a select few see. Now, Riddle can see.

Sirius hates it. He also chooses to ignore it, much like he's doing with the idea that James is captured here, too. "You're lying. How stupid do you think I am?"

"I need not lie, Sirius."

"Yeah, that's what liars say."

Riddle looks unimpressed with him all over again. This man is clearly an only child, because he doesn't seem to know how to properly go in circles in a pointless debate as Sirius does, and as Regulus does. What marks a true sibling is childish, petty arguments about senseless things that always escalates and then is inevitably pushed aside later in favor of hanging out or going to find food. Sirius has been preparing his whole childhood to piss this man off. Thanks, Reggie, he thinks.

"Whether or not you believe me, the facts remain the same; I have James contained within my castle, comfortably close by, because he—unlike the others who fled the Hallow—seemed to make choices that led to his capture. Either he was trying to be the hero, or…" Riddle pauses, flicking his gaze over Sirius with visible disdain. "Trying to save you."

Sirius' heart sinks, because that absolutely sounds like James, and dammit, there goes that stupid fucking bug again! Every time he manages to wrangle his fear, put a lid on it, Riddle has to open his dumb fucking mouth and push him. Oh, Sirius wants to rip his fucking throat out.

"Don't," is all that falls out of Sirius' mouth, and it comes out harsh, almost a growl.

"Don't what, Sirius? Kill James? Hurt him? Torture him?" Riddle watches him, knowing that it's all of that, and more. Sirius doesn't want Riddle to even be within spitting distance of James. "You're so defiant. So prideful. Spiteful, like you said. What would it take to get you to set that aside?"

Fuck you, Sirius thinks. Fuck you, fuck you, fuck you.

"The sound of his screams?" Riddle asks softly. He leans forward on his elbows, holding Sirius' gaze, a gleam in his eyes that makes Sirius' stomach churn. "What if I tortured him in front of you? Made you watch where you could do nothing to stop it? What if I tortured him so thoroughly that he broke, Sirius? What if it was him, begging and pleading for you to cooperate? What then? What would you do?"

No, no, no, Sirius chants inwardly. Please don't. Please, please, please just leave him alone. Hurt me, not him.

He balls his hands into fists on the tabletop, nails digging into his palms. He tries to breathe. Tries not to bend to Riddle's will, because it's clear he's using Sirius' fear against him. The Horcrux Hornet is flying so hard at the inside of the jar that it shakes minutely on the table. Stupid fucking bug.

"How far would you go for your best friend, hm?" Riddle asks, tilting his head again. "To spare him pain. To save his life. If there was something you could do, would you not do it?"

"What do you want?" Sirius grits out.

Riddle's mouth twitches as he leans back. "I want you to break. I want to watch. Set aside your pride, Sirius. Your defiance and your spite—do away with it all. Kneel down on the floor before me like a dog and beg."

Sirius stares at him for a long beat, feeling rather sick at the demand, as well as oddly detached from this entire moment just from how surreal it is. Riddle is not joking, and Sirius can feel bile rising when he realizes what comes next.

Exhaling sharply, Sirius stands up, a little hunched over from where his arms are still chained to the table. He walks around to the side, grinding his teeth as Riddle's gaze follows him, and then he proceeds to dip down on one knee before dropping down on the other. Just like that, he kneels.

His arms remain half over the top of the table, the side of it digging into the tiny, mostly-healed scar he has from where Regulus cut him in the arena. He holds Riddle's gaze, feeling the humiliation of this moment writhe under his skin, but he knows deep down that he has to. Not because he believes doing so will actually save James from whatever Riddle wants, but on the off chance that it might, he will never forgive himself if he didn't even bother to try.

"Don't hurt him," Sirius says stiffly. "Please."

"You're not even afraid," Riddle murmurs, and the thing is, like this, Sirius isn't. The Horcrux Hornet has settled down. Sirius isn't scared; he only burns with anger. "Look at you. There's not an ounce of submission in how you address me now. You are inferior to me, do you understand that? I am above you in power, and so you must come to me as the peasants fell before their kings. You are at my mercy, as is James, so beg for it. And mean it this time."

That horrible pit in Sirius' stomach only yawns wider, and he knows what is being asked of him. He just can't deliver. That's not who he is. Sirius Black is many, many things, but a peasant before a king is never and will never be one.

A little fun fact about Sirius, though. He's a very loyal man, and a devoted one at that, which means there's no low he won't sink to in the name of those he loves. So, for James, he drops his gaze in a clear sign of submission and gets as low to the ground as he can manage from his position. He closes his eyes and lets himself feel it, the sheer terror that rocks through him at the thought of James hurt or dead, feeling himself start to shake and hearing the Horcrux Hornet start back up again.

Sirius is practically speaking to Riddle's shoes beneath the table when he chokes out, "Please don't hurt him. Hurt me. Kill me. Just—just, please, not him."

"There, that's better," Riddle says. Sirius swallows and fights the scalding sensation of humiliation that makes his eyes sting and his stomach twist. There's a hand underneath his chin, lifting his head, and Riddle peers down at him like he's a stain upon his shoe. "Believe it or not, your request will be granted. I never intended to harm James, only you. But think of how far you've fallen in the name of your best friend and ask yourself just how far he will fall for you."

Sirius feels his stomach drop right out from underneath him, and it's one of those sharp mood swings that has him surging forward as far as he can go to clamp down on the only part of Riddle he can reach, which just so happens to be the inside of his wrist. Sirius sinks his teeth in his skin and bites ruthlessly, so hard that blood bubbles up and pours into his mouth, and he doesn't care, just swallows it down and bites harder.

He's promptly backhanded across the face with enough force to detach him, but Sirius went all in, so when he comes away, he brings skin with him. The inside of Riddle's wrist rips open, blood gushing as he hisses between his teeth less like a person and more like a snake. Sirius slumps back, heaving for breath and laughing, leaning against the side of the table and staring at Riddle with his blood staining his teeth.

"You," Riddle declares, "will regret that."

Sirius spits out whatever skin he took with him and leans his head against his bent arms, giving the man a cute, too-sweet smile. "Oh, no, I think that's my crowning achievement."

Riddle's nostrils flare as he pushes roughly to his feet, jerkily grabbing the jar and stuffing it back in his briefcase, clipping it shut and snatching it up. He sneers at Sirius. "You are a useless excuse for a human being. A waste of oxygen."

"Is that the best you've got?" Sirius arches an eyebrow up at him. "Please, my mother came up with better insults. If you're going to kill the woman, you could at least attempt to carry on her legacy. At this point, she's superior to you, and she's dead."

"The only reason you're still alive is because your screams will bend James Potter to my will," Riddle informs him coldly.

"Suppose I just won't scream then," Sirius challenges.

"Oh," Riddle whispers in threat, "you will."

With that and nothing else, Riddle whips around and marches out of the room, still dripping blood as he goes. Sirius blows out a deep breath as soon as the door shuts, then forces himself to his feet so he can shakily plant himself back in his chair. He still feels a little sick. Sort of hot. Itchy.

He stays still until the door opens again, and then he swivels his head and slaps on a grin. "Oh, Stuart, you're back!"

Probably-not-Stuart ignores him and comes over to unclip him from the table. The mask isn't put on again. Sirius is led from the room, but not back to the cell.

No, he's taken lower.

Much lower.

"Hello, neighbor," Lily greets as she leans against the open doorway of Mary's room. She winks at Bingley on the other bed across the room, breaking out into a grin when a giggle seems to spill out of him, which he responds to by shoving his face into his pillow in pure mortification.

"Not today, Lily," Mary says shortly, shoving loose papers into a bag. "Bing Bing and I have to go."

Bingley's head pops up as he groans. "Oh, come off it, Mary, do I have to?"

"Yes," Mary answers promptly, not even looking at Bingley as she snaps her fingers at him. He starts dragging himself up, looking utterly miserable. Lily bites her lip so she won't break out into a smile. "I don't care if there's a war on, your education will not suffer for it."

"Save me," Bingley whispers hopefully as he brushes past Lily in the doorway, eyes wide. He has eyes like Mary, so dark they're black, but he never rolls them at Lily, at least.

Lily snorts and lowers her voice. "Are you mental? She'll kill me if I try anything, and you know it."

"Pfft, she can't kill you," Bingley argues. "You're too cool."

"Bingley, stop stroking her ego. It's inflated enough as it is," Mary calls sharply. "Go on. Get to class."

"Can you come by again, Lily?" Bingley asks.

"No, she can't," Mary answers for her. "She's banned from my classroom. Now, go."

Bingley grumbles, but he dutifully heads off down the hall, stopping by the room of one of his friends to walk with them. Lily watches him go, amused, then turns back to watch Mary continue to grab…her lesson plans, probably? Maybe? Fuck if Lily knows. She knows nothing about teaching.

"I'm banned from your classroom now?"

"Yes."

"On what grounds?"

Mary shoots her a flat look. "On the grounds that you're distracting. Those grounds."

"Oh?" Lily grins at her. "Do I distract you, Mary? Make your job harder? Take your mind off your work? Make it hard to focus, perhaps? Take your—"

"Distracting for my students, particularly my little brother, who you like to sit in the back and giggle with, which—" Mary swivels and arches an eyebrow at her. "I know what you're doing, by the way. Stop it."

"I'm not doing anything."

"No? So, you're not trying to win over my brother to get to me?"

Lily leans her head against the doorway and hums. "You talk about my ego, but look at yours. If you must know, I'm not trying to win over Bingley. I have already done so. And getting to you—well, I hardly need his help with that."

"Give it a rest, Evans," Mary says dismissively.

"Oh, but you'd get bored if I did," Lily murmurs, her lips curling up at the corners. "Admit it, Macdonald, I keep your life exciting. If nothing else, I do manage that."

"Yeah, maybe, but that's hardly high praise," Mary counters, shouldering her bag and moving towards the door. "Personally, I think my life could do with a little less excitement."

"Shame. I think my life could do with a little more you," Lily teases, remaining in the doorway as Mary stops in front of her, looming a bit because she's taller and also in heels. Fucking hell, the heels are criminal. Her legs go for days.

"I can see you thinking naughty thoughts," Mary mutters.

"I like your legs," Lily says stupidly, because her brain and mouth have disconnected briefly, apparently. For fuck's sake, she's usually more smooth about it, but it's like with all that's happened in the past week, she's lost her touch.

"They're good legs," Mary allows.

"Long," Lily agrees.

Mary's lips twitch, then she looks annoyed about it. "No, nope, not doing this with you. You've caught me on a bad day."

"Have we had anything else lately?" Lily mumbles, her tone weary, and that immediately changes the whole mood. It's strange how there's this thing that connects certain people here together, inviting a sense of camaraderie between them, and the reminder of it overcomes everything else.

"No, suppose we haven't," Mary replies with a sigh. She arches an eyebrow at Lily. "It'd be easier for you if you actually spent time doing your chores. I know you got demoted to janitorial, but shirking your duties isn't helping your reputation."

"Fuck my reputation," Lily retorts with a scoff. "Do you honestly think I care about what anyone thinks of me anymore, especially here?"

"Yes, well, I don't have the luxury to not care, because my reputation reflects on my little brother," Mary says softly, adjusting her bag on her shoulder. "I'd like his time here to go a little smoothly at least."

Lily considers her for a long moment, then says, "You're a good sister, you know. A really good one."

"Oh, and you're the expert, are you?" Mary asks.

"I have one," Lily blurts out, then immediately wants to turn around and go in the opposite direction, possibly never speak to Mary again. Her feet feel nailed to the floor. "Had one, I mean. Well, maybe I still have one, I don't know anymore. I thought I had a best friend, but it turns out I still—well, he's still alive. So, you know, maybe I still have a sister, too."

Lily doesn't know why she's saying all of this. She wishes she wasn't. She's gone days not saying any of this to anyone, not daring to reveal the secretive hope that courses in her veins, not wanting to show just how much she cares—too human, too human, still too fucking human. She hasn't wanted the pitying looks she would surely get, or the gentle words of people who would feel the need to remind her of chances and odds and how, oftentimes, hoping in a world as fucked up as this one usually only leads to disappointment.

But, well, being under Mary's gaze is like being under a fucking scalpel; intense and sharp, peeling back the layers of her and taking a look inside. Or, no, it's like being x-rayed. Like Mary can see right down to her fucking bones. It is both unnerving and addictive, as well as terrifying. Lily gets trapped in the challenge of it, like a bargain with herself to see if she can get around Mary and keep her shit together, and what do you know? Not once has she managed to.

Mary doesn't look at her with pity. All she says is, "Well, for your sake, I hope you do. Bully for her, though. I can't imagine being your sister is anything other than hell."

"Oh, you think I'm bad?" Lily breathes out, laughing and feeling giddy almost, just to simply talk about her sister with the hope she's probably better off not having. "My sister is so, so much worse, you have no idea."

"Older or younger?"

"Older."

"Ah," Mary says, her gaze running from the top of Lily's head all the way down to her shoes, then back up again. Her mouth quirks at the corners. "Explains a lot about you."

"What's that supposed to mean?" Lily sputters.

"Younger siblings have this thing of wanting to be the center of a universe," Mary tells her wryly. "Older siblings tend to enable it. Not all, but—well, enough."

Lily rears back. "That's—not even close to true, and I can name one younger sibling right now that will completely deconstruct your entire argument."

"Don't say Regulus."

"I'm saying Regulus."

"Fool," Mary chides. "You, like many, are blinded by his personality to believe that this doesn't apply to him, too. It does. I never said the universe, I said a universe. Regulus doesn't want to be the center of the universe, but he wants nothing more than to be the center of Sirius and James'."

Lily opens her mouth, then closes it. Mary lifts an eyebrow smugly, so Lily has no choice but to scowl and pout and internally berate Regulus as a fellow younger sibling who has let her down. Damn him. He was the perfect counterargument.

"Okay, Aberforth," Lily challenges, snapping her fingers.

"District six was his universe. He put himself at the center of it and nearly died trying to stay there," Mary says.

"I—that's—" Lily wants to stomp her feet. She wants to bite the curl of Mary's shoulder. Oh, Mary is so pretty and smart and Lily thinks if they fuck, everything will be so much easier.

"You're thinking naughty thoughts again."

"Stop being right all the time."

Mary leans in with a smile, eyes like pools of ink that write countless stories Lily is desperate to read. Her hand is cool when it lands on Lily's side, a gentle pressure there, settling above the curve of Lily's hip and giving a slow push. As Lily turns under her guidance, Mary glides past her—and, while she goes by, she whispers in Lily's ear, "Never."

Lily nearly moans. Out loud. Just because Mary has gotten close and smells like sweet pea perfume and one of her curls brushed Lily's cheek and her breath had ghosted over the shell of Lily's ear, and oh, oh, Lily is in trouble.

Five minutes later, Lily bangs right into Remus' room down the hall, declaring, "I need to have sex."

"I'm not sure how I could help you with this problem," Remus replies. "The last time I checked, you don't fuck men." He pauses, pushing up on his elbows and looking aggrieved as he eyes her warily. "Wait, has that changed in the last six years?"

"No, that has not changed," Lily mumbles and resents that he even has to ask in the first place.

Remus blows out a deep breath and slumps back, clearly relieved. "Okay, great, that means I definitely can't help you with your problem."

"Tell me you don't want to fuck me without explicitly telling me you don't want to fuck me," Lily says flatly, kicking the door shut with her foot and moving over to shove his legs aside with a huff.

"What, are you joking? Of course I'd fuck you. It's my deepest desire, in fact." Remus arches an eyebrow and lazily props his arm up behind his head. "Come here, make my dreams come true, why don't you?"

Lily swings her leg over his lap and drops down on him as hard as she can, snorting when he bites his lip and bats his eyelashes up at her. "Excited yet?"

"Ecstatic," Remus tells her. "You know what would blow my fucking mind right now?"

"I've got an idea."

"Come on, rock my world."

"Anything for you," Lily says, reaching down the front of her shirt to dig out a smoke from the pack hidden in her bra. She reaches out to put it between his lips, then gets one for herself, grabbing her lighter at the same time. She lights her smoke, then leans down so her tip will connect with his, catching when he inhales. Lily gave him his first in six years days ago, and he'd coughed through the whole thing, then smoked five more back-to-back. "So, my problem."

"Mm," Remus hums, his eyes closed in pure bliss.

"Oi, pay attention." Lily wriggles in his lap, earning a warning look that makes her grin. "Anyway, my…reach, you could say, has been shortened significantly."

Remus blinks at her. "Your…reach?"

"I, ah, have a lot of sex."

"Lily, you've always had a lot of sex. I'm not sure why you're treating this like it's new? Or… different?"

Lily coughs. "I have a lot of sex with…a lot of women."

"Oh, so there's not—I mean, no girlfriend?" Remus asks, a touch awkward about it, and because she knows him, she knows he wants to avoid this topic so he won't be in danger of talking about Sirius.

"No," Lily murmurs. "No girlfriend."

Listen, she's not—she isn't bitter, okay? Really, it doesn't scald her insides a little bit that Remus was out there this entire time, and he found love, and she was here, running from it. That's not his fault. She's not angry with him about it, but she also sort of is. She's angry at him about a lot of things, none of which she knows how to voice yet. They used to talk about anything and everything. These days, they talk about anything and everything that isn't anything and everything.

"Well, get one," Remus suggests.

"Are you fucking stupid?" Lily snaps reflexively, recoiling back as a knee-jerk response. Remus blinks at her again, a wrinkle forming between his eyebrows. She clears her throat.

"Sorry. That was—rude. I don't think you're stupid."

Except she does, because he is, isn't he? What the hell was he thinking, going off and falling in love with Sirius Black, all while a servant? And just—falling in love, period. A doomed love, no less! The very thing she's spent years dodging, he walked right into with his eyes wide open.

Stupid, stupid, stupid.

She's angry with him for it, because that's such a him thing to do, except he's not much of himself anymore, not as she knew him. She's angry with him, because he looks like her best friend and doesn't, talks like her best friend and doesn't, acts like her best friend and doesn't, feels like her best friend and doesn't, is her best friend and…isn't.

The thing is, they don't really know each other anymore. They can't share looks and have conversations in the span of one blink. They almost don't seem to know how to move around one another as they used to, like a machine in two separate parts that could always merge, two bodies and one heart.

That's gone now. That ease that was always between them is just gone. Absent. Dead like he was for six years. She grieved him. She was still grieving him. He's back and where does that grief go, where does she put it, what does she do with it?

It hasn't left her, and she doesn't know what to do about it. She doesn't talk to him about it, and she knows he knows she's not talking to him about it, like she knows he's not talking to her about a lot of things, and he knows she knows that. It's a lot of knowing between them, despite the fact that they barely know anything about each other anymore.

A stranger is just someone you haven't met yet. What do you call someone you knew better than yourself that you no longer recognize? A ghost?

What is, really, is the struggle to grapple with change. Because they've both changed so much. Still Lily and still Remus, but not as they were, not as they never should have had to be. They know each other and do not know how they've changed. Lily has never known a Remus afraid of freedom, and Remus has never known a Lily afraid of love.

Worse yet is what sits between them. They don't talk about it, can't talk about it, because there's no fixing it. No fixing that Lily didn't save Sirius and was the one to deliver the news in the harshest, most devastating way possible. There's no way to overcome that, and Lily thinks the only chance they'll ever have is if they get Sirius back. He's become so important to her, Sirius has, because he's so important to Remus; she wants him here, for Remus, and will be the first to jump at the first opportunity to save him. Remus never talks about him. Won't. The first and only time Lily tried to bring him up, Remus shut her out so coldly that she still shivers just thinking about it.

There's a lot of shutting each other out, between them.

But, at the core of them, they're still barreling right into things they likely shouldn't, hand-in-chaotic-hand. It's probably best for them to actually take some time away from each other and adjust; instead, they are stubbornly sticking to one another like glue and steadily avoiding all the things they don't talk about, and they're equally obsessed with having each other again. Every night, Remus comes and crawls in her bed, and he cries there sometimes, but he's there, and she's there, and they don't speak because they don't have to, because they're still two bodies and one heart after all this time, if nothing else.

She feels like she misses him more right now when he's here than she did when she thought he was dead.

"Why can't you get a girlfriend?" Remus ventures cautiously. He's more cautious these days. It agitates Lily to see him like this, quiet and subdued sometimes, hesitant in a way he never used to be. He's always been a bit guarded about his more vulnerable feelings, though never with her, but now he's guarded about everything. It makes her want to shake him and scream at him, just so maybe he'll scream back.

"Relationships aren't really my thing."

"They…used to be."

Lily doesn't reply for a long moment, taking a pull from her smoke and letting the ash fall on his shirt. Neither of them try to brush it away. "Well, things change."

"Right," Remus says quietly. "Yeah, they do."

"Yeah." Lily sits there and smokes in silence, they both do, and then she clears the lump out of her throat. "Anyway, when it comes to sex, I'm deprived."

It's true, unfortunately. After Dumbledore released the footage to the whole world—including the Phoenix—he gave a speech to everyone in the Great Hall explaining that there was an unsanctioned mission conducted by 'a select few' that essentially ripped away the secrecy of the Phoenix and therefore the safety of everyone within.

Naturally, everyone knew who those select few were, and so now, Lily and Dorcas are both public enemy number one for the most part, and no one wants anything to do with them. I n short, everything is shit, and Dumbledore is a prick.

Remus hums thoughtfully. "What about Sybill? You two seem to get on well, and she's going through a breakup, so maybe it'll cheer her."

"Mm, been there," Lily admits. "Too messy now, in any case. Kingsley is—he's my—I mean —"

"Your…friend?" Remus suggests slowly.

Lily glares at him. "No. He's just—Kingsley. I'm not going to do that to him. He still loves her, you know, and she still loves him. They'll make up, I'm sure."

"Alright, hm." Remus purses his lips. "I'd say Dorcas, but…"

"Also been there," Lily mutters. "Would love to go back, if I'm honest, but don't tell anyone that. That's too complicated."

"Because of Marlene?"

"Sure, let's go with that."

Remus squints at her. "There's more you're not saying."

"Anyway," Lily says firmly, "next?"

"Hm. Fine." Remus keeps eyeing her for a beat, ultimately letting it go in the end. He never would have done that before he died. Or, not died. No, not—he didn't die. He's right here. Lily still forgets sometimes, usually when she first wakes up in the morning, still so sure she's living in a world without her best friend, and then having to remind herself that it's not true anymore, even if it still feels that way. "Mary?"

"That one," Lily says with a wistful sigh. "Oh, Remus, that one. Fuck me, she's just—she's so —"

"Oh," Remus muses, chuckling, "that's the one you want."

Lily huffs. "She's not exactly my number one fan. For some reason, I think maybe she doesn't like me. Well, no, I think she does, but I think she doesn't want to like me, and I know she won't have sex with me. She's maddening. Oh, she'll stand around and bicker with me for ages, get us both worked up, then let us hang there. And she doesn't listen! Like, ever. She's so nosy, too. Pushy. Fucking knows everything, which is utterly ridiculous. But then—I mean, I don't know, because she'll defend me, or she has defended me once, at least. And she's so good with Bingley, you know. That's her little brother, I don't know if you know him, but she loves him so much. She looks out for people, too. Her people, but all kids. Like—she's a fucking teacher, Remus, going around and shaping the minds of the youth, which is—that's just—"

"Lily—"

"And! And, ooh, she's brave as anything, really. Dropped into the arena in a heartbeat without even blinking. Well, you saw. Just—she has this sort of sense of justice, a clear definition of what she thinks is wrong, and she doesn't stand by and simply accept it, you know? She makes people own up to their shit, but she's not—she isn't harsh. She's so… I mean, she's an artist, for fuck's sake, and a good one. It's beautiful, the things she creates, which makes sense because she's beautiful—"

"Lily—"

"She's like pure duality, do you know what I mean? She—oh, oh, you don't know this. She fucking shot me! Remus, she literally shot me when we first met. Took my gun, shot me, then ran off in heels. Heels. It was so absurd, but maddeningly attractive. I don't know what I did to offend her, because it seemed like we'd get on at first, but then when she started settling in the Phoenix, she just seemed to dislike me. She makes a point to talk about my ego—I don't have a big ego, do I? Look, I can't help it that I'm confident about how good I am in bed. It's the truth! I could show her, if she'd just—"

"Lily!" Remus calls loudly, reaching up to cover her mouth so she'll shut up. Instinctively, as if they're still sixteen, she licks his palm. He huffs a laugh and drops his hand. "Okay, I get it. You fancy her. You've made your point."

Lily blinks down at him. "What? No, I don't. It's just—you know, sex. That's all. That's it."

"Right," Remus says, his voice flat. "I'm not going to push, only because you said she's not interested, so it's best to respect her wishes. But, well, you've got a crush, at the very least."

"I don't get crushes."

"Mhm, sure."

"Anyway," Lily snaps, "Mary is not an option, so…anyone else?"

"Ah…Pandora?" Remus tries.

Lily pauses. "Oh, hm. Pandora… I don't know her very well. Does she like women?"

"Um." Remus' lips tip down. "I—don't actually know. I mean, she's my friend, but I've never seen her with anyone, and the topic never came up. But…you can find out."

"She is very sweet."

"Very."

"Seems like she deserves nice things."

"She does."

"And you like her."

Remus smiles softly. "I do."

"Right." Lily smacks Remus' stomach and starts to climb off of him, then yelps when he stuffs his hand down her shirt to reach into her bra. "Hey, your fingers are cold!"

"Just going for the goods," Remus tells her, drawing out her smokes with a grin. "Carry on."

"Okay, I'm off to try and woo your friend into bed," Lily declares, shuffling along the side of the bed to dip down and kiss above his eyebrow, the very top of his scar.

"Best of luck," Remus calls as she draws back, waving lazily as he lights up another smoke and lets his eyes drift shut.

Lily closes the door behind her and pauses there, hearing all things they talked about, and all the things they didn't. A part of her wants to open the door and go back in to find a way to bridge the gap between them, or die trying, but she doesn't even know where to start. So, she doesn't.

She walks away.

Remus is on his fourth smoke when there's a knock on his door, which alarms him immediately. No one knocks on his door. Lily just barges in, and no one else comes to bother him.

Quickly, Remus sits up and hastily puts out his smoke, coughing and scrambling to tuck his ashtray in the drawer of the stand it sits on, then stuffs the pack of smokes under his pillow. There's a cloud of smoke that he frantically attempts to wave away, but he's not entirely sure it works. There are no fucking windows in an underground bunker.

"Ah, come in," Remus calls with a wince.

Of all the people who could show up at his door, he's not expecting Mrs. Potter. The sight of her poking her head in almost tentatively makes him freeze, wanting the floor to open up and swallow him whole. He hasn't seen her since the first time they met, only indirectly. He hasn't seen anyone other than Lily and hates himself for it. He's free, right? He should be—doing something, but he does nothing.

It's been a week, but Remus…doesn't get out much. He's been assigned to kitchen duty—ironic, really—so he usually eats when he's cooking the meals, which lets him skip breakfast, lunch, and dinner in the Great Hall. He's just. He doesn't know what to…do. He honestly has no fucking clue what to do with himself, or how to face anyone, or how to be—free.

He tried to do something, that first night. Tried to leave, to take his freedom by busting out to get to the Hallow, as if he could just stroll right in, grab Sirius, and say, "Sorry, this is mine, I'll be taking him back now." He looked like a fool, desperate as he was. They threw him in solitary for a night, a room so similar to Azkaban that he almost felt like he was still there. Lily apparently kicked up a fuss, and so did Regulus and Pandora, so he was released the next morning, but that one night was all it took.

One night, and Remus is stuck again. Hiding away. Lost in his own head, tormented with thoughts of what Sirius might be suffering—him and James. The guilt of it eats away at him, not managing to make sure James made it out, not managing to go and save Sirius now. So, he sits in his room, a warmer cell than he's used to, and sets his lungs on fire one smoke at a time. Grieving. Guilt-stricken. Lonely, and missing Sirius with every labored breath. No mask to make it harder to breathe, but losing Sirius smothers him more than a mask ever could.

The only change of pace and form of reprieve he gets is in the form of Lily, but that's not perfect either. It's not easy for them anymore, and she's—distant. There's something alien about her now, unreachable like she's stuck behind a barrier she won't let anyone break through. All her words have teeth.

"Hi, Remus," Mrs. Potter greets, easing inside slowly like she's giving him the chance to tell her to get out.

"Hello, Mrs. Potter," Remus says, a bit stilted, then struggles not to grimace at how formal and uncomfortable he sounds.

Mrs. Potter closes the door with a quiet chuckle, facing him with a small smile. Her eyes are a bit dull, her smile not quite reaching them, and she looks very tired. "Call me Effie, dear. Practically everyone does."

"Oh, right. Sorry, Mrs—ah, Effie," Remus mumbles.

"Do you mind if I sit?" Effie asks, pointing next to him.

Remus shifts quickly to make room. "Not at all."

"Thank you." Effie moves over and sinks into the open spot beside him, then visibly pauses. After a beat, she sniffs the air, then holds out her hand, lips twitching.

"Um," Remus says, his face burning. He's a grown man, for fuck's sake, but this is Sirius' mother.

"I've no desire to confiscate your smokes, Remus." Effie smiles at him again, wider, and wiggles her fingers. "I was rather hoping you'd share, actually."

"Oh," Remus chokes out, then wheezes on a startled laugh, but twists to indeed share with her. Again, she is Sirius' mother. His very beloved mother, at that. So, Remus gives her a smoke and brings out the ashtray. "I didn't know you…"

Effie hums around the smoke, lighting it and passing the lighter back to him. She inhales like she's been doing it for years, then blows out slow rings, looking faintly amused. "I'd ask that you don't tell my husband. He worries for the state of my lungs, and as far as he knows, I quit fifteen years ago. Well, I did quit, but I do share the occasional smoke with Sirius from time-to-time. He taught me to do the ring trick."

"Sirius smokes?" Remus whispers. Inexplicably, his eyes start to sting, because he—he didn't know that. He never knew that. They never discussed it, and he never saw it happen, and Sirius doesn't know he used to smoke, and doesn't know he's doing it again, because he's not here—he's not—he's—

"Not in the Hallow, as far as I know," Effie murmurs, glancing over at him sadly like she knows exactly what he's thinking and feeling. "It was always one of those things he kept at home, separate from the Hallow, just for him. He liked having things that existed outside of the Hallow."

Remus swallows harshly and nods. "Yeah, that's—that makes sense. Was there…anything else?"

Effie sighs. "There was something else. Something entirely untouched by the Hallow that he kept safe. Something he entrusted to me to keep safe when he couldn't."

A beat later, Effie reaches in her pocket and pulls out an envelope that Remus recognizes immediately. His breath freezes in his lungs, and he stares at it, feeling as if his mind has just run directly into a brick wall. That's. It's the letter. His letter. Lyall's letter. Remus never expected to see it again.

"I owe you an apology, Remus. Sirius asked that I would keep this safe, and I—I've had it with me ever since. He asked that I would return it to you if I ever saw you, and I did mean to, but this last week has been…" Effie's lips tremble a bit, and she blinks hard. Her hand shakes when she holds out the letter to him. "Forgive me. I should have come to you sooner."

Remus reaches out to take the letter, doing his level best not to let the building heat of tears in his eyes win. The letter isn't in the same pristine condition he left it in, now a bit wrinkled and bent at the corners, folded down and softened like fingers have run along the edges. That doesn't matter to him. It's the letter. His letter, from his father, that he left in Sirius' hands, and Sirius found a way to get it back to him.

"You have absolutely nothing to apologize for, Effie," Remus croaks, his voice coming out thick and shaky. He keeps swallowing convulsively, feeling as if his heart has shot up to lodge in his throat. "Thank you. I—I can't even—I—"

"It's okay, Remus." Effie reaches out with her free hand and gently pats his knee. She squeezes it, then looks away and keeps smoking, seeming to understand that he needs a moment to get himself together. "I didn't read it. No one has other than you, I presume. I do apologize for the state of it, though. I've had it through…everything that's happened as of late. Losing my home. Losing my—"

"I'm sorry," Remus whispers, squeezing his eyes shut. "I'm so sorry, Effie. I wanted—I didn't want to leave James. I tried to get him to—to get in the van, but he—I don't know why he wouldn't. He just lost Frank, so maybe… I just—I'm sorry."

Effie clears her throat and stands up to put out her smoke in the ashtray, then turns to him, holding his gaze. "I sat Dorcas down and asked for details about everything that happened. I know my children, Remus. I know how far they'll go for each other and those they love, and that includes you. None of that is your fault. No one is to blame, not you or Dorcas or Regulus. The person who is at fault for James staying behind is James, because he is an adult who can make his own decisions. It's a hard pill to swallow, but he chose not to leave the Hallow for Sirius, for Regulus, for you and me and many people, and above all, he chose not to leave for himself."

"Are you angry at him for it?" Remus asks softly.

"Yes," Effie answers bluntly, then tilts her chin up. "And, just the same, I am immeasurably proud of him for it. The truth is, it's no different than many of us would have done. I would go there now if I could. I'd storm the Hallow just to try for them, even if I couldn't make it more than one step inside. There is such bravery in simply trying. We find our strength inside us, and the people around us, and through love—and those boys are some of the strongest people I've ever known."

"I know they are," Remus agrees hoarsely, having to turn his head away and look down as his vision blurs. He's all cut up with it, torn up about it, feeling ripped to shreds by how badly he aches in the aftermath of loss. It's not fair.

"They'll try until their last breath, and they haven't stopped breathing yet, Remus. Neither have we. I think we can join them in trying, not because we owe that to them, but because we owe that to ourselves," Effie whispers fiercely, stepping forward to cup his jaw and carefully turn his head, making him look at her. She doesn't judge him for the tears that fall. "We are still here, and they are still there, and no matter what any of us go through, we will find our way back to each other again. I believe that. I have to believe that."

"I want to believe that," Remus confesses, because he does, and he's desperate to. Pleading for a reason. Begging for a spark of hope. Needing it. Please, please, please.

"Then try," Effie says, and it's so simple, two words, but it's like she's unlocked something within him.

Remus promised Sirius he would never forget his worth, how invaluable he is, even if Sirius wasn't here to remind him, and yet that's exactly what he's done. He's human. He's a person, who deserves to have hope, who has the freedom to try.

Ridiculous as it may be, Remus chokes out a laugh that may or may not be half a sob, but it doesn't matter, because he nods into Effie's gentle hand and says, "Okay."

Let's get this out of the way right now, because Dorcas is sure it goes without saying, but it's been one hell of a week.

When she made her choice to set all of these things into motion and start the war, she had come to terms with the fact that there was no going back, but what she hadn't realized was that the aftermath of her decisions would look like this.

Marlene didn't make it out of surgery until late in the night, and she didn't wake up until the third day. Dorcas wasn't at her bedside when she did. She was too late. Again. As always.

Dorcas wasn't prepared. She hadn't really been at her best, exhausted and running on fumes. She was going and going and going with no chance to stop for rest, which was apparently due to the mantle of her new proclivity for leadership.

You did this, Ms. Meadowes, Dumbledore told her. You don't get to quit now.

It felt like both a challenge and a punishment, and Dorcas didn't back down from either. She stepped up and stepped in to help all those she brought in, either through her own means, or through her own planning. This required assigning rooms, helping people settle in, providing reassurances that felt like half-lies and explaining rules she barely wants to follow herself. This required giving orders and fulfilling tasks, as well as answering unanswerable questions and providing assistance with everything from carting food around to being a reluctant tour guide around the Phoenix.

This required watching Riddle's broadcast explaining that the games were stopped early be interrupted through the help of Filius by releasing the footage of what happened in the arena during the rescue mission. Then, days later, watching a new broadcast in which everyone who broke into the arena were labeled as anarchists, while Riddle twisted the truth of the Hallow escape by labeling everyone who made it out as prisoners of war, and also twisted Frank's death into martyrdom to paint the 'anarchists' in a very bad light.

When she did get a second to return to the infirmary and get an update on Marlene, she'd had to tuck herself in a corner and stuff the back of her fist into her mouth to muffle her sobs when Poppy informed her that Marlene made it through and would make a full recovery with time. She'd slid down the wall and cried and breathed, and then got up and kept going.

On the third day, when Marlene did wake up, Cordelia—her cousin—was the one waiting there for her, while Cordelia's husband, Riker, stayed outside with their baby, Maximus. Dorcas knows this, because she rushed past them to scramble inside, rushing to Marlene's side after Minerva notified her that she was awake, which she learned from Poppy. Minerva knew she would want to know, and of course Dorcas dropped everything to immediately go to Marlene.

The reunion hadn't gone well.

By the time Dorcas had made it there, Marlene had mostly been caught up by Cordelia and the input Arthur provided, because he was cheerfully answering her questions and doing everything he could to keep her calm. When Dorcas got there, Marlene met her eyes and told everyone else to get out. Her gaze had been cold, and her voice even colder.

Dorcas' heart had dropped, but—well, what was she expecting, really? It was ironic, but Dorcas still didn't know, even then, how she was supposed to explain her part in all of this to Marlene. She thought to herself before that she would deal with that problem when she got to it, and well.

Well, there it was.

What was she supposed to say? The truth, finally, because she didn't really have a choice, did she? Dorcas felt guilt clog her throat as she realized that she—she wasn't so sure if she wanted Marlene to know the truth. The lie was easier. The lie was safer. The lie was all Dorcas knew.

But, well, she didn't have a choice. Marlene had already gotten bits and pieces of it, here and there, and she deserved to hear it from her. It was time for Dorcas to own up to her shit.

So, Dorcas did.

She told Marlene how she got involved herself years ago by one drunken conversation with Alastor Moody at a bar when he was there for his Victor's victory tour that year. He'd gone out for a drink, or five, and Dorcas had just been someone at the bar he struck up a conversation with. Casual at first, light, and then much heavier by the end of the night. He picked her brain open and rooted around to find what he was looking for, and then he followed up. Less than a week later, Dorcas was stepping into the Phoenix for the very first time.

She told Marlene how she felt so driven to help, to make change, always wanting to through fashion and then taking the immediate chance to do it this way, too. When Moody had died and the mourning period had passed, Dumbledore asked her if she was willing to take on a higher position to cover the loss of what Moody provided for the war. She was willing, and so she agreed, and she did it. She did it a little too well.

She told Marlene how she worked her way into the central hub of the games by becoming a stylist, originally supposed to sway public opinion through fashion for the tributes she was to work with, as well as find more recruitments along the way. Gideon and Fabian had been recruited beforehand, recruited only a few days after they came to her with humble, yet charming requests to work with her. They'd been in the Order for only six weeks—just long enough for them to have visited the Phoenix twice and gotten orders for their first, last, and only mission—before they were sacrificed for her sake.

She told Marlene how she got them killed, how it was her fault, and how she could not bear to lead Marlene to that same fate. All she wanted to do was keep Marlene safe. She never meant to put her at risk. She never meant to fall in love with her and make her a priority over the war.

She told Marlene how it happened anyway, and how she did everything she could to save her, up to and including starting a fucking war. She told Marlene everything.

That sat between them for a while, like a bomb about to go off in their laps, and Dorcas knew —she knew that Marlene was seeing right through her, thinking back on every conversation they ever had, every opportunity Dorcas could have taken to involve her, to invite her into this part of Dorcas' life, and this cause. Could have, but didn't. Chose not to.

In the end, Marlene had told her to get out, too.

So, Dorcas did, and she kept going.

In the meantime, the less injured tributes have all healed up, gotten rooms and food and a chance to adjust. Same for the previous servants. Asher pulled through, just like Marlene, but she was released three days ago. She's now in a wheelchair and seems as eager to work with Poppy on the biological warfare issue as Dumbledore and Poppy are to consult with her.

Marlene had been released from the infirmary the day after Asher, two days ago now. She'd spent five days in the infirmary altogether, because she needed more time between the bullet wound to her chest, recovering from surgery, and her broken arm. Fortunately, the Phoenix does have access to some of the same medical advancements that the Hallow does, either through what information the Order has stolen throughout the years, or from district one recruits who had a hand in creating said medical advancements.

So, Marlene's healing has made miraculous leaps and bounds. She's up and walking around, though she's a bit slow about it, and her arm is in a proper sling. It should be coming off in a few days, which Dorcas only knows because Cordelia—lovely, wonderful Cordelia—has happily given Dorcas updates on Marlene's condition. See, Cordelia loves Dorcas, loudly and proudly likes her and approves of her for Marlene, shamelessly grateful for Dorcas because she saved Marlene. She tells Dorcas all the time to let Marlene cool off, and they'll be fine.

It's a nice thought, and Dorcas has decided to believe that, because she simply refuses to accept that, after everything, what little bit of more that they were is just gone. No, she's not entitled to Marlene in any capacity just because she saved her. That's not it at all. She just…

Well, maybe she had fooled herself into thinking that she and Marlene could have more once they were here, once everything had been brought to light, once they managed to make it through.

Here they are, on the other side of hell, and what do they have to show for it other than the demons they brought with them?

But, well, Dorcas is bold and isn't one to back down, not really. She has given Marlene space, hasn't approached her, hasn't bothered her since she was told to leave. She was going to wait for Marlene to come to her, honestly, except she desperately misses her and wants so very badly to see that she's okay. That's all. She just wants to tell her she loves her.

So, Dorcas is at Marlene's door, trying to convince herself to knock. It takes her a few minutes, but she inevitably does, and then she's left waiting. She holds her breath.

The door opens, and then the door immediately starts to shut, and Dorcas chokes out, "Wait. Marlene, please wait. Just—"

The door slams, only for it to wrench right back open. Dorcas gets one second to suck in a sharp breath of hope, and then something small hits her right in the chest and bounces off to land on the floor with a cold ting. Dorcas glances down at the ring Marlene just threw at her, staring at it and feeling every inch of the Hallow she is for how hollow she becomes when the door slams one final time, and doesn't open again.

Dorcas picks up the ring and walks away. As she goes, she wonders what it'll take to get the ring on Marlene's finger a third time. Whatever it takes, Dorcas will do it.

For Marlene, she always does.

"Did you check?" Regulus asks.

"Yes," Barty says, heaving a sigh, "I checked. I told you I would, didn't I? The vent is sealed in my room, too."

"And you?" Regulus demands, swiveling on the spot to narrow his eyes at Rabastan. "Did you check?"

"Sealed for us, too," Rabastan murmurs, gesturing between himself and Rodolphus. He glances at Asher. "Did you—"

"Sealed," Asher confirms.

Regulus grinds his teeth. "There's surveillance all over, no way in or out, and slipping past patrols is fucking impossible. If I don't get a route out, I'm going to start killing people."

"Is Pandora into women?" Rodolphus asks, turning to Regulus very abruptly, his eyebrows wrinkled.

"What?" Regulus snaps. "What does that have to do with—"

"No offense, but give it a rest, man," Rodolphus mutters, waving a hand. "You're not busting your way out of here, not unless Beard-Man says you can go, so—ya know, chill out. In the meantime, you can tell me if Pandora is into women."

Regulus stares at him.

Rodolphus coughs. "Just—that cool lady who you fought, the one who busted into the arena —"

"Lily," Rabastan, Regulus, Barty, and Asher all say at the same time.

"Right, that one. Lily," Rodolphus says, lips tipping down. "I think she's—I mean, I'm pretty sure she's hitting on Pandora right now just across the room, and I'm wondering—well, does she have a chance? Does Pandora like women?"

"Why do you care?" Regulus asks, narrowing his eyes, though a part of his brain can't believe he's having this conversation right now. He can't believe a lot of things, because they're never things involving getting to Sirius and James, and so he deems them unfathomable on principle.

Rabastan snorts. "Is she crazy? Pandora, I mean. He likes them crazy. That's why he was with Bellatrix." There's a pause, and everyone looks at Regulus. Rabastan grimaces. "Sorry."

Regulus doesn't acknowledge that. Doesn't even grant it a second thought. The most he lets Bellatrix enter his mind is in his nightmares, or when Narcissa sweeps past him. She looks at him sometimes. Andromeda softened her after all. Just yesterday, they both stopped to talk to him very briefly and very stiffly, and he'd wanted to fold himself up until he just disappeared. He managed a smile anyway, tight as it was, because Dora had crawled into his lap with a grin.

The reunion with Nymphadora had been painful and lovely, all at once. He'd heard her before he saw her, just that loud shriek of Reggie at top volume with undeniable child-like joy. He'd been two days out of the arena, and she'd launched herself at him, throwing her arms around his neck, and he'd just—he'd cried, helplessly. You're not supposed to cry in front of children, he doesn't think, but he did. He couldn't help it at the time. He was so fucking fragile in the aftermath of everything, and Sirius calls him that. Reggie.

It's a bittersweet sort of acknowledgement, just that recognition of finding his brother in the people around him. Sirius is everywhere he looks, really. In Effie and Monty. In the playful shoves and laughter shared between Rabastan and Rodolphus. In Andromeda's head held high and Narcissa's sharp, watchful eyes. In the back of Regulus' mind, talking to him always, providing running commentary that usually gets him through the day, like this is just a new arena and Sirius is still the one he trusts to help him survive.

This place lacks James, much to Regulus' bitter resentment. He only finds James in Effie and Monty, which is partially why he spends practically most of his time with them. But no one can properly encompass the sheer enormity of James himself. There's not even fucking sunshine down here.

In any case, Dora had only hugged him and told him it was okay to cry, extending tragic company in his misery by telling him that she cried, too. Cried a lot, in fact. Cried for her dad, who is gone now and won't be returning to her like Regulus did. She'd cried with him then, and they'd cried together, and Regulus had felt like no less of a child in that moment than she did. Andromeda hadn't interrupted them.

Regulus knows she would have had every right to. Andy has been through a lot as of late. She was injured, lost her home, lost her husband, then lost her sister. Got the other back, but that doesn't change that Bellatrix is dead, and he's the one who killed her. She—along with Narcissa—would have every right to hate him, and keep Dora away from him.

Andromeda doesn't, though. When he tried to apologize to her, she had said, simply, that they would never discuss it. So, they don't. Narcissa doesn't touch Regulus anymore, not even to comfort him, or to try. She's not outright cruel, but there is a frigid distance now, one that he knows they'll never be able to cross.

He's always going to be dead to her, for as long as Bellatrix is. Just another one of those fucked up parts of their family that they'll continue on in spite of.

Honestly, to Regulus, it went as well as it could have. He is their sister's murderer. Most of the time, they still treat him as if he's just their youngest cousin. He can live with that. He does, and they do, too. They don't really have any other option.

But no, Regulus doesn't think about Bellatrix very much, not because she doesn't haunt him—she does, as do many things from the arena—but because he has other things to focus on, namely on figuring out how to get the fuck out of here.

He hasn't made much progress.

"Pandora is crazy," Rodolphus confirms to Rabastan, who immediately rolls his eyes. Rodolphus sighs wistfully, putting his chin in his hand. "And I do like crazy."

Regulus' fingers itch for a dagger. His eyes are narrowed so far now that he almost can't see. "You're going to leave her be."

"Mm, no, I don't think I will," Rodolphus replies, pursing his lips. "Unless—I mean, if she's not into men, fair enough. But if she is, then I'm shooting my shot. Is she?"

Regulus—doesn't actually know, admittedly, but regardless he will kill this man. "Okay, let me reiterate. Pandora is someone very important to me. I am telling you this explicitly, right now, if you shoot your shot and fuck up in any way, I will let her pick a part of your body to take as a trophy, then remove it and give it to her. Still interested?"

"Even more so," Rodolphus says, wiggling his eyebrows. "She's got crazy friends, too. That's hot."

"You know," Barty muses lightly, "I'm crazy."

Rodolphus pauses and eyes him. Flicks his gaze across the room where Lily is chatting with Pandora. Glances back at Barty. "Okay, I'll shoot my shot later. You first."

"I like a man who has his priorities straight," Barty chirps, hopping to his feet and glancing at Regulus. "See you?"

"Mhm," Regulus hums, watching Barty and Rodolphus leave with a sigh. He shakes his head. Lovely, now he'll have to hear all those details later when he's curled up in bed with Barty and doing his best not to cry because he's not James.

"That means I'll have the room to myself," Rabastan breathes out, sounding relieved, and Regulus does his best not to snap at him and tell him not to take his big brother's presence for granted. What Regulus would not give for Sirius to be around to annoy him, and invade his space, and—and—and—

"I'm coming with you," Asher says, wheeling back from the table and beaming up at Rabastan.

Rabastan's face softens. "Don't you always?"

"Have a problem with that?"

"No, no, definitely not. I just—"

"Because, if I remember correctly, it was you who said we'd made it through hell together, so we could keep doing that, and just fucking die together too, while we're at it."

"Right, right, I did say that. Yes, okay, come on. Do you want me to push you to the—"

"I don't need you to push. I can wheel myself."

"Yes ma'am."

Asher's lips twitch, rolling along as Rabastan follows after like a lost puppy. "So, about dying together, how do you think we'll go? I'm thinking something fun. Poison, preferably."

"Shit, I think I like crazy, too," Rabastan chokes out, and Asher tosses her head back as she laughs. Rabastan grins down at her. "No, uh, maybe…we die from old age? Wouldn't that be nice? I think that'd be nice."

"Not as fun," Asher points out, "and that's a long time to stick together, don't you think?"

The last thing Regulus hears before they're too far away to be heard is Rabastan saying, "Yeah, that's the nice part."

Regulus hates them all. Everyone who dares to have their sibling, everyone who dares to have sex, everyone who dares to feel love. He hates, hates, hates them.

Huffing, Regulus stands up and moves to go interrupt Lily in flirting with a seemingly oblivious Pandora. Lily looks deeply displeased by this. Regulus ignores her and feels something settle in him when Pandora beams at him, leaning her arm against his and taking his hand under the table, squeezing it.

For a moment, Regulus gets a little reprieve in making sure that Pandora, at the very least, is safe from anyone who could do her harm of any variety, even in the love department.

It's for the best, really. The love department hurts the worst.

He would know.

James taps his foot impatiently against the floor and grips the arms of the cushioned chair he's forced to wait in. The office is eerily silent, but the muffled sounds of protesting down past the castle grounds drifts up through the cracked window.

It's music to his ears, frankly. Hallow is hollow, Hallow is hollow, Hallow is hollow, they all chant. They're Hallows themselves, no doubt, but the meaning behind it speaks volumes. To know that there are some Hallows—many, in fact, by the sounds of it—that are actively protesting right outside of Riddle's castle is invigorating.

Living in Riddle's castle is…strange. It's opulent, for one thing. He has his own personal servant who brings him food, clothes for each day, and takes the clothes he wore the day before. He's had two servants so far. The first was killed in front of him, because he made the mistake of touching them, catching their arm to halt them and trying, gently, to talk to them. A mere few minutes later, Aurors came in to hold him in place and make him watch as that servant was shot. The next servant never raises their head or acknowledges him, and he goes out of his way to not even get near them.

In his room, there's a very comfortable bed and a screen on the wall. He's not sure why he's allowed to keep up with current events, but he is. The day following the escape from the arena, and the Hallow, Riddle's broadcast explaining that the games were ending early for unforeseen circumstances was interrupted by…well, the unforeseen circumstances.

James had seen most of it already while it was happening, the arena rescue, but he hadn't seen Mary save Regulus. Hadn't watched Regulus make it to safety with his own two eyes. Hadn't realized how fucking dangerous it was for Mary to speak her name, or Lily's, or just how worrying it was that the others there were picked up on the camera. Some of the faces James didn't recognize, but he saw Barty there.

The Hallows know their faces now, as well as their names, because Riddle cut his broadcast short and went silent for a few days, then came back and announced that there was a group of anarchists that set out to put the safety and harmony of the Hallow in danger through war. That's when James really saw an uptick in the protests outside the castle. Either people don't believe his shitty excuses, or they're angry with him for failing to keep this from happening.

Whatever it is, the names of everyone involved in the arena rescue have been released, or at least those that Riddle could get information on, apparently. Lily Evans, Mary Macdonald, and Barty Crouch Jr. The other two—Sybill and Amos—have anonymity in that their last names aren't known, but that's hardly a consolation. Along with the others, their faces have been blown up and marked as anarchists. Riddle's broadcast made it clear; these people are wanted, and any information regarding their whereabouts is to be turned in immediately, and they're labeled as armed and dangerous.

It's not limited to just them, though. All the servants—all twelve of them—have been broadcasted as escaped convicts, also dangerous people; any information regarding them is supposed to be turned in, too. Seeing Remus on his screen had set James' heart ablaze, because all he could think about was how he was free, yes, but he'd be at the Phoenix now, and he'd know that Sirius didn't make it out of the arena.

Rodolphus, Pandora, Dorcas, and Minerva have not been broadcasted as anarchists, but rather prisoners of war, who the anarchists apparently abducted. It's smart, James supposes, because these are either Hallows or people that the Hallows, in some way or another, idolized. To paint them as anarchists would surely garner further support, but to say they've been captured by anarchists and taken from the Hallow changes the whole narrative while still ensuring any information about them will be turned in. Frank was used in this way as well; his death was blamed on the anarchists and broadcasted as further proof that said anarchists are the 'bad guys'. The same thing had been said about Lucius and Dolohov.

No information has been released about Sirius or James.

As for James, he's been recovering, mostly. Between the fight to escape the Hallow and the car wreck at the end—a fight to stay—his body had been put through hell. He'd been given top notch healing from the Hallow medical advancements, but there are some things only a few days of rest can cure. A new cane has been provided for him, but the outside of it is wrapped in a soft, pillow-y material that means if he hits someone with any part of it, he won't do much damage.

Not much has changed with him overall, other than being absolutely capsized by grief for Frank, missing his family, missing Regulus, and just—feeling shitty, basically.

Oh, and he can now see. Yes, like with his eyes. His glasses are just gone, and yet James can still see. Perfectly. He doesn't have contacts in; he knows, because he checked. This means that, without his permission, someone did the operation to fix his eyesight permanently. It's such an attack against his own autonomy that he doesn't even know what to do about it, or how to feel, and all he can ever think about is how upset Regulus gets when James' glasses get taken away.

He hasn't seen Riddle yet. James isn't sure why. The man is likely very busy, but James honestly expected to be tortured every day or something. After all, James has information he wants, doesn't he? James isn't stupid; he knows that Riddle wants something from him, probably a lot of things, and he's prepared to die to not give it to him. Ready and willing to laugh through his last breath while giving Riddle nothing.

There's nothing Riddle can do to get anything out of him, and James sits here in this office he's been escorted to, quite sure he's about to get to prove it.

Sure enough, the door eventually opens, and Riddle sweeps in without a break in his stride. James tenses in his chair, gaze following him. His hands are free. He's not bound. He could get up and snap Riddle's neck.

A quick look over the back of the chair immediately kills that idea, because an Auror stands by the door, gun in hand. Yeah, okay, so James would be killed before he could even fully come out of the chair. He turns his gaze back to Riddle, who swings around the other side of his desk to close the window and silence the sound of the protests, then sits down.

They sit there across from each other in silence for a long moment, Riddle surveying him with his hands threaded on top of the desk, and James sitting still with his jaw clenched.

Then, without a word, Riddle reaches in his inner suit jacket pocket to pull out a recorder and sit it down on the desk. He presses the button, and every muscle in James' body locks up when screams split the silence. Screams James recognizes. Screams James has heard in his nightmares. Sirius' screams.

It just keeps going. James stares at the recorder with pure horror, feeling sick and shaky, wanting to claw his own ears off or crush the recorder in his fist. He's on the brink of begging for it to stop, please stop, when the recorder stops and Riddle opens up his laptop on his desk, clicks a few buttons, then swivels it to face James. On the screen, there's a grainy video of Sirius, who is sitting in a cell on the dingy bed, literally twiddling his thumbs. There's a mask on his face.

"Sirius sends his regards," Riddle says.

James doesn't look away from the screen. Can't. He stares at it hungrily, Sirius' screams still ringing in his ears. Sirius looks fine, overall. Well, his hair is tangled, and he doesn't look his best while literally in prison, but he doesn't look like he's in pain. In fact, he just looks… bored. Yeah, James knows what Sirius looks like when he's bored, and it's that. All that restless energy, that inability to sit still, always staying in motion. But, most importantly, he's alive.

"Leave us," Riddle continues.

The door opens and closes, and James only checks to see the Auror gone when Riddle closes the laptop. Right, well, it's not like James is going to kill Riddle now, after all that. Not when doing so could end with Sirius hurt, or dead, or worse.

"Let's cut right to the chase," Riddle declares, holding his gaze with those dead, hollow eyes of his. "Sirius is in Azkaban, at my mercy, and if you cooperate, his time there will be free of further torture or future death. His life and well-being is in your hands, James, so I implore you to comply. For his sake."

"Bring him here," James demands. "Bring him to me."

"No," Riddle counters simply.

James grits his teeth. "Then how do I know you're not lying? He could be—you could have killed him already. That could be older surveillance, or you could be torturing him anyway __"

"Don't be a fool. Frankly, I haven't the time," Riddle cuts in sharply. "I am very aware that your compliance is dependent upon Sirius' vitality. That is my leverage over you, James, and I need not play games with you to use it. I want your full cooperation, and to get it, I have to give you something you want. I know how this works."

"I want to see him for myself," James says.

Riddle pauses, then inclines his head. "Very well, I'll permit you to visit him, but only when you've earned it. The term that applies here is tit-for-tat. You give me something, I give you something. Does that work for you?"

"What do you want?" James snaps, hating himself for it already, just how quickly he's changed his tune. Somehow, for some reason, he never considered that Sirius could be used against him in all of this. Fuck. Oh, he's so fucking stupid.

"I have spent the last week gathering information on the organization of anarchists that oppose me," Riddle explains, leaning back in his chair. "I have a feeling you know more."

"I don't know anything," James croaks.

"You're an awful liar, James. For Sirius' sake, you need to become a better one, or tell the truth," Riddle murmurs.

James swallows. Shit, shit, shit. "I really don't know—"

"If I reach for my laptop and press one button, Sirius will be dragged from his cell and tortured," Riddle interrupts calmly, never breaking his gaze. It's not an empty threat. "You will hear it as it happens. You will be the cause of it, because you have the power to prevent it. Choose your next words wisely."

James' heart thuds in his chest painfully, his hands shaking in his lap. He feels like a child. He wishes he was a child again. Just a young boy tumbling into his best friend for the very first time; he'd go back there, if he could.

But here he is. He's right here, and this is going to break him. It's going to tear him the fuck apart. He can't call Riddle's bluff, because Riddle isn't bluffing.

What is James supposed to do? Sirius wouldn't want him to breathe a word of anything he knows, especially not if it could put Regulus in danger. He'd rather be tortured to the point of insanity and beyond, and James knows it. But—but Regulus. Oh, Regulus would never—he'd never forgive James if he didn't spare Sirius from any pain that he could, especially not in the name of protecting him. It's so—he's just—he's caught in between them, caught in a trap he willingly walked into, because he is a fool. Riddle said it, and he was right.

All James has, at this point, is the hope that those on the other side of the war against Riddle are strong enough to defeat him no matter what James says or does. What Riddle doesn't know yet and may never understand is that he only has James, but the resistance? The resistance has James' parents, and Regulus, and Remus, and Dorcas, and so very many others that can beat him, if they'll stand together. James is one person, just one, and no matter what he does or how he helps Riddle in the endeavor to help Sirius, the very people James loves and believes in will win. James doesn't just hope for that; he knows that with every breath he takes and every decision he makes.

The odds are not in Riddle's favor. If you ask James, he'll bet on his people every fucking time. It's not a game of chance, or luck, but a game of faith—and James has that in spades.

So, James exhales and lifts his gaze to meet Riddle's, then opens his mouth and starts with, "The organization opposing you is called the Order of the Phoenix…"

Chapter End Notes

for those of you who need/want to know what the procedure is, and to whom it happens to, SPOILERS AHEAD: its the procedure to fix someone's vision (i use the term "fix" very loosely, simply bc i didn't name the procedure in the context of the Hallow, but like, me nor the character nor anyone else saw/see it as something to "fix" at all) and the person it happens to is james, while he's healing up after his car crash. he has no recollection of it happening, meaning they did it before he woke up/became lucid. it's only briefly mentioned in james' pov, because he doesn't know how to feel about it/process it, because it makes him uncomfortable. it will be addressed again, and believe it or not, resolved later.

for everyone else, let's start from the top!

oh, sirius my beloved <3 you can probably tell from his entire pov, but i was genuinely so relieved to get to write his pov again. like, i missed him??? so much??? so, it probably shined through how happy i was just to see him again, because god, he really brightens everything, doesn't he?

like, only sirius could be in such a shit situation and still be cracking jokes and complaining about how bored he is 😭 if he were leaving a review, he would give azkaban a zero out of five stars. he is NOT having a good time. sirius 🤝 regulus: ending up in perilous situations and feeling wholly unimpressed with them.

also lmaooo sirius literally in prison and still killing people 😭 he really said: you put me in prison, im gonna commit crimes, duh 🙄 he's everything to me that whole bit with riddle... ooooh, the way sirius would NOT give in, until james was threatened, and how riddle deliberately showed him that, just so sirius would know how EXACTLY riddle planned to control james using sirius. and sirius biting him and being a fucking menace, i love him so much.

cut to lily! oooh, her and mary 👀 the girls are flirtinggggggg 🥰 sorry, i just think they're neat. mary being right all the time, so true.

but oof, lily and remus, big yikes at the moment. like i said, they have some things to work through, and they WILL, but they're not working through them right this particular second because they're both Very Stubborn. this is really hard for lily especially, as you can clearly tell, bc she closed herself off, and having to open up again isn't so simple. when she does, though, she enters a whole new era. i love it for her tbh.

speaking of remus, he's clearly having a hard time as well. this is particularly hard for him coming from one life of imprisonment to another, and now knowing that sirius—along with james—could be suffering the same things he has? like, that's a huuuge hit for him. and he really needed that push from effie, because it gets the ball rolling, so to speak. but also the parallels of sirius being a mess around lyall and remus being awkward around effie is so cute to me 😭 cut to dorcas—and marlene. so. that's not going well. 😬 tbh, if i was marlene, id be hacked off too. like, imagine the girl you've fallen in love with, who acted like she was just a stylist, turns out to be a part of a secret rebellion that she KNOWS you'd want to be a part of, except she hid it because SHE decided SHE didn't want you involved. like??? ohhh, marlene is so mad yall. throw the ring right at her type of mad 😭 we'll see more of them soon, i assure you.

then there's regulus—also not having a good time. his reunion with dora 😭 also² lmaoooo, him being ready to kill anyone who comes within 5ft of pandora at all times. but just the general underlying grief he's dealing with, and how fixated he is on saving james and sirius. he's trying so hard :( and lastly, james... sigh. giving away secrets, not very girlboss of him. he's really doing his best, but he's put in this impossible position where no matter which way he goes, nothing good comes from it, AND he's being manipulated. it's such a fucked up situation :(

the reveal that sirius DID scream hurt so bad yall, but believe me, it's...not as bad as it could be? i know that sounds insensitive, but trust me, you'll see what i mean later.

HONORABLE MENTIONS:

-sirius taunting probably-not-stuart and riddle 😭
-remus smoking for the first time in 6 years with lily and then just. choosing to pick up the habit again lmaooo
-lily "are you fucking stupid?" evans 😭 pls i love her
-rodolphus "i will hit every step on the crazy ladder if it kills me" lestrange living his truth and getting with the most insane, available people he meets every chance he gets
-rebastan and asher <3
-pandora literally being oblivious to being flirted with by everyone
-barty and regulus platonically cuddling together again, but make it sad
-remus got his letter back!!!

-cordelia loving dorcas <3
-james having faith in the people he loves <3

so...enjoy!

Remus watches in vague amusement as Lily presses herself up behind Pandora and slides her arms out to readjust Pandora's grip on the gun, murmuring in her ear. There is a slow nod, then Pandora turns her head and smiles, visibly oblivious to the fact that she's being flirted with. Lily has been flirting with Pandora for a few days now, ever since she came to him about apparently needing to have sex, and all Remus has seen her succeed in doing is become Pandora's friend.

Pandora, ever since the mission to escape the Hallow, has taken to training. She does a lot of training these days, keeping herself busy, sparring with Dorcas, or letting Lily teach her about guns, and when neither of them are available, it's Rodolphus. She generally goes to him for efficiency, Remus thinks, because she knows Rodolphus will say yes and indulge her by immediately dropping whatever he's doing to go with her instead; he's apparently done it enough times for her to be sure of it now, or so Pandora said. She told Remus all of this with the air of a woman entirely clueless as to why it was like that. Remus could tell her, but honestly, it's kind of fun to watch as it is, and the last thing Pandora needs is something to worry about on top of her friends and also her father. Rodolphus is respectful and just genuinely seems to like her as a friend even outside the flirting, which is primarily the only reason Remus isn't too suspicious about the whole thing.

Besides, Pandora is a big girl. She can handle herself. Sure, she's the kindest soul Remus knows, but even kindness can cut if it's sharpened—and here Pandora is, seeming bound and determined to give herself an edge someone could slice themselves on. She wants to be prepared, Remus thinks, and she wants to be distracted from being so scared. He gets it, and it soothes something in him to see that, no matter what else, she's making many friends here, people who treat her well. This includes Lily, even if Lily pretends its all about sex. Look at her over there, making Pandora laugh and struggling to hide the soft smile on her own face.

A few minutes later, Lily is walking over to him, scratching her head and looking miserable. "I think I've lost my touch."

"Not going well?" Remus asks.

"She likes me. Thinks I'm kind, for some reason."

"You are kind."

"Not really," Lily says with a snort, crossing her arms and leaning against the wall beside him. "Not like I used to be, in any case. Maybe I should just try a more forward approach."

Remus stares at her for a long moment, then murmurs, "Why aren't you kind like you used to be?"

Lily pauses, her face twitching. She keeps looking right at Pandora when she stiffly replies, "You died."

That sits between them, heavy. Remus looks away and doesn't say anything. He doesn't know what to say. It's been days of this. Days and days of them hovering in orbit around each other and failing to talk, failing to connect, failing to get back to the ease of what they once were. Remus wants it so badly that he's genuinely terrified to go after it for fear that he'll find out that it's gone permanently.

All they've done is slap a patch over it, really. They still walk and talk and act just as they used to, but it doesn't feel the same. Remus has spent six years missing her, and he still feels like he's missing her, because—in reality—he is. The Lily he knew is not the Lily who stands next to him now.

She's so different now. Rougher around the edges. Harsher. Flippant, like nothing and no one in this world can touch her. But, underneath it all, Remus sees what's there. Sees just how much she cares and loves, so much that it rips her apart, so much that she can barely accept it.

The thing is. Well, the thing is, she's still Lily at the end of the day, still his best friend, no matter what changes she has gone through. He's gone through plenty, too, but he knows that he's still himself to his core.

The very things they're afraid of, they're made of. They're fit to burst with it, freedom and love clawing on the inside of them and begging to get out.

There's a lot of love in freedom and a lot of freedom in love. Remus thinks it goes hand-in-hand, and he thinks if they can mend whatever is broken between them, the very things they're afraid of won't seem as scary anymore.

"I didn't," Remus says abruptly, turning to look at her, and he watches her shoulders get tense instantly. "I didn't die, Lily."

Lily doesn't reply.

"I didn't die," Remus whispers, "and I did. I—the person I was before did die, in a way, but I'm not dead. Lily, I'm still here. I know that I'm—I know it's different now—"

"Remus," Lily cuts in, "it's fine. Let's not—"

"It's not fine," Remus insists, "because we're not—it's all wrong. We're all wrong, and we're not supposed to be."

Lily rolls her jaw, squeezing her eyes shut. "Of course you want to do this now. Look, I'm not… I'm moving on, okay? I'm moving past it. Letting it go."

"No, you're not. You're holding on so tight you're only breaking yourself," Remus tells her.

"Fuck you," Lily hisses, head swinging around to pin blazing eyes on him, and he thinks it's the realest thing she's shown him since he showed up. "You don't know what this is like. You don't know how it feels to—"

"I don't?" Remus challenges, a strange heat starting to rush under his skin, and he doesn't—he hasn't gotten heated like this, like he used to, in a while. Not freely. Not outside of life or death situations. "Lily, don't be a fucking idiot. You think you're the only one who lost their best friend six years ago? I didn't even know if you were dead or not."

"See, that's the difference!" Lily bursts out. "I did know. I was told you died, and that it was my fault! You got off easy, do you know that? Because you're the one who gave yourself up; you're the one who made the fucking sacrifice, Remus. But me? I had to live with that! I had to live with the guilt! Why the fuck would you do that to me? I never wanted you to do that for me. I just—I ran. I left you there. I—"

"Lily. Lily, shut the fuck up." Remus reaches out to grip her shoulders, meeting her glare with his own. "That was not your fault. You're not to blame for my choices. I did what I did because I love you. It's that simple. I love you, Lily, then and now and the past six years and the next six and all the years I've got in this life. All of them will be spent loving you, and I would do it all over again; I would do it tomorrow. The mere chance that you would make it out and be safe made all of it worth it, and knowing that it worked? You can't even imagine how much of a relief it is. I don't regret saving you. I'm glad you ran, do you understand? I'm grateful that you've lived. And I'm sorry—I'm so fucking sorry that you've been hurting, and grieving, and suffering guilt. I'm sorry, okay? I'm sorry."

"It's not fair," Lily whimpers.

"I know," Remus says. "I know it's not, and I know how it feels. James—he—I feel like I left him behind, and like I let everyone down, myself most of all. I've been hiding from it, from the shame of it, because I'm blaming myself, and because I'm so angry at him for it. But it's not my fault, and he didn't do any differently than anyone does for those they love. Lily, it's not your fault, and I love you."

"I—I hated you for it, for doing this to me, for being dead. I still hate you for it," Lily chokes out, a film forming over her eyes. She raises her hands, curls them, and moves them jerkily up and down at her chest, like she wants to reach in and yank something out. "It feels like—I feel like I've been limping through life. I feel so fucking empty, all the time, and I can't—I can't even breathe sometimes, because I don't—Remus, I don't want to be empty anymore. I don't—I can't—"

"You're not, though. You're not empty, Lily," Remus mumbles, squeezing her shoulders. "Look at you. Fuck, you can't even see it, can you? You're so full you're about to explode. You can't keep it all in and shut everyone out. It doesn't work."

"But I have," Lily croaks.

Remus shakes his head, voice softening. "You really haven't. Do you know what I see? I see life. You've lived a whole life, Lily, these past six years, even if you tried not to, because you didn't want to live without me. But you did. You made friends, like Kinglsey and Sybill. You've fallen in love and didn't let yourself have that love; that'll be Dorcas. You've learned new skills, because I just watched you shoot with various guns and never miss. You lived. You had to live without me, and you did despite your best efforts, just like I lived without you."

"I'm sorry. I'm so sorry I left you there. I—I tried so hard, Remus. I was always trying so hard to wait for you. I've just been waiting for you," Lily sobs, and she's shaking, rattling under his hands like she is exploding now, finally, in spurts.

"You couldn't wait for me, and that's okay," Remus tells her, sliding his hand up to sweep under the curtain of her hair and grip the back of her neck, pulling her into his arms. He kisses the top of her head. "It's okay. I never wanted you to."

"I still fucking miss you," Lily says, crying, the words muffled into his chest. "I still—all the grief and guilt, it's still here, it's still in me. I don't know how to get rid of it. I don't know where to put it now."

Remus closes his eyes and rests his cheek on the top of her head. "Give it to me. Give it to the people you care about. Give it away, Lily. It's just love. That's all it is."

Lily makes a horrible, choked noise against him and seems only capable of crying. A lot of crying. Messy crying. Remus holds her through it, pressing his face into her hair, hating every second of it and knowing it's absolutely necessary.

They could never move forward if they didn't go back. He knows that, but knowing doesn't make it any easier. He can feel how much it hurts her, and he can't help her, can't fix it for her. There's all this is, the horrible process they have to go through to get to the core of who they always were, together.

It's just the start. Remus knows that, too. He'll have to take his turn as well; he can't escape unscathed. He'll have to open up and face his fears and methodically work through things he'd rather leave alone. All those years he spent wishing he could just talk to Lily and tell her everything, and now he's going to have to work at it to do so. It was never supposed to be a struggle. It was supposed to be easy.

Remus is learning that the important things in life are rarely easy, and Lily? Lily is important. One of the most important parts of his life. He wants her back. He needs his best friend.

Lily does calm, eventually. She sniffles wetly and smears her face against his chest, getting rid of snot and tears, probably. Then, finally, she pulls back and violently clears her throat.

The first thing she says is, "How'd you know about Dorcas?"

"What, that she's the one who got away?" Remus asks. Lily swallows and nods. "Because I know you." Lily looks like she's about to cry again, and Remus sighs. "I'm sorry, by the way. You don't have to talk about it if you don't want to."

"I loved her," Lily rasps. "Probably still do. Maybe always will, at least a little. The worst part is that I didn't know. I didn't know until I'd already let her slip away from me, and then… And then I still wouldn't accept it. Couldn't. I don't know what's wrong with me. There's something wrong with me."

"I don't think so. I think you were just scared. We all get scared, Lily," Remus murmurs. "I'm scared right now."

"Yeah." Lily sort of hiccups a chuckle, sniffling again and rubbing her red nose. "Yeah, me too. All the time, really."

"I think we all are," Remus admits.

"I'm—" Lily clears her throat again, blinking hard, breathing in and out. "I don't know—I have no idea what to do now, you know? Because if I'm not—because, before, I wasn't… letting myself have anything. Didn't know how. Still don't. You said I lived, but I didn't know that, didn't feel that, and I don't—I can't work out how to do it again, or where to go from here."

Remus hesitates, then says, "Well, the thing is, you're still living. You're sort of…already doing it. I mean, even with love, yeah? You're open to it. You want it, at least, because you're half in love with Mary as it is."

"No," Lily says, like a reflex. Remus raises his eyebrows at her, and she bites her lip. "Maybe? You think?"

"I do think, but only you can know that. How do you feel?" Remus asks, reaching out to poke her chest. "In here."

Lily swats at his hand, and he grins. "Oh, fuck off. Now you're just fucking with me."

"A little bit, yeah, but I mean it," Remus says, letting his smile turn gentle. "Just because you ran then doesn't mean you have to punish yourself by running now. Slow down, Lily."

"I'm still mad at you," Lily mumbles, "and I'm sorry."

Remus sighs. "I know. Me too."

"We're okay?" Lily whispers.

"We're okay," Remus confirms.

Lily looks at him for a beat, takes a deep breath, then slowly lets it out. "Okay. Right, okay, well…we lived without each other then. Worst time of my life, just to be clear."

"Me too," Remus admits. "But some of it was good, just like it was for you. That's okay, too. That's what living is, all the good and bad, easy and hard. We don't—we shouldn't be guilty about it, Lily. I don't want you to be guilty, and I'm sorry, but nothing in this world will ever make me regret Sirius."

"You really love him, don't you?"

"More than anything."

"More than me?" Lily asks.

Remus huffs a weak laugh. "The same, just differently."

"I'm jealous, just on principle," Lily informs him, her lips curling up in the corners. Her face softens. "You can—you know you can tell me about him, don't you? About all of it. About every bit of the past six years. Anything."

"It's a lot," Remus admits.

Lily smiles. "I've got time."

So, when Lily holds out her hand, Remus reaches out to take it, and they leave the gun range together, leaving Pandora to keep practicing, now accompanied by Rodolphus in nearly the same exact position as Lily was in before. Lily doesn't even glance at them as they leave. They go to Remus' room and talk.

Oh, they talk, and talk, and talk. They talk and they laugh. They talk and they cry. They talk and chainsmoke, watching the cloud above their heads where they lay shoulder to shoulder with an astray between their hips. They talk and burn a hole into Remus' mattress, putting it out between catching each other up on the last six years, covering torture and fear and loss and pain, setting their lungs on fire as they trade stories of friendship and joy and love.

They talk, and they live, and they find that ease they fought to have again, both waiting for it.

Always waiting for it.

Lily leaves Remus eventually, because she has some things she needs to take care of. Things she needs to do. When Lily sets her heart on something, when she makes up her mind, she can't be stopped. That applies to everything, whether it's a mission or simply taking steps she needs to get better.

Lily goes to Kingsley first.

"I'm sorry," Lily says the moment he opens his door. "I should have trusted you, but the truth is, I didn't. I refused to, because it was a risky form of trust, and it scared me. But you were right. You're my friend, you were the first friend I had here, and I haven't been a good friend to you. I'm sorry."

Kingsley stares out at her, not speaking. After a beat, he crosses his arms and leans his shoulder up against his doorway, raising a hand and flicking his fingers to indicate quite clearly that he's going to need more than that.

Yeah, okay, fair enough.

"You don't have to forgive me. I'd like you to, but I understand if you can't. I just—I want you to know that I am sorry. And I have immense respect for you—always have, really—even if I showed the opposite. You mean…" Lily trails off, then clears her throat. Oh, this is very difficult. "You're important to me, even if I've failed to show it. Oh, and I'm sorry I put a gun to your head. I shouldn't have done that; fuck, that's so fucked up. I'm so sorry I did that, and if you want me to stay away from you, I understand, but I want—I do want you in my life, King, and I'm sorry I never showed that either. So. Yeah."

"You know, Red, I feel like I need to go shake Remus Lupin's hand," Kingsley says dryly. "He's working miracles, clearly."

"Maybe a bit," Lily admits sheepishly. "It's sort of his thing."

Kingsley's lips twitch, and then his face softens. "You know what I could never understand about you?"

"Oh, here we go," Lily mumbles, wary now, feeling exposed. It's becoming clear to her all over again why she doesn't do this shit. If you're just leaving yourself open for hits, of course it's going to fucking hurt when you get smacked.

"I could never understand how you convinced yourself that you didn't care, when that's all you ever seemed to do. You weren't a bad friend, Lily. You made mistakes here and there, sure, but we all do," Kingsley murmurs. "I do, too. I made a mistake by what I said to you. I shouldn't have, because not only was most of it about you blatantly wrong, but it hurt you and I knew it would. For that, I'm sorry."

"It's okay," Lily whispers. "I know you were upset, and scared, and freaking the fuck out. I've always thought of you as this unshakeable man, but you're just as human as everyone else. Not just Dumbledore's soldier. I shouldn't have treated you as such. I'm sorry for that, too."

Kingsley sighs, and here Lily is, left open for a hit, but all she gets is an embrace. He reaches out and tugs her in, and they have never once hugged before, but she goes willingly now; it seems he knew she would. "Water under the bridge, Red. We'll just do better next time, yeah?"

"Yeah," Lily agrees, blowing out a deep sigh of relief. When she pulls back, she clasps her hands together and rocks back on her heels, then blurts out, "So, you and Sybill are totally going to make up, right?"

"I don't know," Kingsley says quietly, frowning a bit as he leans up against the doorway again. "I'm not sure if I can. The thought of her in the field, in danger, and she could—she might—" He squeezes his eyes shut and lets his head hit the doorway with a dull tap. "I, um. I don't know. What is it when you let someone go because you can't lose them?"

"A double negative, I think," Lily says gently, a pang in her chest when he opens his eyes and looks so sad. "King, you didn't let her go. Take it from me, you'll regret pushing her away. And take this from me, too. Don't let the war come between you, because before you know it, you could lose her, if not to the war, then to someone else. And you will regret it. Trust me on that. Hold onto her while you can."

"Speaking from experience, I see." Kingsley gives her a weak, weary smile. "Dorcas?"

Lily sighs. "Fucking hell, was I that obvious?"

"I'm observant," Kingsley offers mildly. Lily clicks her tongue, and he lifts his head, blowing out a deep breath. "Right, well, you…may have a point. That's good advice."

"Don't ignore it." Lily steps back. "Alright, I have to go."

"Making rounds?" Kingsley asks.

"Don't worry, you were my first stop," Lily assures him with a playful grin, then continues on to the next.

Lily goes to Dorcas second.

Dorcas looks very exhausted when she opens her door, and Lily feels sympathy unfurl within her, as well as a rising sense of nerves squirming about in her stomach. If she makes it through all of this without vomiting, it'll be a miracle.

"Oh," Dorcas murmurs. "Hey, Lily."

"Hi." Lily clears her throat. "Can I come in?"

"Sure," Dorcas says, letting her in and shutting the door before moving to plop down on her bed with a weary sigh, visibly miserable. Lily knows that things aren't very good for her overall right now, as she has been working herself to the bone, but the fact that she and Marlene aren't okay certainly isn't helping matters. Lily moves to sit beside her, staring at her hand, at the ring on Dorcas' finger. Marlene's ring. The sight of it sort of breaks her heart. "What's up?"

"We, ah, need to talk. Or, well, I need to talk to you. I mean, I need to tell you something," Lily mumbles.

Dorcas bolts up in alarm. "What is it? What hap—"

"No, no, nothing like that. Nothing to do with the war or any of that mess, I promise," Lily says quickly, holding her hands up. Dorcas settles slowly. "No, um, it's more…personal."

"Oh." Dorcas blinks. "Oh?"

"Yeah." Lily fiddles with her hands in her lap, her heart beating a little too fast, though she can't figure out if it's from fear or nerves, or both. Probably both. "So…I'm going to say something to you, and it's—well, I'm going to feel awkward about it. I might vomit."

"Lily, is this a love confession?" Dorcas teases, clearly trying to lighten the mood. She even leans over to bump their shoulders together, smiling at her.

Lily looks at her and breathes out, "Yeah, actually, it is."

Dorcas' smile fades. She blinks again, then just stares at Lily, then leans away like she's trying to look at more of her. Lily is doing her level best not to throw up. Oh. Oh, fuck, there it is. Well, that's just—out there now. Okay, that's fine. That's—

"Oh," Dorcas says softly. "Lily, um. It's—I'm—"

"No, no, wait," Lily blurts out. "Wait. Please wait. I'm not trying anything, okay? I swear I'm not. What I mean is, I—I was in love—I mean, I did love you, before. I think."

"You think?"

"No, I know. I just—I didn't know then. I didn't realize it until you were—until you said you were in love with Marlene, and even then, I didn't really…accept it fully. The thing is, I couldn't love you then. I mean, I did, but not all-in, do you know what I mean? I couldn't love you the way you deserved; I couldn't love you right. I wasn't loving me right, really, or… anything. Or I didn't know I was. This is—I know I'm not explaining myself well, but what I'm trying to say is that I wasn't ready then, for any of it. But it was there. It was there, Dorcas, and I need you to know that. I need you to know I loved you, and I still do."

Dorcas takes that in, apparently needing some time to process, which Lily is admittedly grateful for, because she feels like she just ran a damn marathon. She resists the urge to press her hands into her stomach and bend over to catch her breath. Why is she winded? She's not even trying to be with Dorcas. This is ridiculous. She is not fine. All the times she told herself she was fine were lies. Oh, she is so fucked up.

After a long moment, Dorcas carefully reaches out and takes Lily's hand. Lily feels better instantly, suddenly able to breathe as they thread their fingers together. Dorcas swallows and holds her gaze. "I get it. I—yeah. Yeah, me too, Lily."

"Yeah?" Lily whispers, her throat feeling thick, because isn't that just tragic? They had it, almost.

"Yeah," Dorcas whispers back. "I was…doing the same thing, I think. The war was my priority, and if it hadn't been, it would have been you. Before her, it could have been you."

"I'm sorry," Lily croaks, and she doesn't know who she's apologizing to. Maybe both of them. Maybe to the lost opportunity they worked together to throw away.

"Yeah, so am I," Dorcas admits. She squeezes Lily's hand and takes a deep breath. "Do you still…? You said you weren't trying anything, but do you—do you…?"

Lily darts her gaze away immediately, tucking her lips in and feeling her heart give that same strange pulse in her chest that it did when she heard Dorcas say she loved Marlene. Not Lily, but Marlene. And Lily has a name for that pulse now; she knows what it is. Yearning.

It's just—she can't help it. She knows now, and she wants… Well, that's the thing, isn't it? Dorcas was an almost lover, and Lily wants to undo everything, rewind time, and know what she missed. It's hard to let go sometimes. It's so hard.

"Lily," Dorcas says softly, a mere breath. She waits for Lily to look at her, and she looks so, so sad. "I'm sorry, but it's her. I love you—I do love you, Lily, and you will always, always, always have a part of me, okay? But it's her. It's Marlene."

"I know," Lily chokes out, eyes stinging, and how is it possible to be heartbroken over losing something you never had? She didn't think it was possible, and yet, here it is.

"Oh, Lily, I'm so—I'm sorry. I'm so fucking sorry. Come here," Dorcas rasps, pulling her in, and then the whole situation gets so much worse, because Lily clings to her and cries.

Fuck, this is mortifying.

Dorcas coddles her through it, a bit. Pets her hair. Holds her close. Tells her she loves her. Thankfully and tactfully doesn't bring up Marlene again. Lily lets her do it. Needs her to.

She holds onto Dorcas, tucks her face into Dorcas' shoulder, breathes Dorcas in. For a moment, she lets herself pretend she has her. Just for a moment. And then she lets go, and it hurts. Fuck, but it really hurts, far more than she expected it to when she went into this. She knew it would be shit, but she didn't know it would split her open and scrape her raw.

Lily only pulls away when she knows she's ready, and Dorcas doesn't make her a second before. It's good. It helps. In the end, it's necessary, because Lily can't go anywhere if she stays here. That's the thing. She doesn't want to stay here anymore. She doesn't want to be trapped by an almost, because she wants someone she can have, and she wants to let herself have someone when she's ready. She isn't, not yet, but she'd like to try to be. And so, this is where it starts.

It's an end and a beginning, and it leaves her a bit sensitive and exposed after. Dorcas doesn't seem surprised that Lily needs to go quickly after that, but she does catch her hand and bring it to her mouth, pressing a gentle kiss to her fingers. A Hallow gesture of admiration, Lily knows, and she appreciates it. Oddly, after all of that, she's proud of herself, too.

They don't say anything else, but they don't have to. Lily leaves, and she knows they'll be alright. They will, because the love is still there between them. They didn't let it bloom, but the seeds can't be uprooted from the garden they laid upon, and is a garden less of a garden through a drought?

No. A garden that bears no fruit is still a garden.

Lily goes to Mary last.

"No, shut up," Lily says firmly, the split second Mary opens her door and looks immediately unimpressed. Following these words, she looks less unimpressed and more disbelieving, her eyebrows flying up. "Sorry, that was aggressive, and rude, but I really need you to let me talk."

"Alright," Mary replies slowly, curious now. "Proceed."

"I don't know if you don't like me, or what I did to offend your apparently delicate sensibilities, even though I am the one who has the right to dislike you, because you literally shot me when we first met," Lily tells her. "And, you know, that's okay. It's okay that you might not like me. But, the thing is, I like you. I—really like you. Like, really. My best friend thinks I'm half in love with you, which is ridiculous because we haven't known each other long, and all we do is bicker, and I just got rejected by someone I never even let myself love properly, which was heartbreaking, by the way, so the entire concept of loving you even a bit, even just starting to, is so absurd that I can't even begin to wrap my head around it—"

Mary's face journey is wild right now, flying through so many expressions that Lily doesn't even bother trying to figure out what any of them mean. There's some surprise, a bit of alarm for sure, and it doesn't matter because Mary opens her mouth like she's about to speak, and Lily is not having it.

"No, no, let me finish," Lily insists, and Mary snaps her mouth shut. For once. "I know I'm just rambling and not making any sense, but that's your fault, because I can't think around you apparently, which is just—annoying, is what it is. Anyway, my point is, I'm a fucked up mess of a person who has been through a lot of shit, and I have no idea what I'm supposed to be doing, and I'm genuinely terrified of loving in any capacity, but I've had—a breakthrough. Clearly. As you can tell. I don't think I'm handling it well, honestly, but I'm trying. I got a friend back today—two, really—and I lost an almost lover, and these are good things, so I'm —I'm sort of riding the wave."

"I see that," Mary says faintly.

Lily scowls. "I wasn't done. All that is to say, I'm not ready for love, not really. Not yet. But I want to be, someday, and none of this has anything to do with you overall, except I like you, a lot, and if I don't love you at least a little bit already, I probably could, if you'd let me. Except you won't let me, which might be for the best, because like I said, I'm not ready. But I'll probably do it anyway, because I never leave well enough alone, and I don't want to avoid it, or refuse to accept it, or run from it; I want to walk into it with my eyes wide open and do it on purpose. And I just—I just think that maybe, just maybe, you'd be secretly alright with that. Maybe. Would you?"

Mary is silent for a long time, and then she clears her throat and arches an eyebrow. "Can I speak now?"

"Oh. Yeah, sorry, I'm done," Lily replies, ridiculously out of breath and nervous in a good way.

"So, you've clearly had…a day," Mary states. She pauses, then huffs an incredulous laugh. "You know, good for you. I think… Well, I think that, if you wanted, you could come inside to hang out with me and Bing Bing. Maybe entertain him for a bit. I want to draw. It helps me decompress."

Lily blinks. A lot. "I—wait, no, yeah. Sure. Yes, I'd love to."

"Come on, then," Mary says simply, lips curling up as she pushes open the door and steps to the side.

"I—I still don't know if you like me or not," Lily admits, stepping into the doorway and stopping there, searching Mary's gaze like she can find the answers there and only succeeding in getting lost in her eyes, because apparently she's a walking cliche now and there's no hope for her.

"One of life's greatest mysteries," Mary murmurs, pools of laughter in the black of her eyes.

"You never answered my question," Lily whispers, her heart doing a funny little twist in her chest. "Would you?"

"Maybe," Mary says, then tugs her in and shuts the door.

Regulus is snatched out of his near-daily daydream of taking Slughorn by the back of his head and smashing his face down against the table he sits at until he's just a smear on it by the harsh tug on his sleeve that gathers his focus instead.

"Reggie," Dora says, vying for his attention with a small frown and a tiny wrinkle between her eyebrows. That same Black stubbornness for what she wants that exists in all Blacks. It's in her blood. Her wrinkled eyebrows look like his.

"Dora, where's your mother?" Regulus asks immediately, pushing the chair next to him back and holding onto her arm so she can climb up into it.

Dora gets settled and flashes him a smile. "She's coming, but she's walking so slowly with my new aunt Cissa."

Narcissa has now been dubbed as new aunt Cissa by Dora, much to her palpable delight. Regulus hadn't been there when Andy introduced them properly, but they're two peas in a pod, from what he's seen. It's quite clear to him that Narcissa is very pleased about being with Andromeda again, regardless of anything else, and she adores her niece.

"There she is." Dora proceeds to stand up in the chair and jump up and down, waving her arms. "Mummy! Mummy!"

Regulus holds onto the back of her shirt so she won't fall, and again, her reckless zeal reminds him so much of Sirius that it's painful. It hurts in a good way. A good ache. A reminder in the form of a pin-prick that stings, yet alleviates pressure.

Andromeda sweeps over with Narcissa, both of them stopping by for idle chit-chat for a moment, inquiring what's for lunch, asking where Regulus' usual entourage is, and then they're collecting Dora and heading to go through the line so they can make plates of food and eat lunch together. They can never really linger around Regulus for too long. He gets it. If he could, he'd get as far away from himself as possible, too.

Regulus' usual entourage consists of Barty, Rabastan, Asher, Rodolphus, and occasionally Pandora. Well, Pandora is a bit of a social butterfly, in that she flutters around to whatever group she likes, welcomed by all. To refuse her would feel like the equivalent of a crime, but one you're horrified by committing. However, much to Regulus' eternal displeasure, Pandora is apparently fond enough of Rodolphus to be swayed into spending most of her time with him—and the whole group, by extension—but Regulus is single-handedly cockblocking that man as much and as often as he can. Pandora, of course, remains entirely oblivious to all of this.

There's sort of a mess of fractured groups at the moment, in all honesty, which is generally only noticeable at mealtimes.

One group consists of Mary, Sybill, Amos, and Lily. Every now and again, Dorcas will be with them, but she's usually sitting with Minerva and wistfully gazing over at where Marlene, Alice, and Emmeline all sit together. Joining those three is Kingsley, much to Regulus' bemusement, but apparently he came from district five and was once childhood friends with Alice and Frank, and in the aftermath of Frank's death, those two have reconnected as friends. Regulus is pretty sure that Emmeline, Marlene, and Kingsley are single-handedly getting Alice through to their grief, because as far as Regulus can tell, they're a bit of a shell unless those people are with them.

Alecto spends her time with Narcissa, and Andromeda by extension, while Majesty has taken to sticking with the large group of previous servants saved from the Hallow, as does Huey Rutledge, who tentatively offers Regulus sad smiles whenever Regulus catches his eye. During meals, it's the quietest table. When any of them do talk, they whisper like they're expecting to get in trouble for it, but each time they don't, Regulus notes they do it more and more.

Effie and Monty are generally at the same table as Regulus, close by, or down a table with Minerva, Poppy, Filius, and Dorcas. Aberforth comes and sits with them sometimes. Effie and Minerva seem to get on well, but not at first. There had been a tension between them that everyone was wary of, sourced from the fact that Minerva was the head gamemaker behind all the shit that went down in the arena and Effie seemed to want to beat the hell out of her for it, except Minerva—according to Dorcas—is not easily beaten.

They did not fight, thankfully. Regulus talked to Monty about it, and then Monty talked to Effie about it, and then Effie marched off to go talk to Minerva about it—which is when Regulus groaned and put his face in his hands, waiting for the entire underground bunker to collapse around them or for someone to die (he would have bet on Effie winning, but maybe he's just biased), but none of that happened. It seemed that Minerva and Effie talked like two adult women, discussed the whole matter, and came out the other side with mutual respect and a building friendship, despite everything.

There's a lot of that going around. Continuation. Pressing on. Sitting aside issues and focusing on what matters now. There is this big thing sitting between everyone, and it's not just brushes with death and loads of trauma. No, it's war. It's the war lingering like a shroud over them all, something that ties them all together, and everything in the past can't affect the present they're faced with now.

As for Regulus' usual entourage, they're all broken up at the moment, but will surely make their way here at some point. Asher is most likely caught up with Poppy, because Poppy is also absent from Minerva's side. Rodolphus is caught in the middle of a conversation with Alecto. Rabastan is going through the line, getting his tray of food. And Barty…

Barty is lingering around Mary, Amos, Lily, Sybill, and also Pandora at the moment. Most of the time, Barty is never too far away from Regulus, and Regulus spends any time he isn't with Effie and Monty with Barty. Not only because Barty is Barty, but also because Barty needs it, badly. He lost his mum, killed his dad, and hasn't been doing well in the aftermath of either. Mostly the first, admittedly, but either way, he's only just now starting to look a little better, which Regulus knows can be attested to his willingness to linger around Barty through anything, through his manic ramblings in the day, through his quiet sobs in the night; through it all, Regulus is there, because Barty is Barty, and Barty has consistently been there for him. Still is, even now.

Barty hides his issues well, carrying on as he usually does, doing all the usual things he would do. Flirts with Amos, gets Sybill to laugh when she's sad, annoys Lily, entertains all of Regulus' frantic thrown-together schemes to break out of here, no matter how foolish or impossible. But—when they're alone, and it's just them—they'll lie on the floor in Regulus' room, and Barty will ask him to hum the tune of a nursery rhyme his mother used to sing to him, and Regulus will, and Barty will curl up on his side, back to Regulus, and cry. And, at night, Regulus will curl up against him, close his eyes, and chant his promise to himself to keep going, to keep breathing, to the consistent beat of Barty's heart.

One person who never shows up to meals is Remus. It has been over a week, and Regulus hasn't laid eyes on Remus once since Regulus made sure Remus got out of solitary. They haven't spoken. They haven't made it a point to seek each other out. Regulus doesn't know what he's supposed to say to him; he doesn't know how they're supposed to be here at the same time, together, without—without—

So, you can imagine his surprise when the chair next to Regulus that Dora was in scrapes across the floor, drawing his gaze away from his own plate to find Remus plopping down in the open seat, his jaw clenched and his shoulders back.

Naturally, Regulus freezes like a startled hare under the gaze of a watchful wolf. His mind goes blank for a moment, and it hasn't even been two full weeks since he got out of the arena, since he laid right there under his brother's fists and used Remus as leverage over him to keep those fists raining down. He couldn't do it, couldn't endanger Remus, and never even planned to, but he pretended he would have. He was going to die under that pretense and never correct it. He never apologized for that. He never apologized for a lot of things.

There's too much between them to even know where to start. Regulus has wronged Remus, but it's not just that. It's that he is here, and Sirius is not, and as much as Regulus hates that, surely Remus does, too. It's that Remus is here, and James is not, and Regulus doesn't want to hate that, and so he tries not to, and only manages by half. No, no, he wouldn't want them to trade places, Remus left there and James safe here, but—

But.

They sit right next to each other, staring at each other, and Regulus sees Sirius in Remus, too. Finds Sirius there in the love he has for Remus, and the love Remus has for him, clear as day in the bags under his eyes and that lack of something in his gaze; that something is Sirius, and Sirius is absent. Gone. Not here. Remus is here, and Sirius is not, and James is not, and Regulus could rip Remus' throat out for it, or offer up his own for the same treatment, or simply hold onto him and cry.

None of those things happen, of course. It's all feeling, pure sensation, a breath frozen in place and a moment lost to the cruel hands of time, swirling down a drain as they sit here, drained, missing the same things in the exact opposite ways. Hand-in-hand without ever touching. Mirror, mirror sitting before me, which of us could the most miserable be?

"Do you have the wrong table?" is what falls out of Regulus' mouth. "Lily is across the room."

"No," Remus says, "I'm here for you."

"You never come to meals," Regulus murmurs.

"I've been grieving," Remus replies, clipped.

Regulus looks away, staring down at his plate, appetite fully vanished. Not that he has much of an appetite these days, but he eats anyway, because he has been hungry and he knows how important nutrition is to keep one's strength up. He can't allow himself to get weak. He needs to be ready at all times, ready the moment there's a shift in the wind and he can get to them, get to them, he will get to them.

Regulus clears his throat. "They're not dead."

"No, but they're likely being tortured, and as someone who knows intimately how that feels, I'm a little more informed on why that's something to be upset about," Remus says bluntly.

"Thanks for saying so, really appreciate it," Regulus grits out, drawing his hands down into his lap to hide how they shake. He fists them and wills himself not to hit Remus.

Remus sighs. "I'm not—listen, I'm not trying to be a prick, alright? I'm just not going to sugarcoat it. Denial doesn't help either of us, and it definitely doesn't help them."

"I will help them," Regulus says firmly, turning to look at him almost challengingly. "I'm going to help them."

Does he know how he's going to do that? Mm, no. But he will, in fact, be doing that. At some point. Eventually. Someday. He doesn't know when or how, but if it takes finding a way to escape the Phoenix and march his way into the Hallow right by himself, then that's what he'll damn well do.

"Ah, so you've made it through your grieving period," Remus notes, flicking his gaze over him, lips curling up in one corner.

"I never had a grieving period," Regulus retorts sharply, and he hasn't. There was no grieving period. There was no transition from arena to safety, because the fighting hasn't finished; James and Sirius still need to be fought for, and that is central to Regulus' survival, so he breathes and keeps going and doesn't break down, doesn't shut down, doesn't do anything other than stay focused. For them. He clings to that, to being ready, because that's all he has now.

"Regulus…" Remus' expression twitches, eyebrows furrowing as that same curl in his lip ticks down in the opposite direction. "It's okay, you know, to not be fine."

Regulus digs his nails into his palms. "I am fine."

"Fuck's sake." Remus heaves yet another sigh and plants his elbow on the table, reaching up to swipe his hand over his face. His shoulders are hunched, and he drags his hand back and forth over his hair, then turns to peer at him, looking very exhausted all of a sudden. "You're still so fucked up."

"So are you," Regulus grumbles, like an accusation. They bonded over this, didn't they? Why is it a problem now?

Remus shakes his head. "Look, we can unpack all of that later, or…not, knowing us, but I've had—" He stops, then blows out a deep breath. "Well, I had a talk with Effie the other day, and I helped Lily out earlier, which—in doing so—helped me. So, yes, everything is fucking awful right now, but I've decided to deal with that by believing it'll get better, even if I have to make it get better. Do you understand what I'm saying?"

"Yes," Regulus says, because he does understand. They are in the same boat, in this regard. "You're going to help them, too. If it makes you feel any better, I never doubted that, regardless of your grieving period. Have any ideas?"

"Oh, just right into it, then," Remus mutters, mildly amused.

Regulus arches an eyebrow. "Is there anything else worth talking about?"

"I don't know, is there?" Remus shoots back, holding his gaze.

"I—" Regulus stops, because he wants to say there's not, but that's not true, is it? I'm sorry bangs at the back of Regulus' throat, and he's never been good at saying it, but Remus is looking at him and he knows he needs to.

Remus shakes his head and almost looks fond. "Alright, fine, I'll get it out of the way first. I'm sorry."

"You—what?" Regulus blinks at him, then leans in to stare at him in sheer disbelief. "Remus, what the fuck do you have to apologize for? I'm the one who threatened to put you in danger inside the arena. I'm the one who used you to get Sirius to lose it. I'm the one who spit in the face of all the times you've helped me by leaving you alone in all of this now. If anyone should be apologizing, it's me. What are you sorry about?"

"I'm sorry for leaving you alone in all of this, too, because I have. I'm sorry I didn't—I tried, but James was left behind, and I'm sorry I made it out when he didn't, because I know you'd rather it be him."

"Remus—"

"And I know that because you made it out, and it's one of the worst things I've ever felt, but I wish it had been Sirius. I'm sorry, because you're my friend, and I'm—I am so fucking grateful that you're here and you're okay, but something in me wishes it was him, and I can't help it," Remus chokes out.

Regulus feels like something in him pops. Just deflates a little. He exhales heavily, shaky from relief, and he's nodding. He nods almost frantically and rasps, "Yeah. Yeah, okay, thank you. Because—because I thought—I thought I was alone in that, and I didn't want to be alone in that."

"You're not," Remus says hoarsely. "I promise you're not."

"I have so few friends and you're one really fucking high on the list, Remus, and I'm glad you're free. You have no idea how glad I am," Regulus tells him rapidly, feeling a little untamed and wild as he just—confesses. "But I wish it was James."

"Fuck," Remus declares on a laugh that sort of cracks in his throat, and he nods along, too. "Yeah, Regulus, same here."

"Oh, they'd be so angry at us if they knew," Regulus whispers.

Remus quirks a weak smile. "Our secret, then."

"Right. Right, okay." Regulus flexes his hand under the table and keeps nodding, feeling inexplicably lighter. "Right, so that's—that's out of the way. We're awful and we're sorry. Good enough for me. Good enough for you?"

"Yes," Remus admits, and he clearly means it.

"Good, because we have other shit to focus on," Regulus says, leaning in even closer and lowering his voice. "As of now, I have—no plan. I mean, I've sort of been tracking the way this place works. Memorizing rotation schedules. Finding out who goes where and does what. It's just—well, after Dorcas and Lily pulled what they pulled, the measures to keep everyone inside are infuriatingly thorough. We can't just leave."

"But staying here isn't an option," Remus mutters.

Regulus grimaces. "I know, but at the risk of going to solitary, an escape attempt can't be made until there's an opening, and there aren't openings, Remus, I've checked. I mean, you already went to solitary once, and if they try to throw you in there again, I'll kill someone. Like, actually."

"Regulus," Remus says, lips twitching.

"I'm not joking," Regulus whispers, holding his gaze. "If they try to pull that shit again, I'm going to kill them. Any of them. All of them. Sirius would."

"Oh, is that why you plan to?"

"Well, only partially. You're also my—friend."

"Aw," Remus coos, "look how far you've come. Remember when you said I wasn't your friend?"

"Simpler times," Regulus replies wryly.

Remus snorts. "Do you know how fucked up our lives are that the time after your first arena was simpler than this?"

"I'm very aware." Regulus sighs. "Things will get simpler if we can get James and Sirius. So, brainstorming."

"We can't fight our way out?" Remus asks. "I know Lily would come, and I don't doubt some of the others would be happy to as well. Lily can still get into the armory in the gun range, so that's an option. If we did it late at night, maybe…"

"I don't think we'd make it very far. The surveillance here is too good. We'd be caught before we even got halfway in. All I can think of is—well, Rodolphus said it, actually, but I've been thinking…Dumbledore," Regulus says.

Remus blinks. "Dumbledore?"

"Dumbledore of the Albus variety, not Aberforth. If we could somehow convince him to let us out, convince him to clear a mission to go to the Hallow, then maybe…"

"Oh, that's never going to happen."

Regulus is about to open his mouth and tell Remus never to say never—he knows from experience that saying so usually ends up getting proven wrong, and what do you know? The universe is moving fast, or the fates, or whatever thing exists out there that shifts winds and throws in plot twists—because the words have barely left Remus' mouth before something happens that will set the course for exactly what he spoke against. Before you know it, never can be now, and here it is.

The loud buzzer indicating an update broadcast from within the Hallow makes the entire Great Hall fall silent. There's a large screen at the front that's usually off, but it comes on whenever Riddle is addressing the world, thanks to some untraceable, technological interference from this end.

The screen flicks on now, and Regulus is expecting Riddle, which is why he nearly chokes on air when it's James.

Oh.

Oh, it's James.

Regulus stares, his lips parting as he takes him in. James, James, James. There he is, alive and looking…startlingly well. His glasses are missing, and his hair is slicked down in a way Regulus has never seen before, but there he is. Right there. He looks so—put together. Dressed in a suit with a striped tie soothed down, cufflinks glinting, dripping in opulence and looking so rich and refined that Regulus feels like he's something untouchable, too expensive, too valuable.

Regulus simultaneously doesn't like it and feels his mouth water like a fucking reflex. In seconds, his chair is clattering loudly in the deadly silent room, and he nearly trips over his own feet to move towards the screen, drawn in by it, drawn in like there's a hook around his spine that drags him to James.

James is looking right into the camera, his expression calm and neutral, but it's like he's looking right at Regulus, looking like him and like he never has before, looking beautiful, always beautiful, and all Regulus can think is oh, James, I've missed you.

"Hello," James says softly, and Regulus chokes out a harsh breath, his shoulders jerking like he was just struck. How long has it been since he heard James' voice? Since before the arena. That horrible morning where Regulus was dragged away along with Sirius, and James was yelling then, but he sounds so gentle now. "Today, I address all of you with a very important message."

Regulus inhales sharply, and even that's loud in the otherwise silent room. Everything feels like it's coming from far away, so he's only distantly aware that Remus has followed him and is standing at his shoulder, watching with him.

"There are external forces that wish to dismantle the peaceful core of the Hallow, all in the name of wreaking havoc and causing mayhem," James declares. "These external forces are anarchists, and they are gathering to threaten the very state of the world as we know it, as we have always known it. The very state of the world as we need it. These anarchists wish to cause war, and I beg of you, please don't fall prey to it. Sympathizers of the anarchists, ask yourselves if you wish to encourage war and death within your own home, within your own families. This is not a time to turn on each other, but a time to band together against one common enemy. Stand with me, stand with your fellow Hallows, stand with your Master—and stand against all those who oppose peace."

Regulus feels a chill go down his spine as he stares wide-eyed at the screen, at James, at a man he loves and knows inside and out. A man who sits before him and everyone to say things Regulus knows for a fact he doesn't agree with.

It's not him, Regulus knows that. Or, well, it is him, but those aren't his words, and this isn't his choice. Look at him there, camera-ready and giving a speech like it was scripted for him. Oh, baby, Regulus thinks as he gazes at James, what have they done to you? They have him doing something he'd never do without coercion. Riddle is making him do this, and Regulus needs no time to work out how. Sirius. He's using Sirius.

"Desist all protests and instead come together to help one another. Any information about these anarchists or those taken as prisoners of war are to be turned into the authorities. Hear me, Hallow is not hollow. Hallow is harmony." James dips his head. "Thank you."

The screen goes black and all hell immediately breaks loose.

James walks quickly through the concrete corridors of Azkaban, his heart racing as he's led through the silent, solemn prison. It's frigid here and so quiet that the sound of his steps echo off the walls. His shoes are pinching his toes, and he's so nervous and full of anxious anticipation that he's struck with the impulse to beat-box.

Naturally, James does not give into this impulse, because he's being marched past one cell after the next, revealing a masked servant in each one, full of hollow eyes and gaunt faces. His stomach churns just seeing them, so he forces himself not to look, because there's nothing he can do for them, and the urge to try only puts Sirius in further jeopardy.

And then—there. The guards leading James along come to a halt in front of a cell, and he peers around them eagerly, his breath punching out of him at the sight of Sirius, who springs up from his bed the moment he hears James. The cell doors open with a clang, and James bursts forward, frantically pushing past the guards to run to Sirius.

Sirius, who watches him with wide eyes, the bottom half of his face covered. He's reaching out before James gets to him, and they collide into each other so hard they go stumbling back.

"Sirius," James chokes out, gasping almost, hugging him so hard that he can feel Sirius' ribs constrict under his arms. Of course, he gets no response, which immediately makes him scramble back and raise his hands to fumble at the clasps of the mask, only to find it locked. He rears back and stares at Sirius in horror, then whips his head around to glare at the guards. "Let me unlock the mask."

"Sorry, those weren't our orders," comes the dry response, and then the door shuts again. "We'll return to collect you shortly."

With that, the guards sweep off, and James grinds his teeth, glaring after them, but cold hands on his face gathers his attention. Sirius tugs on his head, shaking it a little as he stares at him with wide what-the-fuck eyes. His hands are trembling against James' face, and his chest is heaving, very faint sounds of sharp, muffled breathing only just escaping through the slots on the mask. It's so tight to his face that he can barely make a sound, just like with Remus.

"Okay, okay, it's okay," James chants, gripping Sirius' wrists, squeezing them gently. "You're okay. Are you okay?"

Sirius proceeds to give him a flat look over the mask.

James winces. "Alright, fair enough. I just—I meant, have they tortured you? Recently, I mean. In the last few days?"

Sirius' eyebrows draw together, and then he shrugs and pulls his hands back to tap his own wrist.

"Right, you don't know how long it's been." James bites his lip and nods. "Okay. Er, has it been a bit since they tortured you last, then? A notable amount, maybe?"

Sirius pauses, then nods.

"Okay. Okay, good," James wheezes, his shoulders slumping as relief pours through him. No, Sirius isn't in the best condition at the moment, but at least he's not being tortured daily.

Riddle is keeping his word, it seems. He would, wouldn't he? It's what gets James to do whatever he wants, and if he were to torture Sirius anyway, James would spit in his face and never comply again. By letting James actually have some control over what happens to Sirius, Riddle keeps James on a leash.

At this point, James doesn't even care. Yes, he feels absolutely filthy in the aftermath of getting on camera to read the speech written for him, but he'd do it all again to see Sirius and be sure that he's safe. Or, well, mostly safe. Safe enough, how about that? It'll have to do for now.

James reaches out to brush his hands over the side of Sirius' tangled, unkempt hair. It's a bit limp and not as shiny and pretty as it usually is, which James knows must be driving Sirius mad. Maybe James can bargain to bring a brush next time. Should that be a priority? Probably not, but whatever.

The balls of James' hands bumps into Sirius' cheeks, the part not covered by the mask, and he immediately frowns as he reaches up to press the back of his hand to Sirius' forehead.

"You're hot," James mumbles.

Sirius stares at him, then wiggles his eyebrows, which is so ridiculous and so Sirius that James can't stop himself from releasing a hoarse, choked laugh.

"Yes, you're always hot, but I mean hot," James says. "As in temperature-wise. A bit sweaty. Clammy. Are you sick?"

Sirius nods and steps back, showing James his wrists and inner arms, where he's broken out into a rash. James grabs him and stares at it with a frown, and then Sirius points at his legs, chest, and face before pointing to the rash again.

"You've broken out all over?" James asks.

Again, Sirius nods, then taps his stomach.

"Your stomach hurts?"

Sirius snaps his fingers and nods once more, then pokes himself in the temple, gesturing to his head.

"Headaches?" James frowns when Sirius nods again, then shrugs his shoulders and waves his hands around like a man as baffled as James is. "Are you, like, allergic to prison?"

There's a beat, and then Sirius' shoulders start shaking, his eyes above the mask crinkling up, alight with laughter. There's just the quietest, faintest sound of muffled, muted laughter that breaks James' heart, because of the many things Sirius is, quiet isn't one, especially when it comes to laughter. But, well, it does soothe something inside James to know Sirius is laughing, that he can still laugh, even after everything.

"Alright, well, are you getting worse?" James murmurs.

Sirius shakes his head, then gives a thumbs-up.

"You're getting better?" James narrows his eyes when Sirius nods. "Are you lying to me?"

Sirius whacks him upside the head.

"Okay, just checking," James mutters, and Sirius steps back to sit on the edge of the bed, jerking out his hands in yet another clear sign of what-the-fuck? James glances out into the empty hall, then moves forward to hit his knees in front of Sirius, reaching around to cup the back of Sirius' head and push it down. He makes them both slouch together, the curtain of Sirius' hair falling forward as much as it can on either side from under the mask. James hides there and lowers his voice to a mere breath. "I don't know how much time we have, and I need to be careful. You're under surveillance."

Sirius' arms come around James' neck, helping block his face. It probably looks like a lover's embrace, honestly, and James could not give a fuck less. If Riddle is watching, let the man wonder—if he'll even bother to care.

"Listen to me, I'm going to make sure you're as safe as you can be. I'm going to keep you from being hurt. I'm not going to let anything happen to you, okay?" James whispers fervently.

Sirius wrenches back, his head popping up, and James lifts his head, too. Sirius is wide-eyed again, studying his face, the cogs behind his eyes turning in his mind, and he's so smart, he knows James so well, so it comes as no surprise that his eyes narrow a moment later. He immediately starts shaking his head, digging his nails into the back of James' neck in clear reprimand. Oh, he is not happy.

"Stop. Sirius, stop it," James hisses under his breath, only pushing closer, shaking his head along with him. "I know what you're thinking, but stop thinking it. We have to trust them, do you understand? We have to trust they'll pull through for us, for the whole world, and in the meantime, I'm doing this. You have to let me do this for you, and for me, and for Regulus."

Sirius' eyes visibly soften, and his shoulders slump. Even with half his face covered, he conveys guilt with ease. Of course he doesn't want to be the catalyst to what James is doing for him, but—well, sometimes that's just how it goes. There's really nothing Sirius can do from his position at the moment.

"Listen, don't worry about anything," James tells him, even though he knows that's pointless to say. "Come here." He tugs Sirius back in, this time burying his face into the curtain of his hair for the sole purpose of speaking softly in his ear. "Do you know what happened to the other tributes?"

Sirius nods against his cheek.

"So, you know Regulus is safe?"

Another nod.

"Do you know what happened in the Hallow?"

Nod.

"Frank?"

A pause, then another nod, a bit slower. Sirius' arm comes up around him, hand pressing flat between James' shoulder blades. James squeezes his eyes shut and tucks his face into Sirius' shoulder, letting them hang onto each other for a long moment, heavy grief choking him, likely choking Sirius, too. They hold onto each other like that, probably for too long, but James desperately doesn't want to let go.

He doesn't let go anyway, but he does lift his head again and start whispering once more. "Mum and Dad are safe, Sirius. They were saved, too. It's—well, a lot has happened, and I don't have time to explain it all, but they're alive and safe."

Sirius jerks against him, fingers digging into James' back, and James can feel how Sirius' shoulders wrench up on what must be an aborted sob of relief. This time, James is the one holding Sirius when he slumps a bit, like his strings have been cut.

The distant sound of steps reach them, and Sirius tenses up, his hand patting at James frantically, trying to communicate something with so much urgency in his movements that James knows what it is instantly. He drags one hand up to cup Sirius' neck and puts his lips directly against Sirius' ear.

"Your moon made it out safely. Your moon is free," James breathes out, and Sirius gives a full-body shudder before he collapses against James and clings to him. The steps draw closer, and James swallows. "They're coming."

Sirius draws back slowly, and his hand slips over James' shoulder, their gazes meeting. Sirius presses his hand flat to James' chest, applying a bit of pressure right between his lungs. James slides his hand down and mirrors the contact, feeling Sirius' chest rise and fall under his hand.

Eyes stinging, James gives a shaky smile and nods. "I know. Every breath, in and out. I'm with you, you're with me."

It's the last thing James gets to say to Sirius before the cell opens and the guards drag him away.

Chapter End Notes

alright! from the top!

remus and lily!!! oh, they kill me!!! it's just like. that whole scene of them finally kind of —arguing? like, idk, i feel like, in that situation, lily was really stuck between so many different feelings surrounding remus that she didn't know how to navigate, like she sort of idolized him in death (made him the center of her universe, if you will), resented him for how he "died" (a sacrifice), and couldn't move past any of it (hence the waiting). and it was this thing of like, they didn't want to live without each other, but they had no choice. they HAD to, and they did, and they needed to accept that before they could ever live WITH each other again.

that whole scene between them makes me so emotional, just because i love them so much, and godddd lily loves remus SO MUCH, and remus loves lily SO MUCH, and it's all just SO MUCH.

but hey, trust remus to get around lily and take less than 2 weeks to Fix Her (this is a joke, lily is and always was perfect) when other people have spent YEARS trying 😭 kingsley saying he needs to shake remus' hand GOODBYE honestly, in this fic, remus has to things Central To His Character. one is he embodies "Be Gay, Do Crime" and two is he literally works miracles??? no you don't even know yet, but just wait, this man hasn't met a disaster he can't gift a miracle to 😭 anyway, lily riding the wave of the miracle, her breakthrough! she makes up with kingsley!!! ahhhh their friendship is so important to meeeee <3 i love them a whole lot.

and then 💫dorcas💫

okay, so listen. i didn't expect that whole scene between them to hit as hard as it did. i was so??? like, the bittersweetness of it, tragic and tender, and the way lily had to have her heart broken to help it heal? im??? and the thing about the pain of an almost lover? it's absolutely devastatinggggggg. but its also? healing? like, that was something lily really needed to do and needed to happen, so she could move forward, ya know? idk, they're just really special to me.

and dorcas, pleaseeeeee, with the whole "before her, it could have been you" and "lily, it's her. it's marlene" LIKE??? she's sooooo in love with marlene 😭 just the whole moment between them, and their love for each other past, present, and moving forward is so special to me.

oh, and marylily!!! now what the hell do you do when lily evans turns up at your door rambling about being half in love with you but also not all ready for love but also probably doing it anyway??? like what was mary supposed to DO with that? HELP SHE WAS NOT PREPARED PLS 😭 but she just rolled with it. listen, lily had a long day, she was probably rushing through things she could have taken her time with (she hasn't figured out how to Slow Down yet lmaooo), BUT there was mary to chill her out. god, i love them so much.

and then oooh the remus and regulus moment! no stop, because they're so important to me 😭 they're friends!!! they're being—mutually miserable together, but at least they're not ALONE. them sort of just, coming clean about the worst sides of themselves? like wishing james and sirius were there instead? that's rough shit, but it's also human, and it's also THEM. like, that's what they do—they show their worst to each other and help one another handle it, so they don't have to do it alone. they're very fucked up men, but that's okay. we love them anyway.

james!!!! not james on the broadcast LYING HIS ASS OFF!!! give this man a round of applause, because he just did BEAUTIFULLY—i mean, it was on the behalf of riddle, but i will ALWAYS celebrate james' achievements, duh 🙄 also regulus getting to see james again 😭 im gonna die, he loves him so muchhhh and then, again, james!!! and sirius!!! they got to see each other!!! sirius is just vibing in jail, and apparently allergic to prison lmaoooo 😭 but james updating him on everyone

—effie, monty, and the moon. ILL CRY. they love each other sooooo much, it RUINS me.

okay, HONORABLE MENTIONS:

-rodolphus dropping everything at any time to do whatever pandora wants, he's down so bad 😭
-the pandalily hints going down like a lead balloon, but marylily being on the rise!!!
-lily and remus being okay again!!
-dorcas suffering the whiplash of "is this a love confession" "yeah, actually, it is" 😳 LIKE HELLO??? COULD YOU IMAGINE????
-kingsley being so chill with "water under the bridge, red"
-mary literally blowing right past lily talking about love and shit to be like "hey wanna come inside and calm down, maybe?" 😭
-regulus and remus my beloveds <3
-regulus having a whole entourage ajdjsksjsj 😭
-james and sirius being Number One in charades (really, there's no pair better) alright, that's about it, but i just wanted to thank everyone for the comments and support. i really do appreciate them more than you can know!!!

Regulus feels his leg jump up and down with racketing nerves, his gaze latched onto the door as he waits. He doesn't really appreciate having to wait, and his impatience is making him feel very fucking mean. He's not above killing an old man; the urge is absolutely there, and if Dumbledore doesn't—

"You look like you're about to come out of your skin, boy."

Wrong Dumbledore.

Regulus darts his gaze briefly to Aberforth, then looks away, staring at the door again. Aberforth moves over to sit down in the chair next to him, gazing upon the gargoyle door-knocker ruefully. Regulus ignores him, because Mayor Aberforth isn't really someone he's ever properly interacted with or gotten to know before, and he doesn't care to.

"You know that tree on the edge of my property back home, the one you became so fond of?" Aberforth asks. Regulus doesn't look at him, but he nods, and Aberforth sounds gruff when he continues to speak next. "My sister's ashes were buried beneath that tree."

Regulus does look at him then, purely because he's surprised. He didn't know that. He didn't even know there was a sister. He also has no idea what to say in response to this.

"Well, better to say—the tree was planted there for her, with her ashes," Aberforth corrects, clearing his throat. "Grew in memorial for her over the last five decades."

"Should I apologize?" Regulus asks, sort of just—reflexively, without even thinking, like an instinct. For fuck's sake, the tree grew from a dead girl's ashes, and Regulus was out there cutting up the bark with his daggers.

Aberforth grunts and shakes his head. "No, you don't need to. Ariana wouldn't have minded."

"Oh," Regulus says. He coughs. "Okay."

"She died in the arena, only fourteen years old," Aberforth tells him. "Nearly lived to see the end of the 34th hunger games. Second-to-last."

Regulus' stomach turns over. "That's—" He stops and gets no further, because there are really no words to encompass what that is. Tragic. Normal. Something all of them will always find horrible. Something all of them have known their entire lives. It's despicable. It happens all the time.

"The man who won instead of her is right through that door," Aberforth murmurs, nodding towards his brother's office.

And that. Well, that's something else entirely. Regulus thought he felt sick before, but no, no, this is true nausea. Siblings in the arena. Regulus and Sirius, Narcissa and Bellatrix—they were not the first. It's common for families of tributes to be reaped later, especially if the tributes become Victors. It's impossible to miss; so many from the Black family; Augusta and Frank; Rodolphus and Rabastan; Euphemia and James; so many others, those who didn't make it, and now two from the Dumbledores. It appears, when it comes to siblings being in the arena at the same time, history is doomed to repeat itself. Only one ever seems to make it out.

"Why are you telling me this?" Regulus mumbles.

"Because," Aberforth says with a sigh, "I wish I had someone to tell me then what I know now. What good does history do in secret? It just makes it easier to repeat. You and Sirius so painfully remind me of myself and Albus."

Regulus resists the urge to grind his teeth. "I don't really think Sirius and I are anything like you and him."

"No? You don't think so?" Aberforth chuckles throatily. "On the day of the reaping for 34th hunger games, the very first name that was called was mine." He swivels his head and meets Regulus' gaze. "Albus volunteered for me."

Regulus is pretty sure his stomach drops right out from underneath him. Okay, now he's in real danger of being sick. That's just…very fucking familiar.

"Albus was seven years older than me, ten years older than Ariana, and he always said he'd make sure nothing happened to us. He promised us that every year, and he intended to keep that promise, because I don't think there was a half a minute between my name being called and him raising his hand and calmly volunteering for me." Aberforth shakes his head, looking weary. "I didn't—it's one thing to think your older brother will do that for you, but something else entirely when it actually happens. You know that twice over now."

"Yes," Regulus whispers, "I do."

"Luck did not shine upon our family that day. Ariana's name was only in that bowl twice. It should have never been her. That saying—may the odds be ever in your favor… It originated from Albus," Aberforth informs him. "He said it to her for her first reaping and likely said it for the second. He always said it at the start. The odds are in your favor. But, well, they weren't. The next name that was called was Ariana's."

"The odds of that…"

"How well I know. I was taken out of the reaping when Albus volunteered for me, so I couldn't volunteer for her, and that was that. Of course, it came as no surprise to me when Albus ensured me that he would be getting Ariana home."

Regulus squeezes his eyes shut, helpless to the goosebumps that break out all over his body, a strange tingling sensation like he's a bell that's been rung, the past reaching out to him now and resonating so hard that he shudders.

"The games were a bit different back then, under Grindelwald as Master," Aberforth continues. "There was more time for the tributes in the Hallow before the games started, for one thing, and Grindelwald was…a bit more involved. It all took place in his castle. Parties, dinners, interviews, training, evaluations. The man himself would speak directly to the tributes, engage with them, and he did so with Albus."

Regulus' eyes snap open, and he looks at Aberforth with his lips parted. "Wait. Grindelwald was assassinated—"

"Don't go getting ahead of the history lesson now, boy," Aberforth mutters. "But—yes. Before that, though, you have to understand why. You see, as it turns out, Grindelwald became quite enamored with Albus. He fell in love with Albus and, against all odds, Albus fell in love with him in return."

"He—what?" Regulus blurts out, eyes widening. It feels like his brain short-circuits briefly out of sheer disbelief. How could he do that? How could someone who had their family ripped apart fall in love with the person who not only upheld the system that did it, but also had a hand in the ripping?

Aberforth doesn't look very pleased about it. "Yes, well, it never made much sense to me either. I always thought that Albus' belief that he was going to die anyway lended itself to his own acceptance of it. Because he meant he was going to go into that arena and do whatever it took to get Ariana home, and you want to know the worst part?"

Regulus doesn't want to know, because he feels ill, but he can't look away from Aberforth now, invested in this, hooked.

"He did," Aberforth says gruffly. "That's the worst part. He did absolutely everything he meant to. Got them both to the end. Kept her safe the entire time. And, when it was just them, he intended to kill himself. Said goodbye to me through a screen, started to say goodbye to Ariana, and then—" He halts, taking in a sharp breath before shaking his head jerkily. His top lip curls up in decades old resentment. "Well, Grindelwald didn't want to lose Albus, you see, and so Ariana was killed instead."

"That's why Albus killed him," Regulus whispers.

"When Albus made it home, he spent some of his new fortune on getting that tree planted for Ariana, but most of it he either gave to me or…saved," Aberforth continues. "He was—well, it consumed him. The guilt. The thirst for revenge. He went back to the Hallow and killed Grindelwald, then fled and… Hm, I don't know if he realized things would turn out as they have, all these years later, but he's devoted himself to trying to make up for past mistakes and unleash war in the name of dismantling the system that cost us our family."

"But he still had you," is what tumbles out of Regulus' mouth, painfully innocent and child-like, because it clambers through him like dissonance, just the way it's him for a moment and he's fifteen and Sirius won't see him and you still have me, you came back and I'm still right here, why don't you want me, why am I not enough, why, why, why?

Aberforth just looks at him, and he's an aged face, eyes wise and hard, so like his brother's and so very different at the same time, and Regulus knows then. Knows that Albus didn't have Aberforth. Knows exactly what that feels like, having your older brother volunteer for you, all that resentment and guilt that widens a divide too far too cross.

It's so much worse for them, Regulus can't help but think, because they lost someone they both loved. He tries to imagine how that would have felt. If, perhaps, Sirius had volunteered for him and the next person to be called had been James. If, perhaps, Sirius had promised to get James home, only to fail in the end. If, perhaps, Sirius had zeroed in on revenge and left him in favor of war. So similar and yet not with all these different components and varying types of love, but it resonates like a ghost from another time who built the place you've taken up residence in, a home rearranged to be unrecognizable, but the frame is still the same.

"Listen to me, boy," Aberforth says gruffly. "My brother was not always a bad man. I…" He closes his eyes. "I don't know that he is now. He has done bad things, and he will do many more, but he has done good, too, and so shall he continue to. What I wish I knew then that I know now is that wrecking ourselves and the world in the name of family doesn't return all that you lost back to you. My sister is still dead, and my brother is a stranger, and he will never have me again. You can go as far as you're able and get nowhere. That's what I wish someone had told me. You'll get nowhere, Regulus."

Regulus stares at him, realizing all at once what the entire point of this was. Aberforth is trying to help, in his own way, though he's very far off the mark. He's trying to tell Regulus not to destroy himself in the name of helping Sirius, cautioning against going too far and doing whatever it takes, because rarely does that get the results one hopes for.

Regulus' face falls blank, eyes narrowing, and he pushes to his feet so he can look down his nose at Aberforth. "I'll get to wherever I damn well please, and do whatever I deem suitable to get there, because the difference between you and me is that my brother will always have me."

He doesn't wait to hear whatever response Aberforth could give to that, because no warning is going to stop him now, and he's tired of waiting around for moves to be made. With a scowl, Regulus marches up the door and tries the handle, finds it locked, then takes two bracing steps back and proceeds to kick the door in so hard that the wood splinters.

Albus Dumbledore is pacing.

Well, he was. He comes to a halt and stares at Regulus as the door swings slowly on its hinges, coming back from where it banged against the wall. Regulus steps inside and grips the splintered wood to slam it shut behind him. It won't stay fully, so it's a little cracked, but Regulus doesn't care.

"Ah," Albus says mildly, "do come in, Regulus."

"Thank you," Regulus replies sarcastically.

Albus clears his throat. "You'll forgive an old man for losing track of time. Patience is a virtue the youth often find on the outside of their grasp. I was once in the same rush as you."

"I won't forgive you, actually. You summoned me for a meeting and then made me wait an hour. I'm not a toy to play with, and I'm done waiting." Regulus moves forward to pull back the chair on the other side of the desk. He sits, then flicks his gaze between Albus and the chair on the other side, arching an eyebrow. "Let's talk."

"Very well," Albus murmurs, and he does dutifully sit and regard Regulus a beat later. "May I ask your thoughts on the recent broadcast from James?"

"He's being used," Regulus declares bluntly. "Riddle is making him do that, using Sirius as leverage against him. It's coercion, and he isn't to blame for it. Do not mark him as an enemy, because he isn't one, and if you do, you'll have more enemies from all sides as a result. I don't really think you're in a position to have another war on your hands."

"Are you threatening me, Regulus?" Albus asks, and he looks faintly amused, eyes twinkling.

Regulus shakes his head. "No, that's a promise. I'm just pointing out what you surely already know."

"I do know, yes," Albus agrees with a sigh. "James is a very important figure in this war. Regardless of coercion, the fact remains the same. The influence he has is vast and will get results, all of which will have a negative impact on our progress in this war. Riddle is very smart, Regulus. James is nothing more than a pawn to him, and one he's using well."

"I know," Regulus grits out. He can only imagine the loss of progress that happened in the aftermath of James' message. How many Hallow sympathizers changed their mind just because someone they idolized told them to? How many protests disbanded? How many people willing to help shut their doors, and how many people wanting to help started to want to help in the opposite direction?

"This is something that will require pushback," Albus informs him calmly. "We will have to combat the negative impact and allow them to gain no further ground."

"I understand that," Regulus says, because he does.

Albus is silent for a long moment, studying him, and then he finally says, "Do you? What do you understand?"

"You need me," Regulus announces, holding his gaze. "You said it was like chess, and you need your pawn, too." He spreads his hands and tilts his head. "Allow me to make this easier for you. I'll even tell you what to do. Your leverage over me is James and Sirius. Use it."

If Albus is surprised, he doesn't show it. He only gives a low chuckle and murmurs, "You're a very brilliant boy, you know."

"I know, and what I am not is an unwilling pawn, but for them, I will be a willing one," Regulus threads his hands together on top of the desk and leans forward, holding Albus' gaze with intensity. "A demanding one, though. You have to give me what I want if I'm to return the favor."

"I wouldn't label this as coercion, then," Albus says. "This is more of a deal, is it not?"

Regulus scoffs. "That would make you feel better, wouldn't it? But let's be honest here, because we both know what this is. You have the power to make me your pawn and move me as you see fit, all for your own benefit."

Albus frowns. "The war's benefit—"

"I don't care about the war. I don't care about a better world. I don't care about any of that, and you know it. You know what I care about, and you're going to use that, and I am going to let you," Regulus snaps, in no mood to talk around the truth. He doesn't care for conversations that feel like verbal spars with no contact. It's strange to think of it now, but Regulus would have preferred to have discussions with Riddle, who spoke bluntly and never hid his intentions. He was self-aware and unmoored in flaunting his power, blunt and to the point, which Regulus finds much easier to deal with.

"I would at least like you to be aware of what I will be needing you for," Albus murmurs, eyebrows furrowed.

Regulus is pretty sure this man has never met someone he didn't have to manipulate in some way to get them to do what he wants when it's not what they want. Well, Regulus will just be the exception. "I am but your puppet. Go on, then, tell me how you'll make me dance."

Albus doesn't look pleased by this description, and Regulus wants to sneer at him. "What I would ask of you is to be a direct contrast to James in all of this. I have a secret informant within the Hallow, close to Riddle, who believes James will be used just as he was today. I want to give our own broadcast, one of which you will be the face of, should you agree."

Regulus arches an eyebrow. "Yes, I suspected as much. It makes sense, considering my relationship with James has been broadcasted and idolized. For us to be at odds will bring upon a significant shift. I know exactly what I'll have to do."

"You're willing, then?" Albus asks, and now he does look the faintest bit startled, as if he wasn't expecting this response. That's probably what he was pacing around about, trying to work out how he was going to get exactly this.

"Your willing pawn." Regulus gives a thin smile. "However, I do have my demands. I will do this, and I will do it well, but while I'm doing so, a rescue team needs to go retrieve James and my brother."

Albus stares at him. "That is a very tall order, Regulus."

"I'm aware, but I also know that it's the only shot we've got. Doing a broadcast will take everyone by surprise. It's the smallest window to get in and out undetected, or the only chance we'll have," Regulus says simply. "The focus will be on me. You may not be able to get into the Hallow directly, but it's not entirely inaccessible. The option to go in from district one is there, at least. Well, you can work out the details, I'm sure. That is your job, isn't it?"

"You ask of me an impossible mission that could get some people killed," Albus informs him.

Regulus shrugs. "I don't care."

"And if the team I send in consists of your friends?" Albus asks, a blatant challenge.

To that, Regulus has to pause. Oh. Oh, Albus is terrible. Truly fucking terrible. The thing is, Regulus does have people here who he cares about. Barty, Remus, Pandora, Dorcas, Effie, Monty, Andromeda, Narcissa. Some of the others he even likes. But, well, the thing is—these are the same people who would literally volunteer to go in the first place. The same people who would demand to go. These are the same people that Regulus believes in more than literally anyone else, and trusts, so he's not sure he'd want anyone else to go anyway.

It doesn't mean they'll all go, and going doesn't mean they'll die. It doesn't. No one has to die, if it's done right, if it all goes well. Regulus forces himself to take a deep breath, then release it, and he stares Albus down.

"Then you're smart, because my friends will get the mission done," Regulus retorts. "I insist on you sending them, in fact."

Albus sits on that for a second, clearly bested yet again, and then he sighs. "You realize, of course, that the odds of this being successful are nearly nonexistent."

"I've beaten worse odds, and so has Sirius and James," Regulus tells him simply. "It's a common thread between us all."

"Is this what it will take for your help?" Albus murmurs.

"Yes." Regulus nods sharply. "Allow me to persuade the leader in you. Riddle has his pawn—James—but only through Sirius as leverage. Take them both, and Riddle loses everything."

"Do you believe he will simply stand by and allow that to happen?" Albus asks. "Have you fooled yourself into thinking that Riddle will not kill them rather than let them go?"

"Riddle won't kill them for as long as he believes he can use them," Regulus replies coldly. His stomach squirms, a horrible feeling like he's about to be sick rocking within him, and it's taking all of his effort not to let his hands shake. "He would only kill them if he knew he was losing them, so obviously he can't find out about it until it's too late."

"You'll forgive me for finding it difficult to think of a way this would be possible," Albus mutters.

"No, I won't forgive you for it," Regulus snaps. "You're supposed to be in charge, right? So fucking figure it out. You want soldiers? You want me to fight for you? Then give me a fucking reason. You got the short end of the deal, because me? I don't give a shit about fighting in your stupid war, but to get them back, and I'll be right there with them—and theyll care enough to fight, to help however they can. You'll destabilize Riddle entirely. Isn't that what you want? You can have it, okay? You can have that, but I need—just—I need—"

Regulus chokes off, physically biting down on his tongue, trying not to show how desperate he is. Albus regards him in silence. He says nothing.

"This is all on you," Regulus whispers. "Aberforth told me how you volunteered for him and went into your games with your little sister, you know. How you went to Hallow and fell in love with the previous Master, the one you killed after he killed Ariana. Then Riddle came in, the Quarterly Memorial came about, and here we are. Everything has a source, doesn't it? At the source of all our problems, it's you. You're the first domino that fell, and I'm—I'm not going to repeat your mistakes, or the mistakes of your brother. Do you understand what I'm saying? You were the start. You owe me."

Again, Albus says nothing. His gaze remains infuriatingly neutral, and Regulus has these horrible, violent impulses in the aftermath of the arena, just like his first. He has a visceral mental image of slamming a dagger through the side of Albus' neck, simply because he won't do what Regulus needs him to. Regulus is so desperate he wants to draw blood. He can't draw Albus', as that would be counterproductive; all that's left is himself, and so he cracks himself open and lets himself bleed.

"Please," Regulus rasps, laid bare to the bone, like all of his scars have split open again. "If I can't persuade the leader in you, then let me persuade the man who knows what it is to be in love, let me persuade the brother you are. I love James, and Sirius is my brother. Please."

Albus sucks in the tiniest, little breath, like perhaps he felt that cut deep, and it would, it has to, considering his own history. Regulus' pride means nothing to him now, and just as easily as the past can resonate with Regulus, the future can resonate with Albus. It tugs at something within, family and loss and ashes beneath a tree and a brother who has a brother and brother who doesn't.

Aberforth gave him history in the hopes he wouldn't repeat it, and whether or not he knows it, Regulus is using it to do just that. Maybe Albus and Aberforth lost everything, but Regulus refuses to. He won't lose Sirius and James. He just won't.

Wielding history like a weapon works. The past resonates like the butterfly effect, the man before him now who volunteered for his little brother and had no way of knowing it would cost him everything, and lead right to this, to Regulus sitting right here in front of him with demands that he fix his mistakes.

Maybe it's that, or maybe it's the way Regulus sits before him, a little brother pleading to an older one on the behalf of his own; or maybe it's the way Regulus sits before him, a man viciously in love begging one who experienced love's most vicious parts to save him from them; or maybe it's all of it.

Whatever it is, it does work.

Albus exhales, inclines his head, and says, "We have a deal."

Remus looks around at the odd grouping of people, not quite understanding what's happening at the moment. Lily is next to him, and next to her is Kingsley. Across the table, Regulus sits beside Dorcas. Dumbledore, who Remus does not like, sits at the head of the table.

This is about James somehow, isn't it? That's all Remus can think, because the broadcast happened only a few hours ago, and Regulus was immediately summoned to Dumbledore's office before anything could properly happen, though things did happen even after he was escorted away. The Phoenix itself has been in a state of chaos ever since, people angry, people slandering James left and right, labeling him a war criminal, a turncoat. Remus wanted to scream at them all.

Don't talk about him. Take his name out of your fucking mouths. He's one of mine, you don't know him, and I pity the state of your lives for never being fortunate enough to.

Effie nearly took a man's head off for suggesting James should be put down, and it took the combined efforts of Minerva and Pandora to pull her away. Monty had looked fit for cheering his wife on, and then when the man didn't shut up, Monty punched him in the face. After that, it was a surge of people scrambling to come to his and Effie's defense, like a wave spilling out from all sides, Mary there in a heartbeat and Barty right behind, Remus moving before he even knew what he was doing, though none of them got to actually fight. The only person who did, ironically, was little Nymphadora, who ran right in and kicked the man in the ankles, which of course brought Andromeda, and that brought Narcissa, and…

Well, needless to say, a clear divide had been set with all the separate parts of those who came in from the rescue missions, along with district six, standing together to stand against everyone else. They were severely outnumbered, of course, but that's a lot of fucking dangerous people in one group, enough to make any crowd hesitate. Remus is pretty sure he's never felt a rush of pure adrenaline like that in his life.

In the end, Kingsley took charge and completely steamrolled the entire situation by reminding everyone that violence and infighting within the Phoenix was not permitted, and everyone who did it anyway would go to solitary.

The whole scene broke up after that, but the rush had stayed with Remus after. Just that feeling. A feeling he can't even put a name to, really. All of them were there together. The servants who took their first act of freedom to move when he did, just following him without question. The tributes, too, all the way down to Alice, even, who barely has any life in them these days, yet was there like they had found their spark. And everyone in between; the rescued Hallows like Pandora, and even Huey was there, as much as he seems allergic to conflict of any sort; those in the Order, like Dorcas, Kingsley, Lily, Minerva, Sybill, and Amos.

Something about it, all of them together, it had sent a tingle down Remus' spine in a way he can't explain. A group of at least sixty people, he imagines, and it's not an insignificant number in the least. Not even half of the people against them, and yet Remus thinks they would have won. Could have won. Somewhere in all of that, in knowing that, Remus felt a rush.

But now…this. Remus still doesn't know what this is. It's not a punishment for what happened earlier, because not everyone involved is here—though, not everyone could fit into this room. It's not anything to do with the rescue missions from before, because, again, not everyone involved is here. So, it's about James' broadcast?

"I've gathered you all here because there is a mission coming up, and I would like to ask all of you to do it," Dumbledore says, and Remus is immediately not on board. Fuck this man, honestly. Remus will never, never, never forgive him for how he lied to Lily, intentional or not. He caused her such pain. Years worth. Remus would sooner spit on him than do a mission for him. "The mission, should you choose to accept it, will be to retrieve Sirius and James from within the Hallow."

Remus is immediately on board.

Unfuck this man, or whatever. Well, no, he's still awful and Remus will never like him, but this is a mission he can get behind. His hands are already shaking, and his gaze snaps to Regulus. Oh, Regulus, such a brilliant man. He did it. Remus doesn't know how, but he fucking did it.

"Yes," announces Lily, the first to speak. Remus can't find his voice, can't quite catch his breath, but Lily is sitting tall with her chin tilted up. This has sat between the two of them since Remus arrived, just that Lily was the one who took charge of the rescue mission in the arena and failed to get Sirius out, and Sirius is the man Remus loves. It's horrible, and they both know it, even if it's unsaid, but Lily would have cared more if she knew Remus' involvement, because she didn't care when she was declaring to the world that Sirius got left behind and was likely dead. Remus heard it from her, his best friend, like a hot brand piercing through him, so callous, and how do they ever come back from that fully? Like this, apparently, because Lily doesn't even hesitate. "Yes, I'll do it. I'm in."

"Me," Remus chokes out, practically fucking vibrating. He can't really form full sentences. "Yes."

"Absolutely I'm in," Dorcas agrees next, her eyes bright, and for the first time since they all came into the room, Lily and Dorcas actually look at each other, equally eager to do this.

"I'm willing as well," Kingsley says simply, possibly the calmest person in the room at the moment, excluding maybe Dumbledore himself. They both radiate that sense of serenity, but Kingsley's seems to be sincere, while Dumbledore's seems more sinister in nature. "Will I be taking point?"

"You will indeed be taking point," Dumbledore announces, and everyone focuses on him. "Now that I've gotten your agreement, I'll explain how this is going to go. Mr. Lupin, you are vital to this mission, because you're the only person in this room who has been in Azkaban."

Remus feels something within him wilt, his stomach dropping out from underneath him. "What do you need to know?"

"Is there an office that has the information of all prisoners, including their cells?" Dumbledore asks.

"Yes," Remus admits. "It's above the level where the—as where the prisoners get taken. The lower levels. It's—I've seen the offices before, but I've never been in them, not since I was first integrated into the system six years ago. I just—I don't know if they'll have a list of cells assigned or not."

"For a system to run smoothly—even a prison system—having an organized database is ideal," Dumbledore murmurs. "It will be the best place to start, at the very least, and you will have as much time as Regulus can grant you."

Everyone stops and stares at Regulus.

"I—" Regulus pauses, the muscle in his cheek jumping, visibly clenching his jaw. "I won't be going. For this to be possible, I'll have to do my part from here."

"Riddle will be utilizing James in another broadcast," Dumbledore says, and Remus doesn't like how he says it. Utilizing James, as if James is just a tool. "I have a secret informant within the Hallow who informs me that James is willing to do these broadcasts in exchange for visits to Sirius in Azkaban. As soon as his broadcast ends, he's escorted from Riddle's castle to Azkaban, and that's the only window of accessibility to both of them that we'll have."

"That sounds like a small window," Dorcas mutters.

"It will be," Dumbledore confirms. "From here, Filius will follow James' broadcast with one of our own, which will be Regulus, who will keep Riddle—and, by extension, the rest of the Hallow—busy and focused on him, hopefully allowing the rest of you to break into Azkaban and get them out."

Kingsley leans forward on his elbows. "How will we be infiltrating the Hallow, since the station there is monitored?"

"You'll be going in through district one," Dumbledore explains calmly. "Filius has a friend there named Pomona Sprout, who works in one of the main labs for the Hallow. That lab sends out shipments of medicine and various other experimental things to Azkaban frequently. You will all be snuck in that way, hidden in the back of the container, undetected."

"Trojan Horse," Regulus mumbles, and he laughs quietly, shaking his head in a mixture of awe and incredulity.

Dumbledore flicks his gaze towards him. "Just so. There will, of course, be a stopping point at the entrance to the Hallow in which the container will be checked. Ms. Sprout has informed us that it's not very thorough, but we'll take further precaution by having one crate empty, which all of you will stay in."

"Wait, like…" Lily grimaces. "You mean we're going to be packed in a small box inside a bigger box?"

"To simplify it, yes," Dumbledore confirms.

"How are we going to breathe?" Dorcas blurts out.

"You will be equipped with oxygen tanks to…ease the strain, but conserving your oxygen as much as possible is ideal."

"We're going to be suffocating. That's what you're saying."

Regulus heaves a sigh. "Yes, but really slowly, so you'll live."

"Oh, well, in that case," Dorcas mutters with a scoff.

"You'll be going directly to Azkaban," Dumbledore continues. "Once you're there, Ms. Sprout will break open your crate and free you, and then the rest will be up to you."

"Okay, I can see getting in as a possibility," Lily allows, her eyes narrowing, "but what's our route out?"

"Far from glamorous, I'm afraid," Dumbledore says. "You will be equipped with tools to override the surveillance feed within Azkaban for fifteen minutes. Only fifteen minutes. That is your only window to avoid detection from cameras, but you'll still be at risk of discovery by people within the building, so—"

"There's not, like, guard patrols or anything," Remus interrupts, clearing his throat when everyone swivels their heads to look at him. "Well, I mean…it's literally a prison. Everyone is in cells. Guards mostly stay in their rec room, and anyone in administration will be in their offices. If we do it quickly and quietly, we can break into one office without alerting anyone and get the information on where Sirius' cell is, then sneak to get him. It's—it is possible to do it quietly."

"Yes, that is the idea," Dumbledore agrees. "It's a mission depending heavily on stealth, and the biggest problem you'll face is time. You'll be racing against the clock, even with Regulus doing what he can from here. Riddle is intelligent far more than most realize. He won't easily be fooled."

"I'm still not understanding how we get out," Lily says.

"Ah, yes, that," Dumbledore replies. "Filius is working his way into servers now to retrieve blueprints of the prison, as well as what's beneath it. Azkaban operates on a lone sewer system underneath. You'll need to travel through it to where the waste runs off from the large pipes. There, Ms. Sprout will be waiting to carry you back to district one."

"Shit and piss," Dorcas declares flatly. "We're going to be wading through literal shit and piss."

"Well, Riddle won't expect it, at least," Lily mutters dryly.

"You will all be sent out to district one to wait with Ms. Sprout ahead of time," Dumbledore murmurs. "I will be notified when James is escorted to Azkaban, and that's when you will go in. If, at any time, Azkaban's breach is discovered, the entire Hallow will respond. They will put up roadblocks, send Aurors out after you, and you'll more than likely be captured or killed before you can make it out."

"There are about ten different holes in this plan," Dorcas announces, staring right at Dumbledore. "You realize that, don't you? This plan is shit. It likely won't work."

"I know," is all Dumbledore says.

Dorcas' eyes narrow. "So, why are you doing this?"

"Because I insisted on it," Regulus snaps. "Look, it's the only shot we've got, alright? It's a shitty plan, sure, but if anyone can pull it off, whatever it takes, it's all of you. I don't care how you get it done. Just get it done."

To that, all protests and doubts come to a halt. No one says anything, but they all look around at each other in silence. It's an insane plan. It's an insane thing to do, to go right into the heart of the very place they're labeled as anarchists, to go when the odds of making it out are very fucking slim. It's an insane idea, risking capture or torture or death, or all of it.

"So," Dumbledore says softly, "I will give all of you one more chance to opt out of this mission, because if you do not, you will have two days to prepare, and then you'll leave."

It seems no one here is sane, because—even given the chance, and knowing all they do—no one changes their answer.

Word travels fast around the Phoenix—this, Dorcas knows well. It's sort of hard to ignore when a mission is coming up, because those involved are taking the time to prepare, and various people are rushing about to get supplies and such.

For example, they've all been training in the two days before they're all set out to leave. Brushing up with guns, brushing up on mats in the training room, brushing up on how to all work the supplies they'll be equipped with. There was, of course, the natural spillage from those involved to those who are not, yet deserve to know. Remus told Effie and Monty. Lily told Mary. Regulus told Narcissa and Andromeda. Dorcas told Minerva. In no time, Pandora had found out about it, and then more and more people knew, and then everyone knew.

Somehow, inevitably, Marlene finds out about it, and Dorcas isn't expecting it to be the thing that brings Marlene to her door, but it is. After everything, it's this.

"Marlene," Dorcas blurts out, her heart thundering hard in her chest just from the mere sight of her, just from the proximity.

"Dorcas," Marlene retorts sharply, then pushes the door open further and backs Dorcas into the room, sweeping in so swiftly that Dorcas just naturally goes stumbling back. The moment she's in, Marlene slams the door shut. "You're leaving, then?"

"I—yes, in a few hours," Dorcas admits.

Marlene holds her gaze and says, "Swap with me."

"What?"

"Swap with me."

Dorcas stares at her. "Swap—what? No."

"No?" Marlene asks. "Why not, Dorcas? Give me one good reason why I shouldn't go instead of you."

"Marlene—"

"Go on. Give me a reason. Can you?"

"It's—" Dorcas swallows, her heart racing, a drip of dread dropping down her back. "You—for fuck's sake, Marlene, you only just got out of the arena—"

"And I'm all healed up." Marlene holds out both arms, lifts them above her head, then drops them back down to her sides. Her eyes are glinting, locked right on Dorcas without wavering at all. "I'm physically capable. I'm as mentally stable as you and everyone else. That's not a good reason, and it's certainly not your reason, is it?"

"What are you talking about?" Dorcas rasps.

Marlene steps closer. "You know what I'm talking about. You know the real reason you won't swap and let me go in your place. It's always the fucking entitlement with you Hallows, isn't it? All of you. Sure, surface level, you're not like them, but deep down? You're no different from the rest."

Dorcas is frozen in place, knees locked, every muscle in her body bunched up. She feels that accusation like a slap. It's hard to breathe, suddenly. Harder, still, to look Marlene in the eye, yet she can't drag her gaze away.

"Just like the rest, when you want something, you deem it yours," Marlene continues, utterly ruthless about it. "You claim it, you idolize it, and you don't respect it for what it is, only for what it means to you."

"No," Dorcas croaks. "No, Marlene, that's not—"

"You don't respect me," Marlene snaps. "You lied to me. All of it, everything, was a lie. And it wasn't that you couldn't tell the truth; it was that you were too scared to. Because you knew me—you got that chance, since I didn't have the option of hiding—so, you saw all of me, and I let you, and you knew I would want everything you didn't want for me if I knew the truth. You made sure I didn't get a choice. You chose to keep me in the dark; not for me, but for you."

Dorcas' eyes sting, her chest feeling tight, because it's true. She knows it's true. She knows and has known this from the very first opportunity to recruit Marlene that she didn't take, all in the name of protecting her, but it was a selfish desire that she indulged in, because she knew then what Marlene would want. She knew, and she didn't care. She knew, and she did what she wanted anyway, on purpose.

She doesn't even have the luxury of feigning innocence, or pretending not to know, and maybe things would be easier if she did, but she doesn't and she can't. She did this. She chose this. Here and now, despite everything and as horribly fucked up as it is, she still wouldn't choose differently. Hallow to the bone, entitled as they come, and running on desperate love. Aching with it. Lost in it. Trapped with no way out.

"I know you were watching the games. I know you were watching me. I know you saw my boggart, and Dorcas? I am not her. I will never be her, not even for you." Marlene steps that final step, so close that they're almost touching, so close that their breaths are mingling. "Is that who you'd rather me be? Is that what you want? You want to own me? Put me up somewhere, soft and safe, delicate and secure?"

Dorcas inhales sharply, gaze snapping up as she breaks out into goosebumps from the pure horror those words invoke. She shakes her head. "No. No, Marlene, that isn't what I want. I want you, just as you are."

"Really? Because I can't tell. Because I was born and bred in the arena, Dorcas. Someone died there and came out as this. As me," Marlene hisses, gesturing to herself harshly. "Don't you fucking get it? You did everything to shield me from war, up to and including starting the fucking war to save me, but I am war. Everything you wanted to protect me from, I was made for. It exists in me already, and you can't take that away from me."

"That's not all that you are," Dorcas whispers.

"Maybe not," Marlene agrees, "but a stylist isn't all that you are, is it? We don't get to pick and choose the parts of people we love, Dorcas. For me, it has to be all or nothing. I need to be loved for the monster I am just as much as I need to be loved for the monster I'm not."

"You are," Dorcas breathes out, blinking hard and fast, a lump in her throat and tears building in her eyes. "I love all of you, Marlene. I love all of you, and more."

"You have a real poor way of showing it!" Marlene bursts out, her voice raising to a shout. "You started a fucking war for me, and I didn't ask you to do that! Do you know how heavy that is, Dorcas?! You can't just put that on someone! I have to live with that now, and the worst part is that I have to live with knowing you didn't even do it for me; you did it for you!"

"Yes, okay?! You want the truth?! I did it for me!" Dorcas explodes, flinging her arms out as her vision blurs and her chest heaves. "Is that what you want to hear?! Yes, I started a war to save you, and yes, I lied to you, and yes, I did absolutely everything in my power to keep you safe even while knowing you'd want to be involved. Yes, all of it, because I'm so fucking selfish, so fucking entitled, so fucking crazy in love with you that I can't bear the thought of losing you!"

Silence rings between them like the aftermath of an explosion, the stuffy pressure of sound you can't make out over the noise of your own heart, your own breathing, the rumble of the earth beneath your feet. Dorcas feels unsteady, shaking, because she knew at the heart of her that it was this all along, she really did, but to be torn apart by the honesty in it is something else entirely. The war was Dorcas' priority for so long, and then it was Marlene, and the same ferocity in which she gave the war her all, she does the same to Marlene. Devotion to the point of detriment. A toxic waste type of love.

"There it is," Marlene whispers, finally. "There you are. Yeah, Dorcas, that's exactly what I want to hear, because I want the truth. Don't hide from me. Let me see all of you."

"I don't even see all of me," Dorcas croaks. "I don't want to see all of me, because some of it isn't pretty."

"You think I care about that?" Marlene asks. "In case you've forgotten, you're not the only monster in this room. But you knew that, and yet you still claim to love me anyway."

"I don't claim it. I know it."

"Don't you want that in return?"

"Yes," Dorcas confesses, "but I don't think I'll get it."

Marlene holds her gaze. "Try me."

"I—" Dorcas swallows thickly, then squeezes her eyes shut and turns her face away, ashamed. "I'm not sorry. I'd do it all again, Marlene, because you're alive and you're here. And it—it doesn't feel selfish to me. I don't feel entitled to you. I don't view you as spoils of war. I prioritize you, your safety, your life over everything and everyone else. I love you so much that I think, if I lost you, I would set the whole world on fire."

"Is that so?" Marlene asks quietly.

Dorcas exhales shakily, opens her eyes, and looks at Marlene tentatively. "There are no good people in war, and I certainly never tried to be. I'm not a good person, and I haven't been entirely good to you, no matter how much I wish I had been, no matter how much I wish I could be. And it—it should probably scare you. Sometimes, it scares me."

"It doesn't," Marlene murmurs, her hand coming up slowly, fingers curled, ever so gently caressing the curve of Dorcas' neck and making her breath stutter. Marlene's voice is soft, so soft, when she says, "It doesn't scare me a bit. Do you want to know why? Because I get it. Because what's worse than all that you did is that it doesn't even matter. I'm still so in love with you that, sometimes, I think I could kill you myself, just so no one could ever take you away from me. And I think, in my worst moments, I even want to. Does that scare you?"

"No," Dorcas breathes out, lips parting as her eyes flutter shut, leaning instinctively into Marlene's touch. It's mental, pure insanity, but Dorcas thinks she'd let her, thinks she'd like it, even. "I told you, I like it rough."

"It's not sustainable, though," Marlene mumbles, and her hand drops away, nearly dragging a whine right out of Dorcas' throat at the loss. Dorcas' eyes snap open, and Marlene frowns at her. "We're not sustainable, Dorcas. This—it doesn't work. We can't work like this."

"Marlene," Dorcas whispers, plaintive now, aching.

Marlene swallows. "I can forgive you for what you've done, because I wouldn't have done differently, and—and I know it was done out of love, not malice. But you have to respect me and my choices if this is ever going to work." She waves her hand between them. "If we are ever going to work, it has to be mutual respect and no more hiding. We do this together. I want to do this, and despite everything, I want to do it with you."

"You won't be safe," Dorcas chokes out.

"Neither will you," Marlene tells her. "You haven't been. You won't be on this mission. Give me one reason—a good one that isn't selfish—why I should have to be the one that has to stay."

Dorcas licks her lips, mouth dry, mind racing. She holds her breath for a moment, then exhales and rasps, "You have family. You have Cordelia, Riker, and Maximus. You—you go beyond this war. Whether or not you're made for it, you exist outside of it. You exist past this war. You exist for more than the war."

"You think you don't?" Marlene asks.

"I can't remember a time that I ever did," Dorcas admits, blinking past the stinging in her eyes. "Not until you. Do you understand? You have to make it through this war. I need you to, and so many others need you to. People need you, Marlene. But me? No one needs me."

"I do," Marlene says, gentle almost. "I need you."

Dorcas looks away again, or tries to, because her eyes are burning and she's nearly in tears, but Marlene cups her jaw and moves in, presses closer and rests their foreheads together like that. Dorcas squeezes her eyes shut, feeling the tears itch their way down her cheeks, feeling Marlene's thumb swipe one of the teartracks away, so careful about it.

"I need you, and I'm asking you to prioritize us. Not just me, but us," Marlene whispers. She kisses Dorcas, fleeting and soft and so very loving. There's so much desperation to be found in the way Marlene's fingers tremble and her breathing shakes, just as desperate as Dorcas feels. "Swap with me. Please."

"Is this an ultimatum?" Dorcas croaks.

"At least I'm giving you the choice," Marlene replies.

"I'd rather you kill me, I think," Dorcas tells her, and it comes out as a whimper, her heart clenching violently in her chest.

A shaky laugh spills out of Marlene's mouth. "Honestly, that could be arranged."

"Make it hurt," Dorcas mumbles.

"No, for you, I'd be so gentle," Marlene whispers, breath spilling out hot and trembling along Dorcas' jaw. Her mouth follows, slow and sweet. "Swap with me."

Dorcas sucks in a sharp breath and holds it, reaching out to grab the sides of Marlene's shirt, fingers flexing in the fabric. She stands there on the precipice, trembling, selfish with Marlene in so many ways, selfish enough to know that refusing her would keep her protected but make Dorcas lose her, yet wanting her so badly that she's on the edge of risking her just to keep her. She hangs in the balance for a long moment, teetering from side-to-side, in equal parts desperate in either direction, clashing on the inside, made up of war as much as the woman touching her.

It is an impossible situation, but the solution has been given to her. Marlene said it. Marlene was right; they're not sustainable as they are, and they won't make it through the war anyway, if they continue like this, at least not together. Dorcas wants to make it through together, both of them. She started the war for Marlene, and she wants to end it at her side. She doesn't want to set the world on fire. She wants to do this right.

There are no good people in war, but there are people who try to be, and it's not the war they'll fight that Dorcas wants to be a good person in, but rather the war within them both that they can never win—and that's why she pulls Marlene close to hold her tight, keeping her, as she says, "Okay."

Marlene goes still against her, then reels back to meet her gaze, studying her. "Okay? We'll swap?"

"We'll swap," Dorcas confirms, swallowing harshly. She carefully eases the ring—Marlene's ring—off her finger, then slips it onto Marlene's thumb while holding her gaze. "We'll swap, but you have to promise me you'll come back. Promise?"

"I promise," Marlene vows immediately, fiercely, and then she kisses her, holding her face in her hands and kissing her like that's enough to make sure that promise never breaks.

The war within wages on, yet here they are, trying for peace.

Lily shrugs her pack on her shoulders, letting her gaze sweep across the bustling activity around her at the underground station. Her lips curl up at the sight of Sybill and Kingsley, hugging each other in a tight goodbye. To the right of them, Regulus stands with Effie and Monty, talking to Remus, who gives a weak smile when Monty reaches out to squeeze his shoulder. Farther to the left, Dorcas is standing in a circle with Minerva, Poppy, and… Marlene, which is surprising.

Lily watches them for a long moment, admittedly curious about the dynamic. Marlene seems a little uncomfortable around Minerva, which is fair. Lily thinks it's commendable that Marlene hasn't tried to kill Minerva at any point, because despite her true loyalties, she still did her job as the head gamemaker very well, right up until she didn't. Making the right choice in the end can't change all the wrong she did before. Dorcas can forgive her, and has, but Marlene has every right to not want to. So, Lily can respect the restraint Marlene shows by being in Minerva's presence without lashing out.

In a way, Lily gets it. She had lashed out at Dumbledore when she found out he'd lied about Remus. Planned to shoot him. Would have if Kingsley hadn't gotten in the way. She'll never forgive that man, and she'll never again be the weapon he forged her into. Everything she does now, all of it, isn't fueled by the absence of love, but built upon the foundation of it.

It's new. She's still getting used to it, honestly. Just that insane concept that she isn't empty, or careless, or loveless; the reality that she's full of how much she cares and overflowing with how much she loves. Fuck, it's terrifying just how many people she cares about, how many people she loves, how many people she wants to let get close to her.

This was something she was accustomed to, before. Six years ago, she loved fiercely and with no fear. Fought for that love, and then lost so much. Lost herself, too, in the process, but she's getting it back. Slowly but surely, she's getting some of it back. Herself, most of all.

The sound of heels reaches Lily's ears, making her lips curl up. She knows that sound. She can always hear Mary coming, and these days, she's always listening for her.

"You'll be careful, won't you?"

"Worried about me, Mary?" Lily asks, turning around, letting her smile stretch wider.

Mary, as always, looks unimpressed. "Worried about your knack for doing insane shit, more like. I hear it's a stealth mission. You don't strike me as someone who knows how to be quiet. Everything about you is loud."

"There's a compliment somewhere in there," Lily muses, and Mary's lips twitch. "But, if you must know, I'm actually very good at being quiet. Sometimes."

"When your mouth is otherwise occupied, you mean?"

"Wouldn't you like to know?"

"Not more than you'd like for me to find out," is Mary's calm, casual response.

Lily purses her lips. "Well, that's a given. Not more, you said. Maybe just as much, then?"

"Stop flirting," Mary chides. She has a 'teacher voice' that's just on the edge of scolding, a little firm, and Lily isn't into it in abstract, but Mary has added a special little flare to it when talking to Lily, specifically for Lily and Lily alone, in which there's a little bit of a condescension in it, as well as warm exasperation somehow—and that is something Lily is into. Oh, mercy on her soul, she's so into it. "I mean it, Lily. This is—I know it's going to be dangerous."

"Well, now you actually do sound worried," Lily murmurs.

Mary sighs and mutters, "Bingley would be sad if you died."

"Oh, Bingley would, would he?" Lily teases, though she knows that's actually true. Bing Bing is Lily's little buddy. Practically her partner in crime, at this point. They're always whispering and giggling together, just to make Mary look at them with suspicion, a smile hidden at the corners of her mouth. Bingley keeps giving Lily less-than-subtle hints on how to woo Mary, because he thinks his older sister should have a cool partner.

It's cute, really. Lily doesn't need help, exactly, but she takes his tips in stride. Bingley really loves Mary, and in the wake of them losing their parents, they're very close. Mary hasn't said explicitly that she and Bingley are a package deal, but she doesn't have to, honestly. Lily is very aware that Mary is raising her little brother, and it doesn't keep Lily from wanting to be around at all. If anything, it makes her want to be around even more, like a moth drawn to a flame.

She can't help it. There's something special about them and their bond. Bingley is a hilarious kid, kind as well, but he's not without his troubles. He went through a traumatic event and lost his parents, watched his sister kill people, and now finds himself stuck in an underground bunker that will never feel like home. Lily has seen him in a sour mood, snapping at Mary, cursing her. She's seen him yell at Mary, say things only young teenagers say because they're angry at the world and the people closest to them are the only targets they have, and she's seen the exhausted, worn look on Mary's face that grew more tense and strained with each word he said until she asked Lily to leave, her voice clipped and her hands shaking.

So, Lily left, and the next time she saw them, they were fine, as if it never happened. Lily knows all about that, fights with your sibling and the love that still exists thereafter. Mary and Bingley are a small, broken family now, and they're trying, and Lily is addicted to the sight of the love she can see holding them together, even through everything. Perhaps selfishly, she craves acceptance within the fold. She just—all she wants is to be around them all the time. It's like they have their own gravitational pull, and Lily is desperate to be tugged in.

Mary invites her in, or has been since the first time she did. Only three days ago, but Lily has been back multiple times. When she's not with Remus, she's with Mary and Bingley. Ironically, they don't do much. Mary draws sometimes. Lily and Bingley fold up paper and make goals with their hands, thumping it through and laughing when they score.

Sometimes, they all talk about ridiculous things, like would they rather take a bath in rice or pudding—a question posed by the ever-brilliant mind of Bingley. Sometimes, they avoid talking about serious things, like the war and death, trying to skirt around the subjects for Bingley's sake, and maybe a little for Lily and Mary's, too. Most of the time, they're just wasting time with each other, doing nothing much at all.

It's probably Lily's favorite thing to do. When she thinks about what she wants to do, it's always that. And, since she's trying to let herself want things and have the things she wants, more often than not she lets her feet take her right to them.

Only once was Bingley off with his friends when Lily showed up, which was yesterday. Naturally, Lily's mind had pretty much immediately went to sex, but Mary wasn't having it. She let her in, sure, but told her to sit on Bingley's bed across the room and stay there. Lily did.

They didn't talk about sex. Well, no, they did, but not sex between them. Just their sexual history, sort of. As it turns out, Mary doesn't do casual sex, not the way Lily does, or did. She doesn't mind casual sex, but she doesn't have sex that doesn't mean the same thing to her partner as it does her. All she ever saw from with Lily is that sex never meant anything to her, nor did the people she was having sex with, because that's how Lily presented it and that's how Lily liked it.

Lily found out that Mary was with Sirius Black once upon a time (ironic, Lily couldn't help but think, and she immediately went back and gossiped with Remus about it, who knew and found the partner shuffle hilarious), and the relationship between Mary and Sirius had been new. It was special, according to Mary, and could have been something—except they got that taken from them.

Mary had to watch that wither and die, through no fault of their own, and ever since, sex and relationships are things she treats with care. She needs to have control in it, an input in it, and she needs it to be an equal exchange. Lily was not someone who could give her that, from what Mary saw at the start, and that's why Mary turned down her advances.

Lily can respect that. She does respect that. The thing is, after that, there's the natural next step in that line of thinking. Lily couldn't give her that then, but can she now? Mary didn't outright ask, and she talked around the subject overall, but Lily had wanted to tell her the truth, which is that she doesn't know if she can give Mary that, doesn't even know how anymore, but she does know that she really, really wants to.

Is that enough on its own? Lily has no idea. She didn't say it, didn't say anything, and instead, she changed the subject.

It turned out to be good, in the end. They didn't have sex, but they laughed. Mary drew Lily a pretty picture. Lily learned that Mary started transitioning before Bingley was ever born, and she chose her name after her Gran who had passed away a few years prior. Mary listened when Lily told a story about Petunia. Lily made Mary toss over her pencil and drawing pad to leave a little message, which was the not-so-original: Lily Evans was [X]. It made Mary laugh again, so fuck originality.

In any case, Lily hasn't seen Mary since, because today has been rather busy with the upcoming missions and all. Yet, here she is now, acting like Bingley is the only one who would be sad if Lily died. Oh, Lily doesn't buy that for a second.

Mary seems to realize this, because she gives in with a roll of her eyes and says, "Yeah, well, I'd be a little let down if you weren't around to keep Bingley company, too."

"And you?" Lily asks, amused. "Wouldn't you be at least a little let down if I wasn't around to keep you company?"

"Maybe," Mary says, lips curling up.

Lily snorts. "Alright, well, in that case, I'll make sure I get back in one piece. Can't leave you disappointed, can I?"

"You disappoint me daily, pretty much every time you talk."

"Well, it's not my fault you're not otherwise occupying my mouth. Modern problems, timeless solutions."

"I opened myself up to that one, didn't I?" Mary asks wryly.

"You did, yeah," Lily teases.

Mary shakes her head, a smile breaking out across her face, which steals Lily's breath every fucking time. "Don't let it go to your head, but I would be disappointed. Really."

"I'll be careful, Mary," Lily murmurs, turning serious now, and a tension Lily didn't even know was there sort of falls away from Mary, her shoulders inching down a little. It makes Lily's heart clench. She forgot somehow that this whole caring and loving business is a two-way street, usually. It feels good to let people mean something to her again, and it feels just as good to mean something to someone else, to a lot of people.

"Thank you," Mary whispers, stepping forward, so close that Lily inhales sharply and goes utterly still.

Mary cups the side of her jaw and carefully dips in, ducking her head to brush a soft, fleeting kiss to Lily's cheek. Lily feels like the contact is burning a hole right through her. She's so tempted to tilt her face up and seek more, or even grab onto Mary and pull her closer, hold onto her, but this moment is gossamer-golden and fragile for how terrified Lily is to break it. She wants to keep it, just like this.

"I'll see you when you get back," Mary says as she pulls away, her lips curling up again as Lily stares at her, lips parted, likely looking like a fool on the edge of fainting, because she has forgotten how to breathe in the last five seconds.

It takes a moment, but then Lily clears her throat violently and nods. "Right. Yeah, that—you will do that. See me. That will happen. You'll—yeah."

"Alright?"

"Yes. That was nice. What you did. I liked it."

"I can tell," Mary replies, chuckling. She reaches out and gently brushes her fingers over the side of Lily's hand, slowly and casually grabbing onto two fingers, the pinky and ring finger, swinging her hand almost playfully. "Your reputation around here… They have you all wrong, don't they? And so did I. You're a softie. A total marshmallow."

"People are rarely ever one thing," Lily points out.

Mary's eyes sparkle, glimmering like the glint of volcanic rocks in the glow of lava, or simply the reflection of Lily's hair in her gaze. "Oh, and she's wise, too."

"And only getting wiser," Lily quips, flashing a smile.

"Time to go!" Kingsley calls out.

Lily's smile fades. "Ah, that's my cue. Hey, tell Bingley bye for me, okay? And that I'll see him soon."

"Alright." Mary squeezes her fingers, just for a second, then lets go and steps back. "Be safe."

"You too," Lily replies, then forces herself to go, turning to meet Remus as he pulls away from a hug with Effie, who immediately reaches out to give her arm a reassuring squeeze. Regulus nods at her, but doesn't speak. Monty tells her and Remus to be careful and make it back safely, and that's that.

Lily and Remus head towards the train together, sharing a long look between them, not having to speak to explain what they're saying at all. Just a simple unit. Doing this together. They'll get on this train together and—

"Remus!" At the call, Remus and Lily turn in perfect sync to watch Regulus jog up to them, looking a little strained. When he does stop in front of Remus, he just opens and closes his mouth, eyebrows furrowed.

And then, Remus sighs and says, "I know, Regulus. It's okay."

"Just—let me say it. I need to say it." Regulus lets out a deep breath, then meets Remus' gaze with a firm sort of glint in his own, looking less like a lost boy with no idea what he's doing and more like a man who has something to say that's actually worth hearing. "I know we both said we'd rather them be here instead, but that doesn't mean I want you to take their places. When they come back, you better be with them."

Remus' face softens, and he huffs a weak laugh. "Yeah, alright. That was sweet, Regulus. Should we hug again? Come he—"

Regulus turns and leaves.

Remus looks so fond. He glances at Lily with a grin, and she stifles a laugh before they turn to get into the train together, him first and her following. She looks back quickly, just to locate Mary standing with Effie, Monty, and Regulus. She meets Mary's eyes, smiles, then looks away.

Kingsley is already on the train, and Remus takes the open seat next to him when he gestures at it, already settling in to study the blueprints of Azkaban. Remus keeps peeking at it, so Kingsley turns to hold it out so they can both go over it. Lily sits across from Remus and kicks her feet up into his lap, slumping back lazily and considering a nap.

A beat later, boots clomp through the aisle, the doors shut, and the train jerks into motion just as someone falls into the seat directly next to Lily. Instinctively, Lily looks up to smile at Dorcas and feels her smile immediately drop the moment she finds Marlene McKinnon glaring at her instead.

"Last minute change of plans," Kingsley explains carefully when Lily whips her head towards him, and he looks like he's only just holding back a wince. "Dorcas opted out after all, and she said Dumbledore cleared Marlene to go in her place."

Lily immediately knows that's not true, but if there's one thing Dorcas is good at, it's being convincing when she needs to be. Very persuasive, that one. Lily flicks her gaze to Remus, who raises his eyebrows and cocks his head just a smidgen. Lily holds his gaze for beat, then swivels to look at Marlene.

"Do you have a problem with that?" Marlene asks, arms crossed and jaw set, every inch of her visibly screaming that she has a problem, and that problem is Lily.

"No, that's…great," Lily mutters, resisting the urge to groan as she lets her head tip back against the seat. Remus squeezes her ankle gently, and Lily closes her eyes. "Just great."

"The mission to go get James Potter—"

"It's a fucking disgrace—"

"—and bringing him here—"

"We don't want him—"

"—nothing more than the Hallow's bitch—"

"Regulus," Rabastan says, his voice low, "don't."

"Regulus do," Barty counters gleefully. "That's your fiancé they're talking about. Fuck them up! Defend your man!"

"Oh, don't. Regulus, just—shit, shit, shit—" There's the hasty clatter of Rabastan's chair, along with Barty's, because Regulus has already sprung right out of his. Rabastan follows warily, while Barty follows in delighted anticipation. "This doesn't solve anything. This is only going to—"

"Who are we fighting?" Rodolphus asks, moving to catch up with them as they pass the table he was chatting with Alecto at. He blinks when Rabastan glares at him. "What?"

"No one's fighting anyone."

"Are you sure? Because by the look on Regulus' face, I think it'll be a miracle if he doesn't kill anyone."

"Yeah, that's his I'm-ready-to-kill-you face," Barty agrees.

"No one can kill anyone!" Rabastan bursts out.

"I mean, we absolutely can. We all have. We're capable," Rodolphus argues.

"None of you have any sense whatsoever," Rabastan grinds out, groaning as Regulus whips around one table to grab the back of the chair one man is sitting in, bracing himself there and using his free hand to fist the man's hair so he can slam his head down, making his face bounce off the table.

"What the fuck?!" the man bursts out, hands flying up to cup his bleeding nose. "What—"

"Hey!"

"What the hell?!"

Regulus snatches the man by the back of his hair and glares down at him as the surrounding tables fall silent. "Let me make something very clear to you—to all of you—" He raises his voice enough that people stop what they're doing to pay attention, everyone alarmed immediately, "—James is no one's bitch, and if you talk badly of him—if you so much as breathe wrong in his direction when he gets here—I promise you and everyone here that I will snap your fucking neck."

"Regulus, honey, don't kill anyone," Effie calls out, bustling over quickly with wide eyes, Monty rushing right behind her, and Mary on the way. "You can't do that. It will only make things worse for James, and for you."

Regulus pauses. Sighs. "Okay, original statement retracted, then. It's your lucky day; James' mother just saved your life. Let that sink in for a moment." He tugs sharply on the man's hair, making him grimace and grit his teeth. "Good, now that that's settled, I'll amend my statement. I won't snap your neck, fine, but I'll fuck your face up every time you insult him until your own mother won't even want to look at you. Either you'll learn to keep your mouth shut, or you'll get brain damage, and trust me, I genuinely don't care which one comes first."

The man glares up at him, blood streaming from his nose. "No one is scared of you or your bitch of a boyfriend—"

"Fiancé," Regulus corrects harshly, then bangs the man's face into the table again.

"Yeah, careful with that. He's really touchy about that," Barty calls out, sounding like he's having the time of his life.

"Regulus, stop," Rabastan says firmly.

"No, keep going, this shit is hilarious," Barty announces.

"You know what? Fuck you!" The man tries to clamber out of his chair, and Regulus immediately kicks him in the back of his knee and slams him face-first into the table (again), wrenching his arm behind his back and holding him there.

Rodolphus clicks his tongue. "He just told you he has a fiancé, man, take a hint. I get it, he's crazy, it's a shame he's taken, but no one likes a sore loser."

"Fuck," the man chokes out. The other people look horrified and also way out of their depth. They've never been exposed to violence in their home like this. "He betrayed—"

"James didn't betray anyone," Regulus hisses. "He's the most loyal man on this planet, and you don't fucking know him. I'd like to see how well you'd handle being in his position. Here, let me give you a taste. You're going to say that you're very sorry right now, or I'm going to hurt something very important to you. Got it? Go on."

The man struggles and spits out, "Fuck off, I'm—"

Regulus wrenches on his arm until something cracks.

The man howls, and people cry out, trying to rush forward as he starts wailing, "I'm sorry! I'm sorry! Okay, I'm sorry!"

"Oh, not handling it so well, are you?" Regulus snarls, and then he's being pulled away by Rabastan and Mary, everyone yelling at once while the man weeps and slips to the floor.

Needless to say, Regulus ends up in solitary.

"Move," Aberforth grunts, glaring at the guard standing in front of the door. "I'm here to get the boy."

"Er," is the awkward reply. "Sir, he—he broke a rule—"

"And I've decided he's been punished enough, so move."

"He's been in here for an hour. For assault, the sentence is—"

Aberforth scowls. "Do I look like I care? Don't make me go get Albus—you know, the man running this whole organization and also my brother. Remember him?"

After a beat, the guard moves.

Aberforth heads down the silent hall. There aren't that many rooms and they're not often used, but apparently the damn boy lost his mind and attacked someone, so here they are. This doesn't have anything to do with Aberforth, but Euphemia came to him requesting his help, and threatening to also lose her mind. Best to derail that before it even starts.

Besides, it doesn't sit well with Aberforth either, the boy being in here. He's a good kid, mostly. Troubled, sure, and rather violent, but Aberforth was much the same in his youth. And, well, he wasn't lying. Hasn't the boy been punished enough?

When the door opens, Regulus is sitting on the floor and looking entirely at peace.

"Get up," Aberforth says.

"That was fast," Regulus murmurs, pushing to his feet and moving forward. He looks very calm. Relaxed, even.

"Enjoy solitary?" Aberforth asks dryly.

Regulus shrugs. "Honestly? A little bit. I like the quiet."

"You're a solitary creature," Aberforth mutters, shaking his head and closing the door when Regulus steps out of it. He supposes he gets it. Some people like being alone; Aberforth himself has always liked it, and it only becomes a problem when you start to feel lonely.

"Are you going to tell me that was stupid?"

"Do I look like your father, boy?"

"Far from it."

"Exactly. It isn't my job to tell you anything, and I can guess you already know it was stupid."

"No, it felt justified," Regulus counters.

Aberforth gives him a flat look as they move up the hall together. "You broke that man's shoulder in three places."

"I told him I'd hurt something very important to him if he didn't apologize. It's not my fault he didn't listen," Regulus replies, arching an eyebrow.

"Well," Aberforth grumbles after a moment, "can't say you don't have a point."

"I'll do it again, if someone else doesn't listen."

"I don't think that's going to be a problem. Word travels fast around here and now no one wants to even bring James Potter up in conversation. Safe to say, no one will bother him if he makes it here. Nothing to worry about, thanks to you."

Regulus' lips twitch, and then he says, "Effie send you?"

"Uh huh."

"Ah."

"Besides," Aberforth adds, "you wouldn't stay too long anyway. Albus needs you on standby for the broadcast."

"I know."

"I'm surprised you volunteered for that. Doesn't seem like you."

"You don't know me."

"Boy, I watched you grow up. I picked up on a few things, and I know for damn sure I'm not wrong about this."

"I—" Regulus grimaces, then huffs. "I'd rather be there. I want it to be me going in to save them, but—but I can only save them from here. It has to be me. I know that. This is all I can do for them, so even though it's something I hate, I'll do it for them. I'll do whatever I have to."

"Like I said," Aberforth tells him gruffly, "you can go as far as you're able and get nowhere."

Regulus scowls at him. "Then I'll go farther."

It's like looking into a damn mirror.

"Alright, boy, you do that," Aberforth replies, leading him past the guard with a sigh, looking away and shaking his head. It's foolish, but some part of Aberforth hopes—deep down—that the mirror shatters and the boy gets somewhere, after all.

It'd be nice if at least one of them did.

Pomona Sprout is a cheerful, lively woman with a big smile and a bigger wine collection, which Lily only knows because the wine cellar below her home is where the group has to stay.

It's thankfully connected to the garage on the side of her house, just below, so they never had to go into the house to get to the cellar. Best not to risk them being seen by neighbors, and with a war on, everyone's paranoid. Lily gets it; Pomona is risking a lot by doing this.

The cellar isn't so bad, really. There are four cots down there, complete with a pillow and blanket each, and Pomona brings them meals and checks on them frequently. She does threaten to skewer them if they touch her wine collection and promises that she knows each bottle, all unopened, and will absolutely throw them to the Hallow if she finds out they had any. Lily would love nothing more than to steal a bottle or two and get absolutely sloshed, and Remus wistfully admits the same, though they get over the urge quickly. Marlene is the one who acts like the cellar is her own personal hell.

She makes it very clear she hates it here. Well, actually, she seems to hate everything, especially Lily. Honestly? Lily would never admit it, but it kind of hurts her feelings.

It's just—well, Lily fought so hard to save her life. Maybe it's a little fanciful, but Lily can't help but feel something for her. A connection of some sort. She had Marlene's unbeating heart beneath her hands, making it beat. She had Marlene's mouth against her own, breathing for her when she stopped. Is Lily not supposed to care for her after that?

Lily does, though. She cares for Marlene, inexplicably, and not just because Dorcas loves her. She cares for Marlene the way she cares for all those she took the time to help, anyone she has ever gotten her hands on to be the barrier between the death that wished to take them. She's not divine intervention; she's simply a woman who does what she can, and she did what she could, and she's proud of that. She looks at Marlene and is proud, so fucking proud, that she's alive.

Lily looks at Marlene a lot. She fails to understand why Dorcas ever came to the conclusion that Marlene has to be protected. Frankly, Marlene seems like she can protect herself just fine. She's quiet, most of the time, but her silence is always sharp, like she's a perpetual edge ready and willing to make others bleed. There's almost a natural instinct to keep your distance away from her, but Lily is pretty sure she likes it that way. Lily is also pretty sure she hates it that way, too.

The thing is, Lily understands why Marlene doesn't like her. Or, she thinks she does. It has to be Dorcas, right? That's the only thing that exists between them.

Lily pretty much confirms it for herself on the first night, when she finds her gaze latched onto the ring on Marlene's finger, only for Marlene to curl her hand into a fist, tucking her thumb in as if Lily might attempt to take it from her again. It's the glare of all glares Lily is met with when she looks up, a very clear sign that Marlene is more than willing to punch her if she even dares to try, and Lily looks away with absolutely no desire to try whatsoever. She isn't sure how to explain that.

How does one explain it? What Lily and Dorcas had, and have, and never had, and will always have. How Lily and Dorcas were merely a could have been, a garden with nothing to show for it but seeds, and it's heartbreaking, sure, but Lily wouldn't change it for anything. She likes it, she likes how things have ended up, and she's at peace with it.

Lily sort of wants to sit her down and tell her about Mary. Tell her how Mary makes her feel, and how it's wholly different from how Dorcas has ever made her feel. Tell her that Dorcas isn't the one Lily truly wanted to try with, but she's so fucking desperate to try with Mary that it's driving her mad, and maybe Marlene could give her advice on how to come out on the other side of a major metamorphosis and settle into the changes, because she's good at that, isn't she? That's what Lily sees when she looks at Marlene, a woman who rolls with the punches, and keeps going, and wears her bruises like jewelry.

But, well, talking to Marlene is practically impossible. She stays to herself, mostly, never too far away from her cot that she dragged towards the back corner where there are no shelves of wine and where the rest of them aren't. She doesn't really talk or provide opinions when Kingsley is talking about the plan; she just looks at the blueprints with keen eyes and listens with focus when he's going over something.

In any case, the second night goes much like the first with them waiting for news of James' broadcast, keeping an eye on the notif, checking their supplies and going over every angle of the plan until their eyes are crossing. At this point, Lily is just gritting her teeth through the hurry-up-and-wait suspense of it all. She wants to get it over with already.

They all retire when evening bleeds into night. Everyone murmurs goodnight to each other, even Marlene, though hers is more of a grunt, as it always is. Lily is treated to yet another glare before she departs; at this point, Lily is starting to grow fond of them. Maybe that's just Marlene's face.

Lily nudges Kingsley's shoulder before bed, ruffles Remus' hair and gently shoves his head playfully before kissing his brow, and then she settles in for the night.

She doesn't sleep, though. Can't, really. She closes her eyes and gets lost in little fantasies of Bingley's smile when she returns, and the way Mary will smile as well, but she'll do her best to hide it. Remus' breathing eventually evens out, and it's not long before Kingsley's does the same. Lily listens to the sound, drifting for a while, not asleep yet not quite awake either.

Until, abruptly, she is.

Lily's eyes snap open as awareness creeps in, late in the night, her brain catching up slowly to what dragged her out of the clutches of sleep. A noise. The scuff of a shoe against the floor, across the cellar. So quiet no one asleep would hear.

Carefully, Lily props up on her elbow, then eases off her cot and makes her way towards the sound. She weaves around shelves of wine and steps around one stand to blink in surprise at the sight of Marlene standing there already.

Holding a bottle of wine.

Just staring at it.

Lily flicks her gaze in between the bottle and Marlene's face. She can't quite make out her features in the dark, but from what she can see, Marlene looks…strained. It's at this exact moment that Lily remembers what Molly told her happened in the arena, how Eli Zatish was going through withdrawal and Marlene apparently stated that she knew what it was like, making it clear that she got sober at some point in the past.

Ah, no wonder Marlene seems to hate this place. That makes sense, actually. She's quite literally surrounded at all sides by constant temptation and showing immeasurable restraint by not giving into it, especially in the wake of everything she's been through recently. Lily figures she'd be pissed off all the time, too, if she was in Marlene's position.

"It was the second thing I thought of when I woke up in the infirmary," Marlene says quietly, and it doesn't surprise Lily that she knows she's here. As a previous Victor, mentor, and tribute twice over, she's always aware. "Dorcas was the first thought I had, but right after that, it was fuck, I could really use a stiff drink right now."

"Well, you were just shot, so…" Lily clears her throat and steps closer. "Can't really blame you there."

"It drowns out the pain. External, internal, physical, mental, or emotional—any of it. But it… ah, it doesn't help, not really. It's still there," Marlene murmurs. "Doesn't go away. You'd think, knowing that, I wouldn't instinctively want it when everything fucking hurts, and yet I do. I still do."

"Yeah, that's—that's how addiction works," Lily replies.

Marlene turns the bottle over in her hands, humming. "You ever dealt with anything like that? Addiction, I mean."

"We're all addicts, Marlene. Just some of us are addicted to more destructive things than others." Lily shrugs and eases closer, gaze sharp on the side of her face. "I'm addicted to smoking, which is shit on my lungs, so there's that. I'm addicted to grieving, I think, and that's worse for me. Can't quite quit that one cold-turkey, but it's an ongoing battle."

"It's always an ongoing battle. You can quit, but it never does."

"But it's a fight worth fighting, isn't it?"

"Yeah," Marlene says softly, "but sometimes you get tired."

"Which is when you let someone else help you fight," Lily replies, equally soft as she stops next to Marlene and gently holds out her hands. "We don't have to do it alone. That's the beauty of it. Give me the wine, Marlene."

There's a long beat, and then Marlene exhales explosively, her arms moving stiffly as she places the bottle in Lily's hands. Her fingers tremble as they slip away.

"I wasn't going to drink it," Marlene declares gruffly.

"Okay," Lily says.

"I wasn't," Marlene snaps, turning her head, and ah, there it is. There's that glare of hers.

"Okay," Lily repeats, simply nodding as she eases the bottle back into the slot on the shelf. "I believe you."

"I'm going back to bed," Marlene mutters, turning abruptly and stomping off to do just that.

Lily turns and goes back to her cot, but she doesn't lay down. No, she gathers her pillow and blanket, then folds the cot up and carts it across the room. As soon as she comes in range, Marlene props up on her own cot to glare at her some more. Lily ignores her and sets the cot up right next to her, in between Marlene and the rest of the room.

"What are you doing?" Marlene hisses.

"Helping you fight," Lily tells her bluntly, flopping down on her cot and settling in with a sigh. "If you want to get up and go stare at wine again, you'll have to crawl over me to do it, which is fine. I'll get up and go do it with you, then take the bottle when you hand it to me as many times as you need to. Sometimes, when we're tired, being reminded that we can fight is enough to keep us fighting."

Marlene scoffs, but she settles back down again. She's silent for a while, and then, "Lily?"

"Yeah?" Lily asks.

"Emmeline told me what you said," Marlene confesses. "About me having to live because you can't love Dorcas right."

"Yeah, well, that's not all someone is worth, I'm learning. You're not here just to do what I couldn't then and don't want to do now, at least with her," Lily mutters. "You're here to be here until you're gone, just like the rest of us. And I'm glad you're here, not for her or me, but for you."

"But you do love her," Marlene points out.

"I—" Lily sighs and turns over to peer at Marlene through the dark. "Marlene, Dorcas and I missed our opportunity long before you came along, and we were never going to get it back, whether she fell in love with you or not. We were always going to be exactly what we are, and I'm okay with that, and so is she. We're better off for it. Do you get what I'm saying? There's no race, I was never running in it, only running from it, and there's—well, I'm running to someone now, I think."

Marlene is silent.

"So, um, you can stop glaring at me now," Lily mumbles, clearing her throat. "You don't have to treat me like a threat, or be jealous, because I—"

Marlene snorts. "You think that's why I'm glaring at you? Lily, Dorcas rebelled against the rebellion to break into the arena and start a fucking war for me. Trust me, you're the least of my worries." Lily makes an inquisitive noise, because if it's not that, then Lily wants to know what the fuck it is, and Marlene heaves a sigh. "No, I was pissed off with you because of why I thought you fought so hard to save my life. I'm not going to be someone I'm not, even to fit myself into someone who would love her the way other people think I should. I'm going to love her exactly as I do, and fuck anyone who thinks it's not right, or I'm not right. I thought, you know, fuck you, too; I just assumed you fought so hard to bring me back to be someone I'll never be, but I take it I was wrong?"

"What? For fuck's sake, no," Lily blurts out, eyes bulging as she leans up on her elbow. "That's not—I don't want you to be anyone other than who you are. We all deserve that, yeah? I just—I have a bit of personal issues surrounding the subject of love. I'm, ah, sort of afraid of it, if I'm honest. I'm—I'm getting better, or trying to. I've sort of been through a lot of shit."

"Yeah, I get that," Marlene offers. "Same here, honestly."

"Right, but…you're unapologetically yourself," Lily says, her voice softening as she lays down again. She swallows thickly and threads her hands on her stomach. "You're not scared to be who you are. I'm envious of that."

"Well, I am scared of who I am, sometimes. I'm just more scared of being someone I'm not," Marlene replies. "Because if I'm that, and the people I love feel love for that, then it means they don't love me. And that—well, that scares me the most."

Lily exhales slowly and murmurs, "Yeah, okay, that's a fucking terrifying thought, now that you mention it. I guess, for me, it's less that I'm afraid of being who I'm not and more that I'm afraid of being who I was."

"We're never who we were," Marlene tells her. "It's not a bad thing, being who you are instead of trying to mold yourself into someone you can never be again. You're scared of the impossible, Lily. Because you can only ever be you in the moment you're living in, and when that moment passes, you're a whole new you—but you're always you, and never who you were. So, don't be scared. Just be you."

"Wow. Inspirational."

"It was, actually. You just don't appreciate my particular brand of optimism."

"Never took you for an optimist, McKinnon."

"Mm, well, now's the time for it, isn't it? It's the bleakest moments in our lives where we learn to survive. Everyone always paints it as this horrible, gruesome thing, but personally? I like knowing how to survive."

"You're not scared?" Lily asks.

Marlene pauses, then says, "No, not really. I know how to survive, but that doesn't automatically mean I will. Sometimes, we just don't. So, I either will, or I won't. Simple as that."

"Just not afraid to die, then?" Lily mumbles.

"No," Marlene says, "I'm rather used to it, actually."

To that, Lily has no reply, blinking slowly at Marlene through the dark. After a few beats, Marlene turns over on her cot. She doesn't say goodnight, so Lily doesn't either, but they sleep.

They sleep until morning with no interruptions.

Chapter End Notes

okay, from the top!

regulus my loveeee <3 he's so sexy when he's bitching at old men and kicking doors in 😍 he's got me giggling and kicking my feet fr no, but that moment between him and aberforth!!! the fact that albus volunteered for his little brother like sirius did!!! do yall know how long ive known that, and had it planned to be revealed by aberforth to regulus??? the whole background of the dumbledores has been floating around in my head forever, and i was so excited when i finally got to write it.

like, it adds so much dimension to albus and aberforth and the strife between them—why aberforth resents albus so much, and why albus is so hellbent on winning this war. just, it's like, imagine sirius and regulus went into the arena, and remus was the gamemaker/master sirius fell in love with, and then remus had regulus killed bc he loved sirius and couldn't bear to lose him—and then sirius came back, abandoned james, and went off to kill remus and devote his entire life to war in regulus' name and out of guilt for loving remus??? like that's so fucked up??? wild, wild shit, lemme tell you.

anyway, moving on! we have an azkaban rescue team! and a plan! a shitty one, but a plan all the same! lily, remus, kingsley, and marlene (it was supposed to be dorcas, but we'll get to that in a minute!), what could possibly go wrong? also, regulus! he's gonna help, too! well, actually, the whole plan sort of relies on him.

right, dorlene!!! ahhhh, i love them so much. they had to have it out, they had to, there was no away around that, because like. they genuinely couldn't sustain as they were without having this discussion. they're a little toxic at the moment—they're going through things, cut them some slack—but they're working on it! they wanna do it together!!! also yes, i slipped the "no one needs me" "i do. i need you" in possibly the last place anyone expected it to be, and i have exactly Zero Regrets.

moving on, marylily my beloveds <3 they're making progress!!! lily is head over heels already, poor girl. i love this transition for her going from having sex with a lot of women to being like I'm A Family Woman Now 😭 she really said, i found a wife and a kid, and im done with the drama HELP GOOD FOR HER LMAO. her and bingley have a special place in my heart, and so do mary and bingley!

also that moment between regulus and remus 😭 GOODBYE regulus was actually being a good friend for once and remus literally couldn't miss the opportunity to be a little shit, i love them so much.

right, then we cut to regulus fighting people with barty hyping him up in the background, rodolphus providing fun commentary, and rabastan being the only one to try and de-escelate the situation. poor rabastan, he tried so hard. but i mean, like, regulus stands for no james potter slander. only HE can perpetuate james potter slander 😤 not him ending up in solitary, staying for an hour, and enjoying the peace and quiet 😭 that miserable little shit really was just chilling and had Zero Remorse for assaulting someone. also the aberforth and regulus dynamic is giving Reluctant Mentor Vibes. i didn't mean for that to happen, but then it did. them>>> and then lily and marlene. lmaoooo marlene just Hating Everything, she's so real, i love her. dorcas, about marlene: she must be protected at all costs! everyone else about marlene: this woman could snap my neck in a second HOW DOES SHE NEED PROTECTING??? 😭

i love the marlene and lily dynamic, because like. sure, dorcas exists between them, but their dynamic isn't dependent on that, ya know? like, lily cares about marlene because she's marlene, and marlene isn't jealous or threatened, just fiercely defensive of who she is, and now that she knows lily isn't someone who expects her to be someone she can't and won't be, she's just Chill. they are similar in some ways—needless to say, dorcas has a type 😭 minor spoiler for the next chapter: we're going to prison

HONORABLE MENTIONS:

-effie getting ready to beat someone up for slandering her son
-monty punching someone in the face for slandering his son
-nymphadora running up and kicking someone in the ankles 😭
-remus' doing an immediate 180 from "fuck this man" to "unfuck this man, or whatever" when he found out what the mission is HELP HE'S SO FUNNY TO ME
-regulus "james is my FIANCÉ, get it right" black
-mary calling lily "I try to shoot people i don't like" evans a marshmallow 😭
-marlene being like: i love you so much i could kill you. and dorcas being like: that's so sexy, babe <3
-regulus changing his threats ONLY because effie told him to (the ONLY person who ever gets him to, btw)
-regulus "i follow through on my threats" black and aberforth "fair enough" dumbledore 😭
-lily helping marlene, and marlene helping lily <3

Severus escorts Potter to his seat in front of the camera, shoving him roughly down into it when he doesn't move fast enough, which earns him a glare. Severus ignores it, because he can't focus on hating Potter today.

Especially today.

It's going to be such a busy day. Playing both sides of this war puts him in this position where he is essentially battling for and against himself on rotation. He'll be helping get Potter and Black out of the Hallow, then he'll have to turn around and do everything he can to keep them trapped, should this mission go wrong. Severus hopes for the state of his headache that it doesn't go wrong.

Angering Riddle is a bonus, at least. The man has been a thorn in Severus' side since the arena break-in. He gives Severus orders that spreads his Aurors thin, a constant pushback against protests within the Hallow, harsher monitoring within the districts, gathering information at all costs, and more.

Within the Hallow, Severus has teams of Aurors on rotation at the abandoned area at the back of the city, in which those that escaped disappeared into. Where they went, Severus does not know. It's as if the very van they were in simply vanished. The entire place is empty. They did discover that the sinkhole was simply an illusion, but even past that, there was nothing to find. Regardless, Riddle has that area constantly on watch and thoroughly guarded.

How Albus plans to have Black and Potter rescued from the Azkaban without that escape route evades his understanding. He can't envision a plan that would ever work, so he suspects today will indeed be a busy day. Severus doesn't need answers, however. His only job to help Albus is to notify him once Potter has been safely dropped off at Azkaban for his promised visit to Black.

But first, yet another message from Potter. It burns through Severus that it's happening, purely because it's working. A good portion of the protests are disbanding, and now more people are coming forward with the desire to help their Master, offering information—usually false—that Severus then has to follow up on. Two days ago, a woman reported that she spotted suspicious behavior around the alley near her home, convinced it was anarchists coming to abduct or kill her family. Upon investigation, it was simply a pack of rodents digging through her trash. He had to call an exterminator.

However, there remains some protests, and there was activity within Hallow servers picked up recently that Riddle is very displeased about, only more so because he can't trace it or locate who was behind it. He only knows that whoever it was didn't go past public servers, meaning only things that are public records, such as prison blueprints. Severus isn't an idiot. If they're going to be breaking in, knowing the layout of Azkaban is just the logical next step.

So, naturally, Riddle wants Potter to be his mouthpiece yet again. This time, his reach is meant to go farther. The districts have grown restless in the aftermath of the released footage of the arena break-in. Riddle hasn't addressed it, far too distracted with the issues within the Hallow, far too obsessed with preparing for war.

In the meantime, riots have broken out in all districts except for one, two, three, and seven. Four, five, eight, nine, ten, eleven, and twelve have been on lockdown for two weeks now. Riddle has the Aurors in each district spread thin as well, all immune and weaponized with biological warfare already, but restrained to instilling curfew and turning each district into nothing more than a prison. People are allowed to work, but only work that benefits the Hallow. Many people within the districts are slowly starving. The militaristic grip in those districts are so strong that the numbers drop by the day.

He knows if the Hallow didn't depend on the districts to flourish, then Riddle would wipe them all out and be done with it. This, at least, convinces Severus that most of the districts will take the immediate opportunity to overthrow the Hallow, no matter what message Potter gives. Regardless of dwindling numbers, they will surely fight back and lose more.

Severus sometimes wonders, by the end of the war, who will be left to see the outcome.

"What, are you joking?" Potter blurts out, his head snapping up to stare at Riddle incredulously, who just swept in and handed him his script on a lone, crisp piece of paper. There's a monitor right beside the camera that plays a slow reel of his script, but letting him read it beforehand is supposed to prepare him so he won't fumble. Any misstep will result in Black's torture, so he simply doesn't falter.

"I'm not asking your opinion, James," Riddle replies. "I don't care what your thoughts are. Simply do as you're told, or shall I have Sirius taken from his cell in preparation?"

Potter shakes his head quickly. "No, that won't be necessary."

Riddle hums and steps back to go sit at his desk, opening his laptop to pull up the camera feed of Black sitting in his cell, as he always is. It's just a reminder to Potter what pressure he's under. As usual, Potter greedily stares at the screen, but he drags his gaze away when the camera crew sweeps in and begins setting up for the broadcast.

And then, without further ado, Potter begins speaking.

When addressing the districts directly, Potter starts by once again giving the message about the anarchists, listing them all off and making it clear that any and all information about them is to be brought forward. That's not the ironic part. No, the ironic part is that Riddle has apparently decided that it's entirely unironic for him to call for peace there as well, and ask that the districts stand with the Hallow as, apparently, the Hallow has always stood with them.

Potter struggles with the next part, his voice too tight, and his body too tense. Riddle reaches for the laptop until Potter's face smoothes out, and his voice softens. The message Riddle is forcing Potter to give claims that the Hallow cares for the future of the districts, a plea for the people within to think of the youth who will be endangered by the anarchists, as if the Hallow hasn't been slaughtering their children for decades.

Riddle continues to work with the belief that fear will get compliance. For some, it will. For most? After decades of facing the system the Hallow runs on and only losing because of it? Well, for most, this will only inspire them to fight back even more. Some will cower in fear, but there comes a point where cowering in fear will only end in death, and the districts are subjected to the hunger games. Survival is something they have been conditioned to fight for, and so fight they will.

Potter is a fool, no doubt about it, but he isn't the biggest fool in this room. No, that honor goes to Riddle.

When the broadcast is over and the camera turns off, Potter stands up swiftly and says, "Alright, take me to Sirius now."

Riddle flicks his fingers at Severus. "Take him."

"Yes, sir," Severus murmurs, showing no signs of how they may just make a fool out of him yet again very soon. He's not a laughing man, not since his mother died, but for the first time in years, it's more difficult than usual to remember.

If Remus wasn't claustrophobic before, he certainly is now. This will go on the list of things that haunt his nightmares, that's for sure. Slowly suffocating will do that to a person.

Imagine this. You're in a crate. It's big enough for four people to squish together in, but only just. It's cramped, lined with a fuzzy material that goes over the top to hide those within, and there are no slots or holes on it. The top is nailed firmly shut. This crate is wooden and boxed in by other crates in the back of a moving truck, and you're staying silent and breathing shallow to conserve your oxygen. You have oxygen tanks to make sure you don't fully suffocate, but those will eventually run out, and if the crate never opens, you will die. Oh, and panicking will only kill you faster.

Yeah, imagine that. Sound like a good time?

Take it from Remus, it's not.

The only way he gets through this is literally closing his eyes and chanting it's fine, it's fine, it's all fine over and over in his head like a mantra. The air is stale and stuffy, and it's hot. He's sweating. He can feel the blistering heat of Lily's skin where she's pressed right up against him. They were holding hands, but then their palms got too slick with sweat, so they let go. Kingsley looks like he's fucking meditating or something, and Marlene is curled up with her head ducked, sitting very still.

If this wasn't for Sirius and James, Remus literally doesn't know if he'd think it was worth it. This is fucking awful. And he has to go back into the underground bunker after this? Just another prison? For fuck's sake, Remus wants to be outside. He wants a little house with a porch, windows up to let in fresh air, a home he can come and go in as he pleases.

What he wants more than that, more than anything, is Sirius in his arms again. He'd give everything up for their something. So, yes, this is worth it.

Remus knows when they reach the checkpoint from district one into the Hallow. He hears the muffled sounds of the truck being opened, people perusing. His hand finds Lily's again, and they cling to each other despite the sweat. They're all breathless, and they still hold their breath until the doors slam shut and the truck begins to move again.

Unanimously, they all take in some oxygen after, as a treat.

Step one: getting into the Hallow. Check.

Step two will be getting out of this crate and getting into Azkaban. In a very strange turn of events, Remus—for the first time in his life—is eager to go back to prison.

"Bet you didn't expect I'd be doing this again, huh?" Dorcas asks quietly, gently applying makeup under his eyes.

Regulus hums. "I didn't, no. Did you?"

"Honestly, I thought my days as a stylist for the war were over," Dorcas admits, her tone dry. She sighs and pulls her hand back. "Have you been sleeping, my love?"

"I get by," is all Regulus says, because no, obviously he hasn't been sleeping. When he does drift off, it's always fitful rest, littered with indistinct nightmares, usually involving Sirius or James, or both. Sometimes, he'll get the occasional nightmare of Bellatrix, or the crimson river, or dead hands. He never gets the only nightmare he wants. He hasn't dreamed of Evan in a long time, not since the victory tour. Regulus still misses him.

"Good job," Pandora comments, offering Regulus a gentle smile. She reaches for his hand carefully, and he lets her take it, lets her hold it. "That's all we can do, for now. And right now, you need to do the broadcast. Are you ready?"

"Ready as I'll ever be," Regulus mutters with a grimace.

Albus didn't give him a script, but did give him a few points he wanted Regulus to cover as cohesively as possible, and he waited until the last moment to warn Regulus that there was a chance Riddle could piggyback onto his broadcast and speak directly to him, depending on what technological team he has at his disposal. Regulus doesn't want to speak to him, anxious that he'll somehow fuck something up, or give away the coup.

"It's going to be okay," Pandora murmurs, tugging him to his feet. "Everything is going to be okay."

"We sent in four of the best people in the world," Dorcas tells him, holding his gaze. "They'll get this done, Regulus. They'll be fine, and then they'll come home."

Regulus finds that he can't speak past the lump in his throat, so he just nods. Pandora tugs on his hand again, guiding him through the room and down the hall. Dorcas walks beside him, their shoulders brushing. It's still so startling to know all that he does about her now, but regardless of all the things he didn't know, she still feels like a friend. James would say that's the most important part, and Regulus decides to agree.

The next room they enter is a little more full. Albus, Aberforth, Filius, Minerva, and Barty. Regulus had asked for Barty specifically during the meeting where Albus had found out that Dorcas swapped with Marlene under his nose. He wasn't pleased, clearly, but she just shrugged and smiled with all teeth as she stated she felt it best that she stay here to make sure Regulus was camera-ready because, really, it was tradition, wasn't it? And, to hear her tell it, her girlfriend was more than capable of taking her place.

In the end, Albus let it go and gave in, simply because, once again, Dorcas didn't really give him a choice in the matter. He also wearily agreed to let Barty be there for Regulus' broadcast at his request. They'll all be sitting behind Filius' computer, within Regulus' line of sight, as if he's just talking to them.

It's supposed to help his comfort levels or something, but really, it does a terrible job when he's guided to a stool in front of a camera. He's already tense, which causes Pandora and Dorcas to fuss over him like he's still their tribute, and well, maybe a part of him always will be. As ridiculous as it is, that's what helps him relax. He's done this before. He has them. All he's missing is James, Sirius, and Remus.

They're coming back, Regulus tells himself, forcing himself to breathe as Pandora and Dorcas retreat to settle next to Barty. Those three sit together, watching him, steady, while Albus sits in between Aberforth and Minerva.

"Ready, Regulus?" Filius asks. This time, Regulus only nods, and Filius begins to count him down. "You're going live in five, four, three, two, one…"

Filius presses a button on one and points at him, and Regulus watches a red light begin to blink on the camera. For a second, he doesn't speak, doesn't move, doesn't even breathe. Then —

"Hello," Regulus says, which is probably stilted and awkward, but he's absolutely not the best person for this. He is the only person they've got for now, though, so…here goes nothing. "I would introduce myself, but I hardly think that's necessary."

This is true, and it makes him uncomfortable, because there's literally not one person in this world who doesn't know his name. He can perfectly picture so many faces turning to the screens near them to see him there, recognizing him instantly, eager to hear what he has to say.

Regulus has no idea what to say, suddenly. All he can think about is James, who is likely moving through the halls of Azkaban right now, heading for Sirius, completely unaware that Regulus is following his broadcast with one of his own. It's as he thinks about James, and James' broadcast, that Regulus realizes exactly how to begin his own.

"Only a little bit ago, my fiancé presented the world with a broadcast," Regulus announces, and then his voice turns wry as he continues to speak. "Now, I present you with my own to do something that's very on brand for James and I, which is me arguing with literally everything he just said."

Regulus sees Barty clap a hand over his mouth, his shoulders shaking. Dorcas breaks out into a grin, and Pandora beams at him. Regulus feels his shoulders relax. Yes, okay. This, he can do. He's been doing it for years.

"You see, James is an idiot," Regulus continues, fixing his gaze on the camera without wavering. "Let me tell you why."

Sirius glances up when he sees movement outside of his cell. His eyebrow furrows just before the door gets thrown open, guards moving in to immediately tase him, cuff him, then jerk him to his feet and march him out.

Well, okay, rude.

If Sirius were capable, he would huff and complain as they shove him along. If they expect him to have a broken spirit, they're very mistaken. For one thing, he's only been tortured the once, and for another, he doesn't even remember the whole thing, because when he finally did give in and scream, the sound of it triggered him into slipping away. So, score one for his fucked up head, he guesses.

In any case, a shithole of a prison and a mask locked on his face and one torture session isn't enough to get him down. That's nothing. Sirius would laugh about it, if he could.

He knows James is behind it, that idiot. Sirius loves him dearly, he really does, but James giving Riddle whatever he wants isn't something Sirius is on board with, especially not for his sake. But, well, Sirius also gets it. If their positions were switched, Sirius would do the same.

So, really, Sirius definitely could have it worse here. He knows that. He's not even sick anymore, despite the conditions. Mostly, it's just the boredom that's torture. Fucking hell, how did Remus do it? Literally what did he do to occupy his time?

Oh, yeah, Sirius remembers what he did. He got sexy. It's a small, stupid thing, but Sirius would give just about anything to feel Remus up right now. Fuck, he misses him.

Sirius feels confusion whip through him when he's taken down to the lower levels. Down, down, down. He's not supposed to be down here anymore. This means one of three things.

Either Riddle is breaking his bargain with James, or James has broken his bargain with Riddle, or James is…

Okay, now Sirius is worried. His mind races along with his heart as he's dragged into the same fucking room he was tortured in before. The mask is left on, but he's strapped into a chair just like last time. The guards leave him there with the same exact man who tortured him the first time. Bastard. Sirius glares at him, watching him like a hawk.

"You remember me, I see," the man says dryly, rolling over on his stupid rolling stool. He reaches up towards the mask on Sirius' face, and Sirius' head jerks away. "Relax, I'm just getting us set up as a precaution. Might not even be necessary, but I want to take a long lunch, so I'm getting ahead."

Sirius squints at the man, but dutifully holds still as he unlocks the mask and sits it aside. Sirius automatically exhales in relief and rolls his jaw, staring at the man suspiciously. The wild thing is, he's a fairly normal man overall, even friendly when he spoke with Sirius last time. This is literally just his day job.

"What do you mean it's a precaution?" Sirius mutters.

"Probably shouldn't say, but…" The man clicks his tongue as he sets a recorder on the stand next to them, the same one as before that he used to record Sirius' screams. "Well, your brother just came on screens with a broadcast. A right shock, he was, and I sort of assumed Master Riddle would have you tortured as a punishment. It's kind of his thing."

Sirius stares at him. "My brother? Regulus? What?"

"Yeah," the man continues, "he's with the anarchists, as it turns out. Bully for you, I guess, because you'll take the heat."

"Is he okay? Did he look well? Safe?" Sirius blurts out.

The man blinks at him. "I tell you I might be ordered to torture you, and that's the first thing you ask?"

"Let me guess, only child?" Sirius asks flatly.

"No, actually. I have a little brother and a little sister. Hate them both," the man replies with a snort. He fixes Sirius with a wry look. "If it was me, and I was you, I'd be begging to make them suffer instead of me."

"You're sort of ruining the integrity of all older siblings everywhere. Come on, it's a bad look," Sirius tells him.

"Not all siblings love each other, you know." The man reaches out and pats his shoulder. "Good for you and him, though. I mean, it ended with you here, but…"

Sirius sighs. "Okay, but—really, how did he look?"

"Well enough, I suppose," the man offers with a shrug, and it's not much, and Sirius doesn't actually trust this man, but he wants to believe it bad enough that he slumps with a gusty sigh of relief. "If it cheers you, Master Riddle might not even give the order, so you could be fine. Let's just hope it's quick either way. My pasta is calling my name, you have no idea."

"Great," Sirius says bitterly, dropping his head back and glaring at the vents in the ceiling above him. The man keeps setting up next to him, and Sirius eventually clears his throat before looking at him again. "So…what kind of pasta?"

Lily has no idea how the device works to override the surveillance feed in Azkaban, but she trusts it will. Filius said it only needed to be within twenty feet of the building, turned on, and then they'd have fifteen minutes.

They turned it on two minutes ago.

Getting out of the crate had been simple enough, thanks to Pomona, who busted the lid open and ushered them out with a promise to go wait by the sewer runoff pipes. They have a system for this in the Hallow, in which Pomona would usually drive in a full truck, leave it to be sorted on the night shift, and take an empty truck already sorted back to district one. It's a smart rotation and runs smoothly, Lily has to admit, and it allows them the perfect route back to district one.

After that, it was almost laughably easy to sneak into the prison, because…well, who the fuck sneaks into a prison? Azkaban is a formidable building, looming high and gloomy, a heavy quiet hanging eerily over it. There are many entrances, and Remus guides them to the one that involved prisoner transport, the one he was taken through when leaving Azkaban and then returning.

It's deserted with only the cameras to worry about, but if they were going to be discovered, they would have already. The device is clearly working.

Inside Azkaban, they start on the ground floor, which is where Remus said the offices are, as well as the rec rooms for the guards are. The higher levels are where the prisoners are kept, while levels below are for the torture and experimentation.

It's cold in the prison, cold enough that Lily shivers as she slinks along the empty hall behind Kingsley. Remus is behind her, and Marlene brings up the rear. They all move silently, keeping a sharp eye out, but Regulus is doing his broadcast, so surely everyone is distracted by now.

Sure enough, as they creep past one room, Lily lifts her head to peek through the blinds, finding multiple guards standing around in front of a screen. She thinks the rooms are sound-proof, because she can't hear any of them, but she can see them moving around, pointing at Regulus and nudging each other. She ducks her head and keeps moving.

"We're looking for an empty office, or one that has less people in it than us," Kingsley whispers, holding his hand out, then flicking his fingers to gesture to them to start spreading along the hall to look, keeping low and out of sight.

Lily breaks away to go to the other side of the hall, moving along and stealing quick glances into rooms. Some of the rooms seem to be for storage. Others are break rooms, clearly for the guards. There's one room with lockers and uniforms hanging up, also for the guards. She passes a room that most definitely isn't an office, but one that makes her stop anyway.

"Um, hey," Lily breathes out, flapping her hand to get their attention. "Hey, uh, we—we have a problem."

It takes a moment, but Kingsley slinks over with Marlene and Remus, and then they all stare into the room. Lily bites her lip, her gaze latched onto James Potter, who is clearly ranting at four different guards, all of which have their backs to the door and window, keeping James inside.

"Why…?" Remus' eyebrows furrow, lips tipping down, and Lily shares a wary look with him.

James is supposed to be en route to Sirius' cell right now. That's where the team was supposed to find him, that way they could sneak in, snatch them, then sneak out. But, if James is here, and Sirius is in his cell, the plan has to change.

"Maybe they're waiting for Regulus' broadcast to be over," Marlene breathes out, inching closer with her eyes narrowed.

"Which is less than ideal for us," Lily mumbles. "Regulus' broadcast is what's going to help us sneak out. Kingsley, how the hell are we going to get James quietly, but also get Sirius?"

Kingsley is silent for a long beat, then he murmurs, "We're going to have to split up. Two are going to need to go retrieve Sirius while the other two stay here to watch James. The goal is to wait for Sirius to be retrieved before we get James and go, just to minimize chances of detection."

"So…get Sirius, come back, get the drop on the guards, take James and sneak out quickly?" Lily summarizes.

"Pretty much," Kingsley murmurs. "Who—"

"I'm going to get Sirius," Remus cuts in.

"Okay, I'm with him," Lily says automatically, at exactly the same time as Marlene says, "I'm going to get Sirius, too."

Lily and Marlene stare at each other. Their fragile peace from the previous night wobbles a little precariously as their eyes narrow at the same time, equally stubborn.

Kingsley sighs. "Marlene, you go with Remus. Lily, you're staying with me in case we have to fight those guards. We know how to fight together, and we can do it quickly and quietly. No, don't argue. Remus, Marlene, go now."

Now isn't exactly the time to protest, as they're all trying to be very quiet, but Lily grinds her teeth in frustration about it. Remus pauses only long enough to squeeze her thigh with a grimace of apology, and then he and Marlene continue on to find an office to slip into so they can figure out which cell Sirius is in, break him out, then get back here and help get James, all within ten minutes and without being discovered.

Right, okay. What could go wrong?

Severus steps into the room, already tired and not at all surprised by the flurry of activity in Riddle's office. The plan is underway. Severus ordered Potter's escort to Azkaban and notified Albus the moment he was informed that Potter had arrived. Shortly after, the younger Black began a broadcast.

It would have been nice if Albus had warned him of that, but of course he did not. Severus understands why, because it's very crucial for the war, but it is agitating. The only thing that makes it less so is how visibly furious Riddle is about it.

"Severus," Riddle snaps, eyes cold.

"Yes, sir?"

"There's a situation."

"I see that, sir."

"Have the team you sent that escorted James to Azkaban bring him back. I want him on the way back here by the time this broadcast ends."

Severus resists the urge to sigh. "Yes, sir."

"Before you do that, however—" Riddle halts when someone steps up beside his desk, head ducked. "What? Speak."

"Sorry, sir, it's just—we've set up the camera, and we're ready to connect you to Regulus Black's broadcast," is the quiet, shaky response. "Ready whenever you are, sir."

"One moment." Riddle reaches out to press a button on a device on his desk. The line connects, and he says, "Make Sirius regret ever being related to Regulus, and if I give the order, kill him. Do you understand?"

"Yes, sir," comes the cheerful response.

The line clicks, and the person next to Riddle's desk shifts nervously and says, "But—but sir, won't killing Sirius mean that James won't do broadcasts anymore?"

"James won't be there, so he will not know that Sirius is dead. I have old footage I'll use for him. He will comply, even without the visits. He's desperate enough," Riddle replies sharply, eyes narrowing. "Severus."

"Yes, sir?" Severus asks.

"As I said, before you have James brought back, there is something of more importance I need you to do," Riddle tells him, and Severus waits for his orders.

When he gets them, his headache grows worse.

"Welp, you heard Master Riddle."

Sirius sighs and drops his head back against the headrest of the chair, gazing up at the vents again. He did, in fact, hear Riddle. So, he guesses there won't be any more talk of pasta.

"You know I'm not going to scream, right?" Sirius asks idly, just like he did last time. That turned out to be a lie, but hey, maybe the second time's the charm?

"Everyone screams. No shame in it, really," says the man who did, in fact, make him scream last time. He's rolling around in his chair, gathering what he needs to. "You're the stubborn sort, though, I'll give you that. I reckon you can last longer this time, yeah? We'll make a game out of it."

"Oh, will we?" Sirius asks, his voice flat.

The man chuckles and rolls to a stop next to him, reaching out to pat his shoulder. "Might as well. You can do it, I believe in you, and hopefully I don't have to shut you in here and kill you. Either way, I'll think of you when I'm eating my pasta."

"Thanks," Sirius replies sardonically. "Really appreciate that."

"Oi, don't blame me, yeah? I'm just doing my job," he says, shrugging. "Now, let's get started, shall we? Round one. May the best man win."

Sirius snorts. "Oh, I'm definitely winning round one."

Regulus thinks he's doing pretty well, honestly. It's easy, almost, to deconstruct Riddle's script with James being the person Regulus bounces off of. Genuinely, he and James can argue for ages, and he's literally spent years insulting him, both lovingly and not, so in a way, it's almost like he's had practice.

With James as a guide, Regulus counters every single thing that Riddle has had him say so far. Explaining that, no, those that left the Hallow are not prisoners of war, but rather those that are aligned with the resistance. Releasing the truth that Frank was murdered ruthlessly on Riddle's orders, and that he, too, had been on the side of the resistance, even in death.

It doesn't stop there. Albus gave him things to share, and share them Regulus does. He tells the whole world how there is a resistance, one that waits in the shadows, not to hurt anyone but to help those in need. It's not war they seek, but a better world for all, and if it takes war to get there, then it's worth fighting, isn't it? The war isn't against people; it's against power, against the system, and against Riddle.

Regulus reminds everyone of the games, how brutal they are, how awful they've always been. Blood, agony, and slaughter. Has the Hallow not been waging war for decades? How can Riddle claim to care for the children in the districts when he sees them slaughtered for entertainment year after year? Is everyone meant to simply continue to accept mass murder and a true imbalance in power and equality forever? Shouldn't the world change to be a safe place for all?

And the Hallows. Well, their Master does not listen to them. He cares nothing for them either. Did he not ignore them when they protested against the Quarterly Memorial? Did he not have many of them slaughtered during the interviews for the Quarterly Memorial, then lie to the public about it? Did he not try to lie about what actually happened in the arena? Has he ever stopped lying to his own people; has he ever listened to them; has he ever cared for their safety and well-being?

There is no harmony in this world, and Riddle has only contributed to that, but there could be harmony in this world. Doesn't everyone want harmony in this world?

Regulus isn't sure that this world will ever find harmony, but he's willing to lie to everyone and say there can be, if that's what it will take to bring harmony back to him in the form of James and Sirius. And so, he turns himself into Albus' pawn, sure that he's lying and daring to hope it's true anyway. He doesn't care if this world has harmony. He's selfish enough to only care for himself and those he loves.

There's little to no warning for the broadcast being interrupted by Riddle. A monitor sits off to the side, showing Regulus there, and then it flickers to show Riddle instead.

Regulus falls silent. Everyone in the room straightens up, paying attention, waiting with a bated breath. This is where things get dicey, because the team in Azkaban are still relying on him to keep everyone distracted and buy them time.

He can see Riddle, and Riddle can see him. Filius said that if Riddle interrupted the broadcast, the world watching would see him instead of Regulus, but Regulus' audio would remain. The only person who can see Regulus now that isn't in this room is Riddle, but the whole world can still hear him.

So, they hear him say, "I was in the middle of something."

"Yes, I noticed," Riddle replies. He looks calm, all except for his eyes, which are cold with fury. He's sitting at a desk, hands threaded together on top. "You'll forgive the interruption. This discussion seemed incredibly one-sided."

"I think you've said enough," Regulus announces.

Riddle hums. "I disagree. I've said very little, Regulus, if you recall. James—your fiancé, need I remind you—has been the one who felt it necessary to speak. I wonder how much it will hurt him to find out that you oppose him and his beliefs."

"As I said, arguing is something James and I are accustomed to," Regulus says shortly. "Though, as his fiancé, I know him better than most. I can safely say that his beliefs mostly mirror mine, but of course you don't allow him to speak freely, do you? His words are not his own. They're yours."

"Why would he speak them if he did not agree?"

"Are you familiar with the concept of coercion, Riddle?"

"I am," Riddle murmurs. "It strikes me to be concerned about you in that regard, Regulus. Are you in danger? Are they forcing you to spread such misinformation?"

Regulus gives a thin smile. "That's your weapon of choice, I believe. Tell me, what misinformation have I spread?"

"This belief that I wish for war," Riddle says. "I do not. You talk of war as if I started it, when I did not. I'm left in a position where I must end it. People oppose me, threaten my home and my people, and intend to dismantle the very way of life as we have always known it. Regulus, I must ask you, why do you think I wish you any harm? You or anyone? I don't."

"Then what are the hunger games?" Regulus challenges.

"Tradition," Riddle answers simply.

"Can tradition not be broken?"

"When it's the foundation of the very structure that runs this world, it can't. You speak of a better world, but tell me, what will this world look like? Tell the people, tell the Hallows, tell everyone how economic collapse will treat them."

Regulus pauses, gaze darting to Albus, who shakes his head. After a beat, Regulus looks away. "I ask you, are the districts not trapped in the vestiges of economic collapse already? If you mean to say that you would take issue with the districts flourishing as the Hallow does, simply speak your truth."

"The districts have been the same as they always have been, and they shall remain so," Riddle retorts. "The world is as it needs to be. To oppose that will only bring further ruin to us all. This is not a time for war, Regulus."

"Then present us with peace," Regulus snaps. "End the hunger games, step down from your position, and come together with those who oppose you to make a better world—one that benefits us all, not just the Hallow, and not just you."

"Or," Riddle counters lightly, "you and all those who oppose me stop seeking bloodshed. Even you, Regulus. You're not a prisoner there, are you? If not, you can leave. I will grant you safe passage into the Hallow. James is here with me; he surely waits for you. Do you not want to be reunited with your love?"

Regulus resists the urge to swallow, his heart thumping hard in his chest. He'd go, is the thing. If that was his only option, he'd go in a heartbeat. It's not his only option, though, so he looks Riddle right in the eyes and says, "No, I think I'll stay right here. If it takes a war to be reunited with James, then I'll be sure to do everything in my power to see the end of it."

"If you continue to oppose me," Riddle informs him, never breaking his gaze, "I assure you, you will not."

James is about to lose his fucking mind. His entire body is vibrating, muscles wound tight, and if he doesn't get answers here in a second, he's going to start swinging.

He remembers a time when he was a softer James. Before his hunger games. Before he ever felt violence touch him. He's never been the same after that; quicker to anger, quicker to lash out, quicker to act when it comes to protecting those he loves. That's always his greatest motivation, isn't it? Nothing gets James to fight faster than defending those that are his.

Sirius? Sirius is his. His best friend, his constant, the very breath in his lungs. So, naturally, James is ready to start flinging shit, because he's here to see Sirius, and they're not letting him. Why? Why can't James see him? Where is he?

No matter what James asks, or how often, the team that escorts him on these visits will not answer. The last time, they brought James in, passed him off to Azkaban guards, then waited for him to be brought back down before escorting him the same way they came. This time, they brought James in, then the Azkaban guards brought them to this room, talked to one of the members of the team, and then left. They've been blocking James in here ever since.

They don't harm him. They also don't acknowledge him. They just watch him rant and rave, demanding answers, and they do nothing else. James just wants to know that Sirius is okay.

That's the crux of it, isn't it? Why James can feel himself slipping. That worry, that dread, that utterly paralyzing fear that something has happened to Sirius, that maybe Riddle has decided to break the bargain, that maybe Sirius is—

"Come in, Shaw."

James halts and snaps his head over to stare at the radio on, presumably, Shaw's hip. The voice—James recognizes it as that Auror he doesn't like, the one Riddle always gives orders to directly. James recognizes the dry lilt of his voice.

"Sir?" Shaw asks, speaking into the radio.

"Escort Potter back to Master Riddle's castle. Now."

"Yes, sir."

James steps back automatically when Shaw starts to move for him, radio still in hand. "No. No, fuck that. I'm not leaving until I see Sirius. I'm supposed to—"

"Don't resist, Mr. Potter," Shaw says. "We have orders. Now, come with us quietly. You'll have your answers when you return to Master Riddle, I'm sure."

"I said no!" James bursts out, stepping back again. "I'm not leaving this prison until I know Sirius is alive. If he's not alive, I'm not complying, so prove to me that he's alive, or—"

"Or nothing," Shaw cuts in, gesturing to someone else on the team with his free hand. Immediately, the person raises their gun and points it at James. "Come along now."

James pauses, considering. He flicks his gaze between the team. There's four of them, all armed with guns, and all likely trained to fight. Only Shaw has a radio. James is one person with a cane that's practically covered in bubble-wrap.

Well, he's had worse odds.

"Thing is, Riddle wants me brought back alive," James says lightly. "I'm sort of important, you see, and I know this, so I know you're not supposed to shoot me."

Shaw sighs. "Mr. Potter, don't—"

James doesn't let him finish. He tosses his cane at the person pointing a gun at him and surges forward to grasp Shaw's radio, slamming it into his face to get him to stumble back. The rest of the team start yelling, starting to move forward, but James uses the momentum of Shaw's stumble to run him backwards. He slams him back against the wall, then slams the radio into it as well until it falls to pieces on the floor.

And then, right after, James whirls Shaw away from the wall and proceeds to tackle him through a window.

There's no warning for it. Lily is just crouched next to Kingsley one second, admittedly pouting, and then James Potter comes flying out the window with another man in the next.

Glass shatters, of course, so Lily instinctively covers her head. She misses James landing on the floor, but she hears it, hears his grunt and the wheeze of the other man.

Well, there goes the element of surprise.

The door to the room bangs open as the rest of the team pours out, and Lily rises up at the same time Kingsley does. As this was supposed to be a stealth mission, everyone was equipped with stealth-related weapons, such as daggers, while these people have guns. Kingsley is not a known 'anarchist', but Lily is. However, they're not really expected to be here, so they do have the element of surprise for a moment longer.

Lily grabs one person and knocks the gun out of their hands, kneeing them so they'll fold over a little bit and meet the dagger she slams directly into the side of their throat. She wrenches it right back out as they choke and whirls around to help Kingsley with the two he's fighting, though that turns out to be unnecessary. He stabs one when she reaches him, elbows the other in the head and moves fluidly to sweep their feet from under them. They hit the ground, and Kingsley follows to slam his dagger in their chest.

Alright, three down, one to go.

That last one is who James is struggling with at the moment, so Lily moves over to help him instead. The man knocks James onto his back at the same time she reaches him, so before his fist ever comes down to connect with James' face, she buries her dagger in the side of his neck. He gurgles, goes limp, then falls to the side when Lily yanks the blade back out.

James blinks up at her from the floor, looking dazed, his lips parted. He's dressed smartly like he was for his last broadcast, but rumpled now, the suit torn from the glass. There's still glass in his hair, in fact, and he's a little cut up. He hardly seems to notice, gaping up at her in disbelief as he is.

Lily would like to take the time to fuss at him for botching the stealth mission, but the doors along the hall are opening as guards come flooding out to investigate the sound of the window breaking. So, for now, she leans over to grab the gun off the man she just killed, snagging James' sleeve as well.

"Get up!" Lily orders, and James scrambles to do just that.

"Okay," Kingsley announces with a heavy sigh, backing up towards them, having claimed a gun for himself, too. James stumbles back as Kingsley guides them, and Lily distractedly kicks him a gun as they go past another dead person. James takes cues well, because he scoops it up. "Right, so the others were just heading to the staircase to go get Sirius—"

"Sirius?!" James demands immediately. "You're saving—"

"Shut up, no time for questions," Lily cuts in, raising her gun as the guards locate them and start pulling out tasers. "King, what's the plan here?"

"The others were heading to the stairwell, so I'm assuming they found what cell he's in from the office. They only just went in, from what I saw," Kingsley says. "If the guards reach the stairwell before the others make it back down, we're all—"

Kingsley never even gets to finish because, from somewhere down below, there's a very loud scream.

Remus freezes the moment he hears the scream. Just for one second, his whole body locks up as he registers it, and his gaze finds Marlene's. Neither of them breathe.

And then, at the same time, they whip around and start pounding down the stairwell in the opposite direction. Not going up. No, going down.

Following the sound of screaming.

Following the sound of Sirius.

Regulus tenses up when he sees Riddle's gaze flick away from him for the first time since he interrupted the broadcast. It makes the small hairs stand up on the back of Regulus' arms, his heart thumping hard. No, Riddle shouldn't focus on anything else but him. What if that's someone coming to notify him that there was a break-in at Azkaban? What if—

"Is it done?" Riddle asks, not addressing Regulus. There's a pause, and Riddle hums. "Good. In that case, there's no need to continue with the farce. Isn't that right, Regulus?"

Riddle's gaze latches onto him again, and the gleam of satisfaction in his eyes makes Regulus' chest go tight. No. No, there's no possible way Riddle knows. The others haven't even been in Azkaban that long. It hasn't even been ten minutes.

"What farce would that be?" Regulus asks with forced calm, arching an eyebrow at him.

"You think I don't know that a team of anarchists have broken into Azkaban?" Riddle asks, and Regulus freezes immediately, his whole body going cold. Riddle leans forward to press something on his desk, mouth ticking up in one corner in a sure sign of victory, holding Regulus' gaze as he speaks to the device, ordering, "Kill them all."

The screen goes black.

Just like that, the broadcast ends, and Regulus is left frozen in place for a long moment, ears ringing. He sees the red light on the camera pointed towards him go off.

"Wait," Regulus whispers, the word escaping him on a fucking wheeze as he stands up, his insides shaking like he's about to fall apart from within first. "Wait, no, no, no—"

Dorcas goes stumbling back with a choked noise, Pandora moving towards her quickly. Minerva, Filius, Albus, and Aberforth are all talking all over each other, loud and disorganized. Barty is moving right for Regulus.

"He—he knew," Regulus gasps out, his hands shaking. "The whole time, he knew. He was—"

"Regulus," Barty says, reaching for him, gripping his arms. Desperately, Regulus grips him back, almost gagging as his stomach heaves, and he makes a high-pitched sound of pure hysteria. Barty shakes him. "Regulus, it's—"

"He was taunting me. He—it wasn't my diversion. It was his," Regulus whines. "Barty—"

"Breathe. You have to breathe ," Barty tries, sounding strained.

Regulus is hyperventilating, vision blurring as he clutches at Barty and dissolves into an immediate meltdown, voice rising with panic as every part of him quakes. "He knew the whole time. He said—he wants to have them killed. Barty, Barty, he said—did he—did I just lose all of them? Did I just—"

"Shh, breathe, just breathe," Barty whispers in his ear, wrapping him up and holding him close.

Regulus collapses into Barty with a raw, guttural sob and can't figure out how he's supposed to breathe ever again.

Remus doesn't care about the mission. He doesn't care that he can hear gunfire up ahead as he steadily makes his way down, and he doesn't care that he can hear Lily and what sounds like James shouting as they come barreling down after him and Marlene. All he cares about is getting to Sirius. Immediately.

Remus and Marlene are farther ahead than the others, and they're running together, so they break out of the stairwell first on the level Sirius is. The screaming has stopped for now, but it still rings in his ears. He knows exactly where Sirius is, and he doesn't slow down on the way to him, not even when guards come running down the corridor towards them.

Marlene doesn't even hesitate, not for a moment, fully just launching her dagger forward and launching herself with a snarl right after. One guard goes down with a choked noise, and the next takes a hit to the face so hard that they cry out and slam into the wall. Marlene keeps slamming their head into it until they slump down, silent and still.

Remus can feel the blood rushing in his veins as he dodges a taser and throws out his fist, making a guard stumble back. He follows the motion and keeps hitting the guard, legitimately forgetting that he also has a dagger until the guard is already a crumpled heap on the floor. Remus rushes past, knuckles bloody and throbbing, a sensation that shouldn't feel so good but does anyway. As he takes the final corner that will get him to the room—he can see it down at the end of the corridor, so close, so fucking close—more guards come rushing at them.

"Marlene, Sirius is in there!" Remus bursts out, taking a hit to the side of the head like it's nothing, not even flinching, just swiveling with the motion to grab the guard and pick them clear up off their feet to slam them back down to the floor.

"Go get him!" Marlene shouts. "I got this!"

Remus heaves out a deep breath and carelessly digs his boot into the side of the guard's head until he hears a crunch that probably means the guard won't get back up again. There are still others, but Marlene sounds so sure that she'll be fine, and Remus knows Lily, Kingsley, and likely James are on the way and will be able to help her if she needs it. He's seen her in action; she can hold her own until they get there.

So, Remus leaves her. Doesn't even glance back. Doesn't slow down or wait or think past getting to the end of the hall where the screams originated from. He starts running.

Before he can make it all the way, the door opens, and a man steps out. Oh, Remus knows this man. Remus has been in the chair for this man when getting punished. If that alone wasn't enough to make Remus want to snap his fucking neck, this man being the one to hurt Sirius certainly is.

The man shuts the door and locks it. The only way to see the room is through the large window beside said door. Remus can see the chair there, just the back of it, the very top of Sirius' head.

"Open that fucking door," Remus declares harshly, starting right for the man, his stride never faltering.

"Can't do that, I'm afraid," the man replies, holding up a little remote and clicking his tongue. "I just got my new orders."

Remus lunges forward at the same time that the man presses the remote, knocking it out of his hand a moment too late. The man gets slammed back against the window, a thick plane of glass that seems to absorb the sound of his head hitting it with a thump. Remus hears him gasp and doesn't care, just wrapping his hands around his throat and shaking him.

"What did you do?!" Remus bellows.

"You're too late," the man gasps out, clawing at Remus' hands, trying to breathe. "He's—he's already….dead…"

Remus refuses to accept this, and also he doesn't like this answer, so he finds his grip around the man's neck tightening. He knocks his head back into the glass repeatedly, clenching his jaw as the man wheezes and tries to push him away, tries to fight him off, tries to struggle. His efforts get weaker, mouth opening and closing as he releases raspy noises, slowly going limp as his eyes roll around uselessly. The blood vessels in his eyes have popped, and it's brutal, it's absolutely gruesome the way Remus is literally just squeezing the life out of him.

Remus doesn't stop until he's squeezed him dry, until he's limp and staring vacantly at nothing, which just so happens to coincide with the exact moment Remus notices the green fog flooding the room through the window.

Remus' hands go slack, his whole body locking up.

The dead man flops to the floor.

From the vents right above Sirius, Remus can see the green fog pouring out, and his breathing goes thin almost immediately. Something sort of just—cracks within him, because he's right here, he's so fucking close, and this can't be happening to him. This can't—it can't —no, it can't, it can't, it can't—

The only thought Remus has as he dives for the door is a constant, desperate stream of Sirius, Sirius, Sirius.

"No! Remus, no!" Lily screams from down the hall, arriving in just enough time to witness this, too far away to stop him, because he can't be stopped, because he isn't stopping.

Remus knows distantly that this green fog has been created to kill people, to kill them in the most excruciating way possible, and that he's likely in a long line of experiments used to make that happen—he knows this, and he doesn't care. He can't think past SiriusSiriusSirius, and that's all that accompanies him as he rushes right into the room; that, and the sound of his best friend screaming his name desperately.

Naturally, the room is full of green fog now, and Remus covers his face, pressing his forearm over his nose and mouth, not breathing as he stumbles quickly to the chair. Sirius is still trapped there, but Remus can't see him, can't even hear if he's screaming over the loud hiss of the fog being released and the ringing in his ears. So, frantically, still holding his breath, Remus feels his way along the chair, removing the restraints.

The moment Sirius is free, things go awry.

Remus hasn't breathed, so his chest is burning, his lungs are on fire, and he really doesn't stand a chance when the full force of a hand slams directly into his chest. He can't stop himself from wheezing as he stumbles back, gasping for air and expecting to immediately feel pain and approaching death, only to feel—nothing. He feels nothing.

Remus blinks rapidly, tentatively sipping in air, breathing in the fog and getting no response. He feels fine. What the—"Fuck!" Remus bursts out, purely from surprise, because hands have grabbed him by the arms to take him for a ride.

Remus goes whirling around, the stand next to the chair clattering to the floor as he goes crashing into it. He tries to get his bearings and only just makes out a fist coming right for him through the cloud of green. Yelping, Remus jerks back to avoid it, his eyes bulging in reflexive disbelief because Sirius is fucking attacking him.

It's so surreal that Remus doesn't even know how to wrap his brain around it, and for that, he takes an elbow to the chest and nearly gets punched again. Remus is admittedly a little affronted that this is happening right now, because he doesn't want to fight the man he loves, obviously, but then he realizes that Sirius has no fucking idea it's him.

Oh, right. Shit.

"Sirius!" Remus shouts, catching Sirius' wrist when he goes for another hit. "Sirius, can you —"

No, apparently Sirius can't hear him, because he proceeds to yank Remus around and shove him into a wall. Okay, well, that's—yeah, now really isn't the time, but Remus can't deny that it's a little thrilling. Sirius is so—fuck, he's so fast, and he's really strong, holding his own in a fight he can't even see in and can't be breathing in.

However, Remus wants to get the hell out of here, sooner rather than later, so he grunts in frustration when Sirius yanks on him again, and he does something he genuinely never even imagined he would do. He uses his strength to slam right into Sirius, coming right at him through the fog and pushing him back against whatever available surface is closest, which turns out to be the window. Remus can hear Sirius' back thud into it, and he feels relief course through him, because that means the door is close by. Okay, they just need to—Sirius finally lands his punch now that Remus is in range, and Remus curses sharply, because fucking hell, Sirius hits like a damn brick. That shit hurts. Remus' jaw immediately blooms with an ache, and he suddenly has a lot of sympathy for Regulus, who literally had Sirius beat the shit out of him once. It's just—well, Sirius hits with his whole body, with all the force in him, like he's trying to kill you with one hit, and it almost seems like he comes really close to succeeding.

Remus shoves forward to knock Sirius back into the window harder, arms wrapping around him tight enough to hold him, because he just needs Sirius to know it's him. As soon as Sirius knows it's him, he'll stop. Of course he will.

"Sirius! Sirius, it's me! It's Remus! It's okay, it's—" Remus halts at the noise that reaches his ears, just the faintest sound of breathing from someone other than him. He can feel it, Sirius' chest rising and falling, Sirius' breath hitting the side of his neck. Sirius is breathing. He's breathing in the fog.

Again, Remus doesn't get any time to ponder this, because Sirius slams his hands against his chest to push him off and whip him around. Remus grunts as his back hits the door, and he only gets one second of warning before the boot moving through the air collides against his chest. Sirius proceeds to kick him so hard that he's kicked right through the door, which bangs open as he goes sailing back and slams against the opposite wall, legs buckling as he tries to catch his breath.

Sirius comes stepping out of the room looking like something ethereal and wild, green fog billowing out around him, hair tangled and untamed, hands and jaw clenched, and—

Oh.

Remus' breath punches out of him as he meets Sirius' eyes and realizes that Sirius isn't even here right now. No, this is—this won't be something Sirius remembers, and Remus isn't scared, exactly, but there's absolutely no recognition in Sirius' gaze as he looks at him, as he moves right for him. He seems to be on one setting at the moment, and it's that single-minded focus to demolish whatever is in his path that leads him to grab Remus by the collar and crawl right into his lap, bracing his hands on Remus' head with clear intentions to snap his neck. Quickly.

And, the thing is, it's not even his fault. He's seconds away from breaking the neck of the man he loves, gripping the top of Remus' head and the underside of his chin, and he won't even remember doing it. This is just—this is how it works, Remus thinks. When Sirius slips away, whatever is left behind continues like an extension of his last need.

If he's running, he keeps running. If he needs comfort, he asks for it. If he can't process something, then he rocks in place. If he's in danger, then he fights, and there's no stop-gap with him like this; he fights to kill.

"Sirius," Remus croaks. Sirius isn't even looking at him. He's disinterested. Blank. "Sirius, look at me."

The fingers gripping him grow tight, flexing, and nothing happens for a long second. Remus tilts his head a little to meet Sirius' dull gaze with his own. They stare at each other for a second—Remus, on the precipice of death; Sirius, empty-eyed.

"It's okay," Remus breathes out, shuddering. "I know you won't remember, but I—I forgive you, sweetheart. It's okay."

Because it is okay, because it's not Sirius' fault, because this is what he was made into, and it was wrong, and he didn't deserve it, and Remus forgives him and wants, desperately, for Sirius to forgive himself for anything he's ever done, and what he will do, and Remus loves him, he loves him so much, even like this, because it's something, because they're something.

Sirius stares at him, and he's still not here, he's not, but he's looking now. He's looking right at Remus, right into his eyes, and his eyebrows wrinkle together slightly. He blinks, slowly, fingers growing a little softer where they grip Remus, just a sliver of tentative hesitation like he's prepared to get right back to what he was doing at a moment's notice. He looks less blank and more confused now. His head tilts, and then his hand drifts down from the top of Remus' head to cup his jaw as he leans in a little, staring into his eyes like he's curious.

Remus' throat bobs on a harsh swallow, his mouth so dry that he doesn't even try to speak. Sirius blinks again, and then there's a shift in his eyes. Remus thinks he's imagining it until it sparks like a flame and starts to spread, both eyes eventually filling with recognition. Sirius rears back, his lips parting around a soft exhale, and when he blinks again, his eyes are wide and entirely his own. It's him. He's here.

"Remus," Sirius rasps.

"There you are," Remus mumbles, managing to crack a shaky, weary smile. "Hi, sweetheart."

"Hi," Sirius chokes out, sounding and looking stunned. Both hands fly up to cradle his face. "You're here. You're—"

Sirius inhales sharply, and then he folds forward to catch Remus in a kiss so deep, so intense, that Remus forgets everything else almost instantly. It doesn't matter that Sirius absolutely needs to brush his teeth, or that green fog is slipping out of the cracked door behind them in wisps, or that there's distant sounds of grunts and gunfire down the hall, or that they're here, in a prison, in the middle of a mission to escape. Nothing else matters but this, because it's everything, because Sirius is absolutely fucking everything.

Remus is clutching at Sirius as desperately as Sirius is clutching at him, kissing him hard, and then left breathless when they do break apart. Sirius looks fit for diving right back into yet another kiss, but then he flinches and scrambles off of Remus with a gasp. He fists Remus' shirt and drags him along as he goes, making Remus yelp and try to get his bearings.

"Sirius—"

"The—the fog. It's—there's—we have to move!"

"Sirius! Sirius, it's okay!" Remus bursts out, reaching up to grab onto Sirius' arms to wrench him to a halt, which is actually a feat, because Sirius is legitimately dragging him along the floor, the muscles in his arms bulging. Remus eases Sirius' grip and slowly stands. "It's—I promise it's okay. We, um. Well, we sort of…just came out of it. The fog, I mean. I don't know why, but it doesn't hurt us."

Sirius blinks. "What? Is it—not bad?"

"No, it is, I think. Just—" Remus swallows and glances at the dead body of the man he killed, still slumped on the floor. "Ah, well, he said…it would kill you. I think it was supposed to, and probably me too, but it…didn't? For some reason?"

"Didn't," Sirius repeats faintly, his gaze crawling to the dead man. He blinks again, then says, "Did you do that to him?"

"Kill him, you mean?"

"Yeah."

Remus holds his gaze. "Yes."

"Oh," Sirius mumbles, then blurts out, "He never got to eat his pasta."

"What?" Remus asks, startled, but Sirius doesn't get to elaborate.

"Remus!"

The shrill call of his name makes Remus' head snap to the side, and he mindlessly snags Sirius' hand before promptly taking off at a sprint. All his mind focuses on in that moment is Lily, and the desperate plea that just escaped her, because she sounds scared, and Remus needs to get to her now.

The others have been backed down a corridor branching off from this one, fighting guards, severely outnumbered by them. Remus' hand falls away from Sirius the moment he sees Lily being dragged along the floor by her hair, Kingsley and Marlene too far away, and James entirely surrounded.

Fuck.

"James!" Sirius shouts, and then he's snatching the dagger out of Remus' belt holster right before he runs full tilt into the fray without even stopping.

Remus stumbles, then goes with the momentum to reach the guard holding Lily, slamming them back into the wall. The guard lets out a shriek, which is when Remus looks down to see Lily slam her dagger into the side of their knee, twisting and yanking. The guard crumbles, and Remus gets his arm around their neck, squeezing and wrenching at their head until there's that telltale snap before the body sags.

Lily scrambles to her feet, chest heaving as she stops and gapes at him, cheeks stained with tears. "You're—but you—I saw you—how are you—"

"I don't know," Remus admits, because he doesn't know, and it fucking terrifies him. He searches her eyes for a long moment, hoping maybe she'll have the answers somehow, impossibly, but she looks as shocked as he feels.

There's a shout, followed by a yelp, and Remus jolts back into motion, because oh, right, there's still a lot of fighting going on at the moment. There's really no time for reunions.

Remus and Lily surge forward to offer help to the others, deflecting hits and throwing out their own. Sirius is cutting a path to James, killing swiftly and effortlessly as he goes, or just shoving people aside, or knocking them out. He's a flurry of desperate, determined movement. Remus goes to aid Kingsley, while Lily rushes to Marlene, who has one guard on their knees with their own taser down their throat, making them choke on it before she turns it on.

There's no way to know how long they fight for, and it doesn't matter, besides the fighting doesn't come to an end. They just all push in together, reaching for each other, drawn into the instinctive need to be in a group. When they're in range, Kingsley yells to run, and they do.

They have to. They can't just keep fighting forever. Getting out is the main priority now that James and Sirius have been located, and yes, the whole stealth bit of the mission has gone entirely to the dogs, but the mission to escape is entirely still on. So, they run, with Kingsley taking the lead.

Kingsley, who has been studying the blueprints of the prison and the sewer system beneath so much that he probably has it memorized. Kingsley, who is trained on how to shake off those who pursue them. Kingsley, who keeps them at a pace that borders on agonizing to keep up with, even for them, let alone those that are chasing them.

They take all the winding turns that Kingsley guides them on, and then follow him right into a room without even a stutter. He bursts in through the door, frantically waving them in, then slams it shut and immediately takes off for a vent in the corner.

"Block the door," Kingsley orders sharply, and so Remus, Lily, and Marlene automatically go for the large desk in the middle of the room, working to move it against the door.

James and Sirius are a bit too busy being caught up in staring at each other in disbelief, clutching one another's shoulders and talking rapidly over each other. James is standing on one leg, Sirius is leaning so close to James that it looks like he's about to kiss him, and they sound like an overturned mess of jumbled, mutual confusion.

"Hey, hey, you okay?" Remus mumbles as he pulls away from the desk to turn to Lily, hands coming up automatically to cup her cheeks and look for injuries. He slips one hand over the round hill of her cheek to ease it into her hair, being careful because it was just ruthlessly yanked on. Lily winces, but she tilts her head into his hands, letting him gently get the tangles out that the guard put there. "Hurts?"

"I'll be alright," Lily whispers, reaching out to press her hands flat to his chest, seemingly just to feel it rise and fall beneath her palms. Her fingers shake. "You—I thought you were—"

"I know, I know, but can we not talk about it now?" Remus asks, his chest pinching at the stricken expression on her face. She starts to lean away from him, and he shakes his head, tugging her closer and dipping down to press his forehead to hers, because he can't. He just can't do it right now. "Please. Just—I can't, right now. I need you. Please."

Lily seems to hold her breath, then exhales and sags into him, hands settling on the outside of his arms, squeezing. She nods against his forehead and says, "Okay, Remus. Okay."

"Shit!" Marlene yelps when the desk thumps as the guards reach the door, trying to burst their way in. "Kingsley, we're sort of cornered here!"

"Not for long. Come on, time to go," Kingsley calls out, sitting aside the vent cover and waving at them to join him as he crawls in.

"King, where the hell are we going?" Lily hisses, the one to follow in behind him, while Remus goes next. Sirius makes James go after, then seems to get into a bickering war with Marlene about who will go last. Marlene ends up winning, because Sirius crawls in after James, while Marlene follows.

It's cramped inside the vent, and they're all squished and sort of shuffling in a slow crawl as they go, shoulders bunched up and heads ducked, making their way on hands and knees. It's stuffy, and when Kingsley speaks, his voice sounds muted and echo-y at the same time.

"There's a, um, body deposit?" Kingsley replies. "Like, it's built towards the back of the prison like a trash chute, but it's where they dump bodies so someone else can pull up a carriage and haul them off. It's—a way out. Technically."

"Don't tell me we're sliding down a dead-body chute."

"Sorry, Red, but we can access the sewers from the back. It wasn't the original plan, but I can't see the guards expecting it, and Filius' device should still be working."

"It hasn't been fifteen minutes?" Remus asks incredulously.

"Not quite, but we're cutting it close," Kingsley mutters. "As long as we get to the sewers, we'll be fine."

"Sewers?" Sirius mutters. "We're traveling through sewers?"

"Oh, sorry, shall we escort you back to your cushy life of luxury in prison?" Lily snaps.

"Who the fuck are you?" Sirius snaps back.

"Sirius," Remus says, a warning.

"Who the fuck is she?" Sirius repeats, harsher this time.

"Is now the time?" James asks, strained.

Lily scoffs. "No, it's not. Shut the fuck up and be grateful about escaping Azkaban, instead of —oh, I don't know, complaining about the circumstances in which you have to."

"Oh, just you fucking wait until I get out of this vent," Sirius hisses. "I don't know who the fuck you think you are—"

"Sirius," Remus cuts in, "this is Lily."

There's a beat of silence. Awkward silence. Sirius coughs and mumbles, "Oh. So, um, not dead, then?"

"No," Remus confirms, lips twitching as he stares down at the tread of Lily's boot ahead of him. He can't really make it out fully in the dark. "Still alive. Very lively, as you can tell."

"Brilliant," Sirius says weakly. "I'm—ah, hi. Shit. Wait, no, I'm really glad you're alive. It's great to meet you. I mean—well, it's shit circumstances, and I have definitely looked better, so this isn't my best impression, but—"

Lily huffs a laugh. "Relax, Sirius, believe it or not, I feel the same about you. Sorry I couldn't get you out of the arena, by the way. I, um. I really tried."

"You're the one who…?"

"Yeah, I was running the team who went in. Again, I'm really sorry that I—"

"You got my brother out," Sirius cuts in. "Thank you."

"Oh," Lily says softly, and then she clears her throat. "Remus, you're right. He's precious."

"Isn't he?" Remus agrees, ridiculously smug and oddly proud, struck with the urge to shout from the rooftops how Sirius is so fucking precious and his. He has him, he has him, he has him again; oh, oh, he has him again. Remus is fucking rejoicing.

Kingsley shushes them all urgently, so they fall silent, crawling about in a ventilation system that, apparently, Kingsley has mapped out all in his head. He seems to know where he's going as he leads them along, taking a turn here or there, which is actually a bit difficult to deal with in the cramped space. It's a relief when Remus hears Kingsley bust out the opening to a vent with a clatter and lead them all out.

The room itself is very compact and sparse when Remus tumbles out of the vent, which is a little high off the ground, so coming out head-first is a bit disorienting. Lily helps steady him by his elbow, but she still looks displeased with him when their eyes meet, though at least she isn't being harsh about it.

Remus waves Lily and Kingsley off to go inspect the chute in the room, choosing instead to help the others out of the vent. James grunts when he flops out, looking mildly ridiculous in his fancy, cut-up suit. His hair is a wreck, while his glasses and cane are absent. He blinks at Remus, then takes his hand with a crooked smile, one that fades when Remus glares at him.

"Remus," James rasps once he's on his feet, "I—"

"Not now," Remus interrupts, clipped. "Later."

Remus turns away from him, ignoring him in favor of helping Sirius out of the vent. Now really isn't the time, and Remus would prefer to be safely inside the Phoenix before he and James talk about what happened. They will need to talk about it, because Remus is tired of having nightmares about that moment of being trapped in the back of a van while James remained behind.

Sirius takes his arm gratefully and leans onto him as he comes out of the vent, and he's there for a moment, gazing at him in that way he seems to be stuck doing here. Just unhindered awe in his eyes, lips parting as he stares at Remus like he's a miracle. His hand comes up almost mindlessly, fingers gently brushing the bruise Remus can feel aching on his jaw.

"Someone hit you really hard," Sirius whispers.

"Yeah," Remus mumbles. "It's okay."

Sirius frowns, eyebrows furrowed, concern in the tenderness of his touch. Remus can only look at him, starved for the sight of him. Oh, just look at him. Here he is. Look, look, look.

And, even like this, Sirius is still such a beautiful mess. He reflects the toll Azkaban takes perfectly, his hair tangled and limp, his clothes shabby and unflattering. He's shivering, sporting bruises of his own, his knuckles raw and busted the same way Remus' are. Remus can feel the ache in his chest where Sirius kicked him and suspects he'll have a gruesome bruise there in the shape of Sirius' boot, along with many others where Sirius tossed him around. They're both less than their best, but that's hardly mattered to Remus ever before. He just doesn't care. He wants to kiss Sirius again. He wants to hold him, and keep him safe, and never let him get hurt again.

"Thanks for the help," Marlene grumbles as she flops out onto the floor, and Remus jolts with a wince, grimacing in apology as he moves over to help her up.

"So, you're just going to…?" Lily sends Kingsley a look of disbelief as she peers into the… body chute.

Kingsley heaves a sigh and climbs up to sit on the edge, gripping the top as he glances around at everyone. "Count to ten and listen for my whistle. If you don't hear it, I'm either dead, or it's not safe to come down."

With that and nothing else, Kingsley tugs himself forward and proceeds to slide right into the darkness of the chute, fully disappearing. They can hear the shush of his clothes against the steel, but that eventually fades, too.

"Cheerful guy," James comments awkwardly, as they all wait, and Marlene snorts at the same time that Lily does. James looks visibly pleased to have gotten tokens of their approval, or perhaps he's just always grateful to lighten the mood.

By five seconds, there's a quiet whistle that reaches them, and they all immediately start moving. They're all eager to get the hell out of here, and they're in the homestretch now.

Lily has to practically shove Remus into the chute next, and it takes genuine effort to not make a sound on the way down. It's literally like a slide, so he sails down quickly, breathless when he shoots out the opening into a free fall right to the floor. It's not too far, thankfully, so he manages to mostly land on his feet, though his ankles smart for it and he stumbles. Kingsley is right there, helping steady him.

Marlene follows next, though she doesn't look pleased about it, and she takes the fall with more finesse than Remus did, absorbing the impact by bending her knees, spry and agile on her feet. James comes down next, and he falls right to the floor, his leg buckling underneath him. Marlene and Remus are there immediately to help him up, but a whine escapes him, and he's most definitely limping now.

"Fuck," James hisses, his arms thrown over Remus and Marlene's shoulders, teeth grinding as he glares down at his leg. When he tries to put weight on it, he crumbles again. "Ah, well, that's not good."

"It's okay, James, we're almost there," Marlene murmurs, briefly glancing up as Sirius drops down, hissing between his teeth as he collapses as well. Remus starts to pull away, but Kingsley beats him to it, and Lily comes sailing down right after. As soon as she has her bearings, she goes to check on Sirius. "Kingsley, how far are we from the sewers?"

"Not too far. Come on, we'll take it nice and easy," Kingsley replies quietly, walking past with Lily, Sirius hobbling along between them, looking very exhausted.

"Alright, James?" Sirius mumbles.

"Been better," James admits. "You?"

"I might vomit," Sirius offers conversationally. "As turns out, adrenaline can only carry you so far. But I'll live. Probably."

"Yeah, same here, I suppose," James says wryly.

The entrance to the sewers—or one of them, anyway—is just on the outside of the body deposit, underneath a heavy grate that shows nothing but darkness down below. Kingsley halts them outside of it, gently helping Lily ease Sirius to the ground, then instructing them to do the same with James. Sirius and James both seem grateful for the second of rest.

"Okay, Lily, get ready," Kingsley says, and she nods as she drags her bag off. He crouches down in front of James and Sirius, calm as always. "My name is Kingsley. As you've likely guessed by now, we're here to get you two out. To do that, we need to make sure Riddle doesn't have trackers in you."

"They never took the one out of my arm," Sirius mumbles, looking a bit pale. "They didn't see the point in putting a new one in, so they just left that one."

"I have one," James admits with a sigh. Face grim, he reaches down and taps his injured leg, giving a rueful smile as he grips his own thigh. "Same place as yours, Remus."

"Let me guess, you have to cut them out?" Sirius asks.

Kingsley nods. "Unfortunately, yes, we do. However, Lily is a medic, and she's prepared for this. She has some medication that will help both of you with pain and discomfort, but removing the trackers and leaving them here is necessary."

"I'll be quick," Lily says as she kneels down next to them to pass out water and medication. "Who wants to go first?"

"Me," Sirius declares. "Get this fucking thing out of me."

"Remus, Marlene, I need you to help me move the grate," Kingsley orders, gesturing them over.

Reluctantly, Remus shuffles away from Sirius and James, leaving them with Lily. They're in capable hands, he knows that, but he wants to be with them. He wants to stay with Sirius. Hold his hand through the procedure. Let Sirius lean on him, hide his face against Remus' neck, and block it all out.

Instead, Remus puts his efforts into helping further them along in their escape. They're still on a time limit. The only reason the guards haven't located them yet is because the surveillance feed has been jammed, and they don't have a lot of time before they need to get down in these sewers. Once they're there, no one will be able to find them.

The grate is rusted iron and very fucking heavy, so it takes the combined efforts of Remus, Kingsley, and Marlene to lift it and shift it aside to leave the opening. By the time they make it back over to the others, Lily is dabbing at Sirius' arm and carefully wrapping it in gauze. The tracker is discarded on the grass, covered in blood.

"Me next?" James says wearily when Lily shifts to him.

"Yes. Drop your pants, Potter," Lily replies.

James cracks a weak smile and holds up a hand. "Listen, I'm an engaged man—"

Lily rolls her eyes and starts taking his pants off. James makes a quiet yelping sort of noise and smacks her hands away a bit frantically, taking over quickly to handle it himself. Remus leaves them to it and kneels down next to Sirius.

"Let me see," Remus murmurs, reaching for Sirius' wrapped arm, his lips tipping down.

"I'm fine," Sirius says softly, his other hand coming up to cradle Remus' jaw, fingers trembling. "I've had worse."

"Doesn't mean I have to like it," Remus mumbles.

"One of the worst things I've ever felt was being without you, Remus," Sirius tells him, "and here you are. How can anything hurt now that you're here?"

Remus could fucking cry. He makes a small noise and leans in to press their foreheads together. "Sweetheart."

"Hm?"

"Sirius."

"What is it?" Sirius whispers, fingertips trailing over Remus' cheek, wiping the tears away. "Oh, the tides are going wild. Calm waters, moon of mine, I beg of you. We're almost to the port. Almost there. We're almost there."

"We have a whole war to fight," Remus croaks, his eyes stinging. "This isn't even the half of it."

"Say the word and I'll run away with you," Sirius murmurs. "We'll abduct everyone we love and take to the seas. Throw them under the deck until we're too far away for them to swim back."

"We wouldn't have to do that to Regulus. He can't even swim."

"Oh, you're fucking awful. I'm so in love with you."

Remus smiles against his cheek and tries—and fails—to stop crying. "I love you, too."

"Say it again," Sirius mumbles into the crook of his neck, hiding there now like he has no desire to ever resurface. "I've been telling the moon every night how much I love you. Say it back. Say it back."

There is nothing in this world Remus would not give Sirius, and so he winds his fingers into Sirius' hair and says it again, and again, and again. He says it back, soft and repetitive like a lullaby, a precious offering for the most precious thing to him. He says it until he stops crying, until they're just there, tucked into each other while everyone else politely ignores them, focusing on their own things. That's where they stay, finding each other again.

And then it's time to leave.

"Alright, we're cleared to head out," Lily declares, helping James stand once he has his pants back up.

"Ready to go?" Remus asks Sirius, easing back.

Sirius nods wearily. "Yeah, I—I'd like to leave now."

"Alright, sweetheart, we'll go," Remus murmurs, taking his arm to help him stand. "We're almost there, and it'll be a struggle, but we'll make it. We're going to make it."

Remus says it because he wants to soothe Sirius, who sinks into him, suitably soothed. He says it, not even knowing if it's true, having no knowledge of what waits for all of them. He says it because he believes it, because he has to believe it.

He says it, and he's willing to do whatever is necessary to make sure he's not wrong.

But, that's the thing, he's never really wrong, is he?

Three hours later, Severus steps into Riddle's office, finding the man sitting behind his desk, gaze latched onto his laptop. He doesn't look up when Severus comes in, not at first. It takes a second, then he lifts his gaze. Oh, this isn't going to go well.

"Explain to me," Riddle begins, "how I ordered you to place roadblocks all over the city, form a perimeter around Azkaban, and the anarchists still managed to escape?"

Severus resists the urge to sigh. "We—"

"And," Riddle continues sharply, "explain to me how they managed to blow up the blockade checkpoint between us and district one on their way out."

"We've been investigating, sir, and it seems that the team of anarchists traveled through the sewers," Severus says, and Riddle curls his lip in visible disgust. "By the time the surveillance feed was back online, they had already escaped all points of visibility. They traveled back through the city with the help of someone from district one."

"Who?" Riddle grits out.

"A woman by the name of Pomona Sprout. She worked in the main lab in district one, including transport in and out of the Hallow. The anarchists were escorted by her."

"Why was she not investigated at the roadblocks?"

"She had clearance, sir," Severus murmurs.

Riddle looks fit for murder. "You mean to tell me that the anarchists were loose in the city, and those at the roadblocks simply waved her through?"

"When she traveled through the city, we were under the impression that the anarchists were still in Azkaban."

"So, they slipped out from underneath everyone's noses."

"Yes, sir," Severus admits.

"At what point, exactly, did you figure out that they had managed to leave Azkaban's grounds?" Riddle asks.

"When they reached the blockade," Severus says. "There is a routine check on the way out from the Hallow into district one, and the anarchists were discovered there."

"And?" Riddle demands.

Severus once again resists the urge to sigh. "And the driver, Pomona Sprout, busted through the blockade, which ended in a crash. She didn't survive. The anarchists fled through the opening the truck left, and the truck was leaking fuel. Someone shot it. There was an explosion as a result."

"Did any of the anarchists die?"

"We recovered no bodies if they did, sir."

Riddle stares at him, hands threaded tightly on his desk. His eyes are cold with rage. "What happened to Sirius Black?"

"He was with them," Severus says simply.

"Of course. Of course he was." Riddle exhales, splitting his hands and laying his palms flat against the desk. His fingers twitch. "This is an unacceptable display of incompetence, and it will not happen again. Escort James Potter to me. Now."

Severus shows absolutely no signs of malicious vindication on his face, but he perhaps takes a little too much pleasure in getting to say, "I can't do that, sir."

"You can't do that," Riddle repeats, going still. "Why?"

"He was with them, too," Severus informs him. If he were a laughing man, this would keep him laughing for years to come.

"I ordered you to have him escorted back here."

"I did. The team escorting him was killed in Azkaban, sir."

Riddle abruptly stands up with a snarl, slashing his hands across his desk and sending everything flying all at once. He picks up a book there and launches it at the wall, looking the most undignified Severus has ever seen him. Severus has never seen him lose control like this, and it's invigorating to watch.

Severus never looks away, taking it all in, how very human Riddle looks. Simply a man. An angry one, his chest heaving, teeth bared and eyes blazing. Even in the midst of all his mistakes, he's never once shown his frustration, because Severus thinks he hasn't realized that he is losing, that he can lose, until this very moment. It makes him wreck his own space, and then—abruptly—it's like a switch flips.

Riddle stops. He surveys his own mess almost blankly, then steps up to his desk and leans down to pull something out of a drawer. A beat later, Riddle straightens up with a jar holding a Horcrux Hornet in his hand. Slowly, he walks around his desk and approaches Severus, holding his gaze.

"This was planned," Riddle murmurs, stopping in front of Severus. The Horcrux Hornet remains still in the jar, no response from it at all. "They didn't simply choose today to have Regulus give a broadcast in response to James, then attempt to utilize that as a diversion. It wasn't just about saving Sirius. No, they knew James would be there."

Severus says nothing. Riddle reaches up and slowly screws the lid off the jar, holding it against the glass with a clink. He eases his hand inside and draws out the Horcrux Hornet, which remains still in his palm. Is it meant to frighten Severus? How can it, when Severus is immune?

"I know this can bring you no harm now," Riddle says, gazing down at the Horcrux Hornet with… It's almost reverence, or as close to reverence as he's capable of getting. "Regardless of that, they can still sense fear and respond to it. Anyone who has betrayed me should be afraid of what I will do to them, wouldn't you say, Severus?"

"Yes, sir," Severus replies.

Riddle holds his gaze. "Do you have a family, Severus?"

"A father," Severus tells him, and the wings on the Horcrux Hornet give a faint flutter. It settles immediately after, just a minor slip, but Riddle catches it.

"Ah," Riddle says softly, reaching up to gently stroke one of the wings. "Your father. What's his name?"

"Tobias Snape."

"Located in district two, I imagine?"

"Yes, sir."

"Do you love your father, Severus?"

Severus pauses, just for the second it takes for him to realize that it's in his best interest to lie, then he says, "Yes, sir."

"Hm." Riddle looks at the Horcrux Hornet, then at Severus, then back to the hornet. "How did they know James would be in Azkaban today, Severus?"

"I don't know, sir," Severus replies.

The Horcrux Hornet remains still. Riddle watches it, then lifts his gaze to study Severus' face. Then, calmly, Riddle tips the Horcrux Hornet back into the jar and screws the lid back on.

"Then find out," Riddle orders, pushing the jar against his chest, letting it go the moment Severus takes it. "And, if you do not, your father will pay the price."

"Yes, sir," Severus says.

Once dismissed, Severus leaves with the jar in hand, thinking of the funeral he will have to plan for his father, wondering if he will be given the order to kill the man himself. Idly, he can't help but think of the irony in that, his only true fear defeated at the order of the man he's never feared at all. Not once has a Horcrux Hornet responded to Severus in Riddle's company, because regardless of power, Severus doesn't fear fools.

Riddle is one of the most powerful, dangerous men in the world, easily qualified to be an exception, and yet the only exception to Severus' rule to never fear a fool is his father.

Only when Severus is alone in his car does he allow himself to sit the jar in the passenger seat, grab the wheel, and laugh.

Chapter End Notes

alright, from the top!

we started with a snape pov for some info-dumping, and also him internally shitting on riddle. hate him, love him, whatever—but as the saying goes, the enemy of my enemy is my friend and all that. him mentally roasting riddle is lowkey so funny to me 😭 then we've got the mission underway, and regulus being a little shit and roasting his fiancé on live broadcast 😭 GOODBYE HE'S SO FUNNY.

not sirius chatting with the man who tortures him, like you KNOW this man is so bored. but also, him being worried about regulus 😭 I MISS THEM in the next snape pov, sorry but "severus" "yes, sir?" "we have a situation" "i see that, sir" fucking KILLS me lmaoooo. and its not explicitly shown (on purpose), but riddle knew then that there was a break in to azkaban by that point, so his unshown orders to snape was to order up the blockades and stuff; he knew like a minute after filius' device was used—it worked (obviously), but the system sent out an alert, basically, that pretty much was like Hey There's An Outside Device Being Used, and so riddle knew then, which is why he ordered to have james brought back, and to have sirius killed—because he'd rather kill him than risk losing him to the phoenix. so yes, riddle knew before he ever interrupted regulus' broadcast.

also riddle and regulus going in circles. fun stuff! i like that bit a whole lot, if im honest. just regulus kind of stretching his muscle of going head-to-head with people in powerful positions.

cut to james, who—after being used and stretched so thin and worried about sirius—finally snaps and loses his collective shit. when he gets impulsive, that's it. like, its over for everyone immediately. he didn't even hesitate; he literally just tackled someone through a window 😭 I LOVE HIM SO MUCH.

and then we get the whole bit of everyone trying to reach sirius and remus going for his man!!! that final remus pov—gahhh, so much happens in it. like, we got remus literally brutally murdering people to get to sirius, which... remus lupin, one chance, please, i am BEGGING.

and then he just. dives into the green fog, having absolutely no idea that he's immune. do you know how fucking insane that is? he SAW eli die to that, and he STILL just ran right in to save sirius. like??? oh, he's so "dont blame me, love made me crazy" this chapter.

also, sirius and remus fighting.... no because remus' whole journey with that, like he was lowkey affronted at first, then he was kinda into it, and then he was just sad 😭 and sirius...has absolutely no recollection of any of that. like he has No Idea that he fought remus (yet), so this is something that they have to deal with in the future. also², sirius being immune, too! some people guessed it already, but we get more on it in the next chapter, i promise!

but actually, sirius not really being able to kill remus, even as he was. and it boils down to, like, he was on Kill Mode, but remus wasn't fighting him, remus was talking to him gently, remus even said he forgave him, and sirius, in that state, was like Okay Something Is Different, bc like. he didn't feel like he was in danger in that moment, and so he...paused. like, its kind of established that he slips away when hes overwhelmed and doesn't feel safe, so remus making him feel safe in that moment literally saved remus' life.

then the final push—again, a lot happened. we didn't see all of it, like snape summed it up, mostly, but we get more information on it in the next chapter, too.

HONORABLE MENTIONS:

-james "listen, im an engaged man" potter 😭
-remus "look at me sirius, this isnt you" lupin (im sorry aksksksk

Dorcas is the one who's waiting at the station when they return, because she's the only one who believes they're not dead. Her reason for this is because Marlene promised she would come back, and Dorcas refuses to move until she does.

It's a bold belief. Desperate, some would say. Pathetic and pitiful, some likely think. Dorcas doesn't care. She simply doesn't accept any other outcome, so if she has to stay in one spot forever, until her very last breath, that's what she'll do.

In the end, it pays off.

She's up and moving the moment the train rolls into the station, convinced that there's more than just the driver on it, and her breath catches when the doors rattle open.

There's an immediate flurry of activity as Sirius, Lily, and Remus pour out. Lily is giving orders, frantic and loud, clothes singed and James' slack body laid out on a backboard. There is no help waiting, no gurney, and Lily doesn't waste time; she just takes off running towards the infirmary with Sirius and Remus going with her, carrying James between them. Kingsley comes darting past, not even stopping to speak to her.

Dorcas stares after them, her eyes wide.

They all looked like hell, quite frankly, suffering bruises and burns, smelling repugnant like they were still in the sewer they came out of, a frenzied air about them that suggests they're all still stuck in survival mode. And James… Dorcas only caught one glimpse, really, but he looked very fucking bad. Not dead, though, at least not yet, because they wouldn't have been so urgent to get him to medical help if that was the case.

Dorcas is taking it as a win, because that's really all she's got, at this point. He's still alive, and he's here. They're all here. They all made it back. She knows that.

She knows, because when she turns, Marlene is wearily exiting the train, looking fucking exhausted. She's covered in dried blood, as well as superficial bruises of her own, and she has clearly fought very fucking hard. The look in her eyes is clear, though. Sharp. Calm, almost.

Dorcas' breath catches at the very sight of her, and something within cries out in triumph, joyous with I knew you'd come back to me, I waited for you, and I was right. She knew, because she's the one who's always late, but Marlene is always right on time.

It's only a second that keeps her trapped in place, her entire fucking being just rejoicing at Marlene's return, and then she's moving. She's running. She doesn't even care, not about anything but getting to Marlene immediately. Marlene can't seem to go much faster than she is, but she's moving to meet her halfway, reaching for her the moment Dorcas gets close.

And then Dorcas has her. Dorcas throws her arms around her with a stuttered gasp, dragging her close and shaking with it, with the gift that is having her again. She wants to be gentle and has forgotten how to, clinging too tight, gripping too hard. It doesn't matter. Marlene is rough with her, too.

Like the others, Marlene smells fucking awful, and Dorcas doesn't care. They clearly did all they could to clean up on the train, but the smell lingers, and Dorcas doesn't care about that either; she wouldn't care if Marlene was still covered in shit and piss. She genuinely couldn't care less, because she has Marlene in her arms once again, finally, safe and sound.

Marlene holds her like she's trying to crush her into nothing, and Dorcas loves it. Dorcas feels like a tube Marlene is trying to get everything inside out of, leaving nothing behind, pushing the very breath out of her lungs until she's hanging in the balance between breathing and never breathing again, kept there like that and never wanting to leave. It feels so unbearably good, like a physical manifestation of how important it is for them to have each other to hold.

The moment Marlene's grip eases, just a little, Dorcas rocks back just enough to shakily cup Marlene's face, searching her eyes as she whispers, "I knew. I knew you'd be back."

"I promised, didn't I?" Marlene tells her, lips curling up faintly, still visibly worn out. "How else could I be sure I'd get the chance to give you your ring back at least one more time?"

"Oh, was that it?" Dorcas chokes out on a shaky laugh. "In that case, keep it for my peace of mind. As long as you have it, I'll know you're making it back to me."

Marlene hums, eyes drifting shut, that tiny tired smile still on her face. "I think I'll do that. Although, I have to admit, I'll miss you finding ways to get it back on my finger."

Dorcas leans in to press their foreheads together, eyes slipping closed, just breathing. "Three times I got that ring on your finger. Sybill says some of the best and worst things come in threes, Marlene. Let's leave it at that. That's enough, yes?"

"Yeah," Marlene whispers, "that's enough."

"I love you," Dorcas breathes out, fingers on Marlene's cheeks, a warrior worshipping war.

Marlene responds to this by kissing her, hands on her hips dragging her in, pressing them tight together. Dorcas can feel the echo of I love you, too in the way she kisses her, putting in the effort to be gentle, delicate about it, slow and sweet. It feels like a first kiss, somehow, though it's not. Just how it's tentative and careful, like at any moment it could end.

It does end when Dorcas squeezes Marlene closer, tighter, trying to fold her up and keep her locked away inside her chest, wanting so badly to keep her safe, because this was the hardest thing she's ever had to do; the worst thing she's ever experienced, simply because she was not there, and Marlene was in danger, and Marlene could have died, and the only thing that kept this world safe was Dorcas' bold belief that she hadn't. What if she had been wrong? She'd raze this world to the ground, she thinks, so it's for the best that she wasn't. But a part of her can't ignore that she could have been, and so she holds onto Marlene too hard, kissing her like she's oxygen, and then Marlene hisses and winces, and Dorcas jerks away.

"It's okay. I'm okay," Marlene mutters, still grimacing. "I just probably have some bruised ribs. Really, I'm fine."

"Shit, we need to get you to the infirmary," Dorcas says, feeling like a fucking idiot. "Okay, come on."

"Fucking hell, you must really love me if you're standing this close to me when I smell like this. And letting me kiss you, Meadowes?" Marlene shakes her head, releasing an incredulous huff of laughter. "Wonders never cease."

"I told you, I love you all of you, even when you're carrying the scent of sewer with you wherever you go," Dorcas murmurs, and Marlene hums in a pleased fashion, grinning, only to wince when she moves too quickly. "Easy. Take it easy."

"Dorcas, I promise I'm alright," Marlene grumbles, but Dorcas won't hear it. Marlene rolls her eyes and heaves a sigh when Dorcas wraps an arm around her to gingerly help her along to the infirmary. "It doesn't matter, really. Lily checked me out on the train, did what she could, and they'll all be focused on James anyway. He needs more help."

"He—he didn't look good," Dorcas murmurs, swallowing past the lump that forms in her throat.

Marlene is silent for a beat, and then when she does speak, her tone is heavy and her eyes flash with ghosts of war. "There was an explosion. Well, the mission went tits up pretty much the whole way through, but we almost made it out easily in the end. Just…the checkpoint back into district one… They're, um, usually more lax, Pomona said, but the city was basically on lockdown, and while they just waved us through at all the roadblocks, they were more thorough at the checkpoint."

"You were discovered," Dorcas whispers, her heart sinking.

"Yeah," Marlene replies, her voice flat and empty. "So, uh, Pomona rammed right through, but—but there was a crash. We were all thrown around, and I—I remember the screams and the gunshots, Kingsley shouting for us to run. We tried. We just—we couldn't get out of range before the truck exploded. I could smell the fuel, and they were shooting, and Pomona was knocked out in the front. She—she didn't—"

Dorcas exhales slowly, refusing to let her expression twist the way it wants to, hardening her heart to it. Because it's war. This is what happens. "She didn't make it out?"

"No. She was in the truck when it exploded," Marlene says. There's a moment of silence. "She was nice, you know? I didn't really like her cellar, but she…" There's another, longer pause, and then Marlene sighs. "In any case, there was nothing we could do. James was—he was closest to the truck, because he stayed back to help everyone crawl out of it. He was so urgent when he told us to run, and Kingsley was yelling it ahead, so we just—we did. And James was, too, but he took the brunt of the explosion. It was—I thought he was dead. I thought—"

"He's not," Dorcas reminds her gently.

Marlene nods curtly. "I know. It was just really bad. Sirius was a fucking wreck, trying to crawl for him, and it was… And then Remus just—he went back for him. Ran right at the gunshots, into the smoke, and Sirius and Lily were screaming, there was shrapnel everywhere, everything fucking hurt, and then Remus came back. He's strong, yeah? I mean, he had James tossed over his shoulder and was yelling at us to run, and we did, and it was just—it was so fucking chaotic. We didn't even know he was alive until we made it to the train."

Dorcas can perfectly picture it. The adrenaline. The desperate need to survive. The pressure to run as fast as you've ever ran in your life, knowing that if you're caught, you'll die. A part of her rails against the fact that Marlene had to suffer that again. She can only imagine the thick smell of smoke, burning metal, the knowledge that the woman who helped died doing her best to. She knows the sound of screams and gunshots, the sound of death, and can still hear it ringing in her ears to this day.

"James is going to be okay," Dorcas says, finally. "The mission went off the rails, but—but it was a success."

"Tell that to Pomona," Marlene murmurs.

"She knew the risks, Marlene." Dorcas grimaces as soon as she says it, because she sounds like Dumbledore. Those are his words. Those are the words of a leader who knows it's true, that people take the risk of dying, and people do it with the hope that they won't die, and then people die anyway.

Marlene glances over at her, eyebrows furrowing. All she says is, "Yeah, I know she did. We all did. But we made it out, and she didn't, and so the mission wasn't a full success."

"I'm sorry," Dorcas rasps. "I know that's insensitive, but you can't expect me not to be grateful that you made it out."

"The world doesn't revolve around me, Dorcas."

"Mine does."

"That's not true," Marlene murmurs. "What about Minerva?"

Dorcas clears her throat. "I once held a gun to her head with all intentions of shooting her if she stood in the way of saving you. Trust me, Marlene, it's true."

"She's like…your mum," Marlene says, blinking at her.

"I—well, maybe, sort of," Dorcas mumbles, feeling hot in the face, ridiculously bashful for no reason.

Marlene blinks at her some more. "You—you don't talk about your parents. It's just Minerva and Poppy."

"Some things are better left unsaid," Dorcas tells her quietly, dropping her gaze to the floor. "It is just Minerva and Poppy. That's all that needs to be said about it."

"Alright," Marlene allows, not pushing, and why would she? It's not like she ever wants to talk about her parents.

As much as they want to see each other, all of each other, there are some things that are folded away into the dark corners of one's mind, tucked into a box with the lock rusted shut, dust a thick film over the top. It's the sort of box you can only open when things are calm, and things aren't right now, and may not be for some time. Dorcas thinks, one day when the war is over and they're safe, she'll sit Marlene down and tell her all about her parents, and she'll listen if Marlene wishes to talk about her own. Because there's so much to see in each other, and they'll need a lifetime to discover it all.

They're going to fight to have the lifetime they deserve to see every part of one another.

"We do need to work on that, though," Marlene adds, wincing and cupping her side as they take the corner towards the infirmary. "Your world revolving around me, I mean. It's not healthy, you know. That's—Dorcas, that's a lot to put on one person. It can't just be me. You need more than me."

"You're the first person I've ever allowed myself to really need at all," Dorcas admits.

"And I thought I was fucked up." Marlene sighs and reaches over to gently pat her hip. "We'll work on it."

Lily sits on the edge of the bed in the infirmary, head in her hands, squeezing her eyes shut tight against the memory of the explosion. She saw it. She watched it go up in flames. She witnessed the shrapnel fly out in all directions. She was an audience to the way James' body went flying.

The worst part, she thinks, was the smell of burnt flesh. She didn't know there could be anything worse than the smell of the sewer, or worse—when they were all locked in the back of a metal truck, stifled by the heavy scent of shit and piss that they all did their best to rid themselves of, still trying to remain quiet. They'd struggled for air on their way into the Hallow, and they'd all been holding their breath on the way out. Lily didn't know anything could smell more awful than that, and then a truck exploded and James Potter was on fire.

They all carry that smell with them, and the smell of smoke, and already the burns are being healed. The burn cream is fast-acting, but even in the aftermath, Lily thinks she'll never get the smell out of her nose.

Arthur and Molly have been delegated to helping Lily, Sirius, Remus, and then Marlene when she arrives with Dorcas. Poppy handles James. Lily did her best, but she didn't have all the supplies she needed, just enough to keep him alive.

They've all been allowed to get showers, get clean, get out of their clothes and into new ones brought to them. There are shower stalls that branch off from the infirmary, a big open area that they were all able to use at the same time, curtains closed and water running, the heavy scent of shampoo and soap thankfully replacing the smell of the sewer and the smell of the smoke. Kingsley had run off immediately after, not even letting himself get checked out, which Poppy surely wouldn't have stood for if she hadn't been so busy getting James clean and doctored. Lily was too tired to bother risking a future lecture from Poppy—or worse, Molly—so she let herself be checked out, her mind full of too many thoughts.

All the running, all the shouting, all the sound of gunshots… For a second, Lily had been back in district six, tossed in the middle of war and mayhem. It felt…

It was different this time. She was scared. Maybe she was last time, but she didn't know it then. She knew it this time, though. Couldn't avoid it. Couldn't fight how sick she felt, how her hands shook, how fucking terrified she was. She saw Remus disappear into the room full of the green fog, and it didn't matter that he somehow, miraculously, came back out with Sirius in tow, because the fear invaded her from that moment and didn't leave her from that point on.

It's still there. She's back, and she's still scared, and it hits her that this is the cost of loving. This is what Dumbledore meant when he said she would be an asset as someone immune to the destructive nature of love, because it is through love that Lily recognizes the full brunt of her fear, and it makes her want to lay her guns down and never step onto a battlefield again. It makes her want to take the people she loves, and the people who they love, far away from here, somewhere safe where they can't be found and don't have to be involved. Let the world outside burn down around them, but please, please, please just let them be safe. Let them never feel fear again.

Lily forces herself to breathe out slowly. She digs the balls of her hands into her eyes, trying to stop shaking. She knows she's just coming down from the rush of adrenaline, and she knows that, with time, she'll feel more clear-headed. But, for now, she wants to curl up into a ball and cry.

They all came so close to death. Too fucking close.

Swallowing, Lily drops her hands and checks herself over again. She's okay. All wounds have been cleaned, bandaged, and left to heal. In a few days, she won't even look as if anything happened at all, save for a few minor scars here and there. It doesn't feel fair, somehow. It's going to exist in her memories, in her nightmares, and in all the people who were present. This exists between them now, a tie that threads them all together, something they'll all share.

It's one of those binding things, Lily thinks. Something you go through with other people that will never leave any of you. A common traumatic event between them only they'll ever understand. Lily will love each of these people with everything in her, and she will let herself, because they were all there trying to help each other survive.

Lily loves them all. Lily fears for them all.

But she—she can't, right now. She just can't. She feels like she's going to be crushed under the weight of it, and she's tired, and she needs to get the hell away from here.

She needs a smoke.

Naturally, the news of their return has spread across the Phoenix already. People are being nosy, as per usual, and Lily ignores their stares and whispers as she makes her way to her room. She wonders, idly, where Effie and Monty are, where Regulus is. None of them turned up at the infirmary, and surely they would be rushing to see James and Sirius again. Maybe they haven't found out yet. Maybe—

"Lily!"

At the delighted shriek of Bingley, Lily comes to a screeching halt, her head snapping up immediately. He's barreling down the hall at full tilt right for her, and Lily feels like all her fear drains right out of her, replaced by a flood of relief.

"Bingley," Lily blurts out in knee-jerk delight that mirrors his, and then she's opening her arms just as he comes flying into them, slamming into her hard enough that she grunts.

"I knew you weren't dead!" Bingley declares, squeezing her, head lying against her chest. "I told Mary, I told her you were too cool to die, I said it."

"She thought I was dead?"

"Riddle said it on the broadcast. He gave the order for all of you to be killed. But I knew he couldn't kill you."

Lily blows out a deep breath, blinking rapidly, and then she grips Bingley's shoulders and slowly eases him back. He beams up at her, and it breaks her heart. "Bingley, I'm—I'm very sorry you had to hear him say that. I'm sorry if you were scared, even for a moment."

"I was," Bingley mumbles, wrinkling his nose. "But just for a second. Only a second, I swear."

"No, it's—it's okay to be scared," Lily says slowly, just as she realizes it. "Let yourself be scared when you're scared. It just means you care, and that's nothing to be ashamed of."

"Oh." Bingley pauses. "Okay, in that case, I was terrified the entire time and maybe cried a little and was basically shitting my pants through all of it, to tell you the truth, but don't tell anyone any of that, yeah?"

"Our secret," Lily assures him with a weak laugh. She swipes her hand over his forehead, not touching his hair, because he doesn't like people to do that. He keeps his hair cropped short to his head in lovely waves he's been training, often brushing it and wearing a wave-cap whenever he's sprawling about on his bed. "Listen, I—I think maybe… Bingley, I don't want to frighten you more, because I care about you, but I don't want you to think that I'm indestructible. I don't want you to have to think of anything happening to me, but something could. You said… You said Riddle couldn't kill me, but he—he can, is the thing. And it's scary. And it's—it hurts to even imagine that, but I need you to know that, no matter what happens to me, or anyone, it's okay to care anyway."

Bingley stares up at her, swallowing, and he's so painfully young that it feels like her heart is cracking in her chest. He doesn't deserve to have these fears thrust upon him. He didn't deserve to lose his parents and his home. Yet, this is the world, and Lily worries he's latching onto her because he sees her as strong and capable, which isn't necessarily bad, but it could be damaging in the long run if something does happen to her. It will hurt, and she never wants to hurt him, even indirectly.

In the end, Bingley just whispers, "Okay," and wraps his arms around her again, hugging her even tighter than before.

"Bingley! Where did you—"

"Uh oh."

Lily's mouth runs dry as she looks up to find Mary at the end of the hall, staring at them. "Uh oh? Why uh oh?"

"I—sort of ran off," Bingley mutters. "We were in our room, and she was upset, but she was pretending not to be. For me, I think. We—well, I got angry and yelled at her."

"Right, I see. Very uh oh," Lily murmurs.

Bingley eases away from her slowly, glancing back at Mary, biting his lip. "You know, maybe she'll just forget all about it now that you're here."

"Mm, doubtful, but either way, you should probably apologize," Lily says.

"I know." Bingley sighs as his shoulders slump. "I—"

"Bingley," Mary calls out, her voice sharp and terse, heels clicking as she moves towards them, "go to the room. Now."

"But—"

"Now, Bingley."

Lily nudges him gently. "Go on. It's going to be wild around here for a bit, so it's best to avoid the mess. I'll come and see you later, I promise."

"Fine," Bingley declares with a huff, pursing his lips in a clear sign of displeasure, but he's smart enough to know now isn't the time to argue. He stops on the way, catching Mary's arm to murmur to her, and she thumps him in the middle of his forehead. He rubs it with a scowl, then goes when Mary forcefully points in the direction of their room.

And then Mary is heading right for her, and Lily fidgets a little ridiculously with her fingers, itching to touch her, already a mess as she tries to get her scrambled thoughts from the mere sight of her in some semblance of order, just to string a sentence together befitting of how relieving it is to see her, and how scared she was, and still is, and how she's afraid because she cares, she cares so fucking much.

Lily decides to start with, "Mary, I—"

She gets no further, her mouth still ever so slightly parted when Mary marches right up to her, catches her face in between her hands, and draws her into a kiss.

Lily has no thoughts after that.

She forgot, really, how good a kiss could be when it's not about sex, or the lead up into sex. That's not to say kissing before, during, and after sex isn't good—because it is—but this has nothing to do with sex, entirely separate from it, and Lily's pretty sure it's the best kiss she's ever had.

It's also a post I-thought-you-were-dead kiss, which—as it turns out—is a fucking phenomenal type of kiss. It's like a lightning strike travels right down her spine, lighting her up and making her jolt as she inhales sharply, falling into it and drowning in it and lost in it and every other cliche in the world.

It's a hell of a first kiss, Lily has to admit, and she can quite literally feel herself be entirely ruined for anything or anyone else from just that, just this, but the thing is, she thinks she has been for some time now. It's the sort of kiss that leaves her shaky and sensitive, Mary's hands sliding into Lily's still-damp hair as her tongue slides over the seam of her lips, and Lily arches into it in an eager way that would be embarrassing if Mary's breath didn't stutter against her mouth, audibly hitching, a small sound escaping the back of her throat that can almost be labeled as a very quiet groan of defeat.

Yeah, Lily's still got it.

Mary keeps right on kissing her, too, and she's the one who chases the kiss when it's broken. She's panting a little, following after Lily's mouth with her own, and Lily can't stop herself from breaking out into a grin as she turns her head away from it, feeling warm all the way down to the bone.

Mary blinks at her, then mutters, "Fuck."

"I can see you thinking naughty thoughts," Lily teases.

"Shut up," Mary replies, then clicks her tongue and leans forward to let their foreheads settle together. Her hands ease over the curve of Lily's cheeks, gently caressing down the sides of her throat. "Okay. Yeah, okay, you got me."

Lily laughs, utterly exhilarated. "Did I?"

"Turns out I'm not immune to your, ah, allure," Mary admits dryly. "It's a shame, isn't it? I suppose I'll have to resign myself to it, being just like everyone else."

"You're like no one else," Lily whispers, bumping Mary's nose with her own. Her lips feel like they're tingling.

"No?" Mary asks. "Because if you wanted to take me to your bed now, I'd be more than happy to go."

"Oh, I would love to," Lily tells her, sliding her hands up her sides and humming in a pleased fashion when Mary leans into her even more, "but I think we'll take it slow."

"Slow," Mary repeats.

"Slow can be fun," Lily murmurs. "Haven't done slow in a while. Let's take it slow. Let's—date. Or whatever the fuck dating is in an underground bunker in the middle of war."

Mary leans back and studies her. "I thought you said you weren't ready for…anything."

"I also said I was probably going to do it anyway, and would you look at that?" Lily says softly, lips twitching. Mary arches an eyebrow. "I just—I wanted to be here. I hate it here, most of the time, but I still wanted to be here, because you and Bingley are here, and I… Well, honestly, I could have died. I nearly died. And that hasn't really scared me in a long time, but it scared me this time, because I have things I want to do, and people I want to love, so I'd like to get started on that. Maybe that's okay with you. Is that okay with you?"

"Yes," Mary breathes out, then kisses her again, and this time, there's absolutely no maybe about it.

For the record, Sirius doesn't like it here. He knows it's supposed to be safe, but it's crowded and full of people he doesn't know. He had wanted to stay in the infirmary, where James is, but people showed up to escort him and Remus away.

Sirius had no intentions of leaving until that woman by the name of Poppy came out to inform him that James was stable. He's resting now, put to sleep to better heal that way, as our bodies heal best at rest, or so Poppy had said. She did allow Sirius to check on him, and it helped soothe him, but he doesn't think he's going to feel fully alright until James is awake. He's clean now, smelling better, but definitely not looking better. Sirius had wanted to crawl into bed with him, but he was too scared to touch him. It was then that people showed up, coaxing Sirius and Remus into coming along.

Remus clearly isn't pleased about it. He'd argued a bit, fussing about Sirius needing to stay and rest as well, but Sirius doesn't want to leave him either. So, Sirius compromised by agreeing to go along, secretly hoping they'll let him see Regulus whenever he's done. Because Regulus is here.

Somewhere in this bunker, he's breathing and alive, and Sirius needs to see him. Whatever it takes to get to that faster, he'll do it. He knows how these things work. Chances are, he has to go talk to someone important who doesn't actually care that all he wants is to be reunited with those he loves.

So, here Sirius is, being led down hall after hall, garnering all sorts of attention he'd rather not have. People are staring at him as he goes by, clearly recognizing him, and Sirius stays close to Remus, their arms brushing as they walk. That's new, too, being able to be close to Remus around so many eyes. It's sort of jarring, in a way, and Sirius almost doesn't know what to do with that freedom. He wants to reach out and take Remus' hand, thread their fingers together, but he doesn't.

"Sirius!"

"Cissa?" Sirius blurts out, nearly tripping as he wheels around to follow the sound of his cousin's voice. He's not sure what he's expecting, but it's not for Narcissa to come barreling down the hall right for him, throwing herself at him.

It says a lot that Sirius is expecting an attack. He prepares himself to take the incoming hit, bracing for it and already planning how he will fight back, and then Narcissa throws her arms around him with a gasp, hugging him. Sirius is as stiff as a board, blinking rapidly, a mixture of alarmed and startled because he doesn't know if Narcissa has ever hugged him before. If she has, he can't remember it. Even so, they're not exactly from the sort of family that does much hugging.

"Fucking hell," Narcissa breathes out, snatching away from him as abruptly as she jumped on him. Her hands fly up to grasp his arms, eyes wide. "We thought—"

"Regulus," Sirius cuts in desperately, gripping her wrists and searching her eyes. "Where's Regulus?"

"No one knows. We all split off to look for him," Narcissa tells him. "After the broadcast, he just—disappeared. Aberforth said he had an idea of where he went and stomped off, so—"

"Broadcast? What broadcast? Wait, Aberforth?"

"You don't know, do you? Oh, Sirius, Regulus thinks you're dead. You and James, along with all those who went on the mission to get both of you out."

Sirius feels like his whole body goes cold. "What?"

"Shit," Remus hisses.

"I have to—"

"Pardon me," comes the gentle interruption, and Sirius whips his head around to see an older man moving down the hall towards them. He bears a startling resemblance to Aberforth, the same eyes, except he looks much kinder. "I apologize for breaking up the reunion, but I must ask Sirius and Mr. Lupin to follow me. It's a matter of utmost urgency."

"Who are you?" Sirius snaps, narrowing his eyes.

"I have the answers you seek, Sirius, or most of them, including where your brother is," the man says. He sweeps his arm out. "Come along, I will explain as much as I can."

"Go," Narcissa whispers, squeezing his arms. "I need to go find Andy and Dora to tell them you're okay."

"Andy and Dora are here?" Sirius breathes out.

Narcissa nods. "They're here. Later, Sirius. We'll all have a proper family reunion later, I promise. I just—I need to let them know you're here."

Sirius lets her go, because he'd like Andromeda, Ted, and Nymphadora to know that he's alive, even if he can't see all of them right this second. He draws back and splits off with Remus to follow the man.

They're not led very far. Just to a door with mismatched wood, clearly having been broken and fixed, a gargoyle door-knocker lying against it. Sirius glances at Remus, eyebrows furrowing to see him glaring at the man's back, jaw clenched.

Okay, Remus doesn't like this man. Noted. Has he done something to hurt Remus? Sirius will kill him. It's not even a question; he'd do it in a heartbeat if Remus wanted him to.

Although, Remus would never want him to, and Remus can definitely kill on his own. Sirius has seen that now, on the way out of Azkaban. It had startled him to actively see Remus snap a man's neck, or beat the shit out of someone until they were choking on their own teeth, drowning in their own blood. Remus is…violent. Very violent.

It's raw, not refined. There's no finesse, and he's messy about it, forgoing technique for brute strength and overwhelming whatever unfortunate soul happens to get in his way. It's more brutal that way, less precise and certainly not as swift as Sirius himself is. If Sirius is a sword forged and sharpened, then Remus is the harsh edge of raw steel. It's not something most would label as beautiful, and yet Sirius had been as enraptured by the sight of Remus like that as he was stunned.

For a long time, Remus had been covered in blood, and that hadn't made Sirius want to touch him any less. It shouldn't have made him want to touch him more, and yet.

And yet.

"Please," the man murmurs, moving behind his desk to gesture to the chairs on the other side. "Have a seat."

Sirius and Remus sit.

"Where's my brother?" Sirius demands immediately.

"Aberforth has gone to get him," the man says. "You'll see him soon enough. Trust me, Sirius, I have no intentions of keeping you from your brother, but there is unfortunately something I need to discuss with both of you."

"Who are you? How do you know Mayor Aberforth?"

"Ah, forgive my rudeness, in my haste I've rushed past introductions. My name is Albus Dumbledore."

Sirius blinks. "Wait, like…"

"Yes," Albus confirms. "Aberforth is my younger brother."

"You're the leader," Sirius states. "Of this whole…resistance, I mean. You're the one in charge, right?"

Albus hums. "Yes, I'm the founder of the Order of the Phoenix. I want to tell you, Sirius, that you're entirely safe here. Many of your friends and family are already here, as is what's left of your home. I'm afraid Riddle released biological warfare within district six, so only a fraction of people made it to safety. I apologize for being the bearer of such burdensome news, but it leads into the matter we need to discuss."

"My home," Sirius croaks. "It's gone?"

Remus reaches over and covers his hand. He knew. He must have, at least some details, but it's not like they've really had time to discuss anything in between all the escaping and whatnot. Still, Sirius feels the shock of it run through him. It's his home. Can he not go back? Ever?

It explains why Effie, Monty, and Aberforth are here, along with Andy, Ted, and Dora. What about Mary and Bingley? What about Crouch, Regulus' friend? What about all the people who sold at the market, and all the children who ran on the school grounds, and those he's known his whole life?

"The district is empty," Albus murmurs. "Unfortunately, as I said, Riddle released biological warfare there, leaving it currently inhabitable, but I don't think it will always be. I think, in time, it's possible that those who wish to return there after the war will be able to, safely, and I have reason to believe that Mr. Lupin may help make that possible."

"What?" Remus asks flatly.

Albus threads his hands together on his desk and leans forward. "I got a full recount of the mission from Kingsley while all of you were in the infirmary. You two faced a terrible trial today to reach your freedom and safety, and for that, I'm truly sorry. However, hope can be found, even in the darkest of times, if only one remembers to turn on the light. Today, I have found the greatest light in the form of you."

"What does this have to do with biological warfare?"

"From my understanding, you two have immunity to it."

Sirius glances over at Remus, who presses his lips in a thin line, eyebrows wrinkled together. Sirius wants to reach up and smooth them out, ease the strain away, cradle Remus' face in the curve of his neck and keep him safe there forever.

"The green fog," Sirius says slowly, looking back at Albus, his own lips tipping down. "It was used in the arena. That was biological warfare?"

"Yes."

"And some people are just…naturally immune? You mean to tell me that I was doing all that running for nothing?"

Albus looks faintly amused by how affronted Sirius is. He shakes his head. "No, not at all. The biological warfare was created from Horcrux Hornet venom, and immunity to it had to be formulated. I have reason to believe, Mr. Lupin, that you were a key piece in creating the formula. I don't wish to dredge up painful memories, but I must ask if you ever recall coming into contact with the fog before today."

Sirius glances at Remus again, his heart sinking at the look on his face, even before he cautiously admits, "Uh, yeah, actually. It was before the Quarterly Memorial. They injected me with something, then made me breathe in the fog. I—" He darts a quick look at Sirius, then looks away. "I…nearly died."

"If I may," Albus says mildly, "did you have a similar experience in Azkaban, Sirius?"

"No," Sirius replies.

"Are you certain?"

"Yes."

Remus opens his mouth, winces, then immediately closes it. Sirius turns and narrows his eyes at him, and Remus bites his lip. "It's just… Are you certain?"

"I just said so, didn't I?" Sirius grits out.

"I—I'm not saying—" Remus pauses, then grimaces and heaves a sigh. He sets his shoulders and meets Sirius' eyes, clearly working himself up to saying what he has to. "Is there any chance you may have…forgotten it?"

Sirius stares at him. His nostrils flare. "Remus, don't insult my intelligence. I was tortured only twice in my stay at Azkaban, thanks to James. That was how Riddle was manipulating him, by giving him the power to make sure I wasn't hurt and allowing him to visit me. Also, consider this, why the fuck would Riddle grant me immunity to his weapon?"

Remus opens and closes his mouth. "Okay, that's…a fair point. He'd never do that. So, how are you immune?"

"Are we sure that I am?" Sirius asks. "I mean, I—I don't—it's all a bit of a blur. Did I…come in contact with the fog?"

"You did," Remus murmurs, eyebrows furrowing again, clearly deep in thought. "Wait, that's —this doesn't make any sense. They intended to kill you with it, which means they didn't know you were immune. I didn't even know I was immune."

"Wait, what—just tell me what happened. I was—" Sirius glances at Albus, who listens to them calmly. Sirius doesn't really like talking about his difficulties with memory, not openly, and especially not to people he doesn't trust. "I was out of it from the torture. By the time I really, ah, got my bearings, we were out of the room."

"You were trapped inside. A man came out and used a remote to deploy the fog in the room," Remus explains. "I killed him and ran into the room to—"

"You what?!" Sirius bursts out, eyes bulging.

Remus blinks. "What?"

"Remus! You just said you didn't know you were immune! So, what, you—you just ran in there anyway?"

"You were in there."

"Fucking hell, Remus," Sirius whispers, staring at him, stricken. "You—you could have died. You—"

"Well, I mean…I didn't go in breathing. I held my breath. I saw how it worked in the games. It's only when you inhale the fog, right?" Remus looks at Albus, who inclines his head. "Right, so I—I obviously didn't plan to breathe it. I was just—I had to get in and get you out. But then I—I did breathe it in—"

"What? Why?" Sirius demands, horrified.

"I…" Remus swallows and looks at him, tentative almost. He takes a deep breath, then slowly lets it out. "You were strapped to the chair, and you—you didn't know it was me—"

"No," Sirius croaks, freezing.

"Sirius—"

"The bruise. You had a bruise from where someone hit you. It's still there."

"Sirius," Remus says carefully, "I'd been fighting since we got there. I was going to be a little hurt. It's fine. I—"

"But you fought me," Sirius murmurs, holding his gaze. "Or, no, I…fought you. I put that bruise there. Didn't I?"

Remus clearly wants to lie, just because it would be so much easier, but—he can't. He wouldn't betray the trust Sirius has in him to not lie to him about what occurs between them when he can't remember. Swallowing harshly, Remus whispers, "It wasn't your fault. You didn't know—"

Too late. Remus has said enough. Sirius flinches back from him, dropping his gaze and dragging his hand away, his stomach churning. He told Remus he would never hurt him. He promised, and then he did it anyway. Because that's what he does. He carries ruin in the lines of his hands and smears it on anything he comes into contact with. Sirius feels fucking sick. He should have never touched him. He was so selfish to ever, ever, ever touch him.

What if Remus hadn't been immune? He would have been dead. Sirius likely knocked the breath right out of his lungs, making him breathe, and if he wasn't immune, it would have killed him. Sirius could have killed him.

"I understand that this is a difficult situation," Albus says into the heavy silence, "and I'm sorry for the emotional toll this is taking on both of you. If it wasn't necessary to save lives, I wouldn't ask either of you to revisit it. I do have to ask, Sirius. Do you, by chance, recall the symptoms from the immunity? Mr. Lupin, I'm sure you experienced it at least. A feeling of illness. A rash. Headaches. Nausea."

"How do you know that?" Remus asks, frowning. "I thought you didn't know how to create the immunity."

Albus sighs. "We do not. We know nothing of the formula, but I have a secret informant who was given the immunization, and I was told of the symptoms it causes. Is that right?"

"Yes," Remus mumbles.

Sirius' heart is beating very fast. "Um. Yeah, I—I did go through that, but I swear I wasn't given an immunization."

"Can you tell me what happened before you went through those symptoms?" Albus asks.

"I mean, I was mostly just kept in my cell, tased a lot, and I did get a visit from Riddle. That's the day the symptoms started, and I—I was tortured that day, but I'm telling you, Riddle never would have had me immunized."

"I believe you, Sirius. What happened with Riddle?"

"Um." Sirius grimaces. "Well, he brought a Horcrux Hornet to intimidate me, I'm sure, but it never left the jar. There were some threats, a little humiliation, and I bit him, then he hit me, and that was about it. Nothing really happened."

Albus surveys him over his glasses. "You bit him."

"He pissed me off," Sirius mutters.

"Did you begin experiencing the symptoms after the visit with Riddle, or after the torture that day?" Albus asks.

Sirius scrunches up his face, thinking hard. "I mean, I started getting itchy after his visit, but I assumed that was because I was around that bastard. Wait, are you telling me you think he somehow slipped me an immunization? That's—that doesn't make any sense. He wouldn't do that."

"He's right," Remus agrees. "Riddle was going to have Sirius killed that way. Why would he give him immunity?"

"I don't believe he did, not intentionally," Albus muses, leaning back with a hum. "Sirius, may I ask, when you bit Riddle, did you perhaps ingest his blood?"

"Oh, yeah, I tore open his wrist with my teeth," Sirius says smugly. "Pissed him off with that. But what does that—" He stops, then blinks. "Wait. Riddle is immune. Of course he is, why wouldn't he be? He was immunized. It's—it's in his—"

"Blood," Remus breathes out. "It's in our blood."

Albus' eyes twinkle. "So it would seem. That's my working theory, yes. It appears to be a bloodborne immunity, though it's clear Riddle isn't aware of this." His gaze settles on Remus, head tilting a little. "It would also seem that I did, in fact, have my deus ex machina this entire time."

"You need my help," Remus says softly.

"I do," Albus confirms. "We don't know how to create the immunity yet, but with samples of your blood, we could begin working out how to form one. In the meantime, you could give willing blood donations to—"

Sirius stiffens. "No. No, absolutely not. Fuck that. He's—you can't just fucking turn him into an experiment and use him like a pincushion. You're not doing that."

"Sirius," Remus starts.

"No," Sirius spits out, standing up so sharply that his chair clatters against the floor. He holds Albus' gaze. "You think I don't know how this works? You think I don't know the signs of manipulation? Already, you've stated it'll save lives, which you know will weigh on him, and that will make him feel a sense of obligation. And, if that's not enough for him to agree, how far will you take it, hm? He's safe here, but if he won't comply, will you threaten to toss him out, or torture him? And what if it takes more than just blood? What if it takes hurting him to get what you need? What then?"

"Sirius, I assure you, I wish Mr. Lupin no harm."

"Good, because you're not going to touch him. He's not a fucking servant, and he's certainly not yours. Use me. I'll do it, whatever you need, but leave him out of it."

Albus shakes his head slowly. "I'm afraid that may not be possible. We've been studying this for some time, and I don't believe the immunity would be able to be transferred from a source that didn't have the immunization. I can only be sure that a direct source will work, and I can't risk otherwise."

"Well, I suppose you're fucked then," Sirius says coldly.

"I believe that's Mr. Lupin's choice," Albus murmurs, holding his gaze, utterly calm. "Not yours."

"He's not yours to use," Sirius snarls. "You can't have him."

"Sirius. Sirius," Remus says, his voice sharp, and Sirius whips his head around to stare at him. "He's right, Sirius. It's my choice. Not yours, and not his, but mine."

Sirius practically wilts. He sinks back down into his chair, staring at Remus with wide eyes. "Remus…"

"I'll give blood samples, and I'll donate however much blood Lily will allow, and no more," Remus announces, turning to look at Albus. "I'll do that on one condition."

"Which is?" Albus asks.

Remus tilts his chin up. "It's my blood. I'll decide who gets immunizations first, and then—after that—you can do what you want with what's left, or how much I give after."

"Very well," Albus agrees immediately. "I want you to know that, with your help, we will be able to take the districts, save countless people from certain death, and take this war to Riddle. You will single-handedly be the catalyst to helping us win this war, Mr. Lupin. This world will owe you everything."

"I don't need everything." Remus' gaze shifts to land on Sirius, face softening. "Something will do."

Sirius clenches his jaw and stands up again, hands balled into fists. "Where's my brother? I want to see my brother."

"Aberforth will surely be escorting him to the infirmary," Albus informs him. "You're free to return there. Mr. Lupin, I'd ask that you remain so we can discuss the plans."

Sirius walks out before he ever hears Remus' response, and he slams the door as he goes.

Aberforth hasn't had to lug a ladder along in years, and he feels quite foolish doing it now, but he does appreciate the wind that stirs his hair and beard. The boy could have chosen a better time to make his grand escape, like perhaps during the day. At least then Aberforth would get to feel the sun.

Being outside makes him ache for home. He always aches for home, though, much like he imagines the boy does. It comes as no surprise to Aberforth that the boy would go outside in the aftermath of what happened. Regulus always seems to seek out trees when he's troubled.

Sure enough, Aberforth eventually spots Regulus where he expected to find him, or close to it. He's never seen Regulus climb Ariana's tree, though he tried, but he did witness Regulus climb the hedge within the arena. It seemed like an important event in his life, and so it would seem the tradition accompanies him now. When believing his brother and the man he loves have died, he has chosen to climb.

Sighing, Aberforth adjusts the ladder and lets it lean against the limb the boy is on with a dull clatter. Regulus doesn't acknowledge the sound. He's sitting on the branch with his knees drawn up to his chest, arms wrapped around them, faced pressed down into them. Aberforth grunts and grabs the ladder, then begins to slowly climb.

He's getting too old for this shit.

Surprisingly, it's Regulus who speaks when Aberforth reaches the top. His voice is devoid of emotion, his face—when he lifts his head—even more so. "I don't care that I broke a rule. I don't care if Riddle has Hallow heli-carriers still out searching for the bunker. If you're trying to get me to come down from this tree, you're going to have to kill me."

"That won't be necessary," Aberforth says dryly. He suspects the boy might fall out of the tree in his haste to get back inside once he knows who's waiting for him in there.

"Alright, well, I got nowhere. Just like you said. Are you here to rub it in that you were right and I was wrong?" Regulus grits out. "Because, if so, I'll kill you."

"Boy, I'm not here for that," Aberforth grumbles. "Even if I was right, I wouldn't do that. But I was wrong. You need to come down now. The others made it back."

Regulus stares at him. Aberforth can see his hands tremble against his legs. The boy's been out here for hours and it's February now, cold outside. He's shivering, but he hardly seems to notice, too busy staring at Aberforth like he's too scared to hope. "The others… Do you—who do you mean?"

"All of them," Aberforth says gruffly. "Everyone who went on the mission from here made it back, and they brought James with them, along with your brother. They're here, Regulus."

Regulus damn near does fall out of the tree, his body jerking as he sucks in a sharp breath, and then his body starts to tip. Aberforth snaps his hand out and fists the front of his shirt, heaving a sigh when Regulus yelps and clamps down on his wrist desperately, his eyes wide with fear. He looks small like that. It reminds Aberforth so painfully of Ariana that he scowls as he drags Regulus back to let him get his balance.

"Oh, fuck," Regulus wheezes, gripping the branch and suddenly seeming to realize how high he is all at once, staring around in dismay. "Fuck, fuck, fuck. What am I doing up here? I need to get down. I need to get down right now."

"Alright, keep your hair on," Aberforth mutters.

"I need to get down!" Regulus bursts out.

Aberforth starts climbing down. "No need to yell at me about it. I didn't tell you to be dumb enough to climb up in a tree when you're scared of heights. Now, stop all that panicking nonsense, boy, and use the damn ladder."

As soon as Aberforth reaches the ground, Regulus scales down the ladder faster than Aberforth has ever seen anyone move, probably a mixture of desperation to get down and desperation to get inside. Aberforth steps up to grab the ladder.

"Uh uh, where do you think you're going?" Aberforth barks when Regulus starts to turn, clearly about to run off. "Only way they're letting you back in with no trouble is if you're with me. Come here, help me with this."

Regulus stares at him incredulously. "But—"

"I'm an old man. Hurry up, or we can stand out here all night, if you prefer," Aberforth tells him.

"Oh, for fuck's sake," Regulus snaps, glaring at him as he marches over to snatch the ladder from him, exhaling sharply and gesturing towards the Phoenix. "Can we go now?"

"By all means," Aberforth says, amused despite himself.

Regulus seems to have no concept of patience whatsoever, and he proves so by keeping ahead of Aberforth all the way back into the bunker. As soon as they're back inside, Regulus carelessly tosses the ladder aside and starts rushing, only to be stopped by those who he incapacitated on his way out, so Aberforth has to step in to keep him from being immediately thrown in solitary (again) for breaking rules and also knocking out about nine different people just to get to the surface.

Really, Aberforth thinks it's a miracle the boy didn't kill any of them. He's pretty sure he was just focused on getting outside, and killing would take a little more time and effort, which is likely the only thing that saved those people's lives.

In any case, Aberforth has to escort Regulus to the infirmary. As Albus' brother, he gets clearance to do pretty much anything he wants. Albus isn't above playing favorites, and even if he was, no one wants to disrespect him by crossing his brother. Aberforth has a high position here, technically. Albus trusts him with everything, all information, and he even consults with him. Aberforth didn't want to be a part of this, but Albus didn't really give him a choice. He never does.

Once inside the infirmary, Regulus immediately starts looking around. That girl—Molly, Aberforth thinks her name is—steps out from behind a drawn curtain and blinks.

"Oh dear," Molly says quietly. She gazes at Regulus with something akin to pity. "Here to see James, I take it. He's not awake, I'm afraid, but he's right through here."

Regulus moves forward to whip the curtain back, and then he instantly freezes, a choked noise escaping him. It comes from somewhere deep, something that tugs at even Aberforth's chest. Well, that's just awful, is what it is.

James is very badly injured, wrapped in bandages and covered in salve for his burns. It's an ugly process, healing burns that severe, though it's thankfully a fairly quick one. He should be fine by tomorrow, Aberforth suspects, but he looks really bad laid up in the bed as he is. The injuries are all over him to the point that it doesn't look like there's really any place you can touch him without it hurting him.

The boy takes a staggering step forward, bracing his hands against the rail at the foot of the bed. He sounds like he's gasping when he says, "What—what happened to him?"

"There was an explosion," Molly explains gently, full of sympathy. Her eyes only grow sadder when Regulus outright whimpers. "He took the brunt of the blast, they said, but he's going to heal up just fine. By tomorrow, he'll look much better; give it a few days, and he'll be good as new."

Regulus heaves out a harsh breath and continues on his staggering journey around James' bed. His head is ducked, but Aberforth can see the pain there, twisting it. His entire expression collapses the moment he reaches the head of the bed and lifts trembling fingers to push them through James' hair in a touch so tender that Aberforth feels like he's intruding by simply being here. He looks away, but that can't save him from hearing Regulus.

He's crying. Sobbing, really. It's muffled, like he's doing his absolute best to hide or stop it, but again, it tugs at Aberforth's chest. Maybe it makes him a soft old man, but he can't help but see Regulus as just a boy. So young, really. He remembers the first year Regulus' name got called, and how Sirius volunteered for him, and the way his breath had caught, because he knew. He knew that he'd just watched a tragedy in the making. He knew that he'd just watched two boys have their innocence snatched from them, and he knew—through that—they'd always have this stunted sort of growth where they're never quite children again, yet they're never going to shed themselves of the pain that chains them to the children they were. He knew, because he'd experienced it himself.

"Where's his glasses?" Regulus chokes out, and Aberforth looks at him again to find him shaking all over like he's on the cusp of falling apart. "Why doesn't he have his glasses?"

Molly gives a wary flutter of her hands, looking pained. "I don't know. He—he didn't have any, or any contacts, and they said he didn't need them anymore. I'm sorry."

"He—he does need them. He needs them. He needs his glasses." Regulus releases yet another horrible, heartbreaking noise and seems incapable of holding himself up any longer. His legs buckle, and he goes down right there next to James' bed, kneeling next to it as he cups James' hand gingerly in both of his, pressing his face to the limp fingers. "They're his. Please. He needs them. He needs his glasses."

Molly doesn't respond this time, likely because it doesn't seem like the boy can process a response. He's just weeping, and there's nothing to be done about it.

"Move," Aberforth orders gruffly, waving Molly back with a scowl, and she looks startled, but she does as he says.

Aberforth reaches out and whips the curtain shut, because if nothing else, the boy deserves to have his breakdown in peace. The least they could do is give him his damn privacy.

Even still, closing the curtain does nothing to drown out the gut-wrenching sound of his sobs.

It's Andromeda who hunts Euphemia down to call off the search for Regulus, because apparently Aberforth is going to get him, and also Sirius and James are here.

Euphemia is pretty sure she and Fleamont have never run this fast in their life. It's so very reminiscent of the last time in the aftermath of the arena break-in, the way they clutched at one another's hand and tore through the halls in the hopes that, very soon, they would be reunited with their children again.

A part of Euphemia died while watching Regulus' broadcast, when Riddle gave that kill order, and she thinks the only thing that stopped her from lying down and never getting up again was the news that Regulus had disappeared. It filled her with such visceral fear, along with the selfish, possibly horrible thought that he was all she had left of her boys, and she couldn't bear to lose him, too.

And now, everything has shifted. Euphemia is breathless as she whirls around a corner, then choking on air the moment her gaze lands on Sirius. She comes to a screeching halt, listening to Fleamont groan like a man on the verge of tears. She wouldn't be surprised if he's crying already. She is. Her eyes immediately start streaming.

"Sirius," Euphemia gasps out, and his head snaps in her direction, eyes widening when he sees her.

They both start running at the same time. They also slam into each other at the same time, and Sirius laughs. It's a breathless laugh of pure elation, one that lifts Euphemia right off her feet. No, actually, that's Sirius. He wraps his arms around her tight and legitimately picks her up from the force in which he embraces her, then goes with the motion and twirls her around until she's laughing with him, even through her tears.

Fleamont nearly tackles them both to the floor with how hard he collides into them, arms thrown around them both, and he is both laughing and crying as well. He squeezes them so hard they wheeze, all of their hands slipping over each other, desperate to touch and hold on, feeling life and love spill out between them. Family. This is family.

"Oh, honey. Darling boy." Euphemia's hands come up to cradle his face, and he stares at her as he always has, like she's his hero. She presses in, tugging him by his head, kissing his forehead fiercely. Fleamont has an arm around Sirius' shoulders, head ducked down against one as he breathes and cries, a big man with big emotions, weeping all over Sirius with no shame in his lumbering frame whatsoever.

"It's okay," Sirius says. "I'm okay."

"We were so worried," Euphemia confesses, because these are things you tell your children, especially the child that doesn't automatically realize parents are meant to care enough to worry. "We've been so worried, Sirius."

"I was worried about you, too. Both of you. All of you, everyone," Sirius tells her. "You have no idea how relieved I was to know you've both been safe."

"We love you so much," Fleamont croaks, lifting his head to peer at Sirius with a watery smile.

"I love you, too," Sirius replies simply, with the sort of ease it took years for him to find. He doesn't let them go, and they're not keen to let him go either. "I—I heard about what happened back home. I'm glad you got out. Andy, Ted, and Dora, too."

Euphemia pauses, her heart giving a harsh clench. She swallows and reaches up to gently sweep her hand over his hair. It's tangled and damp. "Ted didn't—he didn't…"

Sirius' smile falls. "No. No, he—"

"I'm sorry," Euphemia whispers. "Sirius, I'm so sorry."

"Oh no, Dora. Andy." Sirius' eyes sink shut, his eyebrows wrinkling as he ducks his head. Fleamont and Euphemia soothe him as much as they can, and he eventually looks up again. "Are they—how have they been?"

Fleamont gives a wan smile. "It's been hard. We've all been grieving. There were a lot of people lost, but as for Andromeda and Dora, having Narcissa has seemed to help a lot. For Dora specifically, Regulus has also been a big help. It's—difficult, but we're all leaning on each other. Taking care of each other."

"What about Mary?" Sirius asks desperately. "Bingley?"

"They're here," Euphemia assures him. "They lost the rest of their family, but they're safe. Regulus' boy, that Barty, he made it, too. His parents didn't, but Regulus has seemed to help him with that. They've been helping each other, really."

Sirius nods. "And—and Regulus? Has he—"

"It's been rough," Euphemia admits, taking a deep breath and slowly letting it out. "Fleamont and I have been looking out for him, along with Remus. He's a good boy, Remus is. Hasn't been doing well himself, honestly, but he's such a pure soul. I got that letter to him like you asked."

"You did?"

"Of course I did, honey. Of course."

"Okay." Sirius exhales, some of the tension seeming to leave his body, and then it comes right back. "Wait, have you seen James yet? He's—he's in the infirmary. Regulus is supposed to be there now. I sort of…got lost on the way."

"Yes, this place is massive, isn't it?" Fleamont turns to guide him along, and Euphemia joins them. "Been here for weeks and we still get lost frequently. You said James is in the infirmary. Is he hurt very badly?"

Sirius glances between them in a way that makes a pit open up in Euphemia's stomach. "It's —yeah, it's pretty bad. I mean, he's fine. He's going to be fine. They said he'd be healed up for the most part by tomorrow, but…he just looks really hurt at the moment. I just—I want you to be prepared. It's hard to see."

Euphemia swallows harshly. "What happened?"

"There was an explosion," Sirius whispers. "Um, a truck exploded. He was close by, and he…" Likely due to the looks on their faces, he doesn't finish. Instead, he clears his throat and mumbles, "He's alive, though, and he will get better. He's okay, Effie, Monty, I swear it. I promise he'll be okay."

It's not every day that the child comforts the parent, and not on every occasion is it appropriate, but in this instance, Euphemia is so very grateful for him, for the kindness in his heart to want to reassure them, even after everything he's been through. Euphemia leans her head over on him as they walk, basking in having him close again, safe and within reach.

It's quiet between them the rest of the way to the infirmary, something settling familiar and comfortable between them, wrapped up in something else somber. It feels so very good to be together again. Just the same, they ache with what's happened, and they ache for James.

When they do reach the infirmary, Sirius halts outside the doors and closes his eyes, taking a deep breath. He draws away from them, squaring his shoulders, visibly standing taller.

"Sirius?" Euphemia asks.

"Regulus is in there," Sirius says, and his voice cracks. It makes him grimace. He works his jaw, flexing his fingers.

Oh, Euphemia knows what this is. She's seen it before, a ritual Sirius has gone through many times in his hardest moments, before he's going to see his little brother again. He does this. He tries to pull himself together and be strong, stepping into his role as protector, the one who takes care of Regulus no matter what, regardless of his own struggle and pain. It's a self-imposed role, which saddens Euphemia, because she thinks Regulus might appreciate a role reversal sometimes.

But this is what they know. This is how they've always been. Sirius is the big brother, and he's so much more, too. The weight of that is something he shoulders instinctively, and always has, and Regulus doesn't mean to put that weight on him, but it's impossible for him to lift it on his own. Because he loves Sirius like a brother, a mother, a father, a friend, an enemy, a reflection, and like no other. He can't stop that any more than Sirius can stop loving him as a brother, a son, a daughter, a friend, an enemy, a reflection, and like no one else. That's a weight they carry together, between them, and it'll take both of them to lift it.

"Take a moment," Euphemia murmurs, reaching out to gently touch his cheek. "It's alright, Sirius. We'll go in, see him and James, and you can take some time. Just breathe, darling."

"Thank you," Sirius whispers.

Euphemia hugs him again, and so does Fleamont, and then they go inside. It's fairly sparse, especially now that it's getting later in the evening. Marlene is lying in a bed, sleeping, and Dorcas sits in a chair next to her, holding her hand and also sleeping. Euphemia only knows this because Arthur steps out of the curtain to reveal them, and then he gently shuts it back. Kingsley is off to the side, being fussed over by Poppy in low tones, because apparently she's not pleased that he didn't stay in the infirmary from the start. Euphemia sees no one else, and she's looking around eagerly for—

"Here to see James?" Arthur asks kindly. He waves them along. "Follow me. I'd like to warn you, he looks more than a little worse for wear, but I assure you he's healing as we speak, and he'll be much better by tomorrow."

"Thank you, Arthur," Euphemia says.

"Is Regulus here already?" Fleamont asks, still worried about him, too. He's so terribly fond of Regulus.

Arthur nods. "Aberforth dropped him off just a bit ago, then left. Regulus has been by James' side ever since." He offers them a gentle smile as he gestures to the curtain they all stop at. "Go on, then. You're welcome to stay all night."

As if Euphemia was going to do anything else. She smiles and nods anyway, then shares a look with Fleamont as Arthur sweeps off to go help Molly. Swallowing, Euphemia eases the curtain open so they can slip inside.

The first thing she sees is Regulus sitting in a chair next to the bed, holding James' hand between both of his own, James' fingers pressed against his mouth. His gaze is locked on James with unwavering focus, and she follows it.

Oh.

Oh, her poor baby. Tears spring to her eyes almost instantly, and the only thing that keeps her from crying out is the fact that she was bracing for the worst. Somehow, it could be worse, but that doesn't take away from the fact that her son is lying in a bed, covered in bandages and burns. He just looks like he's in pain, even if he's sleeping right through. His face is slack, practically peaceful, despite everything.

Fleamont inhales sharply, and his hand finds hers, gripping tight. At the sound, Regulus' head snaps up. He looks at them, and his eyes are so very sad. It's heartbreaking. He's not crying now, but it's very apparent that he has been at some point.

"He's okay," Regulus says, his voice small and shaking just the slightest bit. "He's—he's going to be okay. They said he'd be much better tomorrow."

It's things such as this that will make sure Euphemia never forgets just how gentle of a man Regulus is. Look at him there, all torn up inside, and he softens himself as much as he can in the hopes that he can offer them a bit of solace. Those fears of his in the arena, that he and James are opposites and not well-suited; they're unfounded. Regulus and James are more alike than people realize, even in all their many differences. It's a beautiful thing to have, and Euphemia knows because she was fortunate enough to find that in Fleamont.

"We know," Fleamont says softly. "They told us."

Euphemia and Fleamont move closer to the bed, standing on the other side of it. James' other hand is wrapped in white bandages, likely burned there, but his wrist right above it is open and unharmed. She gently brushes her fingers over that warm space of skin, something in her easing and unclenching all at once as she feels the flutter of his pulse beneath.

Fleamont edges closer to the top of the bed. He moves so carefully, gingerly cupping the side of James' head to lean down and kiss his temple, then stays there. He closes his eyes and rests his forehead against James', just breathing.

"Have you seen Sirius?" Regulus asks hopefully.

"He's here," Euphemia assures him quietly. She starts to open her mouth, only to close it and cock her head at the sound of the doors opening in the distance. Her lips curl up. "Ah, I suspect that's him now. Go on, go see him. We'll be here with James until you both get back."

Regulus nods, because he knows as well as she does that they're all going to camp out at James' side until he wakes up. He moves towards the curtain, then pauses and looks back at them. As gentle as he is, he says, "Thank you."

"You have nothing to thank us for," Fleamont tells him, not pulling away from James. "We love you, Regulus."

"I know," Regulus replies, and that's all he says, but that alone says so much. He's never accepted their love before. He watches them and James for just a moment longer, and then he turns and slips out the curtain without another word.

Euphemia lets her eyes drift shut, breathing along to the feeling of James' steady pulse beneath her fingers.

Only Sirius could get Regulus to leave James' side. There's a harsh yearning bearing down on his chest, because he wants to see his brother again. Just know that he's here. Alive.

And then he is.

As soon as Regulus turns away from the curtain, Sirius is right there across the room, staring at him. Regulus feels like he's a small child again, for just a second, overcome by the simple elation of seeing Sirius, thinking of him as if he was the grandest thing this world had to offer, as if he was wiser and seconds away from adulthood when he was merely a child not even two full years older than him.

Before Regulus ever found the sun in James, Sirius was the brightest light he knew; his guiding star. Regulus would have followed him anywhere, to the ends of the earth and beyond, and he still will even now.

Maybe especially now.

It's easy, then, to move towards him now. Regulus wants to run, but he isn't the child he once was. Always a bit guarded even then, but now he's cautious with everything, especially the things he's scared most to lose. And this—Sirius, before him, within reach—he's terrified it'll dissolve like a mirage if he moves too fast and shatters the illusion.

Sirius is not smiling. His face is very still, and as Regulus inches slowly closer, he can see a blotchy spot of red crawling along Sirius' jaw. Closer, closer, and Regulus can see the film of tears forming in his eyes. Regulus' heart feels too big in his chest, taking up too much space, constricting with each careful step he takes. Closing the distance.

"Sirius?" Regulus rasps.

"Reggie," Sirius says. It comes out hoarse and choked, his face twitching before it crumbles altogether. A gasp escapes him, and then he's moving to meet Regulus halfway.

Regulus isn't at all prepared for Sirius to stumble right into his arms, collapsing into him like he's so tired of holding himself up and needs somewhere safe to fall into. He clings to Regulus and cries hard, fingers twisting in the back of his shirt, face pressed against his shoulder.

The thing is, Regulus recognizes this. It resonates with him, because he's usually on the other side of it. It's Regulus who always curls into the security Sirius offers, breaking down because he can trust Sirius to take care of all his broken pieces, if not put him all back together again. It's about the comfort one seeks, and Sirius is the strong one, the big brother, the one who never breaks and always offers the shoulder to cry on.

Sirius has never truly done this before, and Regulus is at first very alarmed, even frightened by it. He thinks something must be terribly wrong, and he doesn't know how to fix it, and he needs to fix it—but then Sirius slumps into him like he's giving in to letting himself be cradled and comforted for once, and Regulus realizes with a blooming warmth and simultaneous pain in his chest that Sirius has come to him for safety and security for the first time…maybe ever.

It's the most vulnerable Regulus has ever seen him, and he takes the care to wrap his arms around Sirius and hold his weight for him, and just hold him. Because he knows how it feels to need that, and because he knows how it feels to have that. Sirius is the one who taught him both, and it's through that lesson that Regulus knows how to return the favor.

He'd thought it would be him to fall into Sirius and break in the safest place he could, but he can be the strong one for once. He can be the protector. He can be safe. Little brother or not, he can. Sirius showed him exactly how.

"It's okay," Regulus whispers, feeling like something fractures in his chest and mends together all at once as he realises Sirius is holding onto him like Regulus is all he needs. "It's okay now, Sirius. It's okay. You're okay. I've got you. You're here, and I'm here. Me and you, remember?"

"I was—I was so—" Sirius hiccups a sob into Regulus' shoulder, clinging to him. "I'm sorry. I tried to be—I didn't want to be scared, but I was. The whole time, I was so fucking scared."

Regulus swallows harshly and wishes—oh, he really wishes—he had the words to reassure Sirius. He's not good at this, not good with any of it, because the truth is, he's been terrified this whole time, too.

So, that's what Regulus says. "Yeah, me too."

"M'sorry," Sirius mumbles, yet again.

"You don't—I don't know why you're apologizing," Regulus admits quietly. "I'm the one who made it out. I'm—Sirius, I'm sorry you didn't. I wanted—I tried to make them go back. All I wanted was—"

Sirius makes a disapproving sort of noise, peeling back a little to frown at him. "Hey, don't do that. You can't think I'd ever be upset you made it out over myself. Reggie, I always put you before me. Its you before me every time, okay?"

Regulus feels his throat close up, and he knows what Sirius said is not healthy. He knows he's supposed to tell Sirius not to do that, tell him he doesn't have to do that, tell him he shouldn't do that—but he can't force the words out, because he has missed Sirius so much, even this part that he's always resented. This part where Regulus is the source of everything that's ever gone wrong for him; the name called that he volunteered for, the one picked up before him which left him behind, the reason he tries not to be afraid and the reason he finds himself in situations where he has to be. Regulus has missed even this, and feels unwaveringly loved, and feels unwavering love in return. A complex, complicated thing, something broken and codependent at the same time, and Regulus wants to cradle it in careful hands and never let it go again.

"I wanted you here," Regulus chokes out. "We agreed we both deserved to get out. We—"

"Technically, I did get out," Sirius says weakly, then clicks his tongue when Regulus makes a fussy sort of noise in disagreement. "Okay, hey, I know what you mean. Trust me, I wanted to be here, too. Come here, let me look at you." He reaches up to grab Regulus' face, squishing his cheeks and rolling his head around to examine him critically. Regulus lets him do whatever the fuck he wants. "Doing okay?"

"Mm."

"You look like shit."

"Just modeling myself after you," Regulus murmurs.

Sirius stops rolling Regulus' head around and stares at him, and then he says, "Was that a joke?"

"Was it funny?" Regulus asks.

"No," Sirius replies, then laughs a little hysterically, and keeps laughing, and keeps laughing, and then he's not laughing at all, because he's crying again.

Regulus makes a strained noise, his stress spiking once more, every instinct in him screaming at him to fix it, to fix whatever is wrong. His arms come up a bit, almost instinctively, and Sirius falls into him just like before.

"I—I didn't—I'm sorry," is what tumbles out of Regulus' mouth, heart thumping hard in his chest. "I didn't mean it. You look—great."

Sirius laughs through his tears, words muffled into Regulus' shoulder as he wheezes, "You little shit, I've missed you. Oh, fuck, I really missed you."

"What can I do?" Regulus whispers, because he's trying, but he isn't sure he's getting this comforting thing right, and who better to ask than the person who does it best? "Sirius, tell me what to do."

"Just be here," Sirius rasps in something devastatingly close to a whimper. "Just be here with me, okay, Reggie? That's all I need you to do."

"Okay," Regulus says quietly, because he can do that, and really, he doesn't want to do anything else anyway. "It's okay. I'm here."

Sirius holds onto him for a long time, weeping like it's the most cathartic, comforting moment of his life, and Regulus stays there with him, doing all that he can, just as Sirius has always done for him.

They're okay, because they have each other. Here they are, holding onto this moment; two comforted, two comforting, two brothers.

Always brothers.

Chapter End Notes

okay so let's get into it!

from the top, we've got dorleneeeee <3 the way dorcas was waiting on marlene, she loves her so much. i adore them, yall have no idea!!! also that moment of marlene being like: We're Gonna Work On Your Issues. HELP MARLENE SAID BABE I DONT WANT TO FIX YOU BUT BY GOD SOMEONE'S GOTTA 😭 also we learned james got injured! yeah, i doubt anyone was expecting that lmaoooo. blindsided you all with that one, sorry not sorry. he's not doing too hot. or, well, he was, in fact, too hot...

sorry.

ahem, anyway, cut to lily!!! that was definitely a rough mission for her, that's for sure! the changes from how she was in the beginning, and from her first mission, to now is so fascinating to me. like, she has come so very far. also, her and bingley are so sweet. i love them so much. oh, and marylily!!!

okay, full disclosure, i didn't actually know that they were gonna kiss there. like i had it vaguely in my head that they'd agree to date/take things slow and eventually work up to a kiss and then more, but like. mary MEANT she was kissing lily. she wouldn't stand for anything else, and you know what? who am i to stand in her way? good for them 😌 sirius my beloved <3 the way he has no idea what's going on and he's just. he's very out of the loop and dealing with so much at once. we find out how he became immune—which, again, im not a doctor/scientist, so apologies for any inaccuracies, but it's a fake world and i make the rules, so ha. that whole moment of him not wanting remus to be used and kind of like...speaking FOR remus? it comes from a place of love/worry, and it's really good that remus spoke up and like, made that decision for himself.

also, that moment where sirius found out that he fought remus... yeah, not great 😬 he struggles with that A LOT, and like, he and remus have minor issues about it—rest assured, they'll talk about it and stuff, and it will be addressed more.

i doubt anyone expected the glasses quote to be from aberforth's pov. regulus clearly isn't doing well. all that trouble he had getting out of the bunker, and then he just. beat the shit out of everyone standing in his way to go climb a tree. it's like...well, why didn't he do that to start with? and the thing is, it's partially bc the whole phoenix was in a state of chaos after riddle gave the kill order, so there were less people to fight, and also partially because regulus wasn't even aware that he COULD. when he fought his way out, it was done in the mental state that he didn't care if he was killed or thrown in solitary on his way out, and he didn't care what the fallout of trying to leave would be.

but hey, aberforth to the rescue (again)! also the fact that regulus climbed a tree is doubly tragic when you remember the dreams he had where sirius and james were at the top, the view he was always trying to climb to and couldn't. needless to say, he was not doing well.

it unfortunately only got worse when he did see james again. like, yay, james is here! oh no, james is severely hurt. no one can catch a break 😭 effie and monty reuniting with sirius is so special to me <3 also them seeing james again!!! sad, yes, but he's there. they're all there :(

the sirius and regulus reunion. look, you all know by now how much of a mess they make me. i love them dearly. just the way sirius tried so hard to be strong, but he's been through so much, and the whole time, he was afraid. like the whole comfort thing of family, and just how he and regulus are still kinda unhealthy but they love each other so much, and they're TRYING. and regulus taking care of sirius, trying to be strong, just. god, they make me so emotional 😭

HONORABLE MENTIONS:

-marlene grinning because dorcas kissed her
-mary "yeah, okay, you got me" macdonald and lily "you turned me into a cliche" evans
-narcissa and sirius hugging <3
-aberforth thinking he's too old for this shit lmaooo
-sirius twirling effie in a hug 😭
-regulus accepting effie and monty's love <3
-remus not knowing he was immune and still risking his life and when sirius asks why he says "you were in there"
-regulus calling sirius ugly less than five minutes after he gets back and sirius crying 😭 (not really, sirius is just emotional, but it's still funny)
-regulus being comforting bc sirius taught him how :(

James is perched on a cloud, a very fluffy cloud, and there are so many people here with him. There is the mother, the father, the best friend, and the angel. Pretty, pretty angel. James tries to reach for the angel, because the angel is beautiful.

"James?" the angel murmurs.

"So beautiful," James tells the angel.

"That'll be the meds," says someone else, who has invaded his cloud. He does not know them, but they sound friendly. They also sound amused. James decides they can stay.

"James, honey, how are you feeling?" asks the mother.

"Look at him," the best friend announces, "he's clearly feeling fucking amazing at the moment."

"Oh," James gasps in utter delight when he finds out that he can, in fact, touch the angel. He stares in wonder as he glides his fingers gently along the angel's jaw. To him, it feels like ultraviolet sparks fizzling against his fingertips, and somehow someone is skipping rocks in the rippling lake that sits in his stomach. This is the best day of his life.

"Yeah, he's fine," the father says with a snort.

"Am I dead?" James asks in disbelief.

This displeases the angel, James thinks, because the angel frowns. "No, James, you're not dead."

"Oh," James says. "Are you visiting, then?"

"Visiting…?" The angel looks confused.

James blinks. "Um. Earth, I guess?"

It is a little confusing, James supposes. Where do angels come from? From heaven, or so they say, but where is that? A separate realm? In the sky? James' gut instinct says they come from outer space, celestial like the stars. Somehow, James knows this angel is a star.

"I don't know what that means," the angel mumbles. "I'm not visiting earth, James. I…live here."

"Oh, that's good. That's really good. You should stay here forever," James tells the angel earnestly.

"He's high," says the best friend. "Completely off his head. Of course he's not going to make sense."

"I am the smartest person on this cloud," James declares, then gently boops the angel's nose. He grins at the angel. "Except for maybe you, because you must have all the information ever invented. Pretty and smart. So pretty, so smart."

The angel turns a marvelous shade of red.

"I would like to commit blasphemy," James says, because in for a penny, in for a pound. What is the angel going to do? Smite him? No, somehow James knows the angel won't. Somehow, he knows the angel will hesitate to do so.

"James, we're going to start removing bandages now, okay?" asks the someone else he doesn't know, but is permitted entry to his cloud because they're nice.

"Are clouds on earth?" James muses, and then he yelps as the someone he doesn't know, but is permitted entry to his cloud because they're nice starts to peel away his strange skin, and maybe they're not so nice after all. "No! My skin!"

"James, these are bandages. It's not your skin."

"You're peeling off my skin."

"I promise you, I'm not. Do you feel any pain?"

"No, but it's my skin. Give it back and leave my cloud. I don't think you're very nice anymore."

"James," says the mother, soothing, "it's okay. Your, ah, skin needs to go away. You have better skin underneath."

James sends the mother an incredulous look. "It's my skin."

The best friend laughs. James would like to laugh with the best friend, because they always laugh together, but he doesn't see what's very funny about this. He feels that everyone on his cloud is not suitably horrified about what's happening right now. Do they have no regard for his skin? He looks at the angel desperately, in hopes the angel will take his side.

"It won't hurt," the angel informs him. "They need to get rid of it, and you're going to let them. Just relax."

James is displeased that the angel has not taken his side, so he frowns at the angel. Nonetheless, because the angel is an angel, James knows better to question any further. He sighs and lets his skin be peeled off. The angel was right, it doesn't hurt, and he even forgets it's happening when he lifts his hand to touch the angel again. The angel allows it.

"You're divine," James breathes out in awe, because the angel is literally divinity, and James gets to touch. Wow.

The angel's lips curl up, and the angel looks soft, as well as pleased. James is pretty sure he's going to woo the angel. That is blasphemy, isn't it? Well, it's worth the trip to hell.

"Alright, James," says the someone he doesn't know, but may or may not be permitted on his cloud because they may or may not be nice. "You're all done. See? That wasn't so bad. Now you're free to lay about all day and rest up good and proper."

"When will the medication wear off?" asks the father.

"Couple of hours. He'll likely sleep on and off until then."

"Ah, okay."

"Shame," the best friend says. "This is brilliant."

"Brilliant," James agrees, because the best friend is always right. He sweeps his fingers very carefully over the bridge of the angel's nose. "Wow. Just brilliant."

People on the cloud are laughing, and James likes the sound. It's like windchimes in his brain. Sweet and mystical to his ears. The angel is not laughing. The angel looks fond, but there is no laughter. James wants the angel to laugh. James bets the angel's laugh sounds like celestial harmonies.

"I have to tell you a joke," James says, and the angel blinks at him, then arches an eyebrow. "I need you to laugh."

"James—"

"What did the big flower say to the little flower?"

The angel glances over at the best friend, and the best friend is stifling laughter, and then the angel focuses on James again. The angel indulges him. "I don't know. What did the big flower say to the little flower?"

"Hey there, bud," James tells him, and the mother laughs, and the father laughs, and the best friend laughs, but the angel does not laugh. No, the angel only reaches up to grab his hand, gently pressing a smile to his knuckles. It's a small smile. Lips of an angel. Sweet. James wants to put his mouth on it, and stick his fingers in it, but he's also sad because the angel didn't laugh. "You were supposed to laugh. I told a flower joke. It was funny, and you like flowers."

"Mm." The angel's eyes drift shut. The angel is still smiling and cradling his hand. "Better luck next time."

"I'll keep trying."

"I know."

James sighs wistfully, letting his head drop back against the pillow, gazing up at the angel, enamored. The angel's eyes open, regarding him over his fingers, peering through pretty, pretty eyelashes. James smiles at the angel and risks being smited…smote? Risks certain death at the hands of an angel, in any case, by twitching his finger up, unfurling it slowly to trace the angel's bottom lip. The angel does not beam him with celestial grace and turn him to ash. The angel just looks at him, watching, and allows it.

James keeps looking at the angel, because the angel is very beautiful, and he doesn't want to look away. But his eyes are getting heavy, and with each blink, the cloud seems to wrap around him more and drag him under. His finger slows against the angel's lip, and he frowns. He doesn't want to go away; he wants to be with the angel. Maybe the angel will remain even when he goes away and comes back. Oh, James hopes so.

"You'll stay, right?" James mumbles.

"I'll stay," promises the angel, and James believes the promise, because James looks into the angel's eyes and knows the angel means the promise and isn't being a sneaky little liar.

James smiles, pleased. "I'm going to keep you."

The angel finally, finally, finally laughs, and it has special angel powers to make James' chest go warm. It sounds like a gentle jingle, a tinkling bell, and it's the last thing James hears before he happily falls off into dreams of a knitted hat with the angel's laughter trapped inside.

Remus sneaks into the infirmary to see James.

Well, sneaks is a bit of a strong word. What he really does is march right in, and he's ultimately surprised to find James wide awake and entirely alone, other than Regulus, who is conked out and draped over the side of the bed. He's obviously sleeping deeply, and James is just—gazing at him. The look on his face is so fucking tender. Adoring. Loving. Soft.

When James looks up and notices him, his entire face lights up, splitting into a smile. It takes about ten seconds of Remus not returning the smile for James' to fade.

"Oh," James says quietly. "Right, you're—angry at me."

"Where's Sirius?" Remus asks, flicking his gaze around, eyebrows drawing together. "Where are your parents?"

James clears his throat. "Ah, well, I made them leave. Kicked them all out. They needed to eat, and they've been cooped up in here since yesterday."

"They actually went?"

"It was a fight. I almost cried, so I ended up winning."

"Ah, the ultimate weapon." Remus snorts and shakes his head, then moves over and sits down in the chair next to Regulus, sighing as he looks over at him. He's sleeping so hard that his mouth is slack. Even asleep, his eyebrows are scrunched together, almost like he's still scowling at everything.

"I've had some visitors," James murmurs. When Remus looks up, he drops his gaze. "I knew you'd be along eventually."

Remus stares at him, waiting for him to finally look up, and then he asks, bluntly, "Why didn't you get in the van?"

James grimaces.

Yeah, that's about what Remus expected. Some part of him already knows, and maybe that's why he never asked Dorcas, because he didn't have to. Effie said James chose to stay in the Hallow—and he did. Remus was there; he saw James make the deliberate decision to do that, and he doesn't need three guesses to figure out why, but he wants James to say it.

"Honestly?" James croaks. Remus nods. "I wasn't in the right state of mind to go making decisions like I did. Once Frank died, it—it was like this pressure was on my chest, and I couldn't breathe. I couldn't carry it, Remus. I messed up, and something bad happened, so I—I wanted to do something good. I thought—" He tips his head back, eyes slipping shut as he exhales heavily. "This was foolish of me, but I thought I could do it. Not just for you and Regulus, but for me, too. I really thought I'd get him out, and then it'd all be okay."

"So, you knew, then," Remus replies, his tone level, despite the spike of pure fury that rushes through him. James opens his eyes and looks at him, swallowing. "You knew Sirius hadn't made it out. You knew when you shut me in that van."

"Yes," James whispers.

"You know, James, I—" Remus stops, and a brittle laugh escapes him. "The thing that pisses me off the most is that I would have done the same thing. Verbatim. I wouldn't have told you, I would have made sure you got out, and I would have tried to save Sirius. Do you know what's so infuriating about that? It's that I understand why you did it, but it still makes me angry because I didn't even get the choice; you made sure I didn't get the freedom to choose."

"Remus," James chokes out, "I'm sorry. I—"

"And the worst part is," Remus cuts in, "it had to be you. It couldn't be anyone else, it couldn't be me, because Riddle would have just killed me and found some way to make Sirius do what he made you do. You were the best outcome in all of that, and now we're all here, and we're all safe—and I'm still so fucking angry at you, James."

"I know, I know, you have every right to be," James says, his voice tight like he's trying not to cry. "It was wrong. I know I made a mistake. I've made so many now, Remus. You don't have to forgive me, but I'm sorry. I'm so sorry."

Remus sighs, glancing down at Regulus. It's a good thing he's not awake, is all Remus can think. He'd lose his fucking mind if he knew Remus currently has James on the verge of tears.

It's a pretty shit thing to do, isn't it?

And, like this, Remus isn't really all that angry, as it turns out. Maybe he just needed to hear James say it, all of it, and say sorry. Maybe he just needed to say what he did, out loud, just to feel more real. A person with feelings. A person who deserves the freedom to express those emotions, and then work through them when it's necessary.

Slowly, methodically, he works through them. Feels them. Breathes every time Regulus does, matching the sleep-soft melody of it, letting it lull him, and calm him. Thinks about how James did what Remus would have, what any of them would have, what Lily would have for Remus six years ago, what Remus did himself for her six years ago.

James nearly died. Almost, almost, almost. Too close. He was in a horrible state of mind, grieving and terrified, and trying. He's always trying, isn't he? Remus cares about him so fiercely, one of the few people he formed a deep connection to in the Hallow, and look at all they've been through. James helped him get out. James insisted on it. All these things bounce around in Remus' mind, and he lets them until they settle.

Remus sighs again and meets James' teary gaze. "Friends do this sometimes, I've learned. It comes from a place of love, because we care about each other. You wouldn't leave me behind, and you couldn't leave him behind. I would have done the same thing; I pretty much did, for Lily. The very thing that got me imprisoned in the Hallow busted me out. I understand, James. There's nothing to forgive, but I forgive you anyway."

"I do love you, you know," James tells him earnestly, his eyebrows pinched together. "I really do."

"I know." Remus huffs a weak laugh. "Because Sirius does."

James frowns at him. "I mean, sure, but Sirius also doesn't really have that much to do with it. I love you because you're you. And you—you're my friend, Remus. One of my best friends, honestly, at this point."

"Yeah, James, I know. Me too," Remus murmurs, his lips curling up, admittedly warmed by the ease in which James extends affection and friendship. He's been like this from the very beginning. Some things really never do change.

"Remus?" James says softly.

"Yeah?" Remus asks.

"Why did you come back for me?" James looks at him, studies his face, something gentle in his gaze. "You could have died coming back for me."

Remus could say it was guilt. He could say it was to prove a point. He could say he just wanted to do the right thing. But, in the end, he looks James in the eye and says the truth.

"I couldn't bear the thought of leaving you behind."

The first thing Regulus registers is a gentle caress down the line of his nose, so soft he wouldn't even feel it if he wasn't slowly becoming aware, finding his way to being awake.

Perhaps it's wildly inexplicable, but Regulus knows James by even just the very tip of his finger. He knows it's James ever so gently stroking his nose, the touch simultaneously too curious and reverent to be anyone else, and the pads of James' fingers are entirely unique in their own special shape and texture, which Regulus may or may not have memorized, literally.

Regulus imagines that James is still heavily medicated. While on the prescribed drugs, he has been delighted by basically everything and seems to have little to no grasp on what's going on around him at any given moment, but what he does know, apparently, is that he's obsessed with Regulus, especially touching Regulus as much as he can get away with.

Honestly, Regulus is stupidly pleased by that.

The infirmary is oddly quiet. He didn't mean to fall asleep, really, but he has hardly slept lately—and if he does, it's never good sleep—and he couldn't sleep last night until he actually saw James get visibly better. Not fully healed, even now, but his injuries have definitely made exceptional progress through the night and the morning, so maybe Regulus finally, finally, finally let himself rest—or, maybe James was sleeping, and Regulus' blinks as he gazed at his face got too spaced apart, and he literally couldn't hold his eyes open anymore. Who's to know? The details are fuzzy and unclear even to him. All he knows is that he didn't dream, not even to have a nightmare.

He did stay up to talk to Sirius about the mission, and about Remus. Sirius told him what he did, all of it, how he went in to get Sirius and how he went back to get James, refusing to leave either of them behind. Sirius is distinctly displeased with Remus at the moment, which Regulus finds rather stupid, but he's just so grateful that Sirius is here that he didn't even bother risking getting into an argument with him, not so soon.

All Regulus wants to do, really, is bask in having them all here, safe and sound, with him. It's ridiculous, considering how he was a mere year ago, but he wants to touch everyone, just to know that they're alive. For the longest time, he'd planted his chair right next to Sirius' so he could make sure their elbows were knocking and their arms were touching. It's his brother. A little bedraggled and jumpy, more vulnerable than he's ever been, but his brother all the same.

In any case, Regulus is sure Remus and Sirius will work out whatever their issues are at the moment. It's been weeks of pure hell for all of them, so he doesn't doubt that they're all going to succumb to the temptation of comfort and unity sooner rather than later. They've all been through a lot, and they should get to rest now. Regulus wants to rest now.

At some point, Sirius, Effie, and Monty must have left. That makes no sense, because Regulus can't fathom why any of them would have left James' side so soon.

It causes Regulus' eyebrow to furrow, his rising concern and weary paranoia dragging him awake, face scrunching as James' finger slides up to caress the wrinkle between his eyebrows. Regulus' eyes flutter open, and he blinks slowly, fighting a yawn as the world swims into focus.

Regulus doesn't remember leaning over to rest his head on the bed James is in, but apparently he did, because that's where he wakes up. He's down by James' hip, one of his hands resting on his leg, the other tangled loosely with James' free hand. His face is tilted towards James, so the first thing he sees is James looking down at him with a small smile, entirely lucid.

"And he finally wakes," James murmurs, his finger gently smoothing over his right eyebrow.

Regulus pops up, jolting in place and slamming his elbow into the rail on the side of the bed. "Shit. Ow."

"Oh, did that hurt?" James asks, leaning forward slightly, reaching away from Regulus' face to cup his elbow, rubbing gently. "Funny bone, they call it. Not so funny when you slam it into something, though, is it?"

"You're awake," Regulus says stupidly. "Like, properly."

"Mhm," James confirms.

Regulus blinks at him, then looks around. "Where's—"

"I ran them all off. Made them go away," James tells him, lips twitching. "I'm not actually released yet, but I'm fine, so I made everyone else go. I wouldn't let anyone wake you, though. You were sleeping so deeply; it seemed like you needed it, and I guess I just wanted to be alone with you for a bit."

"What?" Regulus says stupidly, yet again, just staring at James.

James smiles, gaze warm, glasses gone. "We're alone, love."

Regulus isn't really sure why that gets to him, but it does. James is here. James is right here, looking at him, talking to him, smiling at him, calling him love, alive and safe and maybe not at his physical best while still healing, but okay. He's okay, and he's here; so close, and finally, close enough.

Regulus doesn't think he's scrambled up on a bed so fast in his life, genuinely just climbing right onto it with no warning. James doesn't seem startled, at least. If he wasn't expecting it, he was clearly hoping for it, because his arms open up, and he's dragging Regulus close as Regulus frantically crawls up to him with no finesse whatsoever.

It's in the back of Regulus' mind to be gentle with James, to not hurt him, but all inhibitions fly out the window the second James starts tugging on him, blatantly and shamelessly trying to get him as close as he can get. Maybe it's supposed to be this seamless sort of reunion where they click into place, but it's not. It's a messy collision, much like them, all elbows and fumbling fingers, and James makes a horrible gasping noise like a man coming up for air and choking on it, and he's crying before Regulus can properly hold him; it's awful, it's all so awful, and it's the best thing Regulus has ever felt.

"Shh, shh, it's okay," Regulus croaks. He finally, thankfully manages to get his arms around James' shoulders, tugging on him, encouraging him to fall into Regulus' chest and stay there, hide there if he needs to, remain safe there for as long as he seeks the refuge. "James, it's okay. Shh, it's okay."

James digs his face into Regulus' chest, his shoulders hitching under Regulus' hands, a shudder rippling through him. His tears seem dry; the scratchy, raw sort of sobs that Regulus knows feels like sandpaper in your lungs. Pain that burns where it is; pain that burns on its way out.

"I was trying—I wanted this to be—" James chokes off, shaking his head against Regulus' chest. Regulus cups the curve of his skull, fingers delving into hair, and he could cry from the relief of getting to feel it again. James clings to him, hands fisting the back of his shirt. "I didn't—Reg, I didn't want it to be like this. I'm so—"

"James, it's okay," Regulus insists, because it is, because James doesn't have to pretend to be alright for his sake. Goodness knows Regulus never managed that himself, and he's too tired to make those foolish attempts anymore. He won't stand for James thinking he has to make that attempt at all.

"I don't know why I'm—" James groans, sagging against him, just deflating at once. He sniffles. "I'm—I swear I'm so happy to see you, so happy you're here, I'm just—"

"I know, I know, it's okay," Regulus murmurs, squeezing his eyes shut and rocking him a little, letting them sway back and forth like that, letting it soothe them. "I promise it's okay."

"I missed you," James whispers, his words muffled.

Regulus is pretty sure his chest caves in. He can practically feel the three fractures that splinter out from the center, one for each word. I missed you; one fragment, two fragments, then three. He aches with it, because it's—well, it's the longest that he and James have gone without seeing each other. Even back when they never spoke, and Regulus was waltzing around like a fool, wasting time believing he hated him; even then, they still saw each other every day, even just in passing, even just a stolen glance they rarely took at the same time, but always there, so close, only just missing each other.

"I'm here now," Regulus whispers back.

James exhales heavily, hot breath pressing against Regulus' shirt, pooling through the fabric to warm his skin. Slowly, James tilts his head back and peers up at him, hunched in over on himself. His eyes are open, watery and bloodshot, rimmed with red. No contacts. No glasses.

"Did you miss me?" James mumbles.

"Not for a second," Regulus lies, and James sobs out a laugh, eyes welling up again until he's crying and smiling through the tears, shaky hands lifting to frame Regulus' face, gazing up at him with no shame for how his chin wrinkles and his lip wobbles and his tears fall.

"Liar," James rasps.

Regulus nods and leans in to press his forehead to James', eyes drifting shut. He breathes, and breathes, then breathes out a soft, "Yeah. Yeah, I am. It was every second. I missed you every single second. At all times, baby, at all times."

James makes a helpless, muffled noise and tilts forward to press his face into Regulus' throat. Like this, hunched over as he is, James almost seems small. He feels small in Regulus' arms, like he's trying to fold into himself so all of him will fit. Regulus grips him as securely as possible, wishing he had more arms just so he could gather more of James to hold.

"I thought you'd be angry with me," James mumbles, and Regulus' eyes snap open just so he can blink in sheer disbelief. He pulls back to stare down at him incredulously, and James swallows. "Because I—I chose to stay. I—do you know? Regulus, I...knew you were here, and I still—I—"

"James," Regulus cuts in, holding his gaze, "did I not do the same thing when I went into the arena in the hopes that Sirius would kill me and win? That was my original plan, and believe me, it wasn't about leaving you; it was about what I thought you needed, and what I needed, and just—Sirius. Loving Sirius."

"I love him so much," James chokes out.

Regulus nods. "I know. I'm not angry with you for that anymore."

"I love you, too," James whispers fiercely. "I'm so in love with you. Part of the reason I stayed was for you, because he's—he's your brother, and I just—I saw you in the arena, you know, when—" James stops, his face falling slack, and Regulus goes tense instantly when he realizes just how many things actually sit between them now; the changes, the experiences they've been through, what they saw of each other and what they didn't. James exhales shakily. "Your boggart. Your—it was—"

"James—"

"It was me."

"James," Regulus protests weakly.

James is breathing all out of order, thin and shaky, and he's a little wild-eyed. "It's not true. Not a fucking word that was said there with my mouth was true, Reg. I couldn't bear to lose you, and no one—I promise you, no one would be better off with you. If I lost you, I'd look for you forever. You're not rot, love, and you're the most beautiful thing this world has to offer. I would never—I wouldn't—"

"James, it's—stop, it's okay, I know," Regulus cuts in as James' chest stutters on his inhale. "I know it wasn't real. I know it wasn't you. It couldn't be, because you're good, and it wasn't."

"I'm—" James almost seems to release a whine. "I don't know that I'm good, though. I—I try to be, but I just—I made things worse, and—and no matter what I did, it was like—"

"Like you couldn't do anything right?" Regulus asks softly, and James' shoulders jerk as he nods. Regulus sighs. "Welcome to my life. That's pretty much how I feel...all the time. Like a constant failure, and it's—it makes it more difficult to entertain the thought of trying at all. But it's not something only I experience, I'm learning. All humans make mistakes. You're human, James. The most human human I know. And such a good one. The best, in my opinion."

"It's my fault Frank is dead," James whimpers. His eyes shine. "I didn't mean to. I swear I didn't mean to. I only wanted to do the right thing. I was just trying—"

"Don't do that," Regulus replies softly. "I've talked to Rodolphus, and listen, I know where you're going with this, okay? But no, it's not that simple. Bad things happen no matter what we do; that doesn't make you a bad person. You're not a bad person, James."

James collapses forward with a horrible, harrowing noise crawling from what sounds like the very depths of him, raw and scratchy and desperate. He folds into Regulus and stays there, trying to shrink himself down and fit with him, and Regulus holds him, eyes closed, faced pressed into James' hair. He feels him stop crying, slowly. He feels him breathe. Regulus is so glad that James breathes.

They stay there together like that for a long time, and though the setting is different, it feels so much like their first meeting after their arena that it's almost as if they're back there, or as if perhaps that moment has always existed, then and now and later, there and here and anywhere. Regulus basks in it, in this, and it doesn't matter how hard things have been; nothing matters other than this, not anymore, not ever again.

The ruffle of a curtain and a soft gasp makes Regulus tense up as his head whips around. If looks could kill, Molly would be dead ten times over, and it would be a very gruesome death. She stares at them with wide eyes, pink-cheeked, bashful.

"Get out," Regulus snaps.

James swats his hip gently. "Be nice." He clears his throat and lifts his head. "Hi, Molly. Please ignore him. He's just—like that. What can we… Um, what can I do for you?"

"Actually, it's what I could do for you." Molly clears her throat and carefully edges her way inside, side-eyeing Regulus like he might pounce at a moment's notice. Don't tempt him. "I'm glad I caught you while you were still here. I, um. Well, I hope you don't mind, but I thought you might appreciate this, so…"

"Oh," James says softly, when his gaze lands on the glasses Molly holds out to him. Regulus holds his breath while staring at them, because they look just like James' old pair. "I—um, thank you, Molly, I just… I don't—" He swallows harshly and looks almost…ashamed? He can't seem to meet Regulus' gaze with his own. "I mean, I—I do appreciate it, or the thought, but they—they, um, fixed my eyesight in the Hallow. I didn't… I never asked them to. They just…did it."

"The lenses are plain, James. Nothing to help your eyes, or strain them," Molly murmurs. "Regulus said you really need them, like they're important to you, so I may have…put a rush order on replacing them for you. Go with or without them, the choice is yours, but you should have the choice."

James' gaze snaps up to hers, and Regulus' heart clenches at the immediate flood of relief that steals over his face. He looks due for crying again, and Regulus remembers. He can never forget the way James said they couldn't change who he was, not really, but they've done their absolute best to. They've altered him, his very body, without his permission. It's invasive and cruel, and it makes Regulus want to gouge out Riddle's eyeballs for suitable retribution, see how he likes it, the fucking piece of shit. Oh, Regulus could dig his thumbs into Riddle's eyes and just—he could just—

"Thank you," James says, interrupting Regulus' internal tirade of violence. "Really, Molly, thank you."

Molly passes the glasses over with a small smile, then sighs and gives them both a tiny shrug. "I've found that Riddle does his best to take what's important from us all, but what he fails to realize is that what's important will always be important. You two were—" She halts, then takes a deep breath. "You two were very important to Fabian and Gideon. My brothers. And now, through them, you're very important to me. That's what Riddle doesn't understand. What's important will always remain so if we make the choice to let it."

"They were important to us, too," James tells her, as earnest as he's always been. "And, through them, so are you. I'm—I'm very sorry for what happened to them, Molly."

"You were there," Molly whispers, fingers nervously tangling together in front of her stomach. She pulls at a loose thread and flicks her gaze between them. "When they… You were there in their last moments."

"Yes," Regulus confirms, so James doesn't have to.

Molly swallows. "Did they suffer?"

"No," Regulus lies. Again, he does it so James doesn't have to. James isn't the best liar, never has been, but sometimes lying can be a kindness. "No, Molly, they didn't suffer."

Maybe that's not what someone would say if they wanted to incite vengeance within someone. If Regulus were aiming to give Molly further reason to seek revenge, to throw herself into war in the name of her brothers, he would tell her that they were brutally beaten and died in pain. But Regulus has seen Molly with Arthur, seen the shared warmth and simple love between them, so easily bulldozed by the draw of violence waiting on the other side of the truth, and so he lies. Regulus lies so that she may have peace; what a concept, peace in the midst of war. Someone should get to have that, at least.

If it were him, if it were his brother, he would want the truth; he would want to give into the bloodthirsty need to make someone, anyone, everyone pay for it. But, the sad truth is, doing that wouldn't bring him peace. He's learning. He's finally getting it. Revenge achieves nothing; at the end, what hurts will still hurt, and you're no closer to peace than you were at the start. But Molly? She's close. Even grieving as she is, still, she's so much closer, and Regulus will make the selfish and perhaps kind decision not to pull her away from that.

He sees it there in the glimmer of tears in her eyes, the way her shoulders shift, like a weight has lifted and dropped down simultaneously. Grief never goes away; that's a burden to bear for as long as you live when someone you love doesn't. She'll never be free of that, but she can find peace anyway. It's there. It's within her grasp, and Regulus hopes wherever Gideon and Fabian are, they know she's okay. That she will be.

"Thank you," Molly says thickly, blinking hard and clearing her throat. She gives them a watery smile and nods. "Right, well, I'll be on my way. If you two ever need anything…"

"You too, Molly," James murmurs. "Anything at all."

Molly leaves after that, sniffling as she goes, and Regulus turns to find James looking at him. It's a searching look, studying him. Regulus resists the urge to fidget under his gaze.

"What?" Regulus mumbles.

James' mouth curves up at one side. "Nothing, just…that was kind of you."

"Yeah, maybe, but it was also unfair of me to do."

"I don't think so."

Regulus huffs a weak laugh. "Yes, well, you wouldn't."

"What's that supposed to mean?"

"You see the best in people. In me."

"Not that hard to notice." James smiles at him, a crooked thing, warm. "Impossible to miss, really."

"Debatable," Regulus says, and James opens his mouth like he's about to argue, because of course he is, because of course he would, but Regulus shakes his head. He reaches out and taps the corner of the frame of the glasses, held folded in James' loose grip. "So, what will you choose?"

James glances down at them, eyebrows furrowed. After a beat, he looks back up. "You like my glasses."

"I do," Regulus admits. "Believe it or not, I just so happen to like you even more, with or without them. Don't wear them for me, James. Wear them for you, if you want to."

"I know it might seem stupid, but they—they helped me with the timeline before," James confesses, and Regulus nods, because he remembers James telling him that. "My glasses and my cane help me get my bearings, but now so much has happened, and it's all—it gets a bit confusing, honestly."

"So they don't help anymore?"

"Maybe with some more time to adjust, they will. But that's not all my glasses do. I mean, I've worn them my whole life. I've needed them, and it feels—it makes me uncomfortable that I don't anymore. But they—they help me feel separate from the Hallow, does that make sense?"

"They always took your glasses from you," Regulus murmurs.

"Yeah," James replies. "I want them back. I want—I want to need them again. And I never will."

Regulus reaches down gently and takes the glasses, carefully unfolding them and slowly sliding them onto James' face. They sit as they have always sat, looking the exact same. Regulus gets a heart flutter just looking at him. James swallows harshly, lips parting around a deep exhale.

"Do you feel better wearing them?" Regulus asks.

"Yes," James whispers.

Regulus smiles. "Then you need them."

James gazes up at him with such wonder, such reverence, that maybe Regulus should see it coming, what happens next. Yet, for some reason, it takes him wholly by surprise. Just the quick slip of James' hand around the back of his neck, tugging him down, and then Regulus is being kissed.

Regulus hasn't left the infirmary, so he hasn't brushed his teeth. James probably hasn't had the chance to use a toothbrush either. Both of their mouths are stale, and it doesn't matter. They're not kissing with tongue. It's just lips against lips, pressed together, a warm weight. It's likely the tamest they've ever kissed, and they've certainly kissed in filthier conditions, tongue-and-all, but this one. This is the one. Oh, yes, this one fills Regulus with so much warmth and love that he can feel it tingling in his very fingertips.

James pulls away just to peck him again, then kisses each corner of his mouth, then along his jaw, his cheek, wherever he can reach. Smothering him in soft, quick kisses that makes Regulus want to squirm and laugh, so he does, warm from his hair to his toes. His face is warmest of all.

"James, James," Regulus gasps out through laughter, desperate now to speak, to say something so devastatingly important he feared he would never get to say again. "Stop, hold on, just—James, would you—"

"Listen at you," James mumbles, chuckling. "I've never heard you laugh so much. It's lovely. You're lovely."

"I love you," is what spills out of Regulus' mouth next, coasting out on what sounds like a breathless giggle, but no less sincere for it. James stops. He just stops, then pulls back to look at him, lips parted. Regulus reaches up to cradle his face, staring into his eyes. Those pretty eyes of his. "I love you, James. I loved you from the start, I love you now, and I'll love you for as long as love is something that exists—and, if it ever stops existing, I'll reinvent it just for you."

James bites down on his lip, then licks them, eyes bright. He exhales shakily, nodding. "Okay. Yeah, okay. I—well, you see, I'm trying not to—" His voice cracks, so he clears his throat with effort. "I'm trying not to cry, and I have to say, love, you're making that very difficult at the moment."

"I'd apologize, except I'm not actually sorry. I mean it, James. I love you so much," Regulus murmurs.

"Fucking hell," James breathes out, "are you—so you'll just be saying that all the time, then? Is that—it's a thing now?"

"Well, I'm trying not to lie to you anymore," Regulus admits, lips curling up. "Telling the truth is a good place to start."

James groans and tips his head forward, leaning into him, holding on. Regulus cards his fingers through James' hair and whispers the truth in his ear over and over, saying it and saying it and saying it. Feeling it. Letting himself feel it.

I love you, I love you, I love you. He does, and he does, and he does. Love as a verb, because it's something you do. Regulus is doing it. He's been doing it for a long time. Maybe not in the best way throughout, not always, but doing it all the same.

He's going to keep doing it, too, and get better at it all the while. He'll try and try and try, and that's enough.

For both of them, from both of them, that's enough.

Remus is not having a very good day, despite the rather healing conversation he had with James earlier.

Lily is mad at him. Well, she's been mad at him pretty much ever since he ran into the room full of biological warfare, and she's doubly mad at him for running into gunfire and smoke because he refused to leave James behind, and he gets her anger. He really does. They've only just gotten each other back, and to come so close to the realization that they could easily lose each other again is infuriating, likely even more so for her, because he was the one who was taking insane risks.

He really does get it, because he was sort of mad at James for the same thing, in a way. And, sure, Lily sat all of that aside while on the mission, but they're back now, and she's pissed.

"What were you thinking?" Lily had hissed at him.

"I wasn't," Remus had confessed.

Lily's voice had been so cold when she said, "Yeah, you never fucking do, do you?"

In any case, her anger only got worse when she found out that he was planning to let Dumbledore use his blood, in the same line of thinking about Sirius on the whole matter. He knows it comes from a place of love, worrying about him, but there is a bigger picture here. If he can help make sure more people won't be slaughtered at Riddle's hands, he has to do that. It doesn't matter if he's afraid, if the mere idea of being yet another experiment makes him feel sick, because he could help people. Children, innocents, the very people he loves.

It seemed to soothe Lily a bit that she was allowed to put the limit on how much blood he can donate. She put her foot down and said that he can only give one pint every eight weeks, but he can give a small sample of his blood as needed, though no more than three times in a week. Remus thinks this is a little extreme, but she went on about red blood cells and how long it takes them to regenerate, along with other medical science stuff that he didn't argue with her about.

However, by estimate, one pint of his blood is five hundred milliliters, and it can be used in two milliliter injections to give immunity to around two hundred and fifty people.

Despite everything, Remus can't help but feel that there's something really special about that. He also put his foot down and told Dumbledore that all the children in the Phoenix have to be immunized first, along with all the freed servants, the rescued tributes and those that went in to break them out, everyone from district six, and those that escaped the Hallow. After that—and only after that—can Dumbledore use it however he sees fit, on whoever he sees fit, including himself.

That probably only leaves approximately one hundred people, at most, but Remus is the one giving his blood, so he demands to have some say in how it's used, just this much at least. The children will be safe. Those he loves will be safe. Those who have already suffered because of Riddle will be safe. Maybe it makes Remus selfish to demand that, maybe it doesn't, but he honestly doesn't give a shit either way. In the end, Dumbledore agreed to his terms, so that's that.

Remus is set to give his donation later in the week, and he's admittedly nervous about it. Lily has already stated that she'll be there, but she's ignoring him otherwise because she's pissed at him. The thing is, she's not the only one.

Sirius is mad at him, too.

On one hand, Remus gets it, because he knows it's not just that. Remus knows it's really just anger Sirius feels for himself. It's that Sirius hurt him. It wasn't his fault, and they all ended up okay in the end, but of course Sirius isn't going to see it that way. He's blaming himself, because of course he is.

Remus wants to fucking scream, because it's not fair, because he doesn't want it to be like this. He wants to wrap his arms around Sirius, run his hands through Sirius' hair, breathe him in and keep him close and never let him go. It's been too long; Remus has spent too long worrying about him, missing him, wanting so badly to have him close again.

He's here, is the thing. Remus doesn't think Sirius wants to see him, and Remus also doesn't care. He's just going to have to get over it. Remus didn't spend fucking weeks missing him, lost without him, just for him to get back and be stubborn enough, after everything, to run away from their something.

No. Fuck that. They're not going to do that.

Remus can be wrong, as it turns out. Tragically inevitable and woefully pointless, he called them, and maybe he was right at the time he said it, maybe that's how they started out, but he'll be damned if that's all they'll ever be.

The proper thing to do here, what Remus should do, is let Sirius have more than one night to adjust, maybe give him a little space, let him cool down and get his bearings. The only thing is, Remus has never been very good at being proper or doing what he should, has he? Hm, let's reframe that, here and now. Make it positive. What it is, really, is that Remus is very good at doing what he shouldn't in an improper manner, and you know what? Good for him. It's a skill, at this point.

So, naturally, Remus hunts Sirius down.

Sirius is somewhere in this bunker, and Remus knows he won't be far away from Effie and Monty. Of course not, and he isn't. He's practically right up under them in the Great Hall, sitting beside them with Narcissa on the other side of the table.

For a beat, Remus hesitates to come closer. For one thing, Remus hasn't really interacted with Narcissa, specifically, because—well, ah, he killed her husband. He knows that Sirius once said she had no love for Lucius, but still. Honestly, it's less cowardice that keeps him from telling her it was him, because—if Sirius is to be believed—she likely won't care or might even thank him; no, it's more that he might have to revisit it, what he did, and have to acknowledge that he feels exactly zero remorse about it whatsoever.

All around him, people are murderers—through war, through self-defense, through survival. It weighs on them, despite their reasons. Remus? Even without reason, it doesn't weigh on him at all. He doesn't have nightmares about that, killing Lucius or Greyback, and he doubts he'll have nightmares about any of the others he killed on the most recent mission; he didn't last night, in any case. When it comes to what he feels about being a killer, he feels—nothing. Absolutely nothing.

His nightmares are riddled with his own torture, the loss of his mother, of Lily, Sirius, James, his dad. Getting whipped, his scars splitting back open and swallowing him whole. The empty eyes of Hallow servants. The cold of Azkaban. The chair on the lower levels and the mask strapped to his face.

Sometimes, Remus thinks that being a servant really fucked him up. All the experiments. All the torture. Because while he knows that killing is the worst thing he's ever done, he never quite feels bad about doing it. He probably should. A lot of people do, here. Sirius does.

But, the thing is, Remus has suffered at the hands of people who wanted him to suffer, and he knows the difference between someone who does what they have to, and someone who does what they want to. He knows it intimately. It's a different perspective, and in war, murder is commonplace. Remus thinks that he's been in war his whole life, ever since Greyback came into it.

It infuriates Remus to think about the mark that man left on him, on his life, how he shaped it, and how he shaped him. Somewhere out there, long ago, there might have been a softer Remus, one who didn't dive head-first into chaos and violence, one who never had to to survive, one who would feel remorse for the blood staining his hands. But they whipped that out of him. But it died with his mother. But it was muzzled like a dog and left to snarl and foam at the mouth, defiance building until he never misses a chance to bite. But they silenced it, and he has found his voice, and now, now they hear him scream.

So, no, Remus doesn't want to revisit it, or talk about it, or think about it. He doesn't want to be a killer, but he doesn't care that he is, and maybe he should. But he has seen worse things, experienced worse things, and those weigh on him more than murder ever could. Maybe someday, when this is all over and he's just an old man, he'll look back and feel the remorse he should now. He welcomes the thought, because he knows that will mean the war is over.

But, for now, the war is still waging, and he's remorseless. Maybe he's selfish, too. Desperate. Because all he wants is Sirius, right now. So, despite Narcissa's proximity, and despite how sure he is that Sirius is avoiding him, Remus marches right up to him anyway.

"Sirius," Remus says firmly, and all heads swing towards him immediately. Sirius' relaxed expression goes tense, and Remus resists the urge to grind his teeth. "Can we talk?"

"I'm busy," Sirius replies shortly.

"Okay, allow me to rephrase," Remus corrects. "We need to talk."

Sirius huffs. "Oh, is that right?"

"I mean, we can do this here in front of an audience if you like," Remus says, raising his eyebrows.

"Oh, fuck you," Sirius mutters.

"No, that we can't do in front of an audience," Remus drawls, and something in his chest goes warm when Sirius' face starts to turn red. Oh, that blush. There it is.

Effie proceeds to burst out laughing, then claps a hand over her mouth like she's done something unforgivable. Sirius looks betrayed instantly, only more so when Monty goes into a coughing fit, trying to cover his own laughter. Narcissa's lips curl up at the corners, amused.

Sirius glares at him. "I don't find you funny."

"Shall I tell another sex joke, or…?"

"Have you no shame?"

Remus arches an eyebrow, which is all it takes for Sirius' blush to come back in full force and spread. Monty is practically wheezing at this point, and Effie has buried her face in her arms. Narcissa is grinning now, looking very entertained. It's not every day that people get to see Sirius turn as red as a tomato, Remus thinks, which is a shame. It's truly a sight to behold. Remus has missed it so much.

With a disgruntled sound, Sirius bolts to his feet, grumbling that he'll be back soon enough, complaining under his breath as he follows Remus along. He stays one step behind him the whole way, refusing to come too close, arms crossed over his chest defensively, expression set into something closely resembling a pout. It's adorable.

Remus leads Sirius to his room, waiting for him to step in before closing the door. He neatly steps around Sirius, careful not to brush against him, respecting his boundaries.

"What?" Sirius bites out. "Talk."

"Sit," Remus orders as he takes his own spot on the edge of the bed. He gestures beside him, and Sirius stares at it, squinting suspiciously like getting too close would be a trap. They're both stubborn enough to wait each other out, a challenge, but Remus isn't budging. He's more stubborn when the situation calls for it, believe it or not.

Finally, Sirius caves and moves over with a warning glare, plopping down next to Remus with space between them, holding his arms out rather childishly and announcing, in a mocking tone, "I'm sat."

"Good job," Remus praises, as equally mocking as Sirius.

"Fuck—" Sirius stops, thinks about it, then turns red. He drops his arms, looking away. "Look, I'm not…pleased with you at the moment, so maybe it's best if we don't do this now."

"I'm not waiting." Remus takes a deep breath, then slowly lets it out. He softens his voice. "I'm done waiting, Sirius."

Sirius' face screws up, and he squeezes his eyes shut, then proceeds to blurt out, "We have to break up."

"Mm, no," Remus says.

"No." Sirius blinks open his eyes. He swivels his head, slowly. Stares at Remus. Blinks and blinks. "No?"

Remus nods. "Yeah. No. We don't have to."

"Well…" Sirius sits on that for a moment, looking a little lost. He opens and closes his mouth, eyebrows pinching together. It takes him a truly adorable length of time to clear his throat and set his shoulders. "Well, we are. So."

"Are we?"

"Yes."

"Look me in the eye, then," Remus says. "Look at me when you break up with me."

Sirius peeks at him, then quickly looks away. He's chewing on his lip. "What does eye-contact have to do with a breakup? Is that, like, required? I've never dumped anyone before."

"Yes, I can tell," Remus replies dryly. "You're rather shit at it."

"I am doing my best," Sirius hisses.

Remus sighs, helplessly fond. "Sirius, stop. You're not breaking up with me."

"I am," Sirius counters weakly. "I am, literally as we speak. This is a breakup. You should be crying. Why aren't you crying?"

"You don't want to break up with me; you just feel you have to, because you hit me," Remus announces bluntly.

Sirius' whole body locks up immediately. He looks like he wants to bolt, his throat convulsing on a harsh swallow. There is shame in his eyes when he looks at Remus, finally, utterly pitiful. "Remus, I'm—I—"

"You were strapped to the chair," Remus begins to explain, holding his gaze. "The fog filled the whole room, so we couldn't see each other. When I removed your restraints, you slammed your palm into my chest. I inhaled reflexively, and you pushed me into the tray by the chair, then tried to hit me. I dodged, you elbowed me in the chest, tried to hit me again, then shoved me against a wall."

"Oh, fuck," Sirius wheezes, looking horrified. "Remus—"

"I thought maybe you just didn't know it was me and couldn't hear me, but I knew it was you. I knew it was you when I tackled you and slammed you against the window," Remus continues, and Sirius blinks.

"That doesn't count. That's self-defense. I was attacking you."

"That's when you hit me."

Sirius practically whimpers. "I'm so sor—"

"And then I shoved you, pinned you there, and heard you breathing," Remus carries on, his voice light. "Very confusing for me, you understand, but I didn't really have much time to think about it, because you whirled me around into the door, then kicked me right through it. I have a bruise in the shape of your boot on my chest."

"Oh, oh shit, Remus," Sirius gasps out, his hands shaking as he reaches for him, only to curl his trembling fingers into fists and pull away. He has tears in his eyes.

"You followed me out," Remus murmurs. "I saw you, and I knew immediately that you weren't really there at the time. You'd slipped away. You looked at me with no recognition, and then you crawled into my lap. Put one hand on the top of my head. One hand under my chin. Got ready to snap my neck."

"No. No, no, no," Sirius chokes out, and he comes up off the bed, a burst of motion. He paces, hyperventilating, hands in his hair, wild-eyed. A mess. A beautiful mess, as always.

Remus exhales. "Listen to me, Sirius. You could have killed me, but you didn't. I could have died, but I didn't. Things could have happened, but they didn't."

"I hurt you," Sirius rasps. "That did happen. That—"

"I didn't blame you, I still don't, because it wasn't your choice. You didn't choose to hurt me," Remus says softly, standing up and ducking his head to chase Sirius' ashamed gaze, catching it and holding it. "But this? What you're doing now hurts me, and it is a choice. You're actively making that choice, because you can't forgive yourself, and that punishes me, too. Do you hear me? You're choosing to hurt me now."

With something bordering on a whine, Sirius shakes his head, chest stuttering on his shaky breathing. "I can't. I can't do it, Remus. I—I can't. You could have died. It doesn't matter if it's out of my control or not. You could have died. If you had, if I was at fault for it, do you have any idea what I would have done? I would have gone insane. I would have—I would—I wouldn't survive that. Not losing you. I love you. Oh fuck, I love you so much, and I—I can't hurt you again—I gave you bruises, but not the fun kind, not—"

Remus huffs in frustration. "Sweetheart, I love you, I do, but you're putting a lot more weight on this than me. I'm—I don't want to be insensitive, I really don't, but I genuinely do not give a shit that you hit me. Like, at all. Because, rationally, it wasn't done by your choice; it wasn't done because you want to hurt me; it wasn't done out of violence you had any control over. I'm not scared of you. My trust in you hasn't fractured. It doesn't hurt, and the bruise will fade, but I'm not going to stop missing you. Or loving you. So, please let it go. Please."

"I need you to care about yourself more," Sirius demands.

"I do care about myself. For fuck's sake, I've been tortured multiple times," Remus snaps. "Sorry if a little bitch hit from my boyfriend doesn't quite compare."

Sirius' mouth drops open.

"It's my body," Remus continues, worked up now. "I decide what I'll accept and what I won't. A couple of fucking bruises is nothing, Sirius. It's a laugh, actually. Take a whip to my back and then we'll talk."

"I—fucking hell," Sirius breathes out. "Remus—"

"Do you want me to hit you in the face?" Remus asks, and Sirius shuts up, giving a violent blink. "Is that what you want? Do we need to, what, settle some sort of score here? Get even? You hit me, I hit you, guilt absolved?"

"What?" Sirius chokes out, eyes bulging.

"If you want," Remus says slowly, holding Sirius' gaze, mouth wrapping around each word like he's tasting every letter, "I will actually slap the shit out of you."

"Remus," Sirius gasps, all dramatic-like, mouth hanging open. His cheeks are flushed. Rosy. All the way down his throat.

"Do you get what I'm saying?" Remus asks, feeling like he's about to rip his own hair out, because they're going in circles and getting nowhere, and it's making him feel like he's about to cry. "It's not a big deal to me, okay? I—it doesn't mean I don't care about myself or my well-being, because I do. If I didn't, I wouldn't grant myself the freedom to beg you now, and I'm begging. I'm begging, because what's worse than you hitting me is these last few weeks without you, and I'm tired of it. I can't do it anymore. I care about myself so much that I'm asking for you, because I need you, alright? I—I need you to be here. I need you to hold me. I need—I—Sirius—"

"Remus," Sirius says, strained, and Remus' vision is blurry, so worked up now that the feeling that he's about to cry has become his reality, the tears building and his body shaking like he's about to rattle apart.

"Look at the fucking world we live in," Remus chokes out, his shoulders heaving. "It's death and blood and pain everywhere, so this? What even is this, in all of that? Not your fault, or mine, that's for sure. We're in war, Sirius. It's war out there, now, and maybe it always has been. So, please, please, let me have the freedom of peace here, with you." He steps closer and wants so badly to reach for Sirius, but won't move an inch. He would never force it. "We—we never thought we'd have this, and now we have it. We have it, sweetheart. We're not in the Hallow. We're as free as we can get right now, more free than we've ever been, and you said—you told me you'd live for me."

"I did live for you," Sirius gasps out. "I really did. I do."

"So let's just—let's live, together," Remus says, plaintively, his voice so tight it threatens to snap between his teeth. "I'm not—I don't want to pressure you or push your boundaries or force you into anything you're not ready for. If you don't want to touch me, that's one thing, but if you hold yourself back out of guilt and fear, to punish yourself, then I can't accept that. Sirius, you deserve better than that. We deserve better than that. Whatever you need, you have it. Forgiveness? It's yours. I forgive you even if you're not at fault."

Sirius swallows harshly and opens his eyes, eyebrows wrinkled in the middle. His hands are flexing at his sides, fingers trembling. "You—you have to let me train you."

"Train—I—what?" Remus blinks, nearly startled right out of his tears. "Train me. You want to train me?"

"Yes," Sirius says firmly, taking a deep breath and setting his shoulders. "Train you to fight me."

"Sirius—"

"No. No, Remus, listen to me. I can't—the loss of control is too much, and this is all that I can think of that will help. Because I can't control when I'm myself and when I'm not, but I can make sure you're ready for anything that I could ever throw at you. I—I want you to be able to beat me. Not kill me, I know you'd never, but incapacitate me, and quickly. I want you to be able to do it half-asleep and blindfolded, when I have a weapon or don't, when I'm not holding back. That way I know you'll be able to stop me from hurting you if—if—"

"Okay," Remus cuts in.

"Okay?" Sirius repeats, his voice small.

Remus takes a deep breath and nods. "Yes, okay. You can train me, if that will make you feel better. If that's what you need, then that's what we'll do. But I won't hurt you, Sirius. If you're going to do this, then you're going to show me how to do it without causing damage."

"I—yes, alright," Sirius mumbles. "We'll—we can ask Effie for help. She's really good."

"This is just a precaution, you know," Remus whispers. "It only happened once. Every other time you were triggered, you weren't violent. It was in the aftermath of torture, Sirius. I really don't think it's going to happen again."

Sirius shrugs, stubborn as ever. "I don't care. I need you to be prepared. That's what I need, because I need you to be okay, and I need to never fucking hurt you again."

"It wasn't your fault."

"Maybe not, but it was my hands."

Remus sighs and tips his head back, blinking hard to fight the tears still stinging in his eyes. "Is this—so, what? We can't move past this? We can't even work on it? Or try? This is it?"

There's a long beat of silence, and then Sirius sounds close to tears when he whimpers, "Well, don't—don't say that. Now it sounds like you're breaking up with me."

"Doesn't feel good, does it?" Remus croaks, dropping his head forward, his heart clenching violently when he sees how splotchy Sirius has gotten, eyes wide and wet. He looks so upset.

"I need to know, Sirius. I need to know if—if—"

"Okay, no, I'm—I'm sorry. I take it back," Sirius decides, and he shuffles forward carefully, tentatively. He doesn't reach out and touch Remus, but he seems to just—fall into him. Lean on him. He hooks his chin over Remus' shoulder and releases a shuddering breath when Remus' arms slip around him all the way, holding him, and yes. Yes, this is it. This is all Remus wants. This right here. Something. "We don't have to break up. I was being stupid. We'll just—we can figure it out."

"Thank you," Remus exhales all at once, sagging against him.

"Oh, oh, you—" Sirius makes a sound like a whine, lips brushing Remus' jaw, and then he's peppering kisses all down the side of Remus' neck. Careful and sweet, but greedy. He chokes a little, groaning, and then—finally—like a flood, Sirius touches him. His hands press against Remus' shoulders, so tender, so adoring. "Remus. Remus."

Remus doesn't even really get to respond before Sirius cups his jaw and tilts his face with urgency, his mouth finding its way to the bruise his fist left behind. Remus' eyes flutter shut, lips parting around a sigh, and Sirius kisses him there so gently like he can wipe the violence away. A world of violence they live in, of course there's some spillage over into them, in who they are themselves and who they are together, but this means so much more. It means something. It means everything.

Sirius is frantic, then, but meticulous. He eases Remus back to the bed and makes him take off his shirt so he can kiss the bruise from his boot, too. Every inch, even where it's ugly, he kisses and kisses and kisses. It doesn't hurt, but it makes Remus ache, because he knows Sirius needs to do it. Needs to face what he did when he didn't even really do it at all, and apologize when he's not to blame, because he's Sirius, and that's what he does. And so Remus lets him. Remus lays there and lets Sirius do this for him, and for himself.

Another thing about Sirius is that he's thorough. He doesn't do anything halfway. So, naturally, he makes Remus turn over to kiss all the scars on his back, too, despite not being responsible for them. It doesn't matter. He's sorry about them as well, and Remus knows it. Because he cares so, so much; he cares more than anyone Remus has ever known.

And maybe Remus is selfish and perhaps enjoying this far too much, because when Sirius asks if he has any new scars, he kicks out of his trousers and shows Sirius where they cut the tracker out of his thigh. Sirius kisses the jagged line with reverence, like he can capture all the pain Remus has ever felt with the surface of his lips and swallow it down himself, keep it all himself so Remus doesn't have to.

Last—oh, yes, Sirius saves the scar on his face for last. He crawls up and cradles Remus' head, holding him still. Kisses every part of that scar, from where it cuts through his eyebrow to where it meets his lip. Sirius doesn't kiss his mouth, but once he's done, he sags like all of his strings have been cut and rests his forehead against Remus'. They breathe.

"You have to let me do that whenever I want, whenever we're alone together, I mean," Sirius whispers. "Can you do that?"

"I don't know. It's such a hardship," Remus jokes. His voice comes out croaky. He doesn't know why, but he just cried. Somewhere in all of that, he cried, and felt—he felt so—he can't even describe what he felt. Love, maybe. Wholly and completely loved. Cherished. Adored.

Sirius rocks their foreheads together. Lets their noses bump. Exhales sharply. "Always fucking with me, aren't you?"

"I'll do it until we're old and grey," Remus murmurs.

"If we get there," Sirius whispers.

Remus strokes his hair. "We'll get there."

Chapter End Notes

drugged james my beloved <3 he's so funny lmao. i want to put him in my pocket!!! him just being so enamored by regulus is so... oh, he's lovely.

also, remus and james!!! there was a reason i didn't mention remus going back for james in the last chapter, because it was going to be addressed again in this chapter! their friendship means so much to me, yall have no idea. and like, remus' anger had been festering, and it was less anger at james and more anger about his lack of freedom in the whole endeavor, which is honestly fair.

then jegulus... AHHHH. so much happens with them. they're so grossly in love, it makes me wanna die. i think, like, this is where it really shines through how much growth regulus has had. like, thinking of where he started out and how he is now, he has come soooo far. im ridiculously proud of him.

also, james getting his glasses back!!! because the thing is, eyesight aside, he DOES need them. like, it's implemented in the story that his glasses help him with his issues with time and such, and they're as necessary as they've always been—like molly said, what's important will always remain so if chosen to let it. i think there's something really special about that, like james reclaiming his bodily autonomy, and still holding onto the fact that there are things about him that CAN'T be changed. it's this really empowering thing of like, james has always needed his glasses, and he still does. no one can take that from him, even though they tried.

also just how tender regulus is with james—this continues to be a theme. and like, if you recall, after what happened with frank, james had the thought that regulus would tell him that he was still good and because bad things happen doesn't mean he's bad, and he KNEW regulus would tell him that, and then regulus did. just like regulus knew the boggart wasn't really james, because james would never say those things, and then james reiterates that now. like, they KNOW each other. they understand each other. that's so special :(

regulus has turned into a whole sap. james is back, and he's now in Coddling Mode. he's gonna coddle this man so much, just wait. he's so in love, i almost pity him, but james is in the same boat lmaooo.

and then we've got remus again!!! i think his viewpoint on murder and the things he's done are so interesting, because like, it's so wildly different to everyone else. he's very pragmatic about it. and like, he's always been aware that it's the worst thing he's done, but he's never been shy about not having any remorse about it. and there is a point in the story where that kind of gets unlocked for him, and you see why its almost out of reach. it's explained more later.

also, remus is just a man on a mission this chapter lmaooo. he MEANT he and sirius were figuring their shit out, and honestly, can't blame him. we love a man who knows what he wants 😌 it was very important for remus to tell sirius everything that happened, because trust is such a big thing between them, for BOTH of them, and they've always been very mindful of each other's boundaries and such. like, they're still insane, but they're so incredibly healthy about it that it makes me kinda scratch my head and squint at them, like how are you DOING THAT? i love them so much.

also, that whole thing of like, remus really getting worked up and diving into the nuance of sirius harming him and how he views it—you have to keep in mind the world they live in, ya know? like, remus KNOWS violence, he knows it intimately, and he is very big on like, his freedom and his choices etc etc, so his frustration with the whole situation genuinely wasn't a lack of care for himself at all.

and sirius struggling with the lack of control and needing to regain control through training remus was a big thing, too. like, they will figure things out, and it'll take time, and they'll be exploring like, forgiveness and intimacy issues etc, so there's more to come on that. it takes time, but they are madly in love with each other, so that isn't gonna change <3

-high james telling a flower joke
-agbt reference to regulus' laughter sounding like the bell in his knitted hat 😭
-molly my beloved <3
-james telling remus he loves him :(
-jegulus being sickeningly in love
-remus and lily fighting (they'll be alright)
-remus making sirius blush and everyone laughing at him lmaooo
-sirius trying to break up with remus and remus just being like No
-remus offering to slap sirius (this is talked about later), but remus is so insane
-sirius kissing all of remus' scars 😭

Day-by-day

Chapter Notes

hello, everyone!!!

warnings for this chapter:

-references to past murder
-references to past death
-references to past child death (its a little bit heavier in this chapter than others, like we actually revisit it briefly, and it's not as vague as the other times)
-references to past torture
-references to past violence
-references to past gun violence
-references to past dissociative amnesia
-references to past injuries/wounds
-references to biological warfare
-depictions of depression
-depictions of ptsd (this is very heavy and involves violent nightmares as well as vague, brief mentions of hallucinations)
-brief, vague implied panic attack (not too heavy, but you can tell that it's happening)
-heavy depictions of grief
-mentions of blood
-heavy descriptions of violent/murderous nightmares involving killing loved ones (sirius and regulus)
-brief mentions/depictions of past burns/burning this chapter is heavier than the one previous, and a lot heavier than the one that follows, and it's the one i like to refer to in my head as "The Struggle Chapter" because everyone is struggling. we get some light, happy moments, sure, but it's definitely a rough one. please read the warnings and take care of yourselves!

Aberforth watches James, Sirius, and Regulus shuffle into the room, each of them looking very, very worn out. Visibly tired. The picture of exhaustion. Albus can't even let them rest?

It makes Aberforth itchy. These are his people. These three here are his; district six, born and raised, and he saw it all. He has seen them when they were no bigger than knee-high, running around and giggling with each other, so innocent then, having no idea that they'd end up here.

Aberforth wants to snap at Albus to leave them alone, at least for a damn week or two. How can Albus look at them and not see himself? How can he look at them and only see what they can give? Haven't they given enough?

"Take your seats," Albus murmurs, watching them do just that over the top of his glasses. That boy—Regulus—has his jaw clenched; he looks tense, ready to spring, gaze locked on Albus like he's more than willing to come across the table and kill him if he says or does something wrong to the other boys next to him. "I know you're all very tired, so I'll keep this short. I don't intend to hold any of you from well-deserved rest."

Aberforth grunts and squints at him suspiciously, but Albus seems entirely sincere. That's the thing about him, though.

He always does.

"James, I must speak with you first," Albus starts, and James blinks, seeming to rejoin earth. He looks mildly startled to be here, reaching up to touch his glasses fleetingly. "Allow me to introduce myself. My name is Albus Dumbledore, and I'm the one who created the Order of the Phoenix."

James blinks at him, then says, "Er, I know. Dorcas told me."

"I see." Albus gazes at him for a moment, then leans forward to thread his hands together on the table. Something about the action makes Sirius narrow his eyes. "I have to ask, when you were with Riddle, what information did you give him?"

"Ah," James chokes out, freezing in place, tension blooming in his frame immediately. "I—I didn't—"

"Fuck you," Sirius spits out. "You're accusing him of—"

"Leave him alone. You know he was coerced," Regulus hisses.

Albus sighs and lifts a calm hand. "That was not an accusation. James, I assure you that you're in no trouble, and it's not your fault. I'm merely asking so I can be prepared."

"I—" James looks nauseous. "I—I swear I didn't really give him anything. I, um. I gave him as little as possible, just to scrape by. That's why he started making me do broadcasts, but he probably would have no matter what I gave him."

"Yes, I imagine so. He fully intended to never release you from his manipulations; it was a cycle you were trapped in, and not one you could break free from. You did your best," Albus says, and James swallows, some of the tension bleeding out of him. Sirius settles down as well, minutely. Regulus doesn't at all. "I don't blame you for whatever you gave him in the endeavor to save Sirius. I just need to know what it was."

"Um," James mumbles, wincing.

"It's alright, James," Albus assures him. "I'm assuming that Ms. Meadowes explained everything about the Order?"

"Yes, sir," James admits cautiously.

"Including that there are stations we use in each district?"

"Yes, sir."

"Did you tell Riddle that?" Albus asks.

James coughs. "No, sir."

"Did Ms. Meadowes tell you an estimate of our numbers?"

"Yes, sir."

"And did you inform Riddle of that?"

"No, sir."

"Did Ms. Meadowes tell you that we're aware of Riddle's use of biological warfare and intend to create immunity here?"

"Yes, sir."

"Did you tell Riddle that?"

"No, sir."

"He's not a fucking idiot," Regulus snaps. "Maybe he's not the best liar, but he knows how to talk around things, and talk himself out of things. Has it crossed your mind to think that maybe he gave Riddle the bare minimum?"

"Yeah," Sirius agrees firmly, "James wouldn't just dump all the secrets, especially if it put Reggie in danger. No one is better at keeping secrets than him, honestly."

James gives a small, sheepish smile. "That's a bit true. Can't lie to save my life, but I can lie to save theirs, and I can always keep a secret. I mean, I went ten years without telling my own best friend I was in love with his brother. Frankly, I'm a pro."

Albus stares at James and slowly tips his head forward to peer at him over his glasses. "So… what did you give Riddle?"

"Ah," James says awkwardly. He reaches up and scratches at the side of his neck. "Well, er—you, sir."

"Pardon?" Albus asks, blinking.

"I gave him you," James informs him, face scrunching in a clear apology. "I told him you were still alive, and that you run the Order of the Phoenix, and that you've been planning to wage war against him for over fifty years now."

Aberforth waits for the laughter that should be crawling up his throat. He waits to find this funny, because isn't that so funny? Albus, after years of hiding, is in danger. Isn't that hilarious? Where's the laughter? Why isn't Aberforth laughing?

And it's not as if Albus is truly in danger, untouchable in the Phoenix as he is. Someday he may leave it, yes, but likely not until the war is won. Riddle may wish to target him, but he'll be safe. And yet, despite knowing this, Aberforth feels...

Aberforth feels slightly ill. It's supposed to be funny; it's ironic and deserved, perfect karma for Riddle to be aware of Albus' place in all of this, and likely want to hurt him. He'll likely take the very first chance he can get to hurt Albus, in some way or another, and Aberforth isn't laughing. He's not even breathing.

"Well," Albus says lightly, eyes sparkling, "I have to thank you for judging the situation so well and giving the least damaging information you could. You handled that very well, and I can only commend you for it. I'll let all of you go now; I believe you all know how steeped into this war you are, and how your efforts can contribute to ending it faster and more safely, so I will need your help in the future—all of you. For now, though, you all deserve plenty of rest. Thank you."

They all stand, visibly happy to be dismissed, pushing in their chairs and heading swiftly for the door, only for James to gasp and whirl around as he announces, "Oh, I forgot!"

"Something else?" Albus asks.

"Right, yeah, I also gave Riddle one other thing." James winces again and looks right at Aberforth. "Dorcas mentioned you were still alive, so when Riddle—when he asked if my parents made it out of district six, instead of them, I told him you managed to make it out and back to your brother. Er, sorry, Mayor Aberforth. I…gave him you, too."

All the light in Albus' eyes is immediately extinguished, and when he watches it go out, Aberforth finally laughs.

James is very tired. It's a strange sort of tired. A world-weary tired that he's never experienced before, in which people all around are draining him, sapping him of energy.

Not that long ago—in the grand scheme of things—James felt rejuvenated by people. Like they were batteries that could keep him running forever, their laughter when he told a joke pushing him to tell another, their happiness when he did something to please them making him want to please them more. Talking—the voice of life, chatter and communication, a form of caring about people, engaging with them and listening to them. Just being around people was enough to keep him going; oh, he could go for ages and ages, because his smiles came easier and his mind was a lot lighter.

Now… Well, now it takes effort. A lot of effort. Because it's not laughter and chatter and being pleased. It's grief and fear. It's concern for him, the state of the world, and what's coming. Now is not the time for laughter, nor the time for meaningless talks, and no one is fully pleased anymore, not really.
